Nearly three hundred of us gathered last week at Swanwick for the summer school of the London Missionary society. We had a great time, in nothing more valuable than in the handling of great and, in the real sense of the word, fundamental things. The main theme was "Evangelism Through Education," and searching addresses were given on "The Redemption of Man," "Evangelism Through Fellowship," and other kindred subjects. Dr. Maxwell Garnett, who has written an epoch-making book on "Education for World-Citizenship" gave a memorable address on Tuesday morning. It was a thrilling experience to hear him work his way as a scientific thinker to the gospel of Christ, as the hypothesis which satisfies the demand of the human spirit for a single wide interest, focussed in a purpose, which has in it a power to stir and claim the deepest emotions. First he set out to show that such was the quest of all students of education, and then he showed that the quest was in reality one for "faith, hope, love." Dr. Garnett is a scholar of fine attainment. Formerly the principal of a scientific college in Manchester, he is now the secretary of the League of Nations' Union. His strong insistence on the fact that the kingdom of God as revealed in Christ is the only comprehensive interest which satisfies the quest of education, has had and will have a mighty influence upon the policy of our schools. But it must not be supposed that the summer school was transformed from its original purpose to a school for the study of education. It was throughout concerned with the great missionary purpose, and a careful and thorough review of the field was made by missionaries present. Dr. Cochrane, who has been traveling in the east, gave a masterly survey of the eastern scene as it concerns missions. It was wonderful to follow under his guidance the progress of the campaign against leprosy—a campaign which may end in the breaking of this dread power.

The Times

What is to become of the best known of our papers? This problem is not without its serious importance for the life of the nation. It is conjectured that various bidders will be in the market. It is beyond question that the paper has been run at a loss for years, and it looks strange that rich men should bid for the privilege of losing their money. But to possess The Times is to wield an influence for which some men might be amply rewarded for their loss of pounds, shillings, and pence. It is still the paper which is regarded abroad as representative of the educated mind of this county. Among the possible bidders the name of Sir. W. E. Berry is mentioned. He is a great and growing power in journalism, and already he and his brother control the Sunday Times, the Graphic, the House of Cassells, and other big concerns. No one believes that he has reached the limit of his plans. He is the son of a leading citizen and Free Churchman of Merthyr Tydvil, in Wales. But it is still uncertain how far the will of Lord Northcliffe will determine the future of the great journal, for which he paid 900,000 pounds.

Rotarians

Today I had my first experience of a Rotary club, and very delightful and refreshing it was. These clubs are rising in all our great cities, and our American friends will not grudge us this loan from their ample resources in societies. I found a very eager welcome for the preaching of internationalism. I spoke of "The One Front of the World," and no one was warmer in his welcome than a Jewish member of the society. I had gone to the lunch expecting to see Sir J. Martin Harvey, the great actor. He could not come, but with us was another visitor to the town, Gipsy Smith, who spoke a few words, earnest and kind, at the close. The Rotarians may well prove a useful link in the new fellowship of man with man, and nation with nation. Just as every scout is the brother of every other scout throughout the world, so the Rotarian is the brother of every other. The more of such links, the better!

Losses

This morning I read with a shock of surprise that the Rev. E. B. H. Macpherson had died suddenly of heart failure. He was a true minister of Christ, gifted in exposition of the word and in the statesmanship of the church. At Northfield he had been a visitor and acceptable speaker more than once. A warm-hearted, cheerful, generous man, he will make a gap in his own church, the Presbyterian church of England, and in the ranks of his friends. . . . Mrs. Sophie Bryant, whose death is reported from Chamonix, was a great educationalist, who in recent years had worked hard upon the teaching of holy scriptures. Among the teachers of her generation she held a high place, and when she revisited her school, the "North London," she was received with great honor. Her school, one of the finest of institutions, speaks of her devotion and splendid gifts of mind and heart. . . . . That brilliant writer, Mr. W. H. Hudson, has left the scene, which he knew so well how to picture. No one who turns over his books from "A Naturalist in La Plata" to the last of them will regret it. He was a naturalist who seemed to listen to the voices of nature with an ear which never failed him.

From the Poems of West Ham

I do not think I have ever fulfilled my promise to give The Christian Century the West Ham poem, which was crowned by Sir Arthur A. Quiller-Couch. Here are some of the verses, there will scarcely be room for all:

From a high place I saw the city
Open and bare below me spread,
And therein walked (O God of pity!)
Few living, many dead.

Dead men entombed in daily labor,
Grappling for gold in ghostly strife;
Dead neighbors chattering to dead neighbors;
And dead youth—seeing life.

Dead women decking lifeless bodies
(See, what a gay and lovely shroud!)
And in rich temples, where no God is,
Dead corpses, praying loud.

But O, my eyes were ever turning,
With joy and tender deep delight
To where, like stars in dark skies burning,
The living souls shone bright.

Where are her priestly hands preparing
Holy mother and happy wife?
Daily her humble home is sharing
The bread and wine of life.

The neighbors seek her fireside, telling
Of sacred sorrow, joyous plan;
And often quietly in her dwelling
Meet with the Son of Man.

See where the craftsman's last touch lingers
To draw the wonder from the wood,
As life and love, poured through his fingers,
Create and call it good.

Yonder a youth, afire with pity,
Cries in the press most passionately,
"Comrades, arise! and build a city
Fit dwelling for the free!"

He cries. The dead men pass. The pavement
Echoes his voice. Yet, if one stay,
Hope whispers that one opening grave meant
A resurrection day!

There a stern gray-haired prophet preaches
To proud pews full of dull and dead;
And there a gentle schoolma'am teaches
With glory round her head.

Many the dead, and few the living?
Yet see life springing everywhere.
Leaping from soul to soul, and giving
A pause to our despair.

And comes the wind of God's voice sweeping—
"Blind seer, behold again! for they,
Whom you called dead men, are but sleeping
And shall awake one day!"

A Prayer Answered

I found among some letters of last year one from the late Rev. A. J. Viner, whose sudden death took place some months ago. He said, referring to one who had passed away: "What a happy ending. . . . To spend the day in the church she loved and then pass away without weary waiting and pain. May my end be such." Two months afterwards after a Sunday spent in the church of Christ, this man fell dead without any pain or waiting. His wish was granted.

The Mission of the Radical*

WE were emerging from a vast hall, where a radical (a much respected and unusually brilliant person) had just closed his impassioned appeal. My conservative companion (I, now and then, associate with such for the same reason that we plunge red-hot horse shoes into cold water!) remarked: "I can see the place of a radical—we need them to break up the ground in advance of progress." In the words of Mark Sabre, "I see what he means." We like that note in Mark, that ability to see plainly the other side. Cheerfully and freely we acknowledge the function of the intelligent conservative, the temperamental conservative (not the blind, ignorant, dull obscurantist). The conservative is the governor on the engine, the brake on the motor, the "hold-back" strap on the harness. We need conservatives as we need ice houses or deposit boxes. Conservatives keep what others have produced; they pickle ideas; they preserve ideas. We need, on the one hand, to produce wealth, and we need, on the other hand, strong boxes to keep our bonds in safety. Now, John the Baptist was a radical; he was one who broke the ground in advance of progress, making every valley full and every hill low—a highway for the king. John was a forerunner, a herald, a flaming prophet, a passionate radical. Jesus needed John. Jesus appreciated his fiery advocate. He paid a strong tribute to this rough and ready herald: "Of those born of women, none is greater than John." We may well study the man whom Jesus thus highly honored. Before we say more about this radical let us ask one question: What of the "middle-of-the-road" person? In a recent meeting when both liberals and reactionaries had been talking loudly, several men arose and branded themselves as "middle-of-the-road men." They were neither hot nor cold—just tepid; they possessed little mental vigor—just good followers; they evinced no great zeal—seemingly being happily content with things as they were. "Nice people"—these colorless middlers! (Why not say "muddlers!") They had friends in both camps. They played the game according to the rules. They quietly accepted the situation as it was. They carried traditions lightly; they were haunted by no visions; they were just "the common garden variety," plain, ordinary, unimaginative toilers. If the liberal is the engine, if the conservative is the brakes, then the middler is the wheels—he is just pulled or pushed along. Probably a multitude of such people are needed—but they are a sordid lot! "Main Street" was a blast at contented mediocrity. I refuse to sing the praises of the middle-class. I will not praise the timid, contented, unillumined, unthinking man or woman. John was a plain man, even a poor man, but his eyes saw, his brain burned, his voice was resonant wth passion. Lincoln was one of God's plain people—yes, but he was a seer and a prophet. There is no premium on dullness, no glory in stupidity. John was a fiery leader; he renounced property; he lived and died for an idea. He saw that society needed God. His soul glowed with pure religion. Pure religion, for him, was not exhausted upon individual satisfactions, but expressed itself in social justices. His preaching caused people to cry out: "What shall we do?" And his answers were in every case social. He baptized people, thus expressing repentance, but repentance was proved only by social righteousness. This was a wholesome gospel and a balanced religious life. Jesus needed the radical to blaze the trail. Jesus approved and appreciated the work of John. In the cathedral of St. John the Divine nineteen heroic figures, one for each century, have been placed. These nineteen figures have created much comment. Who are these leading men? What did they do? Burning souls—every one! Justin Martyr, glorious St. Francis, Cranmer, with the smell of fire; our own Washington and Lincoln—sacrificial men. A block of unchiseled marble stands in the twentieth niche—whose rugged form, whose spiritual face will emerge? No selfish brute—no smug bourgeois—no traditionalist—very likely it will be the John the Baptist of this day—some unselfish, passionate dreamer, some fiery radical who breaks the road for a fairer tomorrow. We may kill him today—we will place him in the cathedral day after tomorrow. "Who follows in his train?"

Our Lost Youth

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: "The Atrophy of Spirituality in Youth," an editorial article in The Christian Century of August 24, needs the attention of all earnest Christians. The fact stated is, I believe, more widespread than either Dr. Jones or the editor seems to believe. There is a real cause for it. I may not have discovered the cause, but I think I have. For six years I lived in a Christian college town; for four years I was doing evangelistic work over a territory of about thirty counties in Illinois; for two years I was away from Illinois in New York state and Virginia. In all of this field I found these conditions: The children of Christian parents going to college (Christian colleges) only to come back at vacation times out of touch with church work or spiritual conditions, oftentimes openly boasting of having gotten beyond such crudities as prayer, and belief in the Bible, and saying "No one who knows anything believes in such things any more." And frequently quoting their professors as proof of the mistakes of the Bible and the misconceptions of Jesus himself. The influence of these "college folks" soon spreads to the brothers and sisters in the home. I could give hundreds of individual cases of this kind. It is a general condition today of college atmosphere. And it all comes of so-called German rationalism: a thing that works in the dark, not daring to come out and take the platform in fair debate. It is the creed which cost Germany her soul, and which will cost America her soul, if the wish of German-Jewish professors prevails. How or why Christian professors have fallen for this barbarous teaching, unscientific and anti-Christian as it is, and have themselves helped to make education practically impossible unless you will accept the hypothesis of evolution as the basis of all scientific research, can only be answered when you remember that "we wrestle not against flesh and blood." Christianity made our standards of education possible; but Satan has used the system we have built up to wreck civilization and Christianity. If evolution is true, if the Bible is only of human origin, if Jesus was mistaken, then the youth of today cannot be blamed for "having cut him (God) off their list of acquaintances." But who is to answer for this threatened wreck of Christian civilization? God have mercy on us all, and especially on the hands that have sowed this seed of the evil one.

Unity and Union

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The article by Joseph Fort Newton in your issue of July 27, on attempts at unity among the Christian denominations, is wholesome and wise. It has reminded me of the two brief passages in notes I received, now more than fifty years ago, from the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, concerning the name of a paper that the firm of which I was a member were about to publish, with Mr. Beecher's editorial assistance.

"Peekskill, Aug. 31, '69 . . . . As to name, I prefer 'Christian union', much; it is worldwide, 'church' is not. There are many Christians not in churches, and it is a truly catholic Christianity that we mean to advocate . . . ."

"Sept. 6, '69 . . . . 'Christian union' is far better than 'church union', as it is the only union ever to be expected or desired. The union of churches is as absurd as the union of families in philanstery. Church harmony may be held while the hundred sects keep their distinctive organizations. This is to be the marrow of our doctrine—Christian union and ecclesiastical diversity."

In Mr. Beecher's own church, indeed, he carried out this view of intellectual diversity and spiritual unity with eminent success. To quote a paragraph I wrote shortly after his death: "The broad foundation on which he stood made him broadly liberal toward all beliefs which accepted Christ and successfully labored to make men Christ-like. Indomitable in the assertion of his own beliefs (mostly 'Orthodox') he was no less vigorous in maintaining the rights of others to theirs. One of his most characteristic sermons was entitled, 'Other Men's Consciences.' His church received into its communion members from all the Christian sects, who found there a common ground on which to stand and to work. This commingling of elements gave him a body of men and women knit together by the profoundest sympathy in a simple faith, and by an ardent love for the man who had released them from the bonds of petty sectarianism and opened to them the larger liberty of Christian manhood."

Why cannot the present tendency toward considering Christian unity be guided to such a "unity of the spirit" of Christ? And that, not necessarily in individual churches, (although there it would often solve difficulties of maintenance, and perhaps is already growing) but among the denominations at large; such a common loyalty to the Master as inspired the exceedingly diverse original Disciples in their apostolic labors —that "turned the world upside down."

Morristown, N. J. JOHN RAYMOND HOWARD.

Political Prisoners

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: During my recent stay in England I was repeatedly asked whether statements in the English press to the effect that political prisoners—war-time prisoners—are still confined in the United States, could be true. It seemed incredible to English people that these men could still be in prison for expression of opinion only and under war-time legislation now no longer in force.

Again and again I was humiliated to be obliged to admit that my own country is indeed the only one of all that were engaged in the world war that is now in this indefensible position. I use the word "indefensible" advisedly. The government has given no valid or defensible reason for its actions. In writing these words I have in mind the letter sent by Attorney General Daugherty not long ago in reply to inquiries made on this subject by the Federal Council of Churches. The council published Mr. Daugherty's letter together with its own findings of fact regarding the various statements the letter made. (March 11, 1922, issue Information Service, Federal Council of Churches, 105 East 22nd St., New York.)

I have in mind also the practically invariable remark made by government officials when writing or speaking of the release of these men—that "No one advocating the overthrow of the government by violence will be pardoned." It seems to me about as relevant to continue to repeat this ancient formula in connection with these particular men as it would be to reiterate that "No one addicted to walking on his head will be allowed at large." Many of these men I know personally. I know also that the industrial organization to which practically all of them belong is concerned exclusively with industry and is not interested in the overthrow of any government whatsoever.

It would be amusing, were it not for the tragedy that it connotes, to hear men who hold positions of high responsibility talk in this way as if they were entirely ignorant of the fact, well known to people at large (apparently well known to intelligent people even on the other side of the world)—that every one of these political prisoners has been legally and completely cleared of all the preposterous charges made against them during war-time hysteria; that they are now in prison solely for opinions; and that none of these opinions has anything to do with violence in any degree or direction, or with the overthrow of any government. Someone should inform government officials of these facts, so that they will not continue to make so serious a blunder in public any longer. I would not of course like to believe that they already know the facts and yet continue to harp on this ludicrous formula disingenuously. I would much rather give them all the benefit of the doubt. No honest government has any need to be tolerant. There is no "agitator" like injustice.

Has not the time come for all of us, regardless of church or political affiliations, regardless of the demands of our own personal affairs, regardless of every consideration except that of the plain justice of the matter—the inalienable human rights involved, the sheer humanity at stake—to take our stand definitely, emphatically, unequivocally, in behalf of these men in Leavenworth who are standing so courageously by their principles and their consciences, in the face of such odds? These men are bearing the brunt of the impetus toward intolerance and repression begotten by the war and are upholding the best traditions of American manhood, laying the foundation of a more truly American conception of freedom, a freedom that is worthy the name.

Surely too few of us, in the churches especially, are bearing our share of this burden, this work of foundation-building. These men are living true to their ideals at the cost, literally, of their lives. How many of us are doing anything like this for the ideals we profess to hold supreme? How many of us can measure up in courage, in sheer honesty of purpose, in faith, with these men who are giving their lives in the full knowledge that for them individually there is everything to lose and nothing to gain, that no advantage can possibly accrue to them, personally. They are true to their ideals in the hope that "the children of the future" may have a better world to live in.

I feel indeed that the political-prisoner situation as a whole is one of the very gravest issues that confronts us today, and that we should all, especially we in the churches, make it our definite and serious concern to inform ourselves fully regarding it in all its bearings.

Ku Klux Klan

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A few weeks ago I read the articles printed in The Christian Century upon the activities of the Ku Klux Klan, by Sherwood Eddy. In your last issue of September 7, an apparent member of the Klan wrote a letter in which the Klan was quite vigorously upheld. The grounds upon which the article was based, however, seem to be too trifling, in my judgment, to make a valuable defense to that organization.

In the first place, Mr. Gould, who wrote the article, seems to have been replying to an editorial in the Century of July 13; he makes no reference to the later articles of Sherwood Eddy; this probably was not purposeful, but in view of the later articles, much of what Mr. Gould has said seems almost absurd. His letter would make a good appeal more to a person with a single track mind than to a more careful thinker.

This is due to the placing of the Masonic organization on a parallel line with the Ku Klux Klan, merely because each one of them is a secret organization. That similarity exists; granted. But such a similarity cannot by any means justify some of the glaring differences which exist between the organizations. These differences are not apparent at first, let me say; which may help somewhat to explain why so many of the Klan members are also members of the Masons, as explained by Mr. Gould. However, if my understanding is correct, the Masonic orders exist for fraternal fellowship and for the building of character. It is a Protestant body as a whole, it is true; yet it is not anti-Catholic in purpose. On the whole it is a very tolerant organization—partly because many of its members belong specifically to no church. The Knights of Columbus on the other hand seem to be a distinctly anti-Protestant body, if we take their oath for an indication of their purposes. Yet their activity is not as hostile on the surface to Protestantism as the Klan's activity has been toward Catholicism in many places.

Mr. Gould specifically charges the Knights of Columbus with being the "people responsible for the absurd, false propaganda now being circulated against the knights of the Ku Klux Klan." Behind these charges there seems to be only the proof of affirmation. Such wholesale charges must be condemned by most thinking men—especially since the most successful bit of propaganda I have yet seen against the Klan has been written by Sherwood Eddy, and that on his own investigation. And Mr. Eddy, in my opinion, represents the best type of liberal Protestantism in America today. According to Mr. Gould's last sentence, in which he seems to compress a good deal of his feeling about the matter, Mr. Eddy would be classed as an enemy of "our school, our church and our state." Rather an anachronism!

The Klan is an instrument, apparently devised to improve our social order as such. Under this they seem to stand for "the tenets of the Christian religion" and yet in the next breath they stand for "white supremacy." Can the two be consistently combined? A sentence arises in my mind as I write, quoted from Gilbert Loveland in a missionary address: "There are no inferior races; there are undeveloped races." Contrast this with the statement made by Colonel Simmons, "the Imperial Wizard," quoted by Eddy in the August 17 number of the Century: "Keep the Negro and the other fellow (immigrant) where he belongs. They have no part in our political and social life. . . . To assure the supremacy of the white race, we believe in the exclusion of the yellow race and the disfranchisement of the Negro." And yet one of the beliefs (yea, major beliefs) of any member who joins the Klan is "the upholding of the constitution of these United States"—which constitution says in Article XV, Section 1, "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States of by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitiure." Perhaps some of the Klan members may apologize for their leadership and still maintain that the objects for which the Klan was formed are above reproach. Many of them are; but the means chosen are rather ill-advised in the United States, where the "best citizens" want the betterment of the nation to come through the means that the majority of the people have chosen and upheld since the founding of our country.

There are two sides to the question, of course. But on the whole, we must remember as a nation that in the past, progress was slow. If we have learned any of the laws of evolution, they have pointed this out clearly. So in our struggle for a better society, let us not choose impatient methods, though we find ourselves discouraged at times. The better way was pointed out by Him in whom there was no shadow. "For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known; what I tell you in the darkness, speak ye in the light." And again, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till it was all leavened." Not dynamite but leaven is the remedy.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Establish Loan Library on Evangelism

The Illinois Christian Missionary society, of which Rev. Harry H. Peters is secretary, is establishing a loan library on evangelism with a hundred volumes in the collection. These will be mailed to ministers on application. The collection contains not only the standard volumes by such conservative writers as Torrey, but one is also interested to find in it Davenport's "Primitive Traits in Religious Revivals" and Stevens' "The Christian Doctrine of Salvation." Disciples leaders are realizing that one of the preaching problems these days is the proper supply of good books, and the department of the ministry of the United Christian Missionary society proposes to found a loan library of a more general character.

England Changing in Attitude Toward Sunday

Since the war many thousands of men who were in France have carried back to their native land the Continental conception of the Lord's day. Nowhere is this more manifest than in England. The London County council recently voted 74 to 47 to allow games in the public parks on Sunday, something unheard of in England. The Dean of Exeter recently gave permission to the choir boys to play cricket after the Sunday services, an action which has aroused much discussion, it being argued by the Christian forces generally that the complete secularization of Sunday would result in large transportation demands, and the enforced labor of many working people.

Mohammedan Mosque in Detroit Will be Sold

Two years ago Muhahhad Karoub, of Detroit, a devoted Mohammedan of large means, conceived the idea of building a mosque where the teachings of the Prophet might be given to the western world, and spent a total of $55,000 on the venture. It did not turn out well, however, for internal dissension in the group soon emptied the mosque. The Detroit officials put the property on the tax list as being vacant, and not used for religious worship, hence it is now announced that Mr. Karoub will sell the property. It is stated by the Home Missions council that this is the only Mohammedan mosque in the western world, although there are groups of Mohammedan immigrants in a number of the cities of North America.

Hold Worship in a Railroad Car

Both the Baptists and the Roman Catholics have railway cars which are used as a place of worship. These cars are usually conveyed by the railroad free to various hamlets where the people are assembled for worship. The Catholic church has recently refitted a car in the Pullman shops of Chicago called the "St. Paul." This car seats seventy-five people and contains an altar, an organ, stations of the cross, library, dining-room for the priests, sleeping quarters for the staff, and last but not least, a collection box.

Dr. Cadman Invited to Succeed Dr. Jowett?

The pulpit of Westminster Chapel, London, recently resigned by Dr. J. H. Jowett because of ill health, may be occupied by Dr. S. P. Cadman, pastor of Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn Such is the report now being circulated, as Dr. Cadman sails to England to fill a series of preaching engagements, of which Westminster church is one. Whether Dr. Cadman will accept the invitation is problematical, for he has in the past refused calls from various churches both in this country and England. Dr. Cadman is of English birth, but has been in this country for more than thirty years and has been with the Brooklyn church for nearly twenty-two years.

Disciples Church Proposes to Sell Out

The Disciples church at Junction City, Ky., has publicly offered to sell out its property and join with any other congregation of Christians in the city on any basis which includes only those things which all Protestants accept as true, and which are also scriptural. There are seven churches in a town of 600 people, three colored and four white. The minister has tendered a provisional resignation to be accepted in case the proposal of this church is accepted by any other in the town.

Brave Leader of Down-town Church Goes Forward

One of the sturdiest souls at work in down-town Chicago is Rev. Johnston Myers, pastor of Immanuel Baptist church, whose Christian purpose is appreciated by all, though his plan of feeding indiscriminately so many people is sometimes criticized by those with sociological training. His church spire was blown down last spring on the eve of a building enterprise on the adjacent lot. Undaunted by this, however, he will go forward in the erection of a $225,000 building, part of which will be rented as office space, and the lower floors used for religious work. One hundred thousand dollars is still needed for the enterprise, and Dr. Myers has given up his vacation this year to raise the money.

First Community Church Handbook Appears

With the growth of federated and community churches throughout the United States, there has come a demand for accurate information with regard to these enterprises. Rev. David R. Piper, editor of the Community Churchman, of Excelsior Springs, Mo., has issued a "Handbook of the Community Church Movement in the United States." In this booklet the various forms of organization are described, a sample church constitution is given, and the service activities of these churches are tabulated. According to the handbook, Iowa and Illinois lead in the number of organizations. The Iowa organizations are largely rural, while a great many of the Illinois organizations are suburban about Chicago.

Daily Vacation Bible Schools Great Success

From every part of the nation come reports of successful daily vacation Bible schools. Perhaps one of the most unique was that held in a camping ground of automobilists near the giant redwoods in California. The Santa Rosa Baptist church had primary responsibility for this enterprise. In New York this year there were 250 such schools organized under the Metropolitan Federation of Daily Vacation Bible schools. Seventeen hundred instructors had under their care 70,000 children. In two years the Baptists of Indianapolis have increased their schools from 2 to 18.

Baptists Call Experienced Church Architect

The American Baptist Home Mission society has a department of architecture of which Mr. George E. Merrill is secretary. The board has recently called as assistant secretary, Mr. Emery B. Jackson, who has twelve years' experience as a practical architect. Mr. Jackson has studied at the Ecole des Beaux Arts of Paris and is regarded as a competent adviser upon the subject of church architecture. The Southern Baptist convention has also developed such a department.

How Modern Church Program Spreads

Although some of the smaller denominations are still regarded by the Christian world as being non-progressive in spirit, this is often a most fallacious assumption, as is well illustrated by a study of the church program of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkard) at Miami, N. Mex. This church defends a community recreation program by an appeal to the leading authorities on the subject. For the fourth year this church is at work upon this task. It has also developed its program of religious education to such an extent as to secure credit in the public schools for Bible study. Rev. Ira J. Lapp, pastor of the church, teaches the courses on Hebrew history and ethics for which credit is given.

Pray for Revival of Religion

The Great Commission Prayer League, a new organization among the older type of evangelicals of Chicago, seeks to promote a general revival through the exercises of prayer. In its recent literature, it proposes that Watch Night this year shall be specially devoted to prayer for a general revival. An unhappy feature of the movement is a certain atmosphere of suspicion of ministers, which may be noted in the following paragraph of a recent letter: "Infidelity of both doctrine and practice has invaded and is invading our pulpits and churches to an alarming extent. A widely-traveled editor of Great Britain declares that 'at least 75 per cent of the pastors of England are unsound in doctrine.' What proportion of American pastors, think you, have departed from the faith?"

Southern Baptists Plan to Finish Campaign

The Southern Baptist leaders who met in Nashville early in the summer to consider plans for the completion of their $75,000,000 campaign, have secured Dr. L. R. Scarborough as director of the campaign. The work of the laymen's missionary movement was approved. These leaders are concerned with the aftermath of their campaign, and they will ask the 1923 convention to create a large committee which will formulate a program for the period following the collection of the big fund.

Drastic Cut in Number of Chaplains

By the recent action of the congress of the United States cutting down the personnel of the officers of the army by 2,000, a considerable number of chaplains will be retired. There will be only 125 chaplains in service after the first of the year. Fifty Protestant chaplains now find it necessary to seek other positions. The committee on chaplains maintained by the Protestants at Washington is making every effort to see that these men are at once offered suitable work in their various denominations.

Presbyterians to Secure New Pictures of Near East

Rev. B. Carter Millikin, educational secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian church, will sail the latter part of September for Syria and Persia, where the Presbyterians carry on significant work. One of the objects of the trip is to enlarge the lantern slide service of the board, for the denomination has been able to secure large results from the use of lantern slides during recent years. Twenty-two lecture sets on foreign missions are now announced in the folder of this department.

Friends Report Crop Failure in Russia

The American Friends Service committee reports that a vast area of the famine country of Russia has suffered another crop failure through drought this year. A thousand miles east of Moscow is a section where there has been no rain for over a month at the critical season this year. Jessica Smith, the Quaker supervisor for this district, has made a detailed report to the American committee showing a half crop in some sections, and a total loss in others. In one volost the human population has dropped from 11,500 to 6,000 and out of 2,755 horses, only 223 remain. The horses are ill-fed, and not fit for work. Horse speculators are in the country with animals, but at prices which are prohibitive. The American Friends committee has promised to continue its work during the coming winter when it will be more needed than ever and will make an appeal to its American constituency for funds.

Volleyball Breaks Down Mohammedan Prejudice

The Y. M. C. A. has successfully introduced volleyball at Smyrna. Recently two groups of Mohammedan girls played a match game before foreign spectators. By all the rules of their religion they should have kept their faces veiled, but that is out of date in Smyrna now. The local Y. M. C. A. is quite an example of Christian cooperation. On this board is an Anglican, a Scotch Presbyterian, a Roman Catholic, a Gregorian, and a member of the Greek Orthodox church. The head of the Greek church has given his blessing to the study of the Bible as carried on by the Y. M. C. A. The summer camp for boys conducted on the banks of the Aegean sea is one of the most popular features of the association in this section.

Methodists Lead Catholics in Money Raised

It has long been believed that the Roman Catholics were the most efficient money getters in America. According to recent reports the Methodists have excelled them. In the year-book of the Federal Council of Churches the money raised by Methodists is given as $85,934,000 while the Catholic offerings are $75,368,294. The other denominations follow in this order: Northern Presbyterians, $47,035,442; Southern Baptists,

Episcopal Convention Gets Under Way

THE forty-seventh triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal church is now in session at Portland, Ore., for a period of about three weeks. The first bishop ever consecrated for service in America received his consecration in 1784. Before that the Episcopal church in America was a church without an episcopacy, and consequently without the rite of confirmation. At the close of the revolutionary war the diocese of Massachusetts sent Rev. Samuel Seabury to Scotland to receive his episcopal authority, the English bishops continuing in their opposition to a native episcopate.

The convention at Portland is made up of two houses. The house of bishops is composed of 102 men who sit by virtue of their office. The house of deputies is organized on the representative principle. Each self-supporting diocese has four lay and four clerical delegates in this house. The missionary districts have only one each. The house of deputies this year is composed of over six hundred men. Women have no representation in the general convention of the church, but the sessions of their missionary society provide for them a certain kind of fellowship. At the close of this present convention a commission will sit to consider whether women should be allowed to represent a diocese in a lay capacity. It is said that there is no considerable demand in this communion that women should be allowed to enter the ministry.

Prayer book revision will provoke a great deal of discussion. The prayer-book is important not only as the manual of devotion of the Episcopal church, but also in a certain sense as the basic document in all study of worship in the Protestant world. There is much conservative resistance to change, yet in many cases the phraseology has become archaic. The attacks will center on the marriage service, with its word "obey" and its reference to Isaac and Rebekah. It is held by many that the two persons mentioned do not afford the world the picture of an ideal home life. There will be a tendency to remove some of the psalms that are more of the spirit of the old testament than of the new. The form of prayer for the president of the United States may be changed.

The matter of the proposed concordat with Congregationalists, by which the ministers of the latter denomination might secure holy orders while continuing as Congregational ministers, has resulted in a division of the committee, so that there will be a minority and a majority report. Since the proposed concordat has been received coldly by many Congregational ministers, there is less interest in this device than at the previous convention at Detroit in 1919. Nevertheless the debate goes to the very bottom of church dogma.

The high church party will push the matter of stiffening up the position of the church with regard to divorce. They demand that no remarriage of divorcees shall be allowed for any cause. At the present time the rector of an Episcopal church may marry the innocent party to a divorce where the cause of divorce is the one sanctioned in Matthew's gospel.

The question of the future organization of the church is also up for consideration. In the past the presiding bishop was the bishop oldest in service. It is proposed that with the death of Bishop Tuttle, the present presiding bishop, this rule shall be amended, and the church shall elect its presiding bishop. With the creation of church machinery to function in the interim between the conventions, this point is important. Bishop Tuttle is now eighty-five years old.

The Episcopal church has in recent years been making a quiet gain in membership. Its influence in the country is much larger than its membership would entitle it to on account of the age and dignity of the organization. With the abandonment of its former attitude of aloofness to other Christian bodies, it now promises to assume a new and promising role as one of the leaders in the good cause of the reunion of Christ's followers.

$34,881,052; Protestant Episcopal, $34,873,221; Southern Methodists, $33,859,832; Northern Baptists, $21,926,143; Congregationalists, $21,233,412. Of the larger denominations, the Episcopalians are the most generous with offerings of $31.59 per capita. The whole Christian group averages over $10 per capita.

Conference of Denominations in Jamaica

In making ready for the approaching Conference on Faith and Order which will be held in Washington in 1924, the Episcopalian leaders in many sections of the world will hold local conferences to organize sentiment in behalf of union. Such a conference of Episcopalians and the various free church denominations was recently held on the island of Jamaica. There was no expressed difficulty over agreement in matters of faith, but the point of difference was in the mutual recognition of the ministerial orders. The Roman Catholics in Jamaica did not participate in the conference, though many individual Catholics were friendly.

Religious Instruction at University of Illinois

Various religious organizations at the University of Illinois have issued a booklet jointly setting forth the courses of study in religion which will be given there during the coming year. Methodists, Catholics, and Disciples will give courses of University rank, and in addition a number of the churches are announcing Sunday morning studies in religion which will be of more than usual merit. Dr. W. A. Goodell is teaching on the Wesley Foundation. Rev. John A. O'Brien is supported by the Columbus Foundation. The Disciples have secured as their teacher, Dr. Frank Dickinson Coop, who is the scion of a well-known family of English Disciples. The University of Illinois allows credit on its bachelor degree of not more than ten semester hours of religious study. The students must be of sophomore standing or better. The instructor must hold a Ph.D. degree from a school of recognized standing. The religious classes must be conducted on university standards as to numbers, and the instructor must not give more than twelve hours a week of instruction.

New Study of Russian Immigrant Is Out

Prof. Jerome Davis of Dartmouth, who is known to Christian Century readers through his articles, is the author of a new book published by Macmillan this month on "The Russian Immigrant." The book is highly commended by some of the leading sociologists of the country. Books ordered from the author in the early autumn by readers of this paper will be supplied at cost.

Y. M. C. A. Secretaries Strong for World Peace

The Y. M. C. A. conducted a summer school for its employed officers in New York this summer. President William J. Hutchins, of Berea college, taught a class in "America's Relation to the Promotion of Peace," which was attended by 250 leaders of the Y. M. C. A. movement. At the close of the instruction, a resolution was passed congratulating the present administration on its achievements in the limitation of armaments and in behalf of international friendship. The secretaries pledged themselves to work for peace through public addresses, study groups, forums, printed matter and every other available means.

Church Demands An Impartial Trial At Herrin

The Tabernacle Congregational church of Chicago recently passed resolutions on the mine tragedy at Herrin, Ill., charging that the publicity on this matter had tended to obscure the responsibility of certain mine officials. The resolution asks Governor Len Small to make sure that in the approaching trial every guilty person shall be brought to justice. Among other things the resolution states: "We, the official board of the Tabernacle Congregational church, petition the governor and attorney-general of Illinois to use extraordinary precautions in conducting the Herrin investigation that it may be absolutely impartial and sufficiently thorough to reach high and low, employer and employe, who took part in, or whose acts contributed directly in bringing about the Herrin murders. Thus may the efforts to remove the blot of Herrin from the good name of our beloved state not re-

Dr. McElveen Comes Out for Liberal Divorce Laws

The Protestant Episcopal convention in Portland, Ore., has brought to that city an interest in theological discussion. Among the questions before this convention, the proposal to allow no remarriage of divorcees is prominent. Dr. W. T. McElveen, pastor of a leading Congregational church in that city, on Sept. 10 preached a sermon advocating liberal divorce laws. He charged that Episcopal rectors who would not marry divorcees often sent these couples to him for marriage. Dr. McElveen claims that the church people who get divorces are not numerous, anyway, for religious beliefs lessen the family problem.

Rio de Janeiro Welcomes Protestantism

Rio de Janeiro, the city of the beautiful harbor, has welcomed Christian missions more cordially than any other city in South America. The first Protestant church in South America, built in 1819, found its home in Rio de Janeiro. In this city is the only hospital in South America supported by South American churches One church in Rio de Janeiro raises $15.000 a year, supports a missionary in Portugal, and conducts fourteen Sunday schools in its own suburbs. In the whole of Brazil, however, there is not much Protestant work. Only twenty-nine missionaries work north and west of the San Francisco river. One state with a million people has but one native pastor.

Baptist Gain is Speeding Up

American Baptists gained a million members in the period from 1918 to 1921, inclusive, according to a survey that has just been completed by Dr. E. P. Alldredge, secretary of survey, statistics and information of the Sunday school board of the Southern Baptist convention. It took 220 years for the Baptists of North America, including in this designation only the regular missionary Baptists of the United States and Canada, to gain their first million, this period being from 1639 to 1859. The second million, however, was obtained in only 20 years, from 1859 to 1879, this period embracing the Civil war and the reconstruction era. The third million was obtained in only 10 years; the fourth million in 8 years; the fifth million in 9 years; the sixth million in 7 years and the eighth million in 3 years, the total figures for the regular misionary Baptists in the United States and Canada in 1921 being 8,115,445. The ministers of the Southern Baptist convention baptized 260,000 converts in 1921.

Fort Worth Mayor Preaches During Vacation

Mayor E. R. Cockrell of Forth Worth, Tex., was formerly a teacher in Texas Christian university of his home city. He has also been a lay preacher, and during the summer months he has supplied the pulpit for a number of ministers who have been away on vacation. He has visited the neighboring city of Dallas on three recent Sundays, preaching in Oak Cliff Christian church, Central Christian church and East Dallas Christian church.

Wesleyan Methodists Favor Reunion

At the recent annual conference of the Wesleyan Methodist church the most important question was the proposed reunion of the three leading bodies in British Methodism, the Wesleyan Methodist church, the Primitive Methodist church, and the United Methodist church. Though strong petitions against union were presented, the conference voted 464 to 60 that neither on doctrinal nor financial grounds, nor on the ground of differences of government were there any impediments to the union of these denominations. The Lambeth proposals were also considered at this meeting.

Methodist Secretary Wants Consolidation of Boards

The action of Disciples and Presbyterians in consolidating many of their boards has brought about in some other denominations a demand for similar changes. Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley, secretary of the board of conference claimants of the Methodist Episcopal church, is out with a published statement in favor of definite action at the coming general conference of his church. Dr. Hingeley prefers the Presbyterian plan of four general boards rather than the Disciples plan by which five boards were consolidated into one, leaving out of the scheme education, social reform and Christian unity. At the last general conference, the council of boards of benevolence was created, but this action is not regarded by Dr. Hingeley as the solution of the problem.

Italian Protestants to Have Same Hymn Book

Until a few years ago the main body of Italian Protestants in Italy were Waldensians, with many centuries of loyalty behind them. The conversion of Italian immigrants in America to the faith of the various American denominations has made it possible for these denominations to start work in Italy with the reinforcement of native workers. The division in the Protestant forces there has given a visible demonstration to the Catholics of that country of Protestantism's greatest weakness. Lately there has been a disposition on the part of the Protestants to draw together, which is evidenced by the publication of a hymn book which will be used in every Protestant church in Italy. The book is called "Innario Christiano."

Presbyterian Colleges Secure Large Gifts

It is doubtful whether any denomination in America will show a larger gain in educational endowment for the past year than the Presbyterian. They report a total of $7,584,000. This does not include gifts to Presbyterian institutions, like Princeton, which do not cooperate with the Presbyterian Board of Education. The largest advance was made by Wooster college which secured $1,100,000. James Millikin university of Decatur, Ill., made a gain almost as large, securing a round million. Lafayette college of Easton, Pa., added $1,051,000 to its resources. The Presbyterian Board of Education contributed out of its "challenge fund" $139,000 to encourage these enterprises. Among the achievements of the past year was one to secure $26,000 with which to inaugurate work at the Michigan Agricultural school at Lansing. Dr. Edgar P. Hill, formerly teacher in the McCormick Theological seminary, is now secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Education.

Benevolent Work of the Churches Large

The benevolent work of fraternal orders is much better advertised than is that of the Protestant churches. The Loyal Order of Moose has a great institution at Mooseheart, near Chicago, which cares for a thousand children. Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, and others, care for orphans. The Protestant churches are supporting more children, however, than all the fraternal orders, twenty thousand being maintained in this way. It is now a recognized fact that the goal for any child is to secure its reception into a normal home life, and large numbers of these Protestant children are being put out for adoption every year. The social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches has recently gathered much interesting information with regard to the benevolent work of the churches.

Union of Andover and Harvard Divinity Resisted

The union of Andover Theological Seminary and Harvard Divinity school is not to be accomplished without litigation. Visitors of the former school recently sought an injunction to prevent this union, on the ground that such union would be contrary to the wishes of the donors of the endowment funds. The injunction was denied. The law will permit them a hearing, however, on the merits of their claim. Should the contention be sustained, the merger would be a failure. The opposition is based on theological grounds, the Harvard school having formerly been Unitarian, and Andover orthodox.

Propose to Unite Churches Into Single Organization

At a meeting held in Benton Boulevard Presbyterian church in Kansas City recently, ambitious plans were laid to organize every church in the city into a single organization which would fight law violations and would further Christian teachings. The following purposes are announced for the organization: "To improve the moral standing of our citizenship, To be watchful through special committees and support only those officials who are enforcing the law with-

TEN NEW BOOKS ON JESUS

The most significant fact with regard to the new religious books of the year 1922-23 is the great number of volumes treating of the personality, life and work of Jesus. The publishers have felt the pulse of the serious reading public and the publication of these books is a result of that fact. The world was never so perplexed intellectually and spiritually as today. And men are wistfully turning, as never before—and more hopefully than ever before—to the "Lord of Thought" and of the Heart. Nothing could so enrich the fruitage of this new year than for ten thousand ministers to delve deeply into these new revealings of "The Life of Lives."

THE FINALITY OF CHRIST

By W. E. Orchard

The fame of the pastor of King's Weigh House (Congregational) church, London, long ago reached America. This volume of his sermons will be welcomed by students of present-day tendencies in Christian thinking. The Christian World says: "We commend this book to everyone who loves great preaching and fearless independence. ($1.35).

RABBONI: A Study of Jesus Christ, the Teacher

By Canon Anthony C. Deane

"This is a gracious and wise book, showing how to go to school to the Master Teacher. I do not remember to have seen a better study of Jesus the Teacher, alike in atmosphere and suggestion." (Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, D.D.) ($2.00).

THE REALITY OF JESUS

By J. H. Chambers Macaulay

The author finds the reality of life in the reality of Jesus. He writes with a faith that is overmastering and a brilliancy that sweeps the reader along in wondering enjoyment. He says, "The Mind of Christ is the greatest fact with which the mind of man can come in contact. Multitudes today are adrift, uncertain, unhappy, and inefficient in life, for lack of reality of faith. Jesus recreates belief in God and belief in men. He gives to life its joy, its duty and its destiny. Within the shadow of the world's restlessness lurks the reality of Jesus, and the demand for a religion adequate to life is the conscious or unconscious quest of man for the reality of God today." ($1.75).

JESUS AND LIFE

By Joseph McFadyen

The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, holds that it is a "matter of life or death to the world" that men be christianized in all their various relations. ($2.00).

TOWARD THE UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS

By V. G. Simkhovitch

"The teachings of Christ are an historical event. Let us try to understand them historically. Without an historical understanding we have before us not teachings but texts. There is hardly a text in the four gospels that is not apparently conflicting with other texts. Yet an insight is won when the teachings of Jesus are viewed and understood historically." Thus Dr. Simkhovitch, who is professor of economics at Columbia University, takes up his survey of the background of the teachings of Jesus. Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri, writes that this is the best book he has found covering this phase of Jesus' work. ($1.75).

JESUS CHRIST AND THE WORLD TODAY

By Grace Hutchins and Anna Rochester

"A remarkable piece of work," says Norman Thomas, editor of "The Nation," in commenting upon this new book. He adds: "I have never seen a series of studies dealing with modern social applications of the teachings of Jesus which seemed to me so frank, thoroughgoing and suggestive. If Christianity is to have any positive influence in the making of a new age, it will have to be the sort of Christianity which this book expounds so well." ($1.25).

CHRIST AND INTERNATIONAL LIFE

By Edith Picton-Turbervill (With Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil)

The author's theme is—as phrased and accepted by Lord Robert Cecil—that "our national policy, both internal and external, must be Christianized; that, in other words, Christian morality must in its essence be the guide of our national conduct." It is a thesis that has often been urged by divines and others; the author's eloquent pages vindicate it with much independence and from new angles. Miss Picton-Turbervill is known the world over for her work with the W. C. T. U. and the Y. W. C. A. ($1.50).

THE LORD OF THOUGHT

By Miss Lily Dougall and Rev. C. W. Emmet

This book is a study of the problems which confronted Jesus and the solutions he offered. It deals with the religious beliefs current in Judaism in the time of Jesus and the originality of his teaching in relation to them. It is an apologetic on new lines for the uniqueness of Christianity and the supremacy of our Lord in the realm of thought. ($2.50).

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST

By William Temple, Bishop of Manchester

"Just what many people, both young students and older persons who are desirous of thinking clearly on religious topics, are looking for."—Manchester Guardian. ($1.25).

THE CREATIVE CHRIST

By Edward S. Drown

How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the state, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members? Dr. Drown, who is a well known professor of Cambridge, Mass., holds that the answer to all these questions will be arrived at through the acceptance in deed and truth of the teachings of the "Creative Christ." ($1.50).

out fear or favor, and to condemn, by aroused public sentiment, those officials who fail to keep their trust. To develop to a greater degree Christian activity in the individual. To avoid religious competition by all working for the welfare of the city. To create public sentiment which will secure observance and enforcement of laws in harmony with the will of God. To encourage and co-operate with officials and organizations working for the same purposes. To make necessary research which will guarantee the intelligent election to office of capable and God-fearing men and women. Individual members to call to the attention of the executive committee all law violations."

Movement for Change of Methodist Creed

Methodists will face at their next general conference a demand for a change in the articles of religion. The founders of Methodism sought to make their labors perpetual by inserting a clause in the constitution providing that the general conference should not have power to alter the articles of religion nor to adopt any new standard of doctrine out of harmony with the old. Rev. J. W. Houghton of Wellington, O., says: "Some of the articles are an inheritance from the early church fathers, and we presume to say are not held by scholars of the present day. Some of the statements do not convey a thinkable idea, and certainly their authors did not claim to have been inspired."

ABBE PIERRE

By JAY WILLIAM HUDSON
(Author of "Truths We Live By")

The setting is quaint old Gascony. To his birthplace here comes the old Abbe Pierre, on vacation from the college where he teaches, to live for a time with the whimsical, tender but stalwart folk of his native village. In this atmosphere, representative of the beauty and strength of the true soul of France, develops the delicate love story of Germaine, a Gascon girl, and David Ware, a young American, a writer of verse, and professor of English. Seemingly insurmountable differences stand in their way, but the Abbe Pierre, with his winning spirituality, his kindly heart and his humor, stands their friend, and their romance ends in happiness.

Comments on the Book

William Allen White—"A book full of charm, beauty and truth, and yet a powerful and moving story. Should have the right of way with the American public."

Gertrude Atherton—"Exquisite! I don't think I ever found as many beautiful thoughts in any one book."

Ida M. Tarbell—"I think "Abbe Pierre' is delightful. It has left me with a whole gallery of pleasant pictures."

George Madden Martin, author of "March On"—"It is the other side of 'Main Street.' Comes like a breath of pure air amid so much that is dry and arid."

The New York World—"We move a vote of thanks for Mr. Hudson's book and, so far as we are concerned, it is unanimously carried."

The Boston Transcript—"Once in a while comes the publication of a novel which in the beauty of its inception and the charm of its telling stirs in the hearts of lovers of literature a sense of personal gratitude. 'Abbe Pierre' is one of these."

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat—"Searches the depths of the human heart, so near to smiles and always so near to tears, it grips one in a way that surprises."

SEX AND COMMON SENSE

By MAUDE ROYDEN

A book that deserves serious consideration. Miss Royden declares "it will be to the advantage of the world, of the state, of the individual, and of the race, if all the questions involved are faced with frankness and courage."

The Christian Century comments on this book, editorially, as follows:

"We have come upon times when there is great need of clear thinking and plain speaking on a cluster of questions —marriage, birth control, divorce, and the like—which gather about the relations of the sexes. It is in accord with the fitness of things that the leading woman preacher of our time should deal with such issues; doubly so because she brings to the task not only common sense, but a fine spiritual intelligence and a rich human sympathy. Every page of the book is touched with the light of spiritual vision, and its great value is that it gives us the woman's point of view in respect of questions on which women have been too long silent. No man, no woman can read her addresses without a new sense of the sanctity of the body, no less than of the soul, and the conviction that if our Christianity is social in its genius it should cleanse, enlighten and consecrate the relations of the sexes, which are the foundations of the social order."

The Fundamentals of Christianity

By HENRY C. VEDDER
Professor of Church History, Crozer Theological Seminary.

The answer in detail that this book attempts to give to the question "What is Christianity?" is based upon three convictions: (1) that man's apprehension of the character of God has not stood still but has grown with his growth (2) that the highest forms of this progressive knowledge of God are found in the Old and New Testament literature and culminate in the words of Jesus as preserved in the Gospels (3) that the teaching of Jesus is, therefore, the standard by which all other teaching claiming to be Christian must be compared and, in case of conflict, rejected. It is the main object of this book to convince its readers that the parting of the ways has been reached with the Historical Christianity based on Paul as its authority which still has such wide vogue and that the future belongs to a Christianity that will determine its doctrines, program and methods on the authority of Jesus alone.

What and Where Is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN, Ph.D.

By far the most popular book ever sold by The Christian Century Press. More than two thousand copies have already been disposed of, and it is today one of our best sellers.

Of the book Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, says:

> "I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking. The author is one of those psychologists—and alas! all too few is their number—who have gone into the technique of psychology and thought their way through it into real life again. He speaks with authority. His book will have the approval of technical scholarship, but it is intended for the lay mind. I know that if any person reads the book on my recommendation he will divide with me a small portion of the enthusiastic gratitude which he will surely feel toward the author. In my judgment it is far and away the most important book on religion that has appeared during the past year.

And Dr. Douglas C. McIntosh, professor of theology in Yale, says:

> "What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. Dr. Swain has produced what will undoubtedly prove to be one of the most notable religious books of recent publication.. It contains descriptions of religious experiences which rival in interest anything to be found in William James' 'Varieties of Religious Experience' or Harold Begbie's 'Twice-born Men.' But its most valuable feature is its simple, vivid, original, and attractive presentation of the most important elements of modern constructive thought. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

The Shorter Bible

The New Testament

By Charles Foster Kent

THE AIM of the Shorter Bible is to furnish in logical order those parts of the Bible which have especial bearing on the present age. Here can be read in a straight-ahead narrative the thrilling account of the life of Jesus and his teachings as they began their work of revolutionizing the world's life. Short, pungent sentences characterize this new translation by Professor Kent, who stands almost alone in his especial field. A most compelling presentation of the New Testament story.

$1.25, plus 8 cents postage.

"The Old Testament" of the Shorter Bible is also recently from the press and sells at $2.00, plus 8 cents postage.

In this day of strikes and labor revolutions, every alert leader should have accurate and vivid knowledge of what a strike actually is, and what principles are involved. A typical strike was the recent famous steel strike. The interpretation of this strike by Bishop McConnell and others is invaluable, especially to ministers. The book is entitled, "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike."

ONCE there was a man
Who worried about everything
—Almost everything.
He always went over the books himself
After the book-keeper got through,
"Safe bind, safe find,"
He used to say.
He had the water cooler moved
To the center of the office
So that the force wouldn't waste so much time
Getting a drink.
He had burglar alarms all over his house.
He would get up in the middle of the night
To make sure the lawn-mower
Had been taken in.
He worried a lot about his taxes, too.
And the high cost of living.
And his employes pulled a strike on him
That worried him greatly.
But he never took any interest in politics.
"I've got all I can do Tending to my own business,"
He would say.
He looked over a copy of The New Republic once
But found it too far removed from the realities of life
To be worth a business man's attention.

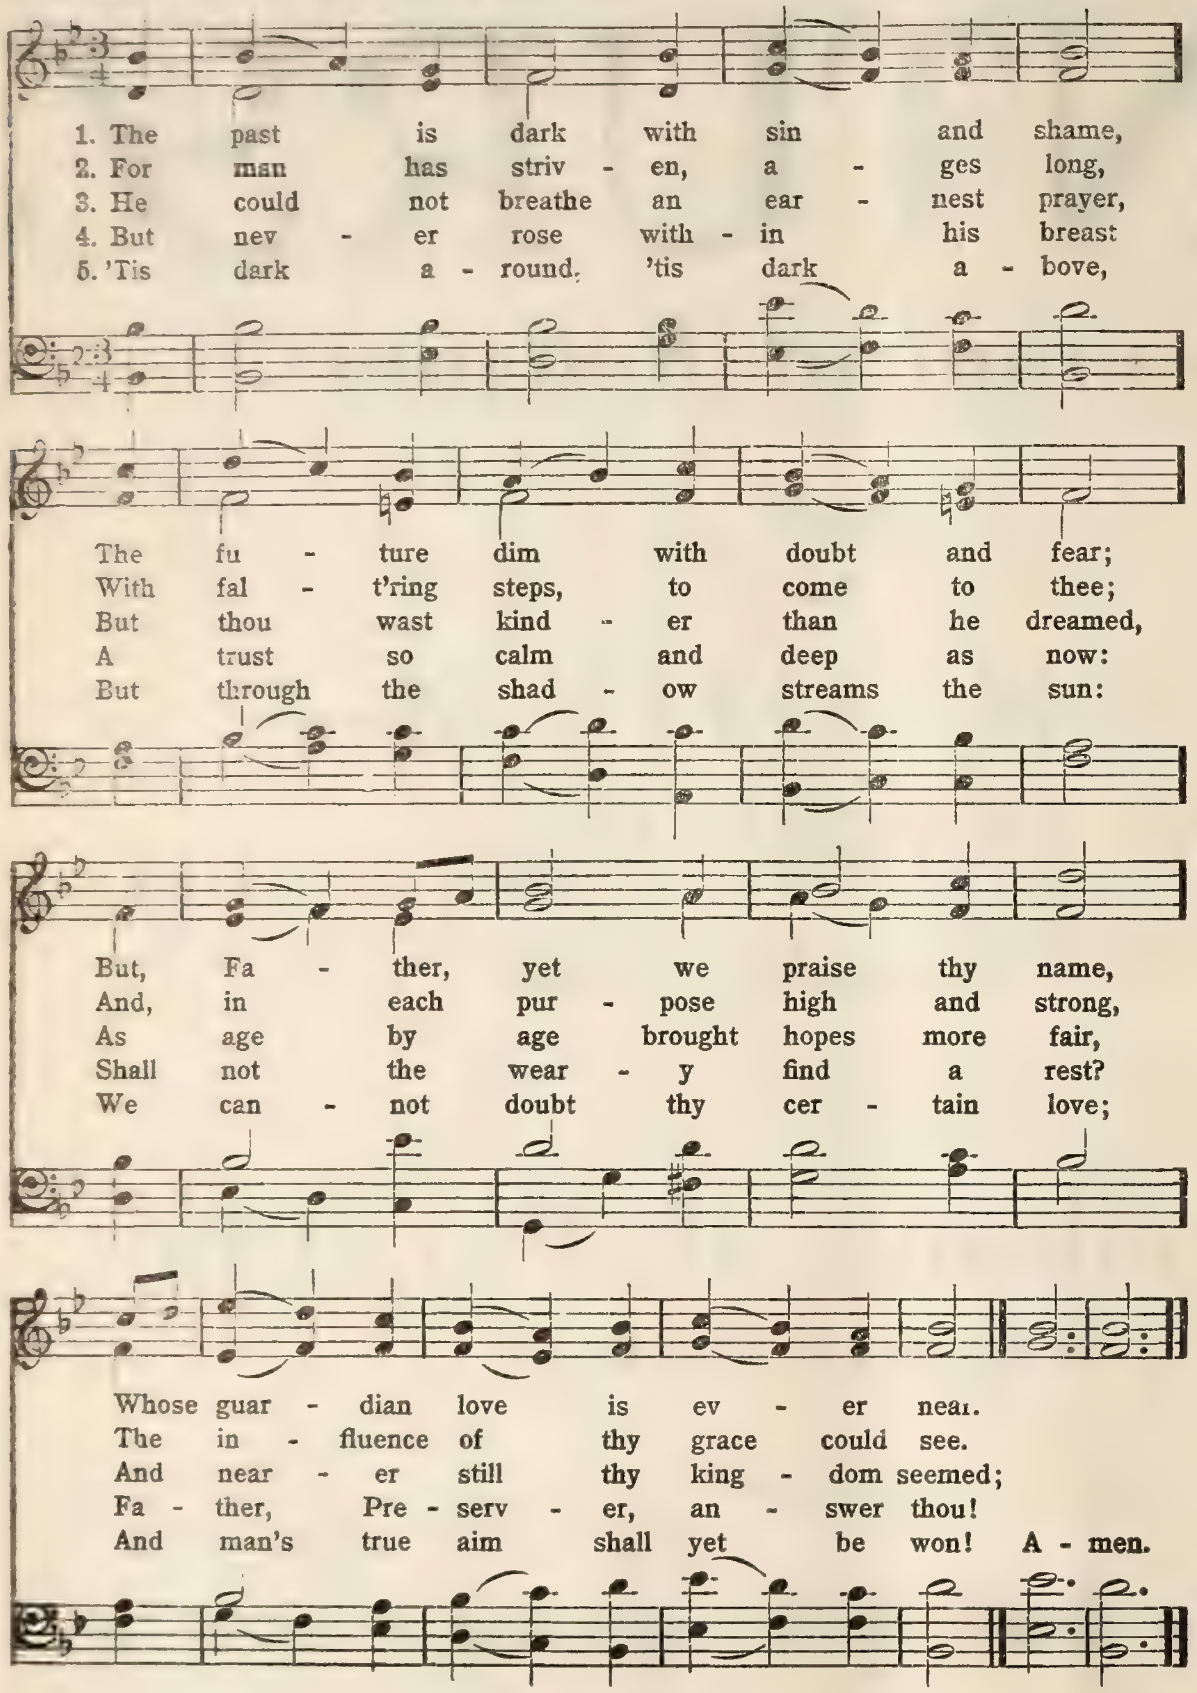
WAREHAM L. M.

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, 1822-1911 WILLIAM KNAPP, 1738



1. The past is dark with sin and shame, The future dim with doubt and fear; But, Father, yet we praise thy name, Whose guardian love is ever near.
2. For man has striven, ages long, With falt'ring steps, to come to thee; And, in each purpose high and strong, The influence of thy grace could see.
3. He could not breathe an earnest prayer, But thou wast kinder than he dreamed, As age by age brought hopes more fair, And nearer still thy kingdom seemed;
4. But never rose within his breast A trust so calm and deep as now: Shall not the weary find a rest? Father, Preserver, answer thou!
5. 'Tis dark around, 'tis dark above, But through the shadow streams the sun: We cannot doubt thy certain love; And man's true aim shall yet be won! A-men.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Churchmen Insist on Release of Political Prisoners

SEVENTY-SIX war prisoners are still in prison at Ft. Leavenworth, not for overt acts against the government, but because they held opinions which were regarded as derogatory to the conduct of the war by our government. The act under which these prisoners were convicted was a war-time act which suspended some of the ordinary rights of an American citizen under the constitution. Most of these prisoners are members of the I. W. W., an organization which has been exceedingly unpopular in many sections of America. The release of the prisoners is complicated by the fact that they will not abjure their opinions, nor leave the organization in which they have suffered so much, yet every one of them has been legally cleared of all the preposterous charges made against them by war-time hysteria. Few churchmen of America sympathize with the views of the leaders of the I. W. W. It is on quite other grounds that such a man as Dr. Doremus Scudder, secretary of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches, seeks from the President the pardon of all prisoners convicted for "conversational" offenses alone. In Chicago there will be a mass meeting of church people at an early date at which the facts on this question will be publicly stated. The commission on the church and social service of the Federal Council of Churches has for some time been committed to the release of political prisoners. Every other great nation has released its war prisoners. The United States has set free the German spies who in many cases committed overt acts against the government, but continues to hold these talkative Americans. The deduction seems to be that it is a smaller offense to blow up a bridge in war time than to make a speech expressing unpopular opinions. The labor world finds in the continued incarceration of the war prisoners a source of irritation. Were one motivated entirely by political and economic considerations, he might well ask whether the continued incarceration of the war prisoners at Ft. Leavenworth is good policy. Their case is made the occasion of tens of thousands of tracts and newspaper editorials, and furnishes an emotional back-ground to radical opinion. The President is minded to turn the men loose and end the agitation. He doubtless will do so if supported adequately by intelligent public opinion.

The Illinois Battle Ground

AN organization of irreconcilable wets in Chicago has presented a petition to the secretary of state of Illinois seeking a place on the ballot this fall for a referendum on the legalizing of the sale of beer and wine. Mr. Anton J. Cermak, the brains of the organized wets in Chicago, is running for an important office on an open platform of nullification of the eighteenth amendment. The first stage in the battle is to ascertain whether the secretary of state will put such a question on the ballot. It is argued by the drys that a referendum on the restoration of Negro slavery would not be put on the ballot no matter how many signatures were secured, since this would be a vote on the possibility of violating the federal constitution. The secretary of state in Ohio has already refused to put such a referendum on the ballot in that state. The friends of law enforcement face the fact, however, that in Illinois the nullification crowd is larger and better organized than in any other state in the Union. The last dying gasp of an outlawed trade is likely to be in the city of Chicago. It is fortunate that the church people have continued their support to the Anti-Saloon League, for that organization is needed for this emergency, as it has never been needed before. In case the friends of temperance must face a fight this autumn, but little time remains for making ready. The issue is of much larger importance than the carrying of a referendum election in Illinois. Were the referendum carried for nullification here, there could be no immediate effect in the change of the law, for a state cannot over-ride the federal constitution, but a victory of the wets would be the signal for other battles in most of the states of the Union. The Christian public opinion of Illinois is strong enough, when aroused, to defeat the most active wet organization the country now has.

John G. Woolley: Orator

TUCKED away in the far corner of a newspaper on a stifling summer day was a brief notice of the death of John G. Woolley. It must have awakened a troop of memories in many a heart, bringing back the tall, graceful image of the orator, and the flashing visions of his incredibly vivid eloquence. It brought to mind the words of Frank W. Gunsaulus in review of "Civic Sermons," in which, happily, some of the noblest addresses of the great orator are preserved: "John G. Woolley made an impression upon me when I saw and heard him illuminating and inspiring a great audience at his graduation. The desire to say what I had to say in life, and the hope that I might have something to say as he said it on that day, which was spring in its full symbolism, was consecrated by the power and charm of his utterance. I am not surprised at the happy fulfilment of all our dreams concerning him. The echoes of his voice in Plymouth church and the stern but just indictments of evil in every form, which I have heard and now have the opportunity of reading, remind me of Parker's lightning at City Temple, London, and the sharp, cliff-like heights one sometimes sees in the speeches of Lloyd George. I thank God for such a man, and such a book, and for the times out of which these truths will bring nothing but the triumphs of goodness!

Denominationalism and the Church in China

DENOMINATIONALISM on the foreign field has been given a most serious setback by the great conference of Chinese Christians at Shanghai. It was the first time that Chinese Christians were ever in control of their own organization. Kindly but unmistakably the influential Chinese preachers told their missionary tutors that western denominationalism meant nothing to the Chinese. More than 130 denominations are now at work in China. These divisions are in the eyes of the Chinese more absurd because many of them could not by the wildest stretch of imagination be of any interest to Chinamen. What would they care about the differences between the northern and southern branches of the Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches in the United States? Whether the church should be governed by presbyters or bishops is not to the point. Perhaps the Chinese churches will want a type of government that has no precedent in western ecclesiastical conditions. All of this does not mean that Chinese Christians agree doctrinally any more than American Christians do. But in face of the overwhelming odds of the great non-Christian religions, oriental Christians insist that any other policy than that of Christian union is fatal to the cause of Christ in China. Of course there is the problem of the supporting constituency in America, Great Britain and other parts of the world. Will the western church continue to aid in the evangelization of China if their party shibboleths are not sounded? Perhaps some money now given would be alienated but it were better to delay some operations in China than to undertake to fasten upon the young Christian movement of that awakening nation a burden that it cannot bear. Paul insisted that his Gentile churches should be free from Judaism. He invoked the authority of the Spirit in behalf of this freedom. China needs a new Paul to preach freedom from occidentalism, and to advocate the leadership of the Holy Spirit in developing a Christianity congenial in its outer form and procedure with the mental habits and social customs of the Chinese people.

A Memorable Summer Ministry

THE policy of the Brick church of New York of keeping its beautiful edifice open during the blistering summer days, and of securing an outstanding preacher to fill its pulpit, has again been justified by the memorable summer ministry of Dr. Hugh Black, of Union Seminary. New York in summertime is thronged with people from all over the land, tourists, pleasure-seekers, buyers, and all sorts, offering a rare opportunity for a preacher who knows the knack of bringing gospel truth home to the bosoms of men and women. Of that divine knack Dr. Black is a master, and no matter how sweltering the day, when the famous avenue seemed to sizzle in the heat, the Brick church was always filled to capacity. Dr. Black is in nowise sensational; he does not fly off at tangents. As Father Taylor said, "he takes something hot out of his own heart and shoves it into ours." He dealt with great themes in a great manner, facing the issues of modern life, and bringing to their solution truths which are truly modern because they are eternal. His sermon entitled "Another King, One Jesus," will not soon be forgotten for its defiance of the reigning materialism, its challenge to the comfortable compromises of our day, and its vision of the city of God on Fifth Avenue. Indeed, Dr. Black belongs on Fifth Avenue, and things will never be exactly right until he is enthroned in one of its great pulpits, speaking to New York City about God without whom its gay and glittering life is a gilded confusion.

The Magical Predominance of H

IT is significant of the passing of superstitions, that so few have even noted the remarkable dominance just now of the initial H in public life. If the average citizen were asked what three men stand out foremost in the affairs of the nation at the capitol, he would without hesitation name Harding, Hughes and Hoover. They form a class quite by themselves, by virtue of the exaltation of their office or of their personal ability as statesmen. After similar fashion, the tale for New York City, the commercial and financial metropolis of the nation, would put Hylan and Hearst in a class by themselves. The conjunction of either group is sufficient to excite passing comment, but their coincidence in these two most important centers of the national life is material out of which a more superstitious age would have fabricated enduring legends, and would have discovered omens of momentous import. Perhaps the ingenious, even in this matter-of-fact day, can conjure up additional evidence of the peculiar significance of this letter in public affairs. The comparative inconspicuousness of the initial in city directories and telephone books or in any ordinary roster of names, adds to the curiosity. If the letter were M or S, the coincidence would not be so surprising. But what occult influences have conspired thus to exalt the ordinarily retiring and diffident H? A few generations ago we would not have stopped with passing comment upon the curiosity, but the mysterious powers of the spirit world would have been drafted into an explanation which multitudes would have hallowed into a magic charm. Doubtless the public business is done better, and political and social influence is more potent, in the case of these individuals because they are untrammeled by the artificial sanctions of ages which believed in magic and signs and portents.

The Sorry State of Religious Education

SURVEYS are hardly needed to convince intelligent people that religious education is at a sorry pass in this country. But now comes Prof. Walter S. Athearn, of Boston University, with statistical reinforcement of the general impression. His studies of conditions in the state of Indiana reveal a state of facts probably typical of conditions throughout the middle west. His reports show that the buildings for the most part were erected to give the preacher a throne rather than to give the child a school room. The Sunday school superintendents are for the most part well-meaning business men who "whoop it up" rather than persons possessed of either educational ideas or educational skill. The teachers are a procession of transients who are for the most part impressed into their important duties without regard to previous training or to general educational achievement. The number of graded schools in the state is far below what one might have a right to expect after twenty years of agitation for this elementary reform. There are some who entirely despair of the Sunday school as a useful agent in the field of religious education. They look to the week-day religious school as the great agency of religious education in the days to come. But the week-day school has many handicaps to overcome before it becomes an establishment in a majority of American towns and cities. It must everywhere break down sectarian opposition. A considerable budget must be provided. More important still the movement can as yet command scarcely a half hundred expert teachers. It takes time to turn these out, and young people will not train for this service until they see the various communities ready to support a teacher in the field of religious education. Dr. H. S. Magill has come to the leadership of American Sunday schools at this crucial time. Our era of Sunday school braggadocio has passed. The church is very humble about its achievements in religious education. A real leader has an opportunity at this hour unparalleled in the history of American Christianity.

What Kind of Pictures Do People Want

IN the past the great motion picture producers have assumed for the most part that the public does not want religious pictures. A number of producers were interviewed on this subject recently, and declared that they were not interested in religious pictures. Yet there is a potential audience in America of forty million religious people. About a third of a million of these are Jews, and the remainder are Christian. This forty million people would appreciate the dramatization of the great themes of the gospel. To produce the Good Samaritan in dramatic form would almost certainly prove of interest to large numbers of people provided it was dramatized with such sincerity as would commend it to sound religious judgment. After the smut and filth of the war period with the debasement of public taste, there has set in a strong counter movement. Mr. Will Hays has come to the kingdom for such a time as this, and if the ideals that were held up before him in the Presbyterian church of which he has been for many years an elder, control his actions in his important position, we should be able to secure a type of picture play that is educational and inspirational. The era of sex abnormality, cynicism, and gun-play should make way for a time when the great themes of English literature would be dramatized to the educational uplift of the whole population. Forty million religious people need only agree on what they want and they will get it. The indecent theater could not exist a month were it not for the patronage of people who ought never to leave such a place without a word with the manager. In smaller communities where the moving picture is about to enter, why should not the church men of the community form a corporation not for profit which would give the community the pictures that are best for it? Such a corporation would not be a charity, but would be distinctly a public service.

The Necessity and Perils of Popular Diplomacy

THE first issue of "Foreign Affairs," a new American quarterly, edited by Archibald C. Coolidge, of Harvard University, contains a significant article by Elihu Root, entitled, "A Requisite for the Success of Popular Diplomacy." In democratic countries, he says, the people refuse any longer to wait until negotiations are over, or policies are even determined; they demand to know what is going on and to have a voice in what is done. Surely this is as it should be, since it is the people who pay and in the end, suffer for what is done in the closed closet of dickering statesmen. They have been tricked so often and so sadly that they refused to go blindly into the shambles in the future. The danger in the situation, says Mr. Root, is that people may be swept into war through mistaken beliefs playing upon old enmities or new fears; and the remedy is in popular education in international affairs. If diplomacy is to be open, it must be intelligent—the people must know not only what is being done, but what ought to be done. The change to the open method of doing the business of the world is all for the good, "for, while there is no human way to prevent a king from having a bad heart, there is a human way to prevent the people from having an erroneous opinion." Safety lies here, as everywhere else, in letting in the light, and letting all the light all the way in.

"What God Hath Joined Together"

IT IS a wholesome sign of the times that increasing attention is being given by churchmen, jurists, educators and students of public welfare to the subject of marriage and divorce. The conditions are alarming. Before the war they were increasingly disquieting. Since its close the riot of divorce has become almost an orgy. No very accurate statistics are available, but the proportion of divorces to the number of marriages mounts steadily, and the divorce courts are clogged with the accumulation of unheard cases. In England, where the law has been more rigid than in the United States, and public sentiment is traditionally more exacting, conditions are said to be even worse than with us. In spite of the restraints the church and the courts are able to place upon the evil, publicists and leaders of national opinion take a very grave view of the situation.

One of the great communions in the American church is now holding its triennial convention during the sessions of which one of the most outstanding themes is marriage and divorce. To be sure, a measurable amount of this time is spent over matters of comparatively trivial moment, dealing with the phrasing of the marriage service. The world is not waiting with bated breath to determine whether or not the word "obey" shall be retained in the bride's response, or whether the groom shall continue to promise the endowment of his prospective wife with all his worldly goods. Human nature has a rather pragmatic manner of settling these matters, quite apart from the verbiage of ancient rituals. But the basic problem of divorce, to which much time is being given, is of a different order.

Yet even the rule of the Episcopal church that clergymen may not perform the marriage service for those who have been divorced is not a solution of the difficulty. It is a wholesome and constructive principle, one that lends dignity to the ordinance of marriage, and lends impressiveness to the sanctity of the home. But it is by no means certain that its rigid enforcement is salutary or remedial of the present disorder. It is too easy and summary solution of the problem. It follows too literally one interpretation of the scripture teachings on the theme, an imitates, as in many other procedures, the laws of th Roman Catholic church. That church has rightly mad marriage a sacred thing. But its rigid rules regardin divorce have raised enormously the proportion of illegitimacy prevailing in Roman Catholic lands, and have led t a growing disregard of church teaching in other parts o Christendom. A certain proportion of the community will be held to marital allegiance merely by ecclesiastica authority. But the losses through renunciation of church obligations tend to increase, and the inner sanctions of morality are enfeebled.

In reality divorce is not in all instances an unmixed evil. There are cases in which the continuance of marriage relations is a deeper affront to intelligence, morality and public order than divorce could possibly be. There are conditions of degeneracy, infidelity, malicious perversion of all the obligations imposed by the holy covenant of marriage which have already dissolved the relations by automatic and inevitable process. There are malignities of disposition, outrages against the sacredness of personality, mordant and cruel hostilities of behavior which outrank in their disintegrating destructiveness any brutality of physical violence or any defections from the fidelities of wedlock. In the presence of such tragedies as these public opinion, even churchly conviction, can no longer insist that marriage is always a divine and indissoluble bond.

Moreover, the evidence of holy scripture is not of the nature and explicitness it has sometimes been supposed to be. The teachings of Jesus should be normative on this and all other matters. In our earliest source (Mark 6:1-10) our Lord affirms the broad principle that the free and easy customs of divorce prevailing at the time were wrong, and that the ideal is faithful and unbroken conjugal relations. Was this intended as the utterance of a formal law for the Christian society, or as a standard of wholesome and ordered conduct? If the former be the case, then no exceptions of any sort are to be tolerated, not even the statutory breach of marriage vows. And to the same purport is the witness of the third gospel (Luke 16:18). In the first gospel, however, which shows in many passages the modifying and explanatory results of reflection and interpretation upon the original clear, sharp and often disturbing words of Jesus, there is added the qualifying clause which has set the type of all interpretation of the Christian law of divorce (Matt. 5:26). Did Jesus intend any such modifying detail, or was he, as in so many other instances, setting forth the ideals of his new social order, which he left to his friends to interpret and administer according to their discernment of his spirit? In other words, do we possess a law of divorce in the New Testament, or have we rather the standard of a monogamous union of one man and one woman for life, marked by affection, constancy, and that mutual respect for personality, without which there can be no ideal marriage?

The remedies for the present lax attitude on the part of so large a portion of the public regarding marriage and divorce do not lie in any single area either of legal or ecclesiastical procedure. They are to be found rather in an effort to lift the total conception of marriage to a new level of sanctity and permanence. There must be a more pervasive conviction that this essential relation of human families ought not to be entered into hastily or unadvisedly, but soberly, discreetly, reverently, and in the fear of God.

It is the solemn duty of parents, in keeping with their other urgent but often neglected obligations in the area of ethical and religious education, to inspire their children with a more worthful and impressive ideal of marriage. Most young people, in spite of the caustic comments frequently made upon the character of the younger generation, are genuinely sensitive to the good opinion of their parents. The family honor and hopes are not lightly esteemed. The kindly and solicitous counsel of those whom they love will not wholly fail of its due effect. And the factors that go to make up the right of choices of life companions, and the manner in which the relationships of the wedded life may be made rich and rewarding, may often come to discovery and possession through the most approved process—the loving admonition of those whose parental relation gives them the surest right of admonition.

Most of all do the young people themselves need to understand the mystic glory of the new relation which they are contemplating. It has all the possibilities of timeless and inspiring companionship. It ought not to be defeated by mere impulses of fancy or of passion, but hallowed by a gradual and growing friendship which shall ripen into the most enduring love. Above all it must be founded on mutual respect if it is to abide. It is the consecration of all that body, intellect, emotion, and will can contribute to a complete nature. That combination of elements, shaded and hallowed by a deep and loyal affection, may well prove the foundation of domestic happiness which will be impregnable against all mutations of the years.

There is need also of a higher standard of intelligent supervision on the part of public officials to whom is entrusted the granting of licenses for marriage. The range of responsibility for most of these guardians of the future families is small at the present time. But even within these limits much greater discretion might well be exercised. In some communities account is taken of physical conditions that are likely to prove disastrous to the welfare of those who seek the right to marry, to the children, and to the public in general. These elements of scrutiny should be exercised much more widely than at present. Too great disparity of age, manifest tokens of mental inefficiency, and other matters such as previous marital experience, and conditions which public policy has made sinister signs on the road of conjugal life, all these may well be included in a closer attention to the meaning and value of marriage.

It is needless to say that a very true responsibility lies upon the minister or magistrate who solemnizes the rite of marriage. It is probable that most ministers who are worthy of the name feel this obligation. Different men exercise it in different ways. Some are directed by their denominational obligations to refuse the service to such as have been divorced. Others are permitted to apply the statutory limitation of this rule. Others are left to their own discretion. This can never be a wholly official or perfunctory thing. The minister stands to those who seek his offices in the relation of a spiritual father. Does he follow them with his prayers and solicitude? Does he ever remind them, particularly on the anniversary of the event, that they have not passed out of the circle of his regard, but that he is still concerned for their welfare and happiness? Such ministries often go far toward keeping intact the structure of domestic happiness.

There are many elements that help to make marriage permanent and sacred. The greatest of these is probably the gift of children. There can hardly be a home without them. A domicile, hotel, boarding-house or stopping place there may be, but hardly a home. To be sure there are potential homes to which the child is invited but cannot come, and there are others to which he comes to tarry but a night. These often have all the value of the mystic child presence. But in some manner he is essential. He is the center of the new and expanding life of those who entered the holy covenant of marriage. He is their greatest teacher. And he binds them together in an indissoluble bond.

Whom God hath joined together are not lightly to be put asunder. Their joys and sorrows, their regrets and hopes, their sicknesses and successes are a common portion. A happy married life is not an accident, it is an achievement. It can neither be made nor saved by mere institutions, even such majestic ones as the church. It is based on the historic need of men and women for companionship, friendship and love. It is sanctified by the love of children and the joy and sorrow of their rearing. It is the holiest of human relationships. But its meaning must be measured by higher standards than mere commonplaces of physical or economic relations. Only when our generation takes seriously the high moralities and obligations of the home, of childhood and of the Christian conception of marriage, shall we be released from the menace of the present riot of divorce, and the current cheapening of the holy relations of matrimony.

Pessimists of Yesterday

IT WAS just one hundred and twenty years ago that the good poet Wordsworth wrote in one of his London Sonnets

Rapine, avarice, expense,
This is idolatry: and these we adore:
Plain living and high thinking are no more:
The homely beauty of the good old cause
Is gone; our peace, our fearful innocence,
And pure religion breathing household laws.

In another London Sonnet he calls aloud to the dead Milton to return, for England "is a fen of stagnant waters." To be sure, in still another Sonnet of the same year, he repents, in a measure, of his pessimism, and cries out

Verily, in the bottom of my heart,
Of those unfilial fears I am ashamed,

For dearly must we prize thee; we who find
In thee a bulwark for the cause of men.

When so sweet-spirited a patriot as Wordsworth can develop a grouch, and see things going to the bow-wows, it behooves lesser men to beware lest their narrow vision reveal to them evils which are not there, harbingers of calamity which signify no such thing.

With all of our zeal in celebrating the centennials of Byron, Shelley and Keats, there seems nowhere a discriminating appreciation of the fagged-out weariness of them and their age as contrasted with the irrepressible buoyancy of our own day. To be sure, we are wearied also, and there are some, not to speak particularly of our vocal fundamentalists, whose vision carries them not beyond the gloom still left by war clouds. The England of a century ago had cause for anxieties which even the England of today does not quite know, though the war just past was staged on an immeasurably grander scale than the Napoleonic scourge of that age. But life is more buoyant today, the world over, than it was in more than one crisis of the past. No poets living and inspiring the common thoughts of today, and destined to serve as the theme of glowing celebrations of art a century hence, show the confirmed weariness of life and hopelessness of social progress which prevailed among all three of the illustrious songsters of a century ago in England. Byron dies at thirty-six shedding gloom through all the later years of his life, bitter-sweet as is the music of his dolor. Already at twenty-five he is lamenting,

There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away.

Where is there anyone, to whom the world now listens, who at twenty-five discovers that "the tender bloom of heart is gone," and repines disconsolate "midst the wither'd waste of life," finding dolorous comfort in his tears, "all brackish though they be?"

Shelley was weeping for the dead Adonais at twenty-nine, and was himself dead at thirty. Again at twenty-nine he was wailing in his "Lament,"

O world! O life! O time!

When will return the glory of your prime?
No more—oh, never more!

His "Time" was also written when he was but twenty-nine:

Unfathomable Sea! whose waves are years,
Ocean of Time, whose waters of deep woe
Are brackish with the salt of human tears!

. . . sick of prey, yet howling on for more,
Vomitest thy wrecks on its inhospitable shore;
Treacherous in calm, and terrible in storm,
Who shall put forth on thee,
Unfathomable Sea?

Keats died at twenty-six. His was the sweetest music of them all, but the wearied, despairing note runs through his song, also. How happy the nightingale, for he

. . . among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan!

Our poets of today often tell ghastly tales, but those likely to survive in the coming generations are robust. They are at least stoical where they are not bubbling with hope. The clearer assurances of a confident science are buttressing a faith which, dispelling the despair of the fundamentalists, girds our loins for entrance into a new earth which shall be, in very deed, the kingdom of heaven.

The Band Concert

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE liveth nigh unto the Summer Home of my son a family of their friends, who also have a Summer Home in that place. And there is in that family a Little Maiden, who recently had a Birthday, and on her Cake were Eight Candles.

And she came unto me complaining. And she said, The son of thy son said unto me yesterday, I do not like thee.

And I said, That was a Sad Message. Art thou Likable?

And she said, How can I know except he tell me? And he hath told me that he liketh me not.

And I said, Thou must not believe all that the boys say unto thee. Some day he will tell thee that he liketh thee; and it will keep thee guessing to decide which time to believe.

And she said, But today he desireth me to take him to the Band Concert tonight. For my father is coming from the City, and he and my mother are to take us to the Band Concert, and his mother is not going. But how can I invite him to the Band Concert when he doth not like me?

And I said, Some maidens have taken a chance, assuming that a Band Concert was a Favourable Place to induce a change of decision in such matters.

But she said, He hath not yet said that he liketh me.

And I said, The day still is young, and he will say it before night if thou hold out; but thy problem is, Is it better to take him and let him change his mind if he will, or to insist that he profess to like thee? And besides these there is one other alternative.

And she said, What is that? And I said, It is not to let him go with thee to the Band Concert.

And she said, I hardly think that I shall do that. But I think that he ought to take me.

And she decided to invite him to the Band Concert, and to postpone the question of his Affection for her.

Now I rather approved the wisdom of her decision; but I decided to give no advice. And indeed I do not think she needed any.

For before the sun had reached the time of noon, she had invited him and he had accepted, and there was no Apparent Coldness between them.

But here I saw what seemed to me an Instance of Inexorable Fate. For just when it was all decided that she would take him with her, and let the question of his liking her wait developments, Grim destiny set in. For my little grandson's mother decided that her children must go to bed at the usual time, and that he could not be Among Those Present at the Band Concert.

Now this little tragedy I have seen enacted on a Larger Stage not once or twice. And I have said that if we love each other it were better to say so, for there are Strange Freaks of Fate that settle many problems for us.

Methodism—An Outside View

By William E. Barton

MANY years ago I learned a hymn. It was taught me by a Methodist preacher, as we were riding to an appointment on Wolf Creek in the Tennessee mountains. I was a young man, and he was advanced in years, "located" and cultivating a farm; but he had his regular appointments, commonly pronounced "'pintments," which included not only Sundays but Saturday afternoons and evenings. In that country the Baptists as well as the Methodists rode upon circuits, and the Baptists (pronounced Babtists) "ruled by Saturdays" and the Methodists by Sundays; so when the month came in on Sunday, there was liable to be a clash of appointments, and a division of the time. On this occasion the Methodists and I were preaching by mutual arrangement. As we rode, we sometimes sang:

I'm noways weary, I'm noways tired;
  O, glory, hallelujah!
Jest let me in the kingdom when this world is afire—
  O, glory hallelujah!

He knew some songs which I did not know. One of them he had been accustomed to sing in his earlier years on the last round of appointments before the annual conference. He had learned it from the minister who composed it; and he told me about that minister. He rode over the hills the year through, amid sun and storm, stinging cold and high water, singing, praying, exhorting, shouting, preaching. He thrashed bullies who tried to break up his meetings; he conducted revivals and camp-meetings; he debated with Baptists and tore the doctrine of predestination to shreds, and in general did the legitimate and God-given work of an itinerant Methodist circuit rider. On the next to the last round before conference, the people of his several appointments were accustomed to present him a little purse, the sum total of these microscopic collections being supposed to be enough to buy the preacher a suit of new clothes, and a pair of new boots and a new hat in which to attend conference. On the following round, he usually had large congregations, assembled to see him in his new clothes and hat and boots, and to hear his final sermon.

THE CIRCUIT RIDER

My friend described to me the method, the stage business, if I may so term it, of this last sermon. Indeed, he had learned the method, and had himself followed it. On the last round of appointments he held his class meetings, and his love feasts, and he made up his roll of members, and he preached his most powerful sermons. He "opened the doors of the church" for new members on probation; and he preached hell-fire to impenitent sinners. At the last service, which was usually late on Sunday afternoon, he finished his sermon, and his exhortation, and his altar-service and administered the communion. Then he placed his Bible and his hymn-book in his saddle-bags, strapped them, took them across his left arm, and reached up to the peg in the wall for his new hat which he held in his right hand. Then he walked to the door, which commonly was the only aperture in the building except the open unchinked space between the logs, and standing in the door, he sang this closing hymn:

Dear brethren, farewell;
To you I now tell,
I'm sorry to leave you, I love you so well:
I shortly must go,
And where I don't know,
But wherever I'm stationed, the trumpet I'll blow.

Then followed stanzas in which he took leave of his stewards and class-leaders, of his members and probationers, of parents and children and others. The hymn was a long one, having many stanzas. The last, I remember, was addressed to the impenitent:

Dear sinners, farewell,
  We've warned you of hell,
Where forever and ever the wicked shall dwell;
  We've pleaded, invited,
But cannot compel;
  To the dread day of judgment, poor sinners, farewell!

There he stood in the door, tears streaming down his cheeks as he sang. I never saw him, but I can see him silhouetted against the light of the western sun, as he stood in his new suit and his new boots, and sang his farewell song. Then he pronounced the benediction as he stood on the threshold, walked to where he had tethered his horse to the swinging limb of a beech tree, bestrode his saddle-bags and rode away through the sunset. The meetings of conference to that preacher were veritable days of judgment. He told the literal truth when he sang, "I shortly must go, and where (he sang it "whar") I don't know." He went where he was sent, and he preached, and prayed, and shouted and sang all through the wilderness.

HONOR TO METHODISTS

Can you contemplate a situation like that without admiration? When I think of Methodism and attempt to estimate the qualities which entered into its earlier years, I think of such men and such scenes and all my love of the heroic rises to do honor to those men. They conquered the wilderness. They preached a rough and ready religion. They slept where night overtook them; and if they cultivated a strong liking for the breast of fried chicken, they also cultivated a thick skin against the assaults of the bed-bug. Do not be too sensitive about that word. If I were going back into that work in which I spent a few of the years of my early ministry, my chief anxiety would be precisely that and kindred annoyances, and not the dangers or the privations or the poverty. I have never been a Methodist circuit rider, but I have shared all that Methodist circuit riders experience, except the Methodist system. That would be very hard for me.

Yet I see that the very thing which would be hard for me was what made backwoods Methodism mighty. These preachers went where they were sent, and their only hope of promotion lay in making a success of their work where they were. They were homeless men. They sang:

> No foot of land do I possess,
> No cottage in this wilderness,
> Till I my Canaan gain.

Does that spirit abide in modern Methodism? I am willing to believe that something of it still is there, modified, to be sure, by changed conditions, but essentially the same in spirit. But I think that that is not wholly true. Methodism has lost something of what made it a conquering power. Otherwise, by this time we should nearly all of us have been Methodists. And I should not enjoy that. For this I must confess, that while there is no denomination other than my own which I admire more than I admire the Methodist church, and none for which I have a more sincere respect, I should not like to be a Methodist preacher. And I think the things which I should not like, and which to my certain knowledge scores, and I think probably hundreds of Methodist preachers do not like, are the very things that have made Methodism strong.

PLAYING THE GAME

I read a few years ago a book by Bishop Neely on the Methodist conference system. It was just such a book as I should have expected him to write. He said in substance that the strength of Methodism was in playing the game according to the rules, and trusting the bishop to administer those rules. He represented, and I think truthfully, that the Methodist bishop is in general a fair umpire, and that some kind of umpire there must be; and he said that the peril of Methodism was in becoming like the Congregationalists. His book is not now before me, and I quote my impression rather than the book, but he said, as I recall it, that so long as local churches insist upon choosing their own ministers, and on holding on to them, and so long as ministers select their own churches, the Methodist church will not be much better than the Congregational. I am not sure but he is right; and there is this added disadvantage, that the Methodist system cannot give the same sense of stability which Congregationalism at its best does sometimes give.

It has fallen to me to see much of the weakness and inefficiency of my own denomination. I see churches without pastors and pastors without churches, and ministers who want to move but cannot and churches who want to get rid of their ministers and cannot do it, and long waits between pastorates. I know the infelicities of our loose and democratic system, and I will not here and now defend it. And there are times when I look with genuine admiration upon the efficiency of the Methodist machine.

For instance, here is a community with a Methodist church, and it is not holding its young people. At the next session of conference, they send to that church an up-and-coming young minister who has a gift like that of the Pied Piper. After a year or such a matter, when his bag-pipe has become less appealing, he can be moved on to where he can repeat the performance, and perhaps do it better, and let his place be taken by an evangelistic preacher. After a year or two of high pressure evangelism, it is time to send a church-builder there to erect a new church edifice—have I not heard that the Methodists are building three churches a day, year in and year out. And then, after him, there must come a debt-raiser. It must be a terrible thing for a Methodist preacher to gain a reputation as a debt-raiser. He will never have any churches that are not in debt when he is sent to them. If I ever become a Methodist preacher, I wish it to be understood that as a debt-raiser I am wholly unsuccessful. But what a system it is, and how beautifully it seems to work—from the outside! If I have any knowledge or suspicion that it has its inside difficulties, this is not the place for me to betray any confidences. But judged from the outside, the Methodist system would seem to me to possess some inherent disadvantages, which I should think might become more apparent as the conditions of its work grow from the rural to the urban.

A RESTLESS MINISTRY

First, I do not think the plan of Methodism is one that insures a contented ministry. It is not simply that pastoral changes are frequent, that is true with all of us, and in some cases they are not as frequent as they ought to be. Henry Ward Beecher was right when he said that one reason for the prevalence of short pastorates was divine mercy. But Methodism gives to the minister no sense of security. Every year the question rises whether he is to be or not to be the pastor of his present church. He goes to conference with the endorsement of his official board, and he does not know whether some other message has quietly gone from an influential member to the bishop that the church is growing restless. That system is of a sort to promote restlessness in the church and discontent in the ministry. Even if it were shown, as may be the case, that the average Methodist minister, now that there is no definite time restriction, remains in a pastorate as long as the average Congregational or Presbyterian minister, I do not think that fact would fully answer this objection.

Then, I have a suspicion that the Methodist system does not tend to the development of great preachers. S. Parkes Cadman and Charles E. Jefferson, if I may name two Congregational ministers who began as Methodists, would have been able preachers in any denomination; I doubt if they would have developed as Methodists into the kind of preachers they now are. One must dig in deep for the foundations of a pastorate such as that of either of these men.

Then, I count it an infelicity that the reward of conspicuous service in the Methodist church is a bishopric. The Methodist bishops of my acquaintance are able men, courteous men, and friends of mine. So far as I am aware, all of them are successful bishops. But some of them I think could render a greater service in work to which they are better adapted. I do not mean to imply that there is any considerable proportion of misfit men in the Methodist episcopate; I only mean that the episcopate is not the most suitable recognition of success for every preacher. Two or three years ago I was in a certain city where I preached in the morning and was free at night. I went to hear a noted Methodist preacher. He had a great congregation and was doing a notable work. A few months later they made him a bishop. Doubtless he and his friends were glad. I may be the only man in America who feels that for him that was a distinct step down. In northern Ohio, many years ago, lived old Mr. Fairchild, who, thirty years ago when I met him just once, was about ninety years of age. He was the father of Presidents James Fairchild of Oberlin and E. H. Fairchild of Berea, and his youngest son did good service as a college president in Kansas. The old man said to me that he had hoped his three sons would be ministers of the gospel, but, he added sorrowfully, "they have all petered out into college presidents." I wish so many of the greatest men in the Methodist ministry did not peter out into bishops. When I say that, I bring no railing accusation against bishops; I merely say there ought to be some other form of promotion of equal dignity and stability for men who deserve high honor in the Methodist ministry and whom God intended for the pastorate.

ECCLESIASTICAL POLITICS

Then, I think the Methodist system is one that lends itself too readily to ecclesiastical politics. I do not care to enlarge upon this point, nor to give instances, each of which might properly be answered either by saying that my information is only partially correct, or that the case mentioned was exceptional. After all proper deductions have been made, I still think there is something in this objection.

Finally, for I am glad to finish this part of my article, I think the Methodist system tends to develop in forms of unusual aggressiveness, the sectarian spirit. It is not possible for a local Methodist church to work out its own salvation in conference with other local churches; its fate must be settled by higher ecclesiastical authority. My impression is that since the war, and the Interchurch movement, the feeling of denominational consciousness has nowhere been developed more strongly than in Methodism.

If anything I have said in this part of my article seems unfriendly, I must trust to the good sense of the reader to acquit me of that spirit. I am charged by the editor to say exactly what I think, without any apology or qualification, and that is what I am doing. There now remains for me the more pleasant task of saying some few equally honest and much more gladly spoken words of sincere appreciation.

Methodism came into the world when it was sorely needed. I have heard it said again and again that but for the rise of Methodism there would have been a revolution in England; I am not sure whether Methodism or the revolution would have done more good, but I am sure that through Methodism England was virtually born again. Being myself a Puritan, and holding in the highest regard the Puritan movement, I may say that next to the work of Luther and then of the Pilgrim fathers, the rise of Methodism is the greatest and most significant event in modern religious history. What could the Episcopal church in England have been thinking of to let such a movement take place outside of its organization? If that fire had been kindled inside the established church instead of outside, what might the Episcopal church be today? And, while Puritanism in this country had no such opportunity as the Episcopal church had in England to take over the Methodist movement, I cannot count it as an evidence of their prophetic insight that the American Congregationalists acknowledged so grudgingly the power of God in the Methodist movement. And Puritanism in America needed the influence of Methodism as surely as did Episcopacy in England.

JOHN WESLEY

There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. His other name was Calvin, and also Knox, and also Milton. But among the men most surely sent of God was John Wesley. Spite of the effort, most unwise, to force his method and his regimen and his theology mechanically upon his denomination, he still lives in the unconquerable influence of his spirit. I have heard of a Methodist woman who was accustomed to catechise the new minister and quote Wesley to him. She asked her new minister how early he rose for his morning devotion and study, and when he told her seven o'clock, she said, "The sainted John Wesley rose at four o'clock, and read his Bible and prayed and began his day's work." To which the minister replied, "If I had such a wife as the sainted John Wesley, I would sit up all night."

The power of Methodism is in the simplicity and directness of its evangel, and in its consecrated earnestness. If in a prayer-meeting two men sitting side by side, rise, and one says, "I have been thinking, as we have been sitting here—" he is a Congregationalist; and the other jumps up and says, "Brethren, I feel in my soul tonight—" he is a Methodist! Not by taking thought do men add a cubit to their stature. There is far too little thoughtful preaching, and still less thoughtful hearing, but men are saved by passion; and the Methodists discovered or rediscovered that fact. God grant they may never forget it!

Methodism made two mighty and effective protests, one against the immorality and low spirituality of the period of its inception, and the other against the rigid, logical, merciless ultra-Calvinism of the time. In both of these protests it was justified, and it proved a leavening force in the Episcopal church of England and the Puritan churches of America. Beginning with no desire for the establishment of a new denomination, it became one of the very largest and most useful of all Protestant bodies. Founded by scholars, it became the religion of the untutored and the disinherited and disfranchised. Holding to the name Episcopal, it became practically presbyterial; for its bishopric is an office, not an order, and the power resides in the presbyteries known as conferences. Thoroughly undemocratic in its organization, no church is nearer to the people. No movement of the last two hundred years is more manifestly of divine origin, or has more thoroughly established its right to be.

FUTURE OF METHODISM

But is it fitted to do as great work in the future as in the past? That is a question which every denomination should face with concern, and the final answer must be given from the inside. With the larger emphasis now given by Methodists to education, and the more ready adaptation of their system to diversified life in a country whose frontiers are rapidly passing, Methodism must have an important work to do. With its military system, its compact organization, its ability to furnish a minister for every church and a church for every minister, it has some advantages which the rest of us admire but which some of us do not covet.

The dangers of Methodism, as I see them, are perhaps not more grave than those which in one form or another we all confront, but they are at least worth thinking of. The first is that Methodism will lose its direct appeal to the conscience of men for an immediate change of heart, and a full consecration to Christ. The next is that it will draw off its ablest preachers to the episcopate, where they will not do as well in administrative work as some other men might do, but will give to the ministry a dangerous leakage at the top. The next is that the ministry will be restless, and the churches more democratically dictatorial. Above all, I could wish that Methodism should never become so intellectual as to forget that men and women live in the sphere of their emotions. Love and sacrifice and willingness to give all for Christ are qualities not attained wholly by appeal to reason. Methodism has not reasoned but has sung and shouted itself around the world. I could almost sing the old camp-meeting song:

Of all the Christians I love best,
I love the shouting Methodist.
I do believe without a doubt
That a Christian has a right to shout.

I do not shout, but I hope that the Methodists will continue to do so. They have my permission to do it somewhat more decorously than I have sometimes known it to be done, but fervor and enthusiasm are very precious, and Methodism has or ought to have them. Enthusiasm is one of the greatest fears and smallest dangers of modern religion. Considering the importance of the Christian message, and of the issues which hang upon it, our enthusiasm seldom reaches the level of respectable earnestness. May Methodism never lose its enthusiasm!

The Battle with Cynicism

By Lynn Harold Hough

"Therefore I turned about to cause my heart to despair concerning all the labour wherein I had laboured under the sun."—Ecclesiastes II. 20.

"Yet I will rejoice in Jehovah, I will joy in the God of my salvation. Jehovah, the Lord, is my strength; and He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and will make me to walk upon my high places."—Habakkuk, III. 18, 19.

THERE are some rather disconcerting features in the book of Ecclesiastes. It has been called the cellar of the Old Testament. One is inclined to wonder how the book ever managed to get into the canon. If books could be diplomats, one would be inclined to feel that all sorts of shrewd sagacity must have been exercised by this particular bit of writing when it made its way into the society of the great Old Testament prophets. The contrast between its selfish disillusionment and the glorious outburst of faith which closes the poem at the end of the little book of Habakkuk could not be more sharply drawn. On the one side there is the play of a mind without moral depth or spiritual height. It moves through life with an observant eye. Someone has described a cynic as a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing. The sudden flashes of insight which come from inner greatness of spirit never appear in the book of Ecclesiastes. And the references to God have an artificial and conventional ring. So life is surveyed and found wanting. So in a dull and colorless world a waning and decadent spirit looks out in despair. It is indeed, the cellar of the Old Testament. The air is damp and the whole place is unhealthy.

One is glad the book is there. It sharpens contrasts which we might not otherwise feel in their full significance. But we turn with a sense of leaving a place of decay to the sharper air and the high perspectives which we find in the great and adventurous faith of the prophets. We pick up the little song in the book of Habakkuk and turn to its last lyric outburst. There is the frightful sound of invading armies. The fruits of the earth and the grain of the field are failing. The flocks and the herds are dying. And in the midst of it all the triumphant spirit of a great believer lifts itself in a perfect hallelujah chorus of triumphant faith. In spite of it all he will rejoice in God. In spite of it all Jehovah is his strength. And even in this hour of unspeakable calamity he is given the feet of a hind and moves in safety among the perilous high places of the earth.

DISILLUSIONMENT

The two attitudes represented by these two utterances do perpetual battle in the world. The men of heavy eyes and cynical disillusionment are all the while meeting the men of triumphant and adventurous faith upon the battlefields of the world. I confess that I feel a certain embarrassment in speaking of these things this morning. The world has been torn and shattered by the disintegrating power of the great war. England has bent under a burden the depth of whose tragic woe only England knows. During the last months of the war I went about among your cities and among your homes. I shall never forget the brave and quiet good cheer with which you moved through the days of blackness, lighted with the swift lightning of bitter pain. You have a way of hiding the shining splendor of your ideals and the searching tragedy of your sufferings behind a reticence which goes steadily about its work, and meets life with cool and steady courage which seeks no expression in words. But in those days one saw through the protective coloring of restraint and caught glimpses of the soul of England. It made him feel like taking off his sandals because he was standing on holy ground.

And now in the years of cruel reaction, if you are tempted to enter upon an experience of complete and bitter disillusionment, if you are lifting terribly penetrating questions about God and man and the nations of the world, and if the reply seems hard with the cold cynicsm of a disappointed hope, can a man from the outside come in and speak of it all? Especially if he comes from a nation which entered the war very late and in the hard days of the confusing peace, by some strange turn of the public mind, failed tragically to take its share in the burden which must be borne if the world is to be made stable, can a man coming so bring you a message to which you will be willing to listen in respect to these terribly bitter experiences? One would be inclined to say quite frankly that such a thing would be impossible anywhere except in the Christian church. But a Christian pulpit does transcend time and space. And if a man is sure that he has a message which God has given him, he can dare to give it even under these difficult conditions, knowing that if it is given with honesty and utter sincerity, it will be heard with respect and it will be understood. So deeply trusting you this morning, I enter upon a discussion of the battle between cynicism and faith upon the great field of the world.

CYNICS IN A GREAT AGE

First of all, shall we take a look at some characteristic expressions of the two attitudes toward life? Surely the best approach to the present in these hard matters is by the appeal to that treasure-house of human experience which is such a rich possession when we truly enter into our inheritance. We remember how the fifth century before the coming of our Lord saw a wonderful outburst of the greatest and the most gracious things of the human spirit. It was the age of the Persian invasions and of the Greek victories. It was the age of Pericles, with all its noble art and its glorious architecture. It was the age when human speech was built into a palace of writing, where the human mind could wander through marvellous chambers of melodious sentences built into periods of harmonious loveliness. It was the age of the penetrating and enquiring mind of Socrates. But it was also the age of the Sophists who, as a class, believed nothing deeply, and were possessed of that sordid mental ingenuity which comes to a man when he has no convictions and no commanding ideals. As you look into the mind of the Sophist, you see the very genius of the thing we now mean when we use the word cynic. Upon the surface of one of the greatest periods of the world's life the disillusioned Sophist moved shrewdly, playing his little game of intellectual make-believe without conscience and without the lifting power of moral or spiritual enthusiasm. Then comes the terrible day of the end of the Athenian supremacy. And the weakness of the Greek states begins to promise a day of doom. It is a time which, indeed, tests the spirit of those who know and love the genius of Attica. Hope itself seems to be blown away like the frail petals of a lovely flower tossed carelessly by the cold hardness of autumn winds.

And in this precise situation lives a Greek who most perfectly expresses the rarest and noblest qualities of the spirit of his race. There is everything to make him a cynic. But instead he becomes the author of some of the noblest writing of creative hope which is to be found anywhere in all the world. He escapes from the sordid selfishness of the day into a sublime vision of that ultimate reality in which goodness and beauty are one. He escapes from time into eternity. By an audacious act of faith he secures a belief that the invisible good is more real than the visible evil. So Plato, like the singer whose lyric closes the book of Habakkuk, becomes the prophet of a singing joy in an age when darkness and disappointment settle heavily upon the world. We must choose between the spirit of the cynical Sophist and the spirit of Plato. Which shall it be?

SOUL OF CYNICISM

In the days of the greatness of the Roman empire Lucretius wrote that memorable poem, "De Rerum Natura." It has many qualities of charm. It holds the imagination by a curious secret of quiet and observant contemplation combined with a noble grace of phrase. But it is at heart a poem of disillusionment. It has the soul of cynicism in it. There is no high and leaping confidence that spirit is stronger than matter. There is no glowing assurance that good is mightier than evil. There is only the cold and dignified acceptance of an evil lot. There is only the emancipation which is the death of all generous and creative enthusiasm. No glorious and prophetic lives have been inspired by Lucretius. No high self-sacrifice has come from the fountains which he set playing. He is still the refuge of those who seek a cold and urbane philosophy in which to dwell while they live lives of philosophic selfishness, ignoring every poignant cry of human need.

The day came when the great structure of the Roman empire was about to fall. The creaking of timbers was heard everywhere. Sometimes a pillar fell crumbling down, and sometimes the roof of a part of the building came crashing to the ground. It seemed as if civilization itself was about to perish in the disintegration of Rome. And right in the midst of all the confusion, when there seemed no solid earth upon which to stand, a powerful voice was lifted. It was the voice of a man who might easily have become the victim of misanthropic gloom. He knew the meaning of that civilization which was decaying. He possessed the most powerful and highly articulated mind to be found in the world of his day. But just when the city of man was breaking, and the streets were full of turmoil and horror, Augustine wrote "De Civitate Dei." Over against the crumbling city of human building he put the eternal city which is the creation of Almighty God. In the very break-up of civilization he found sources of triumphant hope. It was the first great Christian philosophy of history. And it scorned every temptation to the heavy misanthropy of that disintegrating doubt which destroys the spirit of man. It was full of the music of a great confidence. It was full of the splendor of a deathless hope. We must choose between the spirit of Lucretius and the spirit of Augustine. Which shall it be?

If we go far afield we shall find a brilliant cynic in Persia. Probably most men would not know very much about him if a nineteenth-century poet, whose mind moved in the same trails, had not put his musical misanthropy into lovely English verse. As it is, the contemporary cynic, especially the very young cynic who has a bit of self-conscious intellectuality about him, finds his mood expressed with distinction and grace and beauty in the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. There is complete disillusionment. There is the repudiation of hope. There are flashes of dark and terrible wrath. There are songs of the abandon of indulgence. There is the pathos of a sensitive spirit as a refuge making beautiful sentences in an ugly world, ready to sleep at last with an upturned empty glass above it, the symbol of its indulgence and the symbol of its futility. This marvellous poem has never girded men for hard warfare. It has never taught them to see stars in the dark night. It has set their doubts to music. It has made their misanthropy articulate. It has lifted their most weak and hopeless moods into a philosophy of life.

ST. FRANCIS

Coming back from Persia and looking in on the Europe of the thirteenth century, we find a surface of much brilliancy with many seeds of decay under the dazzling exterior. The far flung glory of Innocent III., the consummate achievement of the Summa, the rise of the universities do not conceal from us that inner decay which is to make itself felt so tragically in the fourteenth century. But there is one mighty and creative spirit. There is one personality which maintains secrets of permanent enthusiasm. Saint Francis does not have a great mind. He does not indeed have much of a mind at all, but he has a heart. And with glorious and childlike simplicity he finds his way into the heart of God. All men become his brothers. All living things are received into his great family. All inanimate things are his brothers and sisters. And so he goes singing and serving about Italy and out over the world. No disease is so loathsome, no poverty so terrible, but he comes with the healing helpfulness of his loving heart and his eager hand. So in an age when selfishness and sophistication and unscrupulous sordidness were seizing the world Saint Francis sang men back to innocence and love and the belief in goodness and truth and God. We must choose between the spirit of Omar Khayyam and the spirit of Saint Francis. Which shall it be?

Probably some observers would imagine that America has been so busy with tremendously energetic action that these deep and brooding problems of thought and feeling have not come within the range of its experience. But it has not been so. The nineteenth century witnessed the unfolding of a life among us which as we look back arouses a curious interest. That volume of brilliant autobiography, "The Education of Henry Adams," tells the story. Here was a man, the descendant of two able Presidents of the United States. He had every advantage of training and travel and contact with the best minds of many lands. Harvard University put its mark of discipline upon him, and it seemed as if heredity and opportunity and personal gifts united to make him a man of the greatest promise. Out of it all he wrought a cold and half disdainful cynicism, which left him incapable of creative thought and helpless in the presence of the moment which demanded the masterful deed. As one reads the exquisitely wrought and penetrating phrases of distinguished disillusionment, which make his autobiography so memorable, one feels a wistful longing for one self-forgetful moment of high and assured enthusiasm. But the golden moment never comes.

There was a man in America at the same time, a good deal older than Henry Adams. He was born in the wilderness. He grew up without advantages and without opportunities. He knew no such university of stately traditions as Harvard. A crude and ugly and common man, he lived among hard pressed men and women who knew nothing of the graces and beauties of life. He read every book he could find. He knew the Declaration of Independence and the constitution of the United States. He knew his Bible. And he knew his Shakespeare. And he received every great and noble ideal of which he read into a simple and believing heart. He kindled a glorious fire in his soul as he read these great masterpieces. So without grace and with only the hard and demanding breeding of the wilderness, he strode into the white house in the day of his nation's need. He has kept on travelling, and not so long ago you welcomed that tall gaunt figure, with eternal tragedy and eternal hope in his face, to stand among your men of imperishable memory in Parliament Square. In spite of his cruel childhood, in spite of his terrible handicaps, he believed in men, he believed in God, he believed in the future. And so the world has received him among its few peerless men. We must choose between the spirit of Henry Adams and the spirit of Abraham Lincoln. Which shall it be?

A LIFE ABOVE DISILLUSIONMENT

And now let us come back to the book which lies on this desk, from which perhaps we have been wandering too long. One day two men stood confronting each other. One was a brilliantly disciplined man of the world. He was a Roman trained in the masterful traditions of Roman rule. There was something high and commanding and massive in his very bearing. But he was a cynic at heart. He had no inner sources of moral or spiritual power. With cavalier and careless speech he queried lightly: "What is truth?" The man beside him was strong in the strength of life in the open. His face was full of the wonder of human friendliness, and winsome with a stern yet gentle purity which seemed the very wedlock of tenderness and power. His eyes had a clear richness which made you feel that you were looking into eternity as you gazed into their depths. Goodness was alive in him. Purity was alive in him. Love was alive in him. And as he stood before the weak and selfish worldling hiding behind a habit of Roman dignity, he seemed to tower above the governor, who thought he held His fate in his hands. "My kingdom is not of this world," said Jesus. And as we listen to his words we seem suddenly in the presence of an order of reality higher, vaster, more potent than all the sordid disillusionments of the weary and selfish world. The light of a divine assurance was in the eyes of the Master. The steadiness of a perfect assurance was in his voice. We must choose between the spirit of Pilate and the spirit of Jesus. Which shall it be?

And now we come back to our own day. The world lies torn and confused all about us. There is the breakdown of nations. There is the disintegration of ancient sanctions. There is the far-flung passion of broken hearts. There is all the bitter disillusionment of these terrible years. The voice of the cynic in Ecclesiastes seems to express the very spirit of the time: "Therefore I turned about to cause my heart to despair concerning all the labour wherein I had laboured under the sun." But we cannot forget the other voice. The fearful armies are advancing. The product of the land is failing and life itself is ebbing. But the trumpet of faith is blown like a call to a victorious charge. God is still the God of salvation. He is the strength of suffering and hard-pressed men. He gives them feet of fleetness and power to move upon the high places of the world. Oh, you English people, in the name of your noblest traditions, in the name of that Christian heroism which has so greatly adorned your land, turn from the ways of cynicism to the ways of faith. It is not with the heart of Pilate, but with the heart which the living Christ creates, that we are to master the present and create the future and achieve the victory of goodness and love. Our feet are yet to be made fleet to walk upon the high places of the earth.

The Churches and World Reconstruction

By Lucia Ames Mead

IT IS nearly four years since the guns ceased firing, but the world is still in the abyss of doubt, suspicion and confusion. A new generation is soon to enter the electorate which can hardly remember the beginning of the war and which must foot the bills for the folly of its fathers. It is becoming more and more evident that not only German fathers but fathers in all Christian nations were more or less to blame, for they helped create that war-system which was the primary cause.

Only as these young folks, now in school and college, learn something of the true explanation of the increased taxes, the halted exports and the general moral decadence of white civilization are they going to avoid the perils which overwhelmed their fathers and left combined national debts to equal fifty dollars for every minute since Christ was born. How many church conventions this last summer have given any heed whatever to these vital matters? I note one Episcopal convention, having seven departmental meetings a day for eleven days without five minutes devoted to the greatest problem about which the church needs to give explicit instruction today. As I have read the records of the valuable Northfield conferences and others of like character, I have failed to notice, outside of Williamstown, any serious attention to or any mention even of the great problem of how to outlaw war, to organize the world and to prevent Christians from preparing for another war which would ruin white civilization. I should be thankful to have my attention called to any that I may have overlooked.

The leaders of the Federal Council of Churches are awake and sending forth valuable information, but the rank and file of clergy neglect the question. I heard of only one sermon being preached on July 30 on the peace cause in one large city and this one which I listened to suggested no practical way to end war, aside from pious generalities about righteousness. The clergy do not know what to say and so talk about the minor prophets, the prayer-book, prohibition, etc., and do not proclaim that the nations including ourselves who went to war to end war are more heavily armed now than they were in 1914. It would be worth while if the Church Peace Union could learn by questionnaires how many summer conferences devoted one hour to the question of war and peace.

TALKING ABOUT IT

Hon. Philip H. Kerr, former secretary of Lloyd George and conversant with every feature of the war and the peace conference, said at Williamstown: "The civilized world today is standing in relation to this problem of war exactly where Great Britain and America stood in 1914. It is talking about it, but it is doing nothing about it."

The "No More War" demonstrations on July 29, the anniversary of the opening of the world war, had an ambiguous slogan. Perverse critics insisted that the demonstrators were such fools as to believe that there would be no more war. Next year it is to be hoped that this slogan, borrowed from Europe, will be the unambiguous, explicit command, "Outlaw war." An effort to do definite thinking about war is now the imperative demand. More and more it is becoming evident that if the church shirks this plain duty, as it did before 1914, a confused, irritated world which has learned no lesson and is "economically illiterate" will create conditions that will lead to more war and destroy civilization.

Says Bishop Brent, "International affairs are as much the business of every citizen as national affairs. The true citizen is today a citizen of the world and his first loyalty is to mankind. Patriotism comes as a second loyalty, to be checked, disciplined and determined by the larger loyalty. . . . The immediate, concerted action of the churches will decide whether the world is to backslide or progress. If there is no progress, the chief blame will be at the door of the churches and those commissioned to speak in Christ's name."

It is hard work for the intelligent voter to think intelligently on world matters. He often takes only one or two partisan or sectarian papers and has not enough data for premises. The church should provide, not only inspiration, but information such as The Manchester Guardian, Foreign Affairs, and The Searchlight, and others, can supply to the little committee of one man and one woman which every church needs. Such a committee should gather the material, condense it and make it available in some way to the congregation. Ten dollars spent annually on subscriptions and on one or two important books to circulate among members would enable such a committee, in addition to what the town library supplies, to do valuable research work for the benefit of all, provided the pastor was on fire with zeal to have it done.

The consensus of opinion outside of France is that German reparations must be settled on a much smaller basis if prosperity is to come anywhere. We are all members one of another. The best British opinion is now outspoken in proclaiming that Germany was not "solely responsible" for the war, though at the point of the bayonet she was compelled to lie and say she was. These writers claim that no peace can come until this wrong is undone and the composite responsibility for the war is acknowledged, in which responsibility certain Russians played a leading part. So say ex-Premier Nitti of Italy, H. W. Massingham, editor of The London Nation, Austin Harrison, editor of The English Review, and Pevet and other brave French essayists, little known here, who are now doing what Zola and Labori did a generation ago in probing the Dreyfus case and acknowledging the wrong done then.

These facts and many more should be given to church members whose narrow nationalism and antipathy to "Huns" recently banished German dictionaries from the schoolroom and Beethoven from the repertoires of orchestras, and still helps to maintain that spirit of national egotism which, as Philip Kerr says, is the "chief cause of war" and which we know is the chief obstacle to the fulfilment of the prayer, "Thy Kingdom Come."

The Episcopal General Convention

By William B. Spofford

THE convention of the Episcopal church, meeting in Portland, Ore., this month, was given a good start by Bishop Lines of Newark. At the opening service—a pageant of ecclesiasticism, with monks, mitred bishops and red-robed prelates—he preached a sermon to fifty-five hundred delegates and visitors which challenged them to do big things. He spoke of the breakdown of our civilization; of men and women in revolt, the world over, against the rottenness of modern institutions; and he called upon the church to become an interpreter of this world-wide movement.

> Men use the resources and influences of the old order to suppress this revolt . . . . a vain resort. Public men who would be safe, in platitudinous phrases glorify the fathers and ask for the bringing back of the former age, and some ecclesiastics do likewise, and the remedy is not in the vain effort to recall what has gone, but in a new attitude and new leadership. Power has moved to those who seemed helpless. An interpreter of this world-wide movement is needed, who shall tell us its meaning, and, not stopping to reproach and denounce, show the way the church must move to save the world. We have valued overmuch the safe men who are quite sure to say and to do nothing which is novel or disturbing, nothing unlike what we have been accustomed to, but better irregularity and questionable utterances with life, than undue emphasis upon regularity and dignity.

He called upon the church to be venturesome, to be revolutionary. Not more caution but more daring, was the challenge to the church from this prophetic bishop. And in exhorting his brothers thus he did not limit himself to generalities as do so many present-day "fearless" preachers. He denounced as pagan a civilization that allows cities to grow up with homes of luxury and extravagance, waste and selfish comfort at one end, and mean streets and comfortless houses and indecent conditions at the other.

> The principle of the gospel must be applied in all the relations into which men are brought, whether in their social, industrial, political or community life. The church is suffering today from too close association with those high in authority, and in prosperity, while less considerate for the great majority for whom life is one long ending struggle, often with little hope, often in poverty. We have not measured yet the meaning of our Lord's compassion on the great multitude.

GENEROUS INTERPRETATION

He called upon the delegates to open the way towards church unity by being generous in their interpretation of canons and rubrics; he called upon them to license women workers in the church; he asked for fair treatment for the Negro; he demanded obedience to the 18th amendment to the constitution; he favored changes in the prayer book; he denounced war. He challenged the 120 bishops sitting there in their ecclesiastical regalia, and the seven or eight hundred prominent rectors and successful business men who were to take their seats that day in the house of deputies. They listened attentively to this venerable bishop, prayed for divine guidance, sang, "Onward Christian Soldiers" lustily, and then settled back in their seats for three or four weeks of convention business.

The revision and enrichment of the book of common prayer has been the chief business of this convention. Back in 1915 the general convention appointed a commission of liturgical experts, "to consider and report such revision and enrichment of the prayer book as will adapt it to present conditions." This commission has already made two reports, one in St. Louis in 1916, and another in Detroit three years ago. The results of this six years' work were the addition of a few new prayers. The third report is being made at this convention. With what results I cannot say, not being an ecclesiastical lawyer. One hears that a change has been approved in the house of bishops, but that it must now pass in the house of deputies; one hears it has been passed in both houses but that it must be again approved at the convention to meet three years hence in New Orleans.

The modern theologians feel that the new Christian thought must find expression in the liturgies. Those in the Episcopal church who correspond to the fundamentalists in the Baptist denomination oppose any changes. Ecclesiastical law, like all law, is with the old order.

Nevertheless, many changes have been approved by this convention. The word "obey" and the phrase "with all my worldly goods I thee endow" have been voted out of the marriage service. Many of the mediæval phrases and outworn theological ideas will be stricken from the prayer book if the next convention approves of the action taken this year.

As I write nothing has been done officially in regard to church unity. However, most of the manifestos and resolutions are passed during the closing days of the convention and there is no doubt that some action will be taken, for it is a much discussed topic among the delegates. Old Catholic bishops, eastern orthodox bishops, Greek bishops—they are all in Portland, being given the chief seats at the feasts. Church unity here is the drawing together of like minds. The once famous concordat is not receiving its share of attention. The denominational churches are rather neglected, though many of the most prominent rectors present have shown their willingness to cooperate by worshipping and preaching in the Protestant pulpits of the city.

BROAD-MINDED BISHOP

The case of Bishop Paddock of eastern Oregon might well come under the head of church unity. Twenty years ago he was consecrated bishop of the missionary district of eastern Oregon. He has been unique in his work. At a luncheon given in his honor on the day of his consecration Bishop Paddock said, "I am not going to take any money for the work in eastern Oregon except my salary and I am not going to leave my diocese to talk about my work." Many who were present laughed. How could a bishop build churches without yearly visiting the eastern cities to boast of his great work? That was the accepted missionary method employed by all the workers in the missionary field. Hard work in the district for a few months, then on to New York to raise money for the work by relating romantic tales of the frontier to the wealthy. But Bishop Paddock kept his pledge. How? By refusing to build churches; by refusing to enter a competition in which he might win a few souls from the other churches to his own. Instead he cooperated with the churches he found in the field when he arrived. He declared himself bishop of them all, not by an assertion of ecclesiastical authority, but by becoming the brother and servant of them all. To whatever forces were working for the spread of the kingdom, he lent his aid. With whatever churches were trying to do the work of the Master, Bishop Paddock cooperated. He preached in their churches, he celebrated the holy communion at their communion tables, and to the communion he invited all who wanted to serve Christ. People of all churches came to trust him simply because he steadfastly refused to make another sect out of the Episcopal church.

It is a long story which I have but briefly sketched—the glorious work of this Christian who dared great things for God. Of course he broke rules; he was not over careful about canons and rubrics. The result has been abuse, abuse for not building churches, for not emphasizing organization, for neglecting his own church. The situation reached a crisis last spring when Bishop Paddock left his diocese to come to New York to plead his cause before the central organization of the church. There he was stricken ill, worn out by hard work and bitter assault. Physicians have forbidden his return to the work. He therefore presented his resignation to the house of bishops now meeting. There are those who say that it was demanded by many of his brother prelates. I have it on good authority that this statement is untrue. Yet the fact remains that his resignation was accepted—and accepted joyfully by many who feel that his work in Oregon has not been for the best interests of the Episcopal church. He has been condemned for practising church unity with Christians of other folds.

CONCERNING BISHOP PAUL JONES

Bishop Paul Jones is well known to readers of The Christian Century. He was the missionary bishop of Utah, succeeding the brave Bishop Spaulding. War he condemned as unchristian—and not only war but "the war." He is also a socialist, as was his predecessor; another good reason for calling a special session of the house of bishops to consider his case. It is an old story now, this session in New York several years ago. Suffice to say that Bishop Jones resigned in order to save the church the embarrassment of removing a man who steadfastly refused to compromise with Christian principles at a time when it was dangerous not to do so. He has now been put forward as a successor to Bishop Paddock. A friend "on the inside" informs me that he has no chance of being elected. They are saying that his chances have been killed by his friends. It seems that posters were distributed about the city calling upon the assembled bishops to follow their Christian consciences, rather than their instincts for statesmanship, and deal fairly with Bishop Jones.

It is said that Bishop Jones himself is behind this publicity campaign, and that one seeking office by such means is unfit for the work. Apparently those making the charge do not know Paul Jones. I can say positively that he knew nothing of the plans of his so-called friends; further that he would take up any church work reluctantly, and only because of his loyalty to the church that has mistreated him, for he is happy and useful serving in his present capacity as secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. The house of bishops will not elect him, one may be sure, and in refusing to do so they will be forcing into other work one of the daring spirits whom Bishop Lines says is so badly needed by the church.

SOCIAL SERVICE

A joint session to consider the subject of social service was held last week. Speeches were made, and strong recommendations were offered, but on the whole one cannot help feeling that officially the church has receded from the far-sighted position taken at previous conventions. There are social prophets here who are speaking out, Bishop Williams, president of the Church League for Industrial Democracy, for example, but more is being done outside the convention halls. This league is conducting an open forum where not only churchmen but labor leaders are preaching the social gospel. A letter, signed by several

English bishops, calling upon the church to stand for industrial democracy, is being distributed among the delegates by league members. The attendance at the forum meetings is good; the work of the league is given the approval of everyone apparently, yet for some reason it seems impossible to get an official statement on the industrial situation from the convention. The simple fact of the matter is that this convention is controlled by the central organization of the church, the presiding bishop and council, who doubtless feel that any farsighted statement will hinder them in their work. The secretary of the social service department of the council has proposed the following statement, which will probably be the best that can be had:

> Christian social service means the application of the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ to all relations into which men and women are brought, whether in government, industry, social or political life. The church must serve all people, the privileged and unprivileged alike, and must continue to stand for mercy, charity and compassion for those who are in trouble. Wages sufficient for a wholesome living should be the return for efficient service, and the more that can be done in making the employer and the employed partners in business, with a feeling of common and friendly interest and mutual service, the better.

That is an incomplete statement, taken from a newspaper, since I have been unable to secure any other, but it will serve as a sample of what is likely to pass. Safe to say that Mr. Daugherty will not have to get out any injunction against the Episcopal church! But I should not allow the impression to be created that the Episcopal church is unconcerned about social and economic affairs. The Church League for Industrial Democracy, under the leadership of Bishop Williams and Dr. Richard Hogue, is stirring members of the church to a realization of the importance of these topics. The membership of the league is growing rapidly, with local organization springing up in industrial centers. This group, which has been organized but three years, will undoubtedly be a power at the convention meeting in New Orleans in 1925.

OTHER BUSINESS

It is difficult to paint a real picture of the convention. It is so easy for a writer to stress those things in which he himself is interested. This convention is like most others, I imagine. A large part of the time is taken up in discussing the program of the central organization. The council has presented an outline of the plans for the next four years—missions, religious education, social service, work among young people, work among seamen, work among Negroes—all topics under discussion at joint sessions and mass meetings. It is planned to raise during this period twenty-one million dollars—they have talked a lot about that. The women of the church are here, denied an official voice in the deliberations, but making their influence felt through the meeting of the women's auxiliary.

It is too early to sum up for much can be done before the convention closes. It is certain that the church is being trained to march to the tune played by the national council; and like all national councils ours is not progressive; but in spite of the fact that the convention fell far short of Bishop Lines' expectation, it is a joy to see the Episcopal church as one body, undivided by sectional rivalry. After all there can be little progress without solidarity, and there is no question but that this convention has gone a long way toward a realization of Episcopal unity.

British Table Talk

London, Sept. 4, 1922.

THIS letter is written from a small fishing village in Essex into which few echoes of British talk reach us, except through the papers. It is still the holiday season, and the autumn work of the churches exists only in the realm of ideals for most of us. But if we may trust to intuitions, there is a general feeling of hopefulness abroad. It seems as though the church of Christ has passed the darkest hour, and there are better times ahead. This does not mean that it will meet with less opposition, but it will not be ignored. It is preferable to be attacked than to be patronized as an archaic and quaint survival of other days.

A Typical Holiday Sunday

The experiences of one free churchman on holiday may be taken as representative of the experiences through which a host has passed. In the morning the village chapel; the thoughtful, entirely sincere sermon of an old-fashioned believer with the root of the matter in him; hymns out of an old collection; a service in which the old Puritan tradition still lived! Some of the hymns had phrases in them which could not be sung without mental reserve. "Worthless worms" we were called, and each of us was urged in the hymn to consider himself viler than the rest. But in one hymn there were two lines which I had never heard before, and these will not be forgotten,

Of vast eternity."

There was something strangely moving in that thought of the divine sabbath. The evening; the parish church; procession of the vicar and his choir; raucous but hearty singing; a service full of animation. The sermon, after what seemed a poor attack on German theology,—which should be discredited because of the war!—became a most searching discussion of practical religion which went straight home. It was indeed at the close an appeal for personal dealing with God, that we should come out of the multitude and be with him alone. It was an Anglo-Catholic priest, who spoke. But at the heart of his sermon there was the same experience as that which the Baptist had set forth in the morning. Yet there were clearly two varieties of religious experience in the village church and chapel. And there was still a third company meeting in a tent to hear of prophecy!

The Archbishops at Geneva

On the eve of the assembly of the League of Nations the Archbishop of Canterbury preached at Geneva. Dr. Davidson does not rank with our great orators, but he can always be trusted to deal with a great occasion worthily and gravely. Indeed in spite of all the criticisms levelled at the archbishop it will be generally recognized some day how fine an influence he has been and how in a position much exposed to attack he has kept to the way which he set before himself. His address at Geneva had much in it that was entirely needful, nothing more so than the following words—they may have been cabled across to America, but in any case they are worth repeating: "Once let the Christian men and women upon earth, west and east, north and south, kneel to God side by side, stand shoulder to shoulder before men, to say what they mean shall happen, or rather, what shall not happen, in the round world again and they are irresistible. Would to God that any words of mine today should help to rally that unconquerable force to pledge itself with one voice to the great emprise. Resistless invincible, yes, because it is the will of God, and if we answer to that will there is none other that can stand. The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. May the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

The Four Facts of the Gospel

The Free Church Fellowship which has done much pioneer thinking was busy at its August conference with evangelism and education. The outline of the conference results, which will be set forth more fully in a book, came into my hands today. In part two it gives the content of the gospel. It consists of four facts: "the fact of Christ; the fact of redemption or deliverance from the bondage of evil into the freedom of the city of life; the fact of communion with God, along with every channel of experience; and the fact of the church. the divine fellowship, open to all men, in which the fact of Christ is certified to man, redemption experienced, communion perfected." These facts are always the same. The task of the moment is to show how they may make their appeal to this generation. To that task the fellowship addressed itself.

The Suppressed Hunger

It became necessary for example to analyze the modern attitude to the gospel. It is not enough to sum up the men of the present age as absorbed in pleasure-seeking, or in activities other than religious. They are hiding their hunger and thirst, "for a fuller expression of the creative spirit—sought so passionately and bunglingly in play because choked and repressed so grievously in work; for a fully religious conception of work putting spiritual aims in control of material aims in industry, a conception making work sacramental and sacrificial; for a spiritual ideal of friendship as a comradeship in deep things as well as in superficial things, in the things of the spirit as well as in the things of sense, an ideal so gloriously realized in some sex relationships, so grievously betrayed in others. Until these primary spiritual needs of the day are satisfied, the deeper needs there will tend to be either repressed or exaggerated." If the book deals with this and other kindred themes it is one for which we shall watch eagerly.

Another Loss to the L. M. S.

It is at a very great price in human life that the work of such a society as the London Missionary society is pressed forward. Cables from abroad bring tidings of lives claimed before their times. Arnold Hughes, the head master of the Ying Wa college in Hongkong is the last to be called from the sight of men. His furlough had been eagerly awaited by his friends. He was still in early youth, but he had established for himself a place of honor and noble Christian influence in South China. It is a short time since Eric Woods fell in the same station. For one station to lose two gifted and devoted men in their youth within a little more than a year is a heavy blow. But though there is always a hazard to be run by those who enter upon the work of an eastern missionary, there is no work which offers to the evangelist, or teacher, or statesman in the church a more central position in the life of the world.

The Challenge and Outward Bound

These are two papers of great value for all who care for the kingdom of God. "The Challenge" begins a new chapter at the close of September. It will still be a weekly paper but with no ecclesiastical affiliation. Hitherto it has been a church of England journal with a broad and liberal outlook; now it will become a paper concerned with reviewing the work from the standpoint of the Christian interpretation of the human scene. "Outward Bound," under its editor, Mr. Basil Mathews, begins a new year in October. It has been in stormy waters, but I cannot believe the idealists of this country, who have a passion for world-citizenship, will allow this splendid adventure to fail. With a circulation which in pre-war days would have meant established prosperity, it is still struggling however. When will Christian people take the press seriously?

CORRESPONDENCE

The Problem of Armenia

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: You call attention in a recent issue to a movement for some kind of intervention on the part of our government, as I understand, in behalf of the Armenians. Let us try at least to think what this enterprise means before we besiege Washington with our petitions. The Armenian situation is of course dreadful. Who would not like Christianity to do something to save it? But alas! The Armenians are today involved in the unfathomable distress of a world situation. The nations that began the great war by their own blundering and folly, as Lloyd George has admitted, cannot now save Armenians alone. All Asia Minor is in turmoil; there has never as yet been real peace since the vengeful Versailles treaty. What can we do so many thousands of miles away for people much scattered and mostly in the interior of another continent? The world echoes with the cries of the despoiled nearer home than these unfortunate Armenians. It is not sympathy alone or charity that we need. We are reminded of the story of Jesus' disciples who came to him to know why they could not cast out a terrible devil; and Jesus told them that that kind would only come out by prayer and fasting.

What means shall we use for intervention in Asia Minor? Have we not yet learned that violence gets us nowhere? Who would dream of marching an army against the Turks and killing more innocent peasants of one language, in order to compel freedom for people of another language—all of them on both sides men like ourselves! Would we maintain American garrisons in that distant land, so as to be sure to keep the liberties that we had won for the Armenians by the sword? No! Surely American chivalry does not propose to take up again the weapons of violence.

We need, then, spiritual conditions—wisdom, tact, good temper, modesty and everlasting good-will. Where are these splendid and mighty conditions anywhere in evidence? We had not wisdom enough in our government or our churches to help us out of the inhuman business of war; we had not wisdom enough anywhere to write the peace in terms of justice or good-will. We have not yet found our way back to correct the cruel injustices of the war-treaties, and to take a fresh beginning on the foundation of righteousness. We can scarcely hear the sweet notes of magnanimity, mercy, humility, or humanity for the clamor, the fear, the bitterness and hate that still fill the world. Yes! and even seem to menace our domestic peace.

Chivalry ought to do its work with clean hands and a pure heart; it is futile otherwise. Does anyone think that the United States brings clean hands for ministering to the service of distant peoples? She has not ceased to do the work of cruel and bloody aggression in Hayti; she is advertised over the world as the nation that suffers her own black citizens to be burned at the stake. What can she say to the Turks? She is not a friendly neighbor to the Republic of Mexico. She is still keeping up the vast apparatus of war as if she had never heard of the teachings of Jesus, and her powerful churches acquiesce complacently in such things as these!

No! Brothers, let us go slow, and try the unprecedented experiment of "walking humbly with God" for a season, and let us be quite sure what his will is, before we venture afield on meddlesome enterprises, either alone by ourselves, or in such ruinous political company as the fatal business of war has procured for us.

Southwest Harbor, Me. CHARLES F. DOLE.

Help Wanted

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a country preacher eager to bring to my people the best things, I have tried to absorb and digest as much of modern thought as possible. I have waded through much of Darwin and his followers. I have tried to visualize the creation of a 300,000 year old man complete with wife and children from a fragment of skull. I have tried to sift the true from the false in old and new testament. I have read H. G. Wells and in listening to W. J. Bryan have been able to see some of his weaknesses. In one of your news items you quote a great divine's lack of respect for Bryan's talk from the attitude of a "university trained man." Personally I would appreciate a concise statement of a university trained preacher's valuation of the Bible as a whole after the various specialists get through with it. Practically the ordinary student sees Genesis torn out and thrown in the fire, Jehovah reduced to a tribal deity, the story of the Jews a mass of myths, the law and the prophets a creation of an unscrupulous post-exilian priest. The new testament begins with a fable of the virgin birth, is filled with stories of impossible miracles and comes to a climax in an unbelievable story of life after death. The ethics of Jesus are inferior to those of the great philosophers. The only salvation for man is in evolutionary social science and Christianity is a structure built by a Jewish lawyer on the foundation of the mystery religions of Greece and Egypt. The boy comes home with a contempt for the family altar and the village church and the old fogy preacher. What remains?

BOOKS

THE COMMUNITY, by Eduard C. Lindeman. 222 pp. (Association Press.) The "community" is analyzed as to its sociological, psychological and economic factors; then a constructive treatise on means to community progress is given.

WORK, WEALTH AND WAGES, by Joseph Husslein. 159 pp. (Matre & Co.) An able exposition of Roman Catholic principles as related to the current social and industrial problems.

THE ROAD OF REMEMBRANCE, by Elizabeth W. Ross. 148 pp. (Powell & White, Cincinnati.) A most readable story of a life lived in a remarkable way among the commonplaces of life; full of that spiritual intuition, flashes of inspiration, poetic line and gentle humor that has made thousands laugh and weep with "Mother" Ross.

THE THING FROM THE LAKE. By Eleanor M. Ingram. A strange tale that almost suggests Poe. (Lippincott. $1.90.)

THE VALLEY OF GOLD. By David Howarth. A tale of the Saskatchewan, with a refreshing atmosphere of adventure. (Revell. $1.75.)

BAHAISM AND ITS CLAIMS. By Rev. Samuel Graham Wilson. Through his experiences as a missionary in Persia, Mr. Wilson has been able to gather the first-hand facts concerning the origin of Bahaism, the new religion which proposes to supersede all others. Mr. Wilson gives references to the various authorities on the subject and shows that he has read deeply and thoroughly on his subject. He treats Bahaism with an evident bias in favor of evangelical Christianity, a bias which somewhat vitiates his conclusions. He indulges in no unsupported charges, however, and the reader will be able to gain from the reading of this book an understanding of the noble aspirations and the strange superstitions which are blended together in a curious mixture in this new importation of oriental religion into America. (Revell.)

ANTHOLOGY OF MAGAZINE VERSE, 1921. By William Stanley Braithwaite. Mr. Braithwaite's annual appraisement of the best current poetry. About two hundred poems are here reprinted, with proper credit given to magazines in which the poems were found. An essay by the editor on What is American Poetry? and the Yearbook of American Poetry, 1921, with lists of poems published during the year from various authors, are valuable faetures. No one who pretends to keep up with the development of poetry in America can afford to be without this work. (Small Maynard.)

THE THREE MUSKETEERS. By Alexander Dumas. With complete set of 350 illustrations by Leloir. A particularly pleasing edition of the great French classic, paper, type page, and binding being of the best. The fact that new editions of the work are still called for speaks eloquently of the value of this imaginative masterpiece of the elder Dumas. (Appleton $3.00.)

ARIUS THE LIBYAN. By Nathan G. Kouns. Like "Ben Hur" and "Quo Vadis," this story deals with the period of the early days of Christianity, and it has both historical and dramatic value. The tale is vividly told. Nicholas Murray Butler contributes an introduction. (Appleton. $2.00.)

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST. By Bishop William Temple, of Manchester, England. Dr. Temple is not only a theologian and a philosopher who already ranks, but also an explosive personality afire with love of the church and the people. He escapes all classification. If he is a theorist, he has also proved that he has an amazing capacity for affairs. His latest book—a small one of great significance, consists of four lectures delivered to the recent Christian Student Conference. The characteristics of the book are simplicity and a certain originality in presentment. It is written with lucidity and force. It may be commended as an excellent and very sincere piece of apologetic, which minds, young minds especially, perplexed and harassed in regard to fundamentals may read with great benefit. (Doran, $1.25.)

THE BIBLICAL HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS TO THE CHRISTIAN ERA. By F. J. Foakes-Jackson. For this new edition the notes have been revised and two entirely new chapters dealing with the time between the Testaments have been added. A model Old Testament history. Eighteen years ago Dr. Foakes-Jackson published his Biblical History of the Hebrews. (Doran, $3.00.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

And the Child Grew*

CHRISTIANITY recognizes the worth of a child. No other religion approaches ours in this respect. Today we consider the childhood of our Saviour. He did not spring full-orbed from the head of Jove; he grew. Infancy, boyhood, youth and early maturity are all found in our Lord. He grew. He grew symmetrically, perfectly. "The child grew and became strong, and the grace of God was upon him." Froebel would have gloried in such a child. Every intelligent parent rejoices in this picture of the perfect development of this strong, normal personality.

(1) He grew in stature. It was a four-fold development and fundamentally we note the healthy physical foundation. Never have we given such scientific attention to the health of our children. We see to it that they are well-born. Doctors inspect them in the schools and medical advice is freely given. Eyes, teeth, ears, bone and muscle are watched. The feeding of grade children is carefully watched. In the cities many children were found to be underfed and thus their poor marks were explained. Good women came forward with wholesome food for the half-starved little bodies. Out-of-door schools helped those with lung trouble. Wisely directed general athletics were provided for all children. Parents are learning that mind and soul spring naturally out of healthy bodies and that the main business of the early years is to build up healthy children. Before education, before even religion, comes the healthy, normal physical development. Jesus was a happy, wholesome lad. A beautiful house was built for his adorable soul. Our religion is no product of a sick and perverted man, but the sane, balanced, perfect reaction of a strong and vigorous personality. Our faith will lead us into every worthy social effort which makes for happier, healthier childhood. Play-grounds, fresh-air farms, organized games, boy and girl scouts' activities, supervised recreations, (perhaps chaperoned dances)—all forms of health-building enterprises cannot be foreign to Christian interest.

(2) Jesus grew in wisdom, i. e., mentality. His mind expanded. Jesus was intellectual. Jesus not only wept; he thought. He possessed emotion. Emotion, with him, was the sympathetic response which his keen and open mind made to the needs of those among whom he lived. To be un-emotional is to advertise your blank outlook. One should not be ashamed to weep, one should be ashamed not to weep. Jesus' mental development took the form of illumination—that warm, glowing, sympathetic understanding of God and life. He did not laugh, he did not sneer—he understood. He saw life steadily and whole. He was illumined. He knew men. He knew God. He knew all. We must not under-estimate the influence of his wonderful mother in all this. Education for Jesus was not the mere acquisition of facts, not the mere scientific discovery of one or two laws, not the partial and unbalanced outlook upon reality. His mind was like the rising sun—darkness fled—all appeared in correct relations—Jesus was illumined. Today we are suffering from godless scientists on the one hand and unscientific churchmen on the other—which of these is the worst we cannot say. Nothing could be worse, however, than to have our children taught by ignorant pastors and Sunday school teachers in church and by cold and un-Christian professors in high schools and colleges. Such a system is almost certain to ruin completely any boy or girl. Ignorant church folk give the intellectuals an easy mark, while godless, hard-hearted professors invite the bitter attacks which a certain type of churchman delights to make. More science in church and more religion in school would mend the matter.

(3) Jesus grew in favor with God. His whole nature responded to the Infinite Person. Jesus became a religious genius. At twelve he was well advanced, at thirty he was an incomparable teacher, at thirty-three he was the Saviour. Sidney Lanier calls him "Thou Crystal Christ." As a religious teacher Jesus towers above men as an Himalayan peak rises above the ant-hills of India. Words fail, comparisons become inadequate, definitions confuse. Jesus mediates pure religion as no other; he stands gloriously above, yet savingly near.

(4) Jesus grew in favor with men. Our Lord was and is social. Knowing men, he yet loves them. There is your gospel. Knowledge did not make Jesus cynical nor pessimistic—but considerate. We love him, having learned love from his great heart. Men respond to his touch. They do not hesitate to die for him. Countless millions adore this Saviour.

Thus grew the perfect Christ; thus developed our Lord and Master: physically, mentally, religiously, and socially. How far can we, will we, imitate him?

A Wonderful Story—Simply Told

THE OUTLINE OF SCIENCE

Edited by J. Arthur Thomson
English Scientist and Author

HERE is the supreme publishing achievement of the year. In one logical flowing story it tells you of the progress in all the fields of science since the world began. It reduces the whole subject to terms so simple that the layman can clearly understand. It covers this vast amount of material completely and authoritatively—yet so concisely that it can be contained in four volumes. It gives you a collection of nearly 1,000 accurate and graphic pictures illustrating the text clearly. Of fascinating interest and profound educational value to every man, woman and child.

This great work does for science what H. G. Wells' "Outline of History" does for history—and the Thomson books are much more attractive both as to contents and make-up than Wells'. These four volumes will give a better all-around view of modern science than a hundred volumes on the specific sciences. The remarkably fine illustrations in themselves almost tell the story.

To be completed in four volumes. Three volumes are now ready at $4.50 the volume.

A Suggestion: Send for the first volume (adding 15 cents for postage), and then decide—as you will—that you must have the entire set.

If you wish all the books, send $5.00, and you may pay the balance in 30 and 60 days.

(Do not order more than three volumes now. The final volume will not be out until October.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Kansas City to Conserve Results of Convention

The superintendents of two hundred Sunday schools in Kansas City recently had dinner together and made plans to follow up the international convention held in that city last June. A canvas will be made of the entire city to secure new members of the Sunday schools. The Kansas City Star will give a motor car to the school having the largest results in the conservation program. The second prize is a piano. The following are some of the objectives: "A contest between Sunday schools for new members, improved attendance, leadership training, workers' conferences and constructive forward steps, with twenty prizes. A series of post-convention rallies at which leaders in religious education will speak. A training school for twenty-four weeks. The boys' vested choir, now in progress of organization by Prof. John R. Jones, to give a program Dec. 18, assisted by the Hadyn choir, in Convention hall. 'Pageant of the Nativity' in Convention hall Dec. 19, to be produced under the direction of H. Augustine Smith. 'The Messiah' to be sung Christmas eve in Convention hall by the adult chorus, now under process of selection by Professor Jones. An Easter sunrise program of music Easter Sunday. A 2-day May festival by the adult chorus in Convention hall."

Indiana Quakers Meet at Richmond

The Indiana meeting of Friends is called a "yearly meeting" while the national convention bears the unique title of the "Five Years Meeting." The Indiana Friends met at Richmond recently, and one of the most interesting topics of discussion was the deficit in the foreign mission fund which now reaches the alarming total of $47,000, a considerable sum for so small a body. The income of the society for 1920-21 was $143,971.82, the largest in the history of the society. The income for the past five years has been $515,074.82. The board works in Mexico, Jamaica, Cuba, Africa, West China and Palestine. The Five Years' Meeting will be held in Richmond during September.

Dr. Speer Returns from a Long Tour

Dr. Robert E. Speer has just returned from a world tour. The Federal Council welcomed home its president at a dinner in New York recently. At this dinner, Dr. Speer gave a most interesting account of the various great missionary nations which he visited. Particularly striking were his observations of Japan: "Each time I have visited Japan before I have felt, first, the rigidity and bondage of the thought of the Japanese people, and second, the sense of an almost boundless physical vitality. This time both of these impressions were reversed. The last time, six years ago, it seemed like passing into a stifling atmosphere in coming from the Philippines into Japan. Out of their perfect liberty and freedom of thought and action, one plunged into the rigid institutions and stereotyped spirit of the Japanese nation. But now in this new day one has a feeling of moving among great and free thoughts. Indeed, in Japan today this is the common word—'thoughts of all kinds—and thoughts are very dangerous to a governing class which does not like anything that tends to a full freedom of the people. One does not see in Japan now the same strength of the old institutions binding like straight-jackets the minds of men. But now in Japan, as everywhere else around the world, one does find the deep feelings that are stirring the spirit of all mankind."

Veteran Leader Happy Over Convention

Rev. J. B. Briney of Louisville, Ky., is known throughout the length and breadth of Discipledom as the veteran debater of the movement. An ardent champion of the more conservative Disciples' views, he has in recent years expressed great anguish of soul over the direction things have been going. From the platform on the last night of the convention at Winona Lake, he gave utterance to these optimistic and loyal words with regard to the convention and its leadership: "I say that this is a great day. I feel that I stand among my people. I leave this convention with a bow of peace spanning the future. The future is full of hope for us, brethren, and all that is needed is for us to be careful; to be patient. There are some adjustments to be made, but they cannot be made at once, and so we must all be patient and careful and bridle our tongues and guard our pens. Give the United Society a chance. And how I love Brother Burnham! I do not think he will ever be able to go like I do, but God bless him! Wonderful responsibilities are upon his shoulders. Great questions test the capacity of his mind. I want him to know, and I want you to know, that so far as I amount to anything I am right at his back, and I am going to live with my brethren. I am going to work with them and I am going to fight with them; and sometimes it may be necessary to fight them a little, but I hope it won't; and then, I am going to die with them; but not right now. This is a great day. This is a wonderful occasion, and in the future when we refer in our thought and in our conversation to this convention, just let us say, 'The Convention,' for it is the convention of our missionary history."

Fundamentalists on Coast Attack Methodists

When the fundamentalists on the Pacific coast started an attack on the Methodist church and published cartoons ridiculing a Methodist bishop and belittling John Wesley, they did not fully understand what sort of contest they were getting into. The California Christian Advocate, a Methodist journal, promptly takes up the gauge and brands fundamentalism as a revival of Calvinism. The writings of John Wesley are quoted showing that he explicitly repudiated the idea of a temporal kingdom for Jesus Christ. John Wesley held that the second coming was fulfilled in Pentecost and in the presence of the living Christ in the church. Those who think that theological controversy lacks humor will be disillusioned when they read the description by the Methodist paper of the opposed position of Methodists and Calvinists. The Calvinist position is thus stated:

1. If you seek salvation you cannot find it.
2. If you find it, you cannot know it.
3. If you know it, you have not got it.
4. If you get it, you cannot lose it.
5. If you lose it you never had it.

The Methodist explanations of the human will were characterized in the following five points:

1. If you seek salvation, you may find it.
2. If you find it, you may know it.
3. If you know it, you must have it.
4. If you have it, you may lose it.
5. If you lose it, you must have had it.

Protestant Speaker Greeted With Brickbats

Chicago is getting a reflex of the Irish problem over on its west side. The emissaries of the Sinn Fein have held frequent meetings during the past two years at which large amounts of money were collected, in return for which, the donors received a nice piece of engraving which bore the title of Irish Liberty Bond. Hon. William Coote, member of the British and Ulster parliaments, is in this country, and on a recent evening spoke in Western Avenue Methodist church. His presence was resented by the Sinn Feiners of Chicago, and to punctuate this resentment, brickbats were hurled through the church windows. The public press in Chicago has called upon the city administration to maintain free speech.

Fundamentalists in Southern Methodist Church Active

Though theological controversy is barred from the official publications of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and there is no independent press of significance, the fundamentalist element in the church is finding ways and means to continue agitation. They have brought charges against the orthodoxy of missionaries. The appointment of Dr. Gerald Birney Smith, of the University of Chicago, to lecture at the Southwestern university has created a small tempest. A bulletin called "The Open Forum" is

THE YEAR'S GREATEST BOOKS ON RELIGION AND THE CHURCH

The Reconstruction of Religion

By PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, of the University of Missouri.

A vindication of the teachings of Jesus from the standpoint of modern sociology.

Says Professor George A. Coe: "The book is thought-awakening, conscience-searching, uncompromisingly frank; yet, because it is profoundly religious, it is profoundly friendly."

S. Parkes Cadman: "A valuable contribution to the task of rebuilding the world in justice and peace."

Prof. Edwin L. Earp (Drew Seminary): "In my judgment, after careful reading, this is the most thorough analysis of the whole range of religious thought and practice from the point of view of sociology since Rauschenbusch."

Bishop Francis J. McConnell: "Any one depressed on the religious outlook will do well to read it. I found its optimism positively bracing—with none of the bad after effects which come when optimism is not grounded in reason."

Prof. G. Stanley Hall: "I found real edification in this remarkable book."

Prof. Franklin H. Giddings: "I rate it one of the three best religious books of recent years."

Bishop Charles Bayard Mitchell: "The best book I have read in five years. I am urging all my ministers to read it. Sane, scientific, and loyally Scriptural."

Prof. Charles Foster Kent: "Its spirit throughout is not merely critical, but constructive. In fearlessly declaring that the religion of Jesus contains a solution of our modern social problems he has voiced a conviction that is held by thousands of thoughtful men today."

Prof. Edward Alsworth Ross: "This is a great book, profound, logical, lucid, good tempered, and wise. I do not see how any serious man—least of all a clergyman—can afford to neglect it."

Price, $2.25 plus 12 cents postage.

The Church in America

By PROFESSOR WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, of Union Theological Seminary.

"To all who have won from yesterday's experience the hope of a better tomorrow"—so reads Dr. Brown's dedicatory word, and he could not more effectively indicate the spirit of the book. He says further: "I hold with growing conviction the thesis to which this book is devoted; namely, that it is vital to the future success of American Protestantism that we re-think our doctrine of the church; not that we should continue our discussion of church unity in the abstract, but we must determine what should be the function of the church in our democratic society and come to a definite understanding how the existing churches can see that this function is adequately discharged."

SOME CHAPTER HEADINGS

The Question of Democracy to the Church of Today.
The Religion of the Average American.
Emerging Problems.
The Wider Outlook.
Where the War Left the Church.
The Old Religion in the New Intellectual Environment.
The Church and the New Social Order.
The Church as Spiritual Society and as Ecclesiastical Institution.
The Church in the Community.
The Church Specializing for Service.
The Churches Getting Together.
The Church as a School of Religion.
Finding and Training Leaders.
Thinking Together.
The Contribution of the Church to the Democracy of the Future.

What reason is there for believing that the church will do the work which may be expected of it by the forward-looking men and women of our generation? That is the question Dr. Brown attempts to answer in this book.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS
508 South Dearborn Street Chicago, Illinois

now being issued at Ft. Worth, and a recent issue of this paper contains the following charges by Judge R. W. Hall:

"Our church papers close their columns to a discussion of the evil from our side; not one of the fifteen official publications of the church is fighting rationalism, and more than one has openly and brazenly declared in favor of it; see who are writing the lesson articles in the S. S. literature, in which such books as Wells' History are advertised with ringing endorsements under the heading 'Books of Merit;' why not also approve and advertise 'Hoyles Games' and 'Etiquette of the Ball Room?' Nearly every interest and activity of the church is left in the same hands as before; missionaries are retained in our foreign fields who do not believe the Bible, and a returned missionary was fired by the board of managers for telling us about it; at least one new Bishop was elected who spent two terms at Prof. Smith's Chicago university and who kept the writer of an unorthodox book in one of our universities with knowledge of its blasphemous teachings—he told me so himself. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' Unorthodox preachers are knowingly appointed to our pulpits; rationalists are called and paid to teach in our summer schools of theology, and when we protest we bring down on our unoffending heads threats and abuse."

Ku Klux Klan Visits Chicago Church

A part of the effort of the Ku Klux Klan to maintain respectability in a community is through visits to churches approved by the organization where a contribution is left for the work of the church. The first Chicago church to be visited in this way was that of Dr. Johnston Myers, the Immanuel Baptist church. The masked figures filed into the church five hundred strong at a most dramatic moment when Dr. Myers was making an appeal for funds for his new building. The bank notes deposited by the hooded procession reached the total of $1,200. In many cases the klan visits a church where the pastor is not a member, and the incident by no means indicates that this visit was expected by Dr. Myers.

Missionary Leaders Meet in Ancient Palace

The International Missionary council met at Lake Mohonk last year, and one of its actions was to appoint a small committee to act for the organization ad interim between sessions of the council. This committee which has twenty members widely distributed nationally and denominationally, met at the old Palace of Canterbury the last week in August by the gracious invitation of the Archbishop and of Mrs. Davidson. Dr. John R. Mott presided over the organization, and J. H. Oldham and Dr. Warnshuis served as secretaries. It was reported that following the epoch-making Christian conference in China, action has been taken both in India and in Japan to form in each country a Christian conference in which the native leadership will be numerically larger than the foreign leadership. Many of the problems dealt with in committee touch the fringe of international politics, and are of a very delicate nature, so that naturally conclusions on these subjects have not been given out to the public. The next biennial meeting of the International Missionary council will be held in Great Britain July, 1923. Meanwhile it is planned to hold a series of regional conferences in the Mohammedan lands which fringe upon the Mediterranean Sea. The is preliminary to the Near East Conference on Christian Work which will consider the needs of the Islamic world.

Study of Sunday School Methods

The Massachusetts Sunday School association is putting on a number of Sunday school institutes throughout the state this autumn. Foremost among these is the one which will be held in Boston, October 3-8. The sessions will begin each day at 3:30, and will continue until 9. The first five days will be taken up with addresses on various phases of

Episcopalians Work on Prayerbook Revision

THE triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in session at Portland, Ore., is now occupied with the rather lengthy task of prayer-book revision. Action is being taken, item by item, and it is already certain that brides will no longer have to promise to "obey" when married in Episcopal churches. The marriage law has been strengthened as it relates to the remarriage of divorced people. The clergy are not only forbidden to marry people other than the innocent parties of a divorce granted for the scriptural reason, but members of the church are now forbidden to seek such marriage outside the jurisdiction of the church.

The house of bishops has voted to change the rubric with regard to the reading of the burial service over the remains of suicides, the excommunicated and the unbaptized. The attack on this rubric was led by Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts who said: "Under the present law a murderer or libertine, if he has been baptized, can be buried, but a person who has lived a good life, but who has committed suicide, perhaps while in a state of temporary insanity, cannot be. It compels the clergy to pass judgment on others." The change of this rubric carried the house of bishops by a narrow margin, and must now be passed upon by the house of deputies. While this action was a move in the direction of evangelical practice, an action in a contrary direction is the insertion of a prayer in the burial service blessing the grave where the body of the deceased is laid.

For the first time perhaps in the history of the convention bishops will be on trial for heresy. The former bishop of Arkansas is charged with heresy, and the proof given is taken from a book published by the bishop which is very radical on the social question and in which many old-time dogmas are arraigned. The charge of disloyalty has been brought against the bishop of Oregon. He has observed missionary comity, and has often refrained from organizing an Episcopal church in some little town already over-churched where he might happen to find some Episcopalians. He has treated Methodists and Baptists as co-workers in the kingdom of God. Unfortunately for his persecutors, he has been taken ill, and may not be able to answer his accusers. He is vigorously defended by the more progressive element in the church who insist that a man who has carried on a ministry on foot in small settlements of the western country is not to be criticized for laying aside at times the robes of a bishop to take up the more practical khaki.

A veiled resolution against certain secret societies was passed, it being understood that this action has put the church on record against the Ku Klux Klan. Rev. Dr. John D. Wing of Savannah, Ga., charged that the klan was making an appeal to religious prejudices and racial antipathy.

The transfer of the Western Theological Seminary of Chicago to the vicinity of the campus of Northwestern University has been approved. At a luncheon a movement was launched to raise $500,000 with which to affect the change. It is proposed to raise $100,000 from the alumni.

The question of religious healing aroused a most vigorous debate. A settlement was made by affirming the pronouncement on this question by the Lambeth conference which is moderate in tone, and which commits the church to cooperation with physicians.

The question of names for things occupy much attention in religious conventions, for religious people will by no means agree with the bard of Avon that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." Bishop Anderson of Chicago has introduced a motion that the prayer book shall no more speak of "rectors" of churches, but shall call them pastors. This bishop has also introduced a resolution that the bishops be given authority to ordain men for service in other communions.

Great joy came to the convention with the announcement that the eastern orthodox communions would now recognize the Protestant Episcopal church as a part of the true church. A good deal of negotiation has been going on for a number of years to accomplish this result. In the long run this recognition may affect the question of the religious care of small groups of orthodox people in the United States.

NEW BOOKS OF SERMONS

The Victory of God

By JAMES REID

"The chief distinction of this book of twenty-five sermons," says The Christian Century editorially, "is its serenity of spirit, its vitality of faith, and the artless simplicity of the art with which the preacher delivers the message. Its fashion of sermon-making is the simplest, with no struggle after striking titles, no clever twists of odd or obscure texts. Its illustrations are as apt as they are inevitable; nothing is lugged in. The culture of the preacher is manifest, but more as an atmosphere of sanity and rich suggestiveness, and his wealth of great and beautiful thoughts is matched by a nobility of expression." The British Weekly remarks: "In Mr. Reid's pages we catch the living tones of a preacher who is pleading with men so earnestly that his language grows simple, forcible, direct." ($2.00).

The Forgiveness of Sins

By GEORGE ADAM SMITH

Most American ministers know the unrivalled work by Dr. Smith on the geography of the Holy Land. His scholarship is admitted the world over. This volume contains fifteen sermons, the following being some of the titles: "Our Lord's Example in Prayer," "To Him that Overcometh," "The Moral Meaning of Hope," "Will Ye Have the Light," "The Forgiveness of Sins," "The Word of God," and "Temptation." The sermons were preached in Queen's Cross Free Church, Aberdeen. ($1.50).

When Jesus Wrote on the Ground

By EDGAR DE WITT JONES

Says Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, in his "appreciation" of the author of this book: "It is the shepherd instinct that, after all, is the greatest quality in Edgar De Witt Jones. He loves people. He believes in them. He invests even the unworthiest of them with dignity, and in the spirit of Jesus delights to serve them." And that human quality is sensed in all the sermons included in this book. Among the sermon titles are: "The Towel and the Basin," "When Jesus Wrote on the Ground," "A God Who Will Not Let Us Go," "Other Sheep," "The Lord's Leading," "The Church in Thy House," "The Peace Christ Gives," "The Ladder of Prayer," etc. ($1.50).

Sermons for Days We Observe

By FREDERICK F. SHANNON

In his pulpit at Central church, Chicago, Dr. Shannon stands as the latest in a remarkable succession of great preachers: David Swing, Newell Dwight Hillis, F. W. Gunsaulus and, since 1919 Dr. Shannon. The Biblical World remarks: "Dr. Shannon's addresses cannot be measured by the ordinary yard stick; they can hardly be criticized; it is better to enjoy them." This collection includes sermons for New Year, Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Mothers' Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas and other anniversaries. ($1.50).

The Cross and the Garden

By FREDERICK W. NORWOOD

This collection of sermons by the minister at City Temple, London, is thus characterized by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, who preceded Dr. Norwood in that pulpit: "This is a book of very real preaching of a kind not often heard or read. It is so simple, so real, so direct, so human. . . . I like the book because it is clean off the track of conventional preaching and the further we get off that beaten track and yet keep the essential genius and purpose of preaching, the better for us all. Not in years have I read a book or met a man with such a sense of reality—and that is the chief thing. It is religion dipped and dyed in the stuff and color of human life. Unless I miss my guess, this book will have a wide appeal, especially among young preachers." ($1.50).

The Safest Mind Cure and Other Sermons

By W. E. ORCHARD

Dr. Orchard, of King's Weigh House, needs no introduction to the American reading public. His fame as a preacher and prophet is almost world-wide. The "Challenge" characterizes this collection of sermons as both "fresh" and "vigorous." ($1.35).

The Finality of Christ

By W. E. ORCHARD

"The Quest of God," "Christ as a School of Culture," "The Inconstancy of Human Goodness," "Evolution and the Fall," "The Discovery of God in Thought," and "The Finality of Christ" are among the sermons included in this volume. "Great preaching," says The Christian World of this book. ($1.35).

Lord, Teach Us to Pray

By ALEXANDER WHYTE

"There is something in this book," remarks The Christian Century, editorially, "that defies all analysis, something titanic, colossal, overwhelming, which makes ordinary preaching lie a long way below such heights—a sweep of vision, a grasp of reality, a grandeur of conception that fills the heart with wonder and awe. Dr. Whyte seemed utterly oblivious of the modern difficulties about prayer, perhaps because he was a man of importunate, victorious prayer. He did not argue about prayer; he prayed. Where there is so much that is sublime it is difficult to select, but the sermons on the prayer of our Lord in the garden, on the Costliness of Prayer, on the Geometry of Prayer are memorable. . . . If one would know the secret of great preaching, it is revealed in this book, as nowhere else, in our generation." ($2.00).

Sunday school work, group conferences and departmental conferences. On October 8 denominational rallies will be held in various parts of the city. The Church of the New Jerusalem (Swedenborgian) will house the mass meetings, and other meetings will be held in First Methodist church. Denominational experts will make their contribution to the various sessions of the institute.

United Lutherans to Hold Biennial Convention

Since the organization of the United Lutheran church by the union of a number of smaller denominations, only one biennial convention has been held. The next one will be at Buffalo, October 17-26. Four thousand congregations cooperate in this denomination, and the convention will assemble about a thousand delegates. Forty states of America and six provinces of Canada will be represented. The present officers are: president, Rev. F. H. Knubel, New York City; treasurer, Rev. M. G. G. Scherer, New York City; treasurer, E. Clarence Miller, Philadelphia.

Well-Known British Preacher Is Ill

Rev. R. J. Campbell, formerly pastor of City Temple, London, and now a clergyman of the Anglican church, is reported to be quite ill. Since his days in Oxford, his health has never been vigorous and recently he has had heart attacks. The physicians have counselled complete rest, and it is hoped that by this means he may be restored to usefulness again. His career in the established church has been less spectacular than in the nonconformist pulpit, but he has continued to be a most acceptable preacher to large congregations of people.

California Has Its Own Oberammergau

It may help to take some of the curse off Hollywood when the country at large knows that the city is interested in many things besides the mid-night revels of movie actors. An out-door play called "The Life of Christ" is presented every year, and the season of 1922 has just been concluded. Excursion trains are run from many small towns which have brought thousands of tourists to view the sacred spectacle. It is the claim of the Californians that they have the most vivid and the most spiritual of all the various presentations of the life of Christ upon the stage.

Rector Attacks Divorce Canon of His Church

The Rev. Dr. Percy Stickney Grant has recently made a public attack upon the divorce canon of his church. After insisting that the divorce passage in Matthew is of disputed historicity and that the provision in it was racial, he makes the following interesting observation on the lawmaking of his church: "Is it not remarkable that about the only thing in the new testament of ethical character that church members are asked to give their assent to, on penalty, is Jesus' supposed statement about divorce? To love God and to love our neighbor is not demanded of church members with any disciplinary provision; nor are any of the great spiritual laws of the beatitudes. To give, to lend, and to help has no canon behind it. In other words, a saying of Jesus that had to do with the peculiar custom of the Jews has been made the prime ethical precept of the new testament in the organization of the Protestant Episcopal church."

Chautauqua Clientele From All Denominations

The original Chautauqua in New York, founded by Bishop Vincent, has a great interdenominational clientele. During the past season the attendance by denominations was as follows: Methodists, 1,960; Presbyterians, 1,513; United Presbyterian, 442; Baptist, 416; Disciples, 355; Episcopal, 257; Lutheran, 248; Unitarian, 196. Several hundred ministers and their families were numbered in the list as well as a number of missionaries.

Conference on Christian Life and Work Under Way

While the Episcopalians are promoting their great World Conference on Faith and Order, a number of other leading churchmen are seeking a larger fellowship in the Christian world by conference on the service of the church to the world. The approaching Conference on Christian Life and Work is really the idea of Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden who serves as chairman of the committee on arrangements. The plans have been elaborated far enough to announce that preliminary conferences will be held in America, Great Britain, the continent and in the territory of the orthodox church. The world conference will be held either in 1924 or in 1925, and will include every denomination of any size except Roman Catholics. The orthodox church will cooperate. Commissions are to be appointed which will make careful study of such subjects as the church and education, the church and cooperative effort, the church and moral reform, the church and social service, the church and evangelism, the church and domestic missions, the church and world missions, and the church and international relationships.

Brooklyn Ministers Guided in Their Reading

The Brooklyn-Nassau Presbytery has compiled a list of books for the ministers of the group. Those which are in the public library are indicated. Those which cannot be secured at the public library are kept in the rooms of the presbytery. The list has been compiled by Dr. William P. Shriver of the home missions board.

Lutheranism in Europe Still a Vigorous Force

Though more than a million people have withdrawn from Lutheran churches in Germany during the past decade to adopt the socialistic secularism that denies God, this church is still a great force in Germany, and in many other parts of Europe. In the present boundaries of the German republic there are 38,117,803 Lutherans and 19,325,500 Catholics. Among the Lutheran ministers there has been much hardship by reason of the withdrawal of state support, but perhaps in the course of history this may come to be looked upon as the beginning of a new era of spiritual power. The republican government of Czecho-Slovakia has approved a constitution for the Evangelical church of that country. This is a Lutheran church using the Augsburg confession and has 350,000 souls in its care. It has elected two bishops. The Lutheranism of Germany, unlike that of Sweden, does not have episcopal oversight, though many advocate this form of government.

Lutheran Statistician Presents Report

The Lutherans deserve an honorable place among those denomination of America who put conscience into the gathering of statistics. The advance proofs of the reports of the United Lutheran church are out. These reports will be presented at the biennial convention at Buffalo next month. One astounding fact in these reports is that this church has 395 more ministers than parishes, perhaps the only large communion in America of whom this is true. Of course a number of these serve in secretarial positions, or are on the retired list preaching only occasionally. Even the Lutherans suffer heavy losses through lack of interest. The loss by death during the biennium has been 22,000 while the loss by names dropped from the roll was 60,000. The growth of the church by transfer and by confirmation greatly exceeds the losses however.

Presbyterians Build Up Large Congregations

One of the significant features of Presbyterian work in this country is the tendency to build strong congregations. They do not promote so many centers in large cities, but try to make their work intensive in the localities. The tendency in this regard is well set forth in some statistical studies by Jonathan Jones: "In 1920, 131 churches reported 1,000 or more members, with a total of

THE CRISIS OF THE CHURCHES
By LEIGHTON PARKS, D.D.
Rector of Saint Bartholomew's Church, New York
Dr. Parks derives a powerful text from which to plead the cause of church unity from the present crisis of world civilization —a condition, in the author's own words, "so dreadful that not a few serious-minded men are asking themselves if Western civilization is about to fail." The author sees Christian unity as the imperative need of the hour, and it is to point a way to that end that he has written this book.

190,855; in 1921 there were 150, with 218,059. This year the report shows 167, with 244,177, or nearly 14 per cent of the total reported membership." The statistics show a nice growth in evangelistic interest and, as one would expect, the large churches are the ones which are most successful in evangelism. "In 1920, 61 churches added 100 or more on confession, totaling 8,727; in 1921, 78 were in this class, with a total of 11,694. The following table shows that in the year ended March 31, 1922, 50 churches added 7,001. This is about 7 per cent of the 93,259 added on examination." The five largest Presbyterian churches of the country are: First of Seattle, Central of Brooklyn, Immanuel of Los Angeles, First of Pittsburgh, Central of Denver, and First of Oklahoma City. The largest synod in the country is Pennsylvania with 340,690 members. New York and Ohio follow.

Lutheran Missionary Women Hold Convention

The Women's Missionary society of the United Lutheran church will hold its biennial convention at Pittsburgh, September 26-29. The large increase in giving during the past biennium totals $296,605 over the previous two years. The society has sent to the field during the past two years twenty-one women missionaries. In India the society maintains three hospitals, three dispensaries, forty schools, and thirty-four women missionaries; in Africa, one hospital, two dispensaries, one day school with outstations and eight women missionaries; in Japan, four kindergartens and seven women missionaries; in the West Indies, two homes for children and one woman missionary, and in South America, one woman missionary.

From Morning to Midnight Negroes Expound Religion

Church services continued from early morning until midnight, with just time for meals in between, at the closing day of a big meeting of Negro Congregationalists in Chicago. Colored Congregationalists from two continents assembled to plan an extension of their work. The sessions were held in the Lincoln Memorial Congregational church. One of the strong notes of the gathering was the promotion of interracial cooperation. Dr. G. E. Haynes, who is author of a popular book this year, told of a big new movement in the south to bring better understanding between the races. The next meeting will be held at some point in the central south.

Lutherans Compete at University of Wisconsin

The formation of the United Lutheran church did not include the Missouri Synod Lutherans, a large group of Germans of most conservative tendencies, hence competitive situations arise which are the occasion of great sorrow to intelligent Lutheran leaders. The United Lutheran church is just completing at great sacrifice a building at the University of Wisconsin which will cost a quarter of a million dollars. Now comes the announcement that the Missouri Synod Lutherans will start the erection of a similar building to cost another quarter of a million dollars. As the Lutherans of Wisconsin are predominantly of the Missouri Synod persuasion, the first building will be rendered in considerable measure unnecessary. This situation is typical of the competition in building programs which can be discerned in many of the larger cities. This competition is now a matter of observation and protest on the part of the younger generation and one may confidently expect that during the coming years the total strength of Lutheranism in America will be pledged to a program of cooperation.

European Countries Claim American Ministers

The interchange of ministers between Great Britain and the United States has been operating for some time. Through this interchange a spiritual solidarity is arising which is of great moment in the future relations of the two countries. Less advertised is the exchange of ministers between the United States and the Scandinavian countries. For many years the tendency was all one way, the Swedes, Norwegians and Danes coming to this country. Now Lutheran papers of the United States raise the cry that they are losing some of their most significant men for the pulpits of the mother lands.

Will Bolsheviks Help the Russian Church?

The conflict between state and church authorities was one of the outstanding features of Russian news in the early days of the revolution. The government carried on propaganda against the church and denied the use of a state-owned press to the clergy. It seems, however, that the state is less hostile than formerly and it becomes apparent that Russia will remain Christian, even though it should adhere to communism. One of the first effects of the new regime is seen in a decline of celibacy in the orthodox church. Russian priests have always been allowed to marry, but not until now have some of the monastic orders been given permission to break their vows. Without doubt the regime of the Bolsheviki will modernize the Russian church in many other important ways.

Constructive Quarterly Discontinues Publication

In 1913 the Constructive Quarterly was founded in order to set forth the views of men and women in various communions who looked for the closer unity of the Church of Christ. Dr. Silas McBee, who was formerly editor of the Churchman, has for the past nine years devoted his energies exclusively to the production of this quarterly, and infirmity of health is given as the reason for the discontinuance of the quarterly with the June issue. The history of quarterlies dealing with religious interests is a difficult one, but the Constructive Quarterly has held an honorable place in the field of religious journalism.

TEN NEW BOOKS ON JESUS

The most significant fact with regard to the new religious books of the year 1922-23 is the great number of volumes treating of the personality, life and work of Jesus. The publishers have felt the pulse of the serious reading public and the publication of these books is a result of that fact. The world was never so perplexed intellectually and spiritually as today. And men are wistfully turning, as never before—and more hopefully than ever before—to the "Lord of Thought" and of the Heart. Nothing could so enrich the fruitage of this new year than for ten thousand ministers to delve deeply into these new revealings of "The Life of Lives."

THE FINALITY OF CHRIST

By W. E. Orchard

The fame of the pastor of King's Weigh House (Congregational) church, London, long ago reached America. This volume of his sermons will be welcomed by students of present-day tendencies in Christian thinking. The Christian World says: "We commend this book to everyone who loves great preaching and fearless independence. ($1.35).

RABBONI: A Study of Jesus Christ, the Teacher

By Canon Anthony C. Deane

"This is a gracious and wise book, showing how to go to school to the Master Teacher. I do not remember to have seen a better study of Jesus the Teacher, alike in atmosphere and suggestion." (Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, D.D.) ($2.00).

THE PROPOSAL OF JESUS

By John A. Hutton

Although published last year, this work bids fair to be a book in continuous demand. It is an unusual book, striking out a new line. What Christ's teaching involved for the wide world, in whatever phase of its life, Dr. Hutton describes in detail. Master of a word style, the author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous, but awe-inspiring, as his interpretation unfolds. Jesus is presented, not as the founder of a sect, but "to inaugurate a world-state-of-matters, having as its ultimate motive and principle God." This book, if followed, would bring light into this present social and industrial night in which men now find themselves. ($1.50).

JESUS AND LIFE

By Joseph McFadyen

The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, holds that it is a "matter of life or death to the world" that men be christianized in all their various relations. ($2.00).

TOWARD THE UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS

By V. G. Simkhovitch

"The teachings of Christ are an historical event. Let us try to understand them historically. Without an historical understanding we have before us not teachings but texts. There is hardly a text in the four gospels that is not apparently conflicting with other texts. Yet an insight is won when the teachings of Jesus are viewed and understood historically." Thus Dr. Simkhovitch, who is professor of economics at Columbia University, takes up his survey of the background of the teachings of Jesus. Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri, writes that this is the best book he has found covering this phase of Jesus' work. ($1.75).

JESUS CHRIST AND THE WORLD TODAY

By Grace Hutchins and Anna Rochester

"A remarkable piece of work," says Norman Thomas, editor of "The Nation," in commenting upon this new book. He adds: "I have never seen a series of studies dealing with modern social applications of the teachings of Jesus which seemed to me so frank, thoroughgoing and suggestive. If Christianity is to have any positive influence in the making of a new age, it will have to be the sort of Christianity which this book expounds so well." ($1.25).

CHRIST AND INTERNATIONAL LIFE

By Edith Picton-Turbervill (With Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil)

The author's theme is—as phrased and accepted by Lord Robert Cecil—that "our national policy, both internal and external, must be Christianized; that, in other words, Christian morality must in its essence be the guide of our national conduct." It is a thesis that has often been urged by divines and others; the author's eloquent pages vindicate it with much independence and from new angles. Miss Picton-Turbervill is known the world over for her work with the W. C. T. U. and the Y. W. C. A. ($1.50).

THE MEANING OF THE CROSS

By Edward Grubb

The author of this book is already well known for his other books, among them "The Religion of Experience." Dr. Grubb adapts the older doctrine of the atonement to modern thought—to scientific psychology, to Ritschl's insistence on a solution that is social; and comprising in the conception of Atonement the revelation of the character of God, our identification with His will, deliverence from sin rather than from punishment, and salvation by God's gift of love.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST

By William Temple, Bishop of Manchester

"Just what many people, both young students and older persons who are desirous of thinking clearly on religious topics, are looking for."—Manchester Guardian. ($1.25).

THE CREATIVE CHRIST

By Edward S. Drown

How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the state, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members? Dr. Drown, who is a well known professor of Cambridge, Mass., holds that the answer to all these questions will be arrived at through the acceptance in deed and truth of the teachings of the "Creative Christ." ($1.50).

A Book of Inspiration, Encouragement and Suggestion

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?

Things Eternal

By John Kelman, D. D.,

Pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

Thousands of persons who cannot hope to hear this brilliantly spiritual preacher will welcome this volume of his sermons. Some of the subjects discussed are:

Christ's Lessons in Prayer.
Loyalty to Vision.
Leadership. False and True.
Concerning Gifts.

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS

The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

Selection

YOUR boy selects his college courses with some definite end in view. The end may be no better than merely dodging work. In that case the college turns out what came to it—a dodger. Or the end may be a specialty. In that case it turns out a specialist. How many grown-ups select their post-graduate courses with any definite end in view?

The result is indiscriminate, wasteful reading — Sunday papers, best sellers, the hodge-podge that is well called the popular magazine—that is, whatever is popular, whatever at the moment happens to please.

The notion that education stops with commencement, that, diploma in hand, we can turn our backs for good and all on books and thinking, and join with Yale's famous quarterback in sighing "Educated, by gosh!" —that notion is gradually giving way to the realization that commencement is commencement, and that education is, what we have always dutifully called it, a continuous process which ends only with our willingness to learn.

For those who are not yet wholly "educated, by gosh," and to whom selection still appeals as a desirable road to education, we venture to suggest that now is a good time to begin to plan your winter's reading, and that if you would take a post-graduate course in the business of ordinary living you would do well to include The New Republic among your textbooks. Perhaps, through its weekly visits, you, too, will find that thinking needn't be a bore, that matching wits with a journal of ideas turns thinking into first-rate fun.

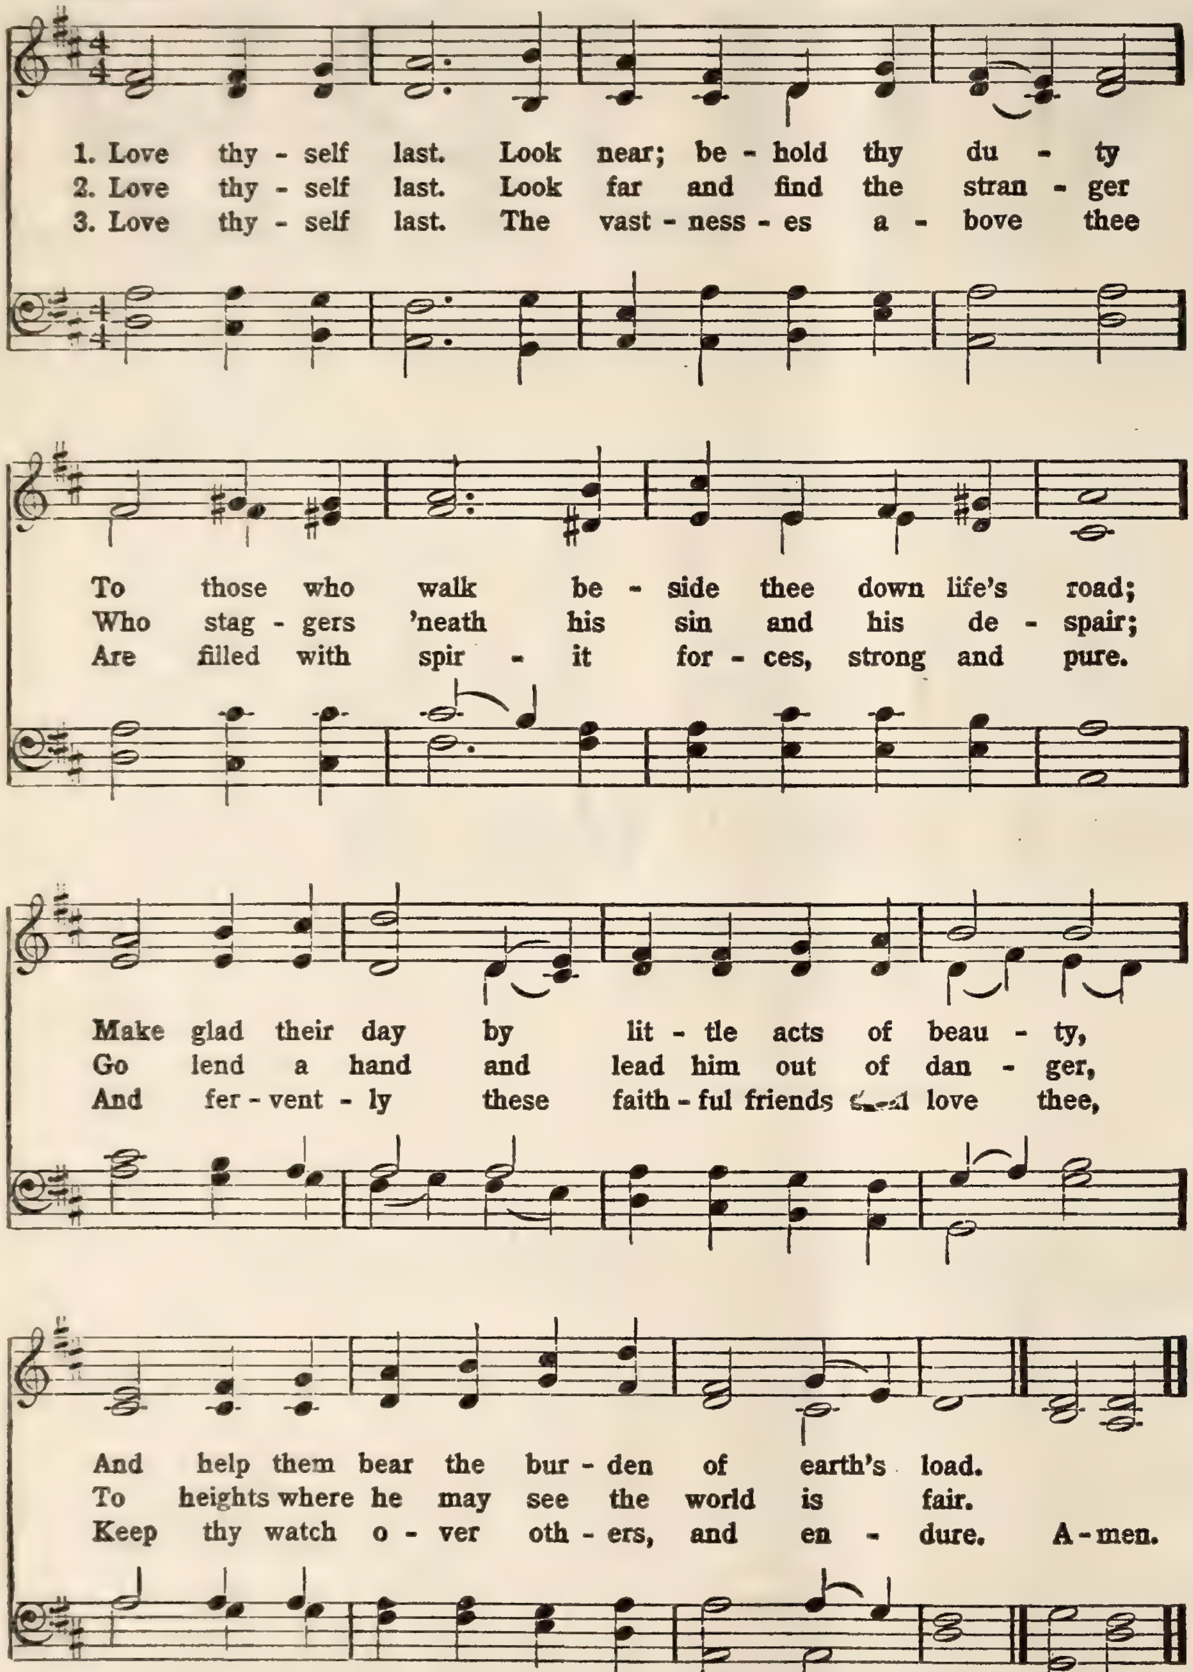
John B. Dykes, 1875



1. Love thy-self last. Look near; be-hold thy du-ty
To those who walk be-side thee down life's road;
Make glad their day by lit-tle acts of beau-ty,
And help them bear the bur-den of earth's load.
2. Love thy-self last. Look far and find the stran-ger
Who stag-gers 'neath his sin and his de-spair;
Go lend a hand and lead him out of dan-ger,
To heights where he may see the world is fair.
3. Love thy-self last. The vast-ness-es a-bove thee
Are filled with spir-it for-ces, strong and pure.
And fer-vent-ly these faith-ful friends shall love thee,
Keep thy watch o-ver oth-ers, and en-dure. A-men.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Chesterton Goes to Rome

G. K. CHESTERTON'S departure from the fold of the Anglican church for the fellowship of Rome will revive once more the talk about England becoming Roman Catholic. A century ago there were less than 100,000 Roman Catholics in England. At present there are not less than 1,500,000. In sixty years thirty-two baronets and 417 of the nobility have been converted to the Roman faith. Gorman in his "Converts to Rome" estimates that 10,000 converts are made annually. But over against these facts must be placed others not less significant. In a century the act of toleration has removed the civil disabilities of Roman Catholics, and no one is now afraid to declare his true faith. While the population of England has quadrupled in a century, the population of Ireland has declined, there being in England at the present time probably more than a million Irishmen of the Catholic faith. During the century a considerable number of French royalists of Catholic faith have come to reside in England. The Catholic church has carried on an insistent propaganda in England ever since the defection of Cardinal Newman. Through intermarriage there is also a considerable transfer of membership. But as over against this tendency in the direction of Catholicism is the loss to Rome through modernistic views. The names of the great modernist priests who have left Rome probably equal in significance those who have entered. Chesterton began life as an artist. His temper has been dogmatic from the beginning. Widely read though he is in philosophy and literature, he has prided himself upon his ignorance of theological studies. His faith has been a thing of simple assertion resting on authority. That one who chooses authority religion should pass from the high church wing of the established church into Rome surprises no one except a high churchman. His departure does not represent a movement, but rather the quest of a dogmatic mind for the most dogmatic of the churches.

He Being Dead Yet Speaketh

WHEN Spurgeon died the editor of a sporting paper wrote an appreciation of the great preacher, in the course of which he said: "In Spurgeon's case one of the first circumstances prepossessing the auditor was that he had no Sunday voice." It was the naturalness of his speech, his freedom from the holy whine—what Dickens called "the Heavenly Father voice"—that made him so attractive. One recalls this tribute as one opens a volume of hitherto unpublished sermons by Spurgeon, entitled, "Able to the Uttermost," a title so characteristic in its simplicity and scripturalness, free from all cleverness and straining for effect; and the sermons have the same qualities of clarity, solid construction, apt and homely illustration, forthrightness of thought and melting unction, which distinguished all his work. Some of the sermons, such as the one on "The Day of Atonement," state the stiffest interpretations of tradition theology; but they do so with a spiritual instinct and a robust common sense which disarms the modern thinker, and rebukes a cheap revivalism. During his lifetime Spurgeon drew and held the largest congregations of any preacher in London, and was perhaps the most widely read preacher that ever lived. He ought to be restudied by preachers today, as much for the vitality of his Christian experience as for the incomparable power of the preacher. Clever, dapper, prettified preaching, dealing with odd texts and eccentric themes—of this sort of thing we have enough and to spare. What the church needs supremely today is really great preaching, by men whose hearts God has touched, who know how to bring two worlds together in the sacrament of the sermon. The world waits for the pulpit to tap what the miners call "the stream below the bottom."

Make Room for This New Society

DR. ARMSTRONG SMITH, of the Save the Children Fund, of London, has organized a Padlock Society, the pledge of which is as follows: "I promise to try my utmost never to say an unkind thing about anyone whether true or untrue." To join the society a padlock must be unlocked, the promise made in the presence of three witnesses, and the padlock then locked. To remain a member, the promise must be repeated in the same manner every New Year's day. When the promise is first made the full name and address must be sent to Dr. Armstrong Smith, Maryland, Lechworth, Herts, England. Already more than a million members have been received into the society. When one thinks of the mean, snippy, catty, wicked things people say about their fellows, and nations say about each other—as witness the outburst of Kipling about America—there ought to be at least fifteen hundred million members of such a society. "It is thoughtless, harmful chatter that we want to stop," said Dr. Smith, and soon the underground railways of London will be covered with appeals to join this "world league of the sealed lips," as it was aptly described by the mayor of Budapest. The aim is simply to Search the inmost of the mind,

Purging all fierce and foul desire,
And kindling life more pure and kind.

There are no fees, no forms to fill out, no inquiries to make—all that is needed is to stop saying naughty, irritating, petty things about people.

The Negro is Making Good

FAITH in the negro's possibilities inspired the men of civil war days to approve of emancipation, and later of the negro franchise. The developing self-consciousness of the race now makes it possible to gather together many interesting facts with regard to the progress of the negro. C. C. Spaulding, secretary-treasurer of the North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance company of Durham, states that the resources of twenty-five negro life insurance companies aggregate twelve million dollars. The negro millionaire has arrived. The press tells the story of Watt Terry, a negro of Brockton, Mass., who now owns property in New York said to be worth $2,300,000. In a recent address at Norfolk, Va., he told the assembled negroes that idling around pool-rooms and questionable resorts was the thing that kept the negro down, and industry was the means to lift him up. The negro press has established a respectable periodical literature which grows more and more intelligent and independent. A number of educated negroes now share the work of the great professions so that it is possible for the black man in a southern city to have practically all his wants cared for by men of his own color. Such eminent negroes as Booker T. Washington, Professor DuBois, and the poet Paul Lawrence Dunbar give indications of the possibilities latent in the black man. The Negro at his worst is just as unlovely as the white man at his worst. One may well hesitate to say which race may descend to the lower depths when it is degraded. The trouble in many communities between white and black is created by ignorant and immoral representatives of both races. Where education and religion exercise their beneficent sway, there is but little race trouble. A wholesome racial pride is being cultivated among negroes which will go far to eliminate some of the sources of friction between the races, for it will remove all desire for racial intermixture.

Sermonolatry and Empty Churches

IN the October number of the Yale Review—which has so rapidly won its way to the front rank of great quarterlies—Dr. Francis E. Clark writes a striking article on "The Menace of the Sermon." The reason for the falling off in church attendance, he says, "is the worship of the sermon instead of the worship of God; it is sermon idolatry which we must chiefly blame for the really deplorable condition of many churches." Oddly enough, we had thought the fact just the other way round; but if Dr. Clark is right, then the liturgical churches ought to be crowded—but they are in no better shape than the rest. No doubt the sermon is often too much emphasized, or at least the other parts of the service are too much neglected; but the sermon is, or should be, a part of the worship. All true preaching is sacramental. While there is a real point in the article by Dr. Clark, as an explanation of the present plight of the church it is wholly inadequate. No, the widespread defection from the church is caused by the plain fact that the new universe in which we live—utterly transformed from the thought-world of our fathers—has not yet been interpreted in terms of Christian faith. That is no easy task, but until it is done we may not hope to see our churches full of eager worshippers.

The New Canon on Divorce

THE house of deputies of the Protestant Episcopal church of America in its recent triennial convention at Portland, ratified and amended the marriage canon, which had been previously passed by the house of bishops. The canon is drastic, providing that no divorced communicant of the Episcopal church may marry again unless infidelity to the marriage vow has wrecked the first marriage, and the person wishing to remarry is innocent of wrongdoing. The motive and purpose of such a canon is altogether noble, but how can it be enforced? The Roman church can enforce such a law, because it holds the power of exclusion from the communion table, and, in final resort, the power of excommunication, which to the faithful means exclusion from salvation, since there is no alternative church, or sect, in which refuge may be found. To be sure, the Episcopal church may exclude from the communion table, but it knows nothing of excommunication as the Roman church understands it. Fortunately, it has no such weapon. The result of the Portland canon will be to drive those who think they are justified in seeking divorce, out of the church, without reducing the number of divorces granted. As a witness of the church in behalf of the sanctity of marriage, and a protest against divorce, the canon is worth while; but it does not solve the question.

Condemnation of the Ku Klux Movement

THE Federal Council of the Churches has received of late a large number of communications from religious bodies and individuals among its constituent groups urging some definite pronouncement regarding the Ku Klux Klan. In various parts of the country this organization is interpreted in widely different ways—in one locality as anti-Catholic, in another as anti-Negro, in still others as against all foreigners, and elsewhere as having still other purposes. It is within safe bounds to affirm with emphasis that a body of men unknown in personnel, usually disguised, and working under cover of night, though it may be animated by constructive and righteous purposes, is sure to fall into the dangers and practices of mob rule and lynch law when it undertakes to perform the functions of government, either executive or judicial, in this furtive and irresponsible fashion. The Federal Council has issued a statesmanlike and constructive utterance which affirms in positive manner that no organization which sets one denomination, race or color against another can be either American, democratic or ethical in its spirit. There may be a passing lure to a certain type of mind in the dramatic and picturesque character of the organization which appeals to the untrained imagination as impressive. The results of such procedure as is carried on by this organization or still worse of such activities as it is likely to inspire in the minds of vicious and lawless men can work only disaster in the nation at large. A few examples of benevolence and patriotic behavior go a very short way toward counteracting the enormous evils which the Ku Klux organization and methods have already fostered, and are still likely to stimulate.

"Politics is the Very Breath of Religion"

THESE words by Dallas Lore Sharp have been taken as a text by that admirable journal, "The American Boy," for its campaign to educate our boys in political ways and tactics through the schools. It is a movement which deserves the encouragement of citizens of all creeds and parties. The remedy for the ills of the professional politician is for all of us to be professional politicians—clean, skillful, fighting politicians—and then the man who makes a business of public life will have to run straight, or not run far. As matters now stand, only a little more than half of our people entitled to vote ever vote on any issue, leaving public affairs in the hands of the boss and his henchmen. If every school becomes a miniature political community, in which boys and girls are taught by practice the arts of politics and self-government, they will not grow up lacking that public-mindedness so much needed to make democracy effective. Lincoln was an adept in all the arts of politics, else he had been helpless in face of the astute and able Douglas who knew all the tricks of the game. High ideals and pious sentiments are not enough; we must know how to translate them into results. The plan here proposed begins at the beginning; it is pedagogically sound, and full of promise for a more intelligent and capable citizenship. The ancient Greeks had a word to describe a man who neglected the duties of citizenship. They called him an "idiot," by which they meant "a man so self-absorbed that he is of no use to the state"; and one knows not how else to describe those who fail in the fundamental obligations of citizens and yet complain of bad government.

Ireland's Outlook

IT would appear that the deaths of the two outstanding leaders of the Irish movement for just and honorable treaty relations with England have had a tendency to sober somewhat the irrational spirits of the rebellious group which belligerently attempted to thwart all amicable understanding. Griffith and Collins were greatly beloved and honored by most Irishmen, and the unhappy events which finally led to their taking off, the one by sickness induced by his excessive labors in behalf of the nation, and the other by assassination at the hands of bitter-enders, would seem to have brought home to minds capable of discrimination the fact that the civil strife perpetuated by the extremists of the de Valera faction was taking the nation rapidly down a blind alley to a renewal of the unhappy conditions which prevailed in the dark days of Irish subjugation. At present there is a calmer atmosphere and an apparent desire to avoid those foolish outbursts of partisanship which would inevitably lead to fresh British reprisals and probably to the reoccupation of Ireland by a British army. If the Irish people have the wit to appreciate the character of the agreement made between their wise leaders and the British government, the future may yet be set to reconstructive measures.

City Hall Scandals

THE administration of the city of Chicago seems to sink lower and lower in public estimation. The mayor, who came into his first term of office with the largest majority ever given to an executive of this city, was gradually involved in the meshes of a machine which by its unscrupulous and avaricious behavior gradually demolished public confidence and made clear the fact that the municipality was headed toward a Tammany-like control as vicious and selfish as that of the notorious organization in New York City. The machine was so strong at the second election period that it carried the mayor and his henchmen into office a second time, but with an astonishingly reduced majority. During the two years since that event the corrupt character of the city administration has become increasingly apparent. The school board situation in Chicago is notorious and inexcusable. Its history during the past five years has been one of unparalleled effrontery and mismanagement. At the present time several of the members of the school board, including its recent president, are under indictment for gross frauds in connection with the purchase of school property and supplies. The police and fire departments are under serious public judgment. Particularly is this the case with the police. The moral conditions in Chicago were probably never worse. Gambling, boot-legging and prostitution are manifestly and almost openly protected by the force. The mayor, stung apparently by public criticism, appointed a clergyman as "law enforcer," and this official has since his appointment been in open conflict with the chief of police, a conflict ending at last in ousting the "enforcer."

Public opinion has openly and increasingly expressed its disapproval of the city hall management, and every measure promoted by the mayor and his administration during recent months has been condemned if submitted to the citizenship of Chicago. This was notably the case in the judicial election. Even a machine-controlled population will at last turn to decency and better government when it recognizes the enormous cost of a city administration as corrupt as that with which Chicago is cursed at the present time.

Repentance and Hope

RELIGIOUS leadership has a double responsibility to men. It must discover the beauties and nobilities of life amid its commonplaces and it must reveal the iniquities of men underneath their respectabilities. A true gospel will, at the same time, encourage men to hope and persuade them to repent. To preach such a twofold message is not an easy task. The mood of the prophet and the temper of the day in which he lives may easily disturb the balance of the two elements of a whole gospel. The Hebrew prophets had a happy faculty for fulfilling both responsibilities by preaching repentance in eras of complacency and proclaiming hope in the day of despair when their gloomy prophecies of judgment had reached fulfillment. Their policy of tempering the wind to the shorn sheep has a justification in pedagogical principles and was strangely vindicated by historical facts. Yet any average age is in need of both messages. The burdens of life are heavy and its purposes none too obvious so that men need a religion which will justify the ways of God to men by discovering to their dim sight the immensities of a spiritual life that make the sorrows and drudgeries of the day not worthy to be compared to them. But their need of a gospel of repentance is just as urgent. They have as much difficulty in plumbing the depths of sin as in measuring the heights of spiritual possibilities and are tempted as easily to complacency as to despair. Their conscience is readily habituated to traditional vices and only the keenest moral insight will help them to become conscious of those human shortcomings that have the sanction of social usage.

Unfortunately the modern pulpit does not seem to measure up to this double responsibility. In an age of specialization, it, too, has specialized and on the whole preferred the more amiable to the sterner duty. It preaches hope and joy and leaves the fault-finding to the secularists. It sustains man's confidence in the faith that he has been made but a little lower than the angels and reassures him so emphatically on the possibility of redemption that it tempts him to a premature sense of security, before he has rid himself of those passions and prejudices that caused the shame of modern civilization and threaten even more disaster. Meanwhile the liberal press, and modern literature in general, have developed such a keen insight into the depravities of modern life, as evidenced in both its international and industrial relationships, that it has often been driven to an attitude of despair, wondering whether the sins of men were not too great to be forgiven—or overcome. There is a strange contrast between the realism of modern literature and the prevailing romanticism of the pulpit.

Quite generally the pulpit still speaks of the war in terms of a democratic crusade and frequently challenges the popular attitude of disillusionment concerning it. It entertains the more realistic interpretations of the conflict given by such men as Sherwood Eddy in an attitude of mingled surprise and incredulity and enlarges upon the possibilities of every favorable incident in the world situation with more optimism than caution. One suspects that its passionate espousal of the League of Nations, in which many liberals have lost faith, may be partially dictated by its unwillingness to admit the defeat of those moral aims of the war which justified its participation in it. This conclusion may be too cynical but it is not too much to say that the church has, on the whole, an inadequate understanding of the shams of modern nationalism and is easily taken in by the unctuous phrases of diplomatists that are calculated to hide the passions of greed and vengeance which still too strongly motivate the policy of nations. The task of revealing these is left almost solely to the liberal press and the few thinkers whose vision is unclouded by the romantic interpretations of war which were so popular and so necessary while the conflict was in progress.

During the war the same contrast between the realism of secularists and the romanticism of the church was evident in the more intimate glimpses of the conflict on the battlefields recorded by close observers. The religious workers in the army who recorded their impressions for the folks at home generally gave themselves to the laudable effort of revealing those glimpses of beauty and nobility which the battlefield nurtures and discovers and which slightly relieve the horrible picture of its cruelties and inhumanities. They wrote of the "star dust in the dugouts" and of the "huts in hell." The more unlovely facts of the war were more adequately described by such cruel realists as Barbusse and Latzko and more recently by Phillip Gibbs, a belated convert to realism. The religious mind seemed to turn instinctively to the task of hiding man's shame behind the rags of his redeeming virtues so that faith in his higher destiny might not be completely destroyed. The realists had no such faith to maintain. Sometimes they were influenced by the very opposite animus and took delight in presenting man in all the impotence of his clay and the cruelty of his untamed instincts.

The contrast is equally obvious in the analysis of modern industrial civilization. Carl Sandburg and many of his colleagues of modern verse have a profounder knowledge of the cruelties and inhumanities practiced under the cover of accepted industrial relationships and social standards than the average pulpit. The fierce young intellectualists who collaborated on "Civilization in the United States," though their attitude is too superior and pharisaic to deserve praise, have been more uncompromising in condemning the real in the light of the ideal than most prophets whose duty it is to convict men of their sins. The church is not lacking in prophets who preach repentance as the only hope of salvation but the sins they see are generally the obvious derelictions from accepted standards rather than the iniquities hidden in the standards themselves. They lack the equipment to analyze the complex and intricate relationships of modern industrial and commercial life in which so many unchristian attitudes are hid and so many unrighteous motives are operative. We have come a far way from the day when theologians were the chief protagonists of the doctrine of the total depravity of man. Most of them now have an easy faith in mankind that "believeth all things," accepting the pronouncement of statesmen at their own evaluation and having complete confidence in the Christian and benevolent intention of captains of industry who are willing to subscribe large sums to missionary and benevolent enterprises but are not so willing to abrogate any of their special privileges in the interest of a more democratic and Christian organization of the industrial order.

It must be admitted that the motive of modern realists is not always to elicit emotions of contrition. Quite frequently they have the opposite intention of discounting conventions and ideals as hypocrisies, in the interest of a freer expression of man's more immediate instincts and desires. Thus many of our contemporary novelists seem to delight in taking a page from Freudian psychology and digging about the slime of the subconscious where the remnants of man's most primitive passions and instincts lie imbedded, so that they may present these to our horrified gaze and make sport of the responsibilities that represent the achievements of man's slow ascent to civilization. Modern realism is often frankly sensual and brutally cynical.

The pulpit has the right and the duty to oppose these tendencies and to insist that our ideals are as authoritative as our instincts and that the morality to which man at least has attained through centuries of experience is not all hypocrisy, whatever the tumultuous passions that seethe beneath its conventions. The love and appreciation that see man's ideals are as necessary to an adequate understanding of human nature as the cool psychological analysis that reveals his lower instincts. But a spiritual interpretation of life is convincing only if its exponents are able to insist upon it after having plumbed the depths of man's depravity; and it has value for the moral life only if it reacts with uncompromising vigor against all moral traditions and social usages that are incompatible with it. We need prophets who know all about man and yet believe in him, whose faith in his destiny as a son of God has been won without ignorance of his real crimes and sins and can be maintained without wilfully obscuring his shortcomings. Like Jesus they must hate sin while loving the sinner; and like Jesus they must be able to apprehend sin in the respectable conventions and traditions of society no less than in individual departure from them.

Allah, the Allies and America

IN the tangled skein of events in the Levant, the echoes of which are reaching us through the despatches, one thing stands out with startling and appalling distinctness, and that is the catastrophe that has befallen the city of Smyrna, one of the Seven Cities of the Apocalypse, the home and burial place of Polycarp, and in modern times the chief commercial center of Asia Minor with a population of half a million. The tragedy of its practical annihilation has come so suddenly and unexpectedly that civilization is stunned for the moment, and even the most lurid accounts give but inadequate impressions of the disaster that has overtaken an entire population. A teeming metropolis, with a modern and spacious sea front, a harbor thronged with the commerce of the world, and a great cosmopolitan citizenship, has been wiped from the face of the earth, and only blackened and bloody ruins mark the spot where most of the near east came first and last to traffic. A noble ministry of missionary and educational character under American auspices has been obliterated, and the men and women who for years have labored to bring it to efficiency have been dispersed to places of safety.

The first summons to the world is for immediate relief to the scores of thousands of victims of this unspeakable outburst of savage race hatred. With the exception of the Turkish quarter, the entire city has poured forth its homeless and hunted inhabitants, falling in their flight under the weapons of massacre, finding death amid the blazing streets where they had lived, or huddled in terrified and famishing crowds along the water front begging with frantic entreaty for any means of escape from the twin terrors of murder and starvation. Notable service has been rendered by the few ships of the American and other navies in those waters, and the refugees have been conveyed as fast as possible to temporary points of safety. But a new and most distressing problem now confronts Christendom—the relief of these hundreds of thousands of sufferers from this latest and most harrowing of world fatalities.

Under the conditions of confusion and poverty now prevailing throughout a large portion of Europe, it is evident that the chief aid in this crisis must come from the United States. It is highly fortunate that our relief agencies were prepared to render prompt and efficient help. The Red Cross made an immediate contribution of $50,000 from its funds. This was a small amount in the emergency, but was of service. The Near East Relief opportunely had a large supply of food and clothing in Constantinople, a part of its gathered material for Armenian and Syrian relief. This was promptly used for the care of the refugees, and is being dispensed in Smyrna and other points where the victims of the tragedy have found partial aid. But vastly more is required to meet the pressing need, and there must be quick response from all people of good will. Meetings are being held throughout the nation for the gathering of funds. The Near East Relief is doing its utmost to serve adequately as a distributor of supplies thus provided. The Federal Council of the Churches, under whose auspices mass meetings were held last week in New York and elsewhere, has named a day of prayer, and is undertaking to forward all funds received for this purpose, a general committee representing all the relief agencies having been organized at its suggestion to act in the emergency. There is the greatest demand for instant and generous participation in this ministry of supply. Never was the call more insistent, and probably for a long time to come this additional burden will be laid upon the sympathies and generosity of those who are sensitive to the tragic needs of humanity.

But it is not enough to discern the enormity of an event of this sort, and attempt to meet in a fitting manner the emergency. It is essential that there should be a just appraisal of the causes of such a breakdown of civilization. It is sufficiently tragic when an erupting volcano, an earthquake or a tidal wave destroys an entire population. But in this instance something far more terrible has happened. A city, ancient and honored, has been destroyed by the mad passions of men aroused against even the weak and helpless by the release of long smoldering fires of racial antagonism and religious fanaticism. And all this in the very days when most is being said about world peace and the ideals of brotherhood. The causes of this tremendous debacle of civilization are not all apparent, but some of them are too evident to be missed.

There are ancient grudges between Turkey and Greece which have had no adjustment through centuries. From the fall of Constantinople in 1453, on whose walls, built by the first of the Constantines, the last of the imperial name stood to look with terror upon the advance of Mohammed II and his Turkish host, Greece has felt the sting of that mediæval defeat, and the hope that some day the city on the Bosphorus might come back to European control. In this hope all the western nations have shared, particularly in the light of the atrocities which Turks have perpetrated upon Armenians and other defenseless groups during the past two centuries. The alliance of Turkey with Germany in the world war deepened this resentment, and one of the assured results of the peace concluded at Versailles was the expulsion of Turkey from Europe, the removal of its government from Constantinople, and the internationalization of the great waterway that flows past its door.

Turkey was prepared to accept this decision. It was willing to submit to all the conditions of the allied victory. It faced the necessity of providing the Armenians with an area that might be regarded as their undisturbed home, and was reluctantly about to take its place as a second-rate power of hither-Asia, with its capital at Brusa or Koniah.

But since that time a gradual disintegration of these allied forces has taken place. There has been an almost unconscious withdrawal from the ideals and achievements of the war to the narrower zones of national self-interest. There has been little moral leadership in the alliance, especially since the United States withdrew. Great Britain has been nervous over the attitude of her Moslem subjects in India and Egypt, who are closely joined in faith to the Turks. Under the spell of this timidity she has modified her attitude toward Turkey, and been far less in the mood for strict enforcement of the conditions of the treaty. France was too much concerned to safeguard her Russian loans of former years to give much heed to Turkish affairs, beyond the hope of securing a mandate over northern Syria. Italy, after a war with Turkey seven years ago, which had less than a shadow of justification, was in no mood to take up an attitude of antagonism, having composed her differences with the Ottoman government. And so the Turk was left to renew his ancient practice of setting one enemy over against another, an art that Abdul Hamid II brought to perfection. And in the meantime he mastered the military lessons taught him by the Germans under von der Goltz and quietly gathered an army, unobserved and yet under the very eyes of distracted Europe.

And why was Europe in this distracted condition? Many causes contributed. But one of the most outstanding of them all was the withdrawal of American participation and sympathy after the unhappy days of the peace treaty and the organization of the league of nations. Neither of these arrangements was satisfactory to the American conscience. The treaty was a shameless betrayal of virtually every one of the fourteen points which the allies had promised Germany should be the basis of the armistice. The American people could not become a party to it, even though their President found himself driven to give it his approval. The league had its own inherent faults, but these were negligible. Its chief fault, and at the time its insurmountable fault, was the fact that it could not be approved without approving the nefarious treaty with which by a strange caprice of fate the President had allowed it to be tied up. Many and various were the motives which actuated this group and that, in congress and in the ranks of private citizenship, to oppose participation in the league of nations, but there was one motive adequate and righteous which justified our negative decision. That was the moral recoil from the immoral obligations involved in participation in the treaty of Versailles. But the past is past. It is not wholly without its aspect of honor despite the partisanship and stubbornness which actuated legislators and leaders at the time. Yet what the technicalities of treaty ratification would not then allow, providential events are making possible. The treaty is breaking down by its own inherent injustice. The league is slowly but surely being separated from the matrix of imperialistic barter and intrigue in which it was first conceived. Events seem to be organizing themselves so as to confront the American people with the league of nations unencumbered by the treaty of Versailles. Without question the very near future will witness an American election in which the issue will be participation in world affairs through the only world organization in existence for that purpose. What America's answer will be can hardly be a matter of doubt.

Slowly but inevitably the thoughtful portion of the nation is coming to understand that our withdrawal from participation in the reconstruction of the world at the very moment when we were most needed, while morally inevitable in view of the sordid fabric of injustice and falsehood of which the treaty was made, was tragical beyond expression. Yet America cannot shake off the sense that every obligation of friendship and good will toward our associates in the war pledged us to see the great enterprise to its completion.

It is not strange that with no help from this country in the projection of a strong, incisive and conciliatory program for the near east, the old animosities among the allies have gradually reappeared, and the foes of civilization have taken the opportunity to regain their lost estate. When the United States entered the war, Turkey abandoned at once the policy of persecution of the Armenians, knowing that it was not safe to provoke the resentment of an aroused American sentiment. With the withdrawal of America from European affairs, those massacres were resumed, and have continued to this hour. Had her rightful place been made for America in the counsels of the nations it is not too much to insist that every one of the conditions agreed to at the end of the year would have been attained—the permanent retirement of the Turk from Europe, the securing to the Armenians of an assured homeland, the internationalization of Constantinople, and a measure of order which would have prevented the total mismanagement of Greek affairs. That misadventure has led to this needless and inexcusable renewal of ancient Greco-Turkish animosities, with the resulting destruction of Smyrna and the vast augmentation of starving populations for which Christendom must become responsible. Nor was it necessary that this should have involved America either in war or vast financial outlay. The knowledge that this nation was concerned in the outcome, and disapproved of policies and programs projected in the interest of the old imperialisms of selfishness and oppression, would go far to give strength to the forces of progress struggling so courageously and often at such disadvantage in the old world for the era of peace and recovery for which all nations long.

What is needed now is that Europe shall completely disentangle the league of nations from the treaty of Versailles, and give America an unobstructed view of her international obligation. The conscience of the nation is not dead. The obligations of friendship and moral assistance are too imperious to be continuously displaced by galvanized political zeal over tariff schedules and river and harbor budgets. For this reason the first obligation of our citizenship is the immediate relief of the homeless and starving, by generous contributions through the approved agencies of assistance; and second, the stimulation of the growing sentiment in behalf of a national policy that shall recognize our international obligations, and restore to us the moral leadership which by our own and Europe's footlessness and perfidy has been all but lost.

The Paste and the Ink

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time there was an Editor who had upon his table a Paste Bottle and an Ink Bottle. And with these twain he edited.

And one day I went to see him, and I found him in Great Perplexity.

And I said, Heavy rests the cares of him who must guide the thought of a Vast Multitude of Readers.

And he said, Forget it. The care that resteth heavy upon me is this, that I have stuck my Pen so often into the Paste and have thrust my Brush so often into the Ink, I have forgotten which is the Paste Bottle and which is the Ink Bottle.

And he lamented with great lamentation.

And he said, I would fain write a Great Editorial, and settle a Number of the Questions that Vex the Nation; but I have forgotten which is my Paste and which is mine Ink.

And I said, Thou art not so unlike other men as thou dost suppose. From the man in the Restaurant who useth his Knife where he should use his Fork, to the fond mother who useth Sugar Plums where she should use a Shingle, and on up to the men who handle the destinies of Nations, there is similar confusion of thought. I have read Presidential Messages which knew not whether to dip in the Ink or the Glue, and have heard sermons which kept Sticking To It when they should have dipped the Pen in Ink and written, Amen.

Now this I considered, that Ink is a Good Thing, and Paste is a Good Thing, and the world is more or less full of a Number of Good Things; but that fact insureth not that any man shall always know which to use at a Given Time.

And I remembered that a Sage of the Olden time had said that there is a time for everything; and a Sage in modern times hath declared that Time maketh ancient good uncouth; and a great thinker hath said that Truth hath its own Statute of Limitations, and if not used becometh a Lie.

So I say unto the sons of men, Consider it not enough that thou hast Virtue and Truth and other Good Machinery. It is necessary that one learn Rightly to Divide the Word of Truth. And this law I lay down to him, who would think clearly and proceed with assurance:

Keep thy Pen out of the Paste Pot and thy Brush out of the Ink Bottle.

"These Incompetent Modern Parents"

By Fred Smith

AT last the children are in bed and asleep. The long day with its multitude of little duties is past. And as I sit "alone with my thoughts" I find myself recalling that in the more Puritanical days of America one of our own poets had written exquisitely concerning "The Children's Hour." It is not often now that I have time to turn the pages of the poets, but the mood being upon me, I obeyed the impulse and turned to the old familiar lines:

> Between the dark and the daylight,
>   When the night is beginning to lower,
> Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
>   That is known as the children's hour.

And as I returned the book to the shelf I thought how that "Time makes ancient good uncouth, lest one good custom should corrupt the world," for the children of this day and generation know no hour that is called "The Children's Hour." For this is the Children's Age. For them we build our schools and colleges; for them we rear our libraries and gymnasiums. Academical professors find no more fruitful line of study in these days than in the broad areas of the life of the child. Then, having garnered far and wide in the field of life, they give to the world in lecture and in literature knowledge in the form of wisdom. For we parents are a much advised folk in these days. The destiny of the world is in our hands. "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world" is still made to do duty on occasion. Therefore is the degeneracy of the present age charged to our account. We are ever being reminded of the multitude of our transgressions. Our shortcomings are manifest to all. The indictment is tremendous. And the conclusion is that we are incompetent. This is the gravamen of the charge that is brought against us.

INCOMPETENCE UNAVOIDABLE

Being somewhat of an interested party myself in this matter and being rather jealous of the good name of modern parents it has occurred to me that before we be judged guilty of the sin of incompetence it may be well to consider if our incompetence is a sin with which guilt should be associated. For incompetent we most certainly are. But, lest it be thought that in so speaking I have said the last word that needs to be said, I hasten to add that, in my judgment, the incompetence of the modern parent is a happenstance and not a sin. It is a fact that is born of necessity. So far as the modern parent is concerned it can be said that "necessity is the mother of incompetence." That is to say, things being as they are, and, it has to be added, our parents being as they were, the incompetence of the modern parent is something that could not be avoided. A fortuitous (or unfortuitous) concourse of circumstances, according to one's viewpoint, made this incompetence an inevitable necessity. And what is inevitable, by that same token, is not a sin. That is to say, we are relieved of the onerous duty of disproving that we are criminals. We acknowledge our incompetence as a fact but not as a sin.

The explanation of this subtle distinction is of vital value in the justification of the modern parent. The difference between the two is simply the difference between the pragmatist and the Puritan. Observation leads to the conclusion that in the eyes of the latter the modern parent is a failure, but in the mind of the former judgment is suspended. The Puritan judges against a background; the pragmatist thinks in terms of the future. They who are puritanically inclined find in us parents incompetence that brings with it an entail of guilt, but they who are pragmatically influenced see in us the evidence of that incompetence which one of our own poets has defined as "high failure." Which is to say, our incompetence may even be found to savor of virtue. It makes a world of difference as to one's judgments as to whether that person evaluates the issues of life, which in this case, is the fact of parenthood, in terms of pramatism or of Puritanism.

BASIS OF EDUCATION SHIFTED

It is therefore of no little significance to notice that it is within the past generation that the basis of the education of our children has been shifted from the theological basis to the psychological. What this means to the modern parent is a study that would take us far afield. In this article we have only space to touch upon the main consequences. This is probably the root cause why the children of our day are so "different" from the children of the past. We all are the children of our age as well as of our parents. And to change the philosophical background of an age is to produce a different people. The generation that sat at the feet of Cotton Mather we expect to have been different from the generation which in our time has gone to school with Professor William James.

This then is our circumstance. We have been born into a day "where two seas meet." The Puritan and the pragmatist contend for mastery. To the Puritan, which his theological outlook, the child is a child of Adam, bearing in his own body the curse of the race, and the fact of original sin. Truly Puritan was the method of Susanna Wesley in "breaking" the will of her children. The child had to be saved though it smart unmercifully for it. The end of the ferule was a good pointer to the paths of virtue. Divinity and discipline met and kissed each other. Rigid discipline was counted the same as righteous education. The Puritan was mightily concerned to mold his children according to his heart's desire. They were called to be saints. They were to be the salt of the earth. But there came a day when the salt had lost its savor. Concerned in little particularities it lost sight of great principles. The children who were to be the salt of the earth suffered a transmutation into something strange in that they became the "vinegar" of the earth. They acidified, and called it edifying. And, to make a long story short, a generation that knew not the Puritan arose. And that is our generation. This is the reason why they of a Puritanical lineage declare truly that they never "saw the likes" of this amazing generation of which we are the parents. Neither did we. But being pragmatical we are suspending our judgment concerning it for the present. We have struck a trial balance, and have found the results in some particulars disappointing, but on the whole, not discouraging.

PURITANISM OUTGROWN

This much is at least clear to us, namely, we have outgrown the weakness of Puritanism, though, it must also be added, we have failed to incorporate into our system of education, its strength. By this I mean that the modern parent no longer looks upon his child "as born in sin and conceived in iniquity." We have too great a regard for the facts and our mothers to be blind to the first or to slander the second. We come to the child seeing there the most wonderful and delicate mechanism that has been made in creation. Into our hands it has been given for our keeping. It is "a bundle of life" built up of passions, emotions, and instincts. Ours it is to mold or mar. We have to bend the developing will, not break it. The bending process has not always been a success, as many of our critics remind us. But neither was the breaking process of the Puritan as ex-President Eliot recently pointed out. The modern parent, however, is never guilty of thinking of his children as "children of the devil."

On the other hand it should be acknowledged that this same modern parent often fails to incorporate into his education of the child the strength of Puritanism. We parents are concerned so much with the question of methods that we often overlook the fact of motives. We give facts but do not impart principles. Our own morality is so fluid that it never crystallizes in our children. Nay, if the truth be told, I fear that most of us are more concerned in seeing that our children become successes than we are in their becoming saints. We have reacted so far from the Puritan ideal as to almost work our own undoing.

WEAK SENSE OF DISCIPLINE

Perhaps nowhere are we so weak as in our sense of discipline. We have been afraid to prune. We have thought of the "rights" of the child when we should have been enforcing our morality. Said an intelligent father to me: It is not for me to implant my creed into my child; she will be able to do that for herself in youth. We have hesitated to direct, while much more have we hesitated to discipline. We have allowed the crop of wild oats to be sown lest by any mischance in the prevention of the sowing thereof we should be destroying a possible rose-garden. To quote the words of Katherine Kennedy: "Does Bobby drag mud into the house and slam doors as he goes: he is but manifesting the initiative and force of a future pathfinder. Does Marion quarrel with regrettable readiness: is it not a sign of the artistic temperament? Such crops of thistles are patiently endured by parents in the hope of a profitable harvest." This is one reason (though by no means the chief one) for the present "carnival of crime." And in so far as this is true of the modern parent there is attached to his incompetence a sense of guilt. In this case incompetence is hesitation's child.

To damn the modern parent for this not altogether unjustifiable hesitation would be to pervert justice. Time is the great avenger if we will but wait. Parents will learn by experience. And, here is a fact that is often overlooked by our condemners, in many of our modern situations, we have no precedent to fall back upon. Civilization has been transformed within the past generation. Eight of the world's greatest discoveries have come to us within the past century. The good fortune of our fathers when "justice broadened down from precedent to precedent" is not ours. We face new conditions; our windows open up to new horizons. They who glibly say that "history repeats itself" are either not acquainted with history or else they do not sense the newness of modern life. Our age is epochal. We, as parents, find it hard to adjust ourselves to the new knowledge. And our lack of adjustment bears bitter fruit in our children. Hence our unfortunate lack of discipline. The Dotoressa Montessori has a word of wisdom here which I cannot forbear quoting in this connection. In recommending her method of discipline to American readers she says: "When the teachers were weary of my observations, they began to allow the children to do whatever they pleased. . . . Then I had to intervene to show with what absolute rigor it is necessary to hinder and, little by little, suppress all those things that we must not do, so that the child may come to discern clearly between good and evil." That is to say, we modern parents can well afford to pay more thought to motivation, for education has to do with morals as well as methods. Thus far we can all afford to be Puritans, but let us be Puritans in a pragmatical way.

KNOWLEDGE IS NOT WISDOM

This, then, is the chief reason of our incompetence in our day, that knowledge has run ahead of wisdom. We have accumulated facts, but we have not deepened our faith. Our Christianity has not kept pace with our civilization. And the difference between these things is largely the measure of our incompetence as parents. For those who are wise this state of affairs will not present itself as a basis for pessimism but rather as a problem for solution. Recognizing our present incompetence as parents does not mean that we have to return to the puritanical conception of the home. This is impossible. One reason why we have not advanced more than we have in this matter is that we have retained too long the thought forms of Puritanism when the power had gone from them. A theocratic sheriffed civilization made possible the Puritan home, but an automobile skyscraper civilization, where time and space are largely annihilated, calls for a new adjustment of parental relationships, on the one hand, to the children, and, on the other to the state.

With regard to the first matter, wise parents will see to it that there is one thing that they will not do, namely, they will not readily capitulate to their children. Authority in the last analysis rests with the parent, though the ultimate judgment belongs to the child. Because our children have a superficial knowledge of facts is no reason why parents should give to their children the reins of power. Too many parents have a fictitious reverence for "book" learning. Wise parents do not forget that knowledge is not wisdom, and will govern themselves accordingly. What is needed is that the spirit of cameraderie shall be fostered in the home life, so that parent and child shall come to live more nearly in a common world. In this sense the time is ripe for the reconstruction of the meaning of the home.

HOME LIFE CHANGING

It would be easy here to follow the line of least resistance and through "the mouthing of words" become eloquent as to the value of home life a la Puritan. We have already seen, however, that this would be no solution of the complex problem which now faces us as to the place and function of the parent in our changed civilization. Our children are our children and yet they are not our children. In a way that was not true for the children of the past the horizon of their life is not bounded by the four walls which we call home. When they are early taken by the state into the school it does not take very long before the average parent becomes conscious that the curriculum of today is not what it was in the days of his youth. As the years pass by the hours outside the school schedule are more and more trespassed upon by school activities. Two to four evenings per week is no uncommon experience. Society grows more and more, the parent becomes less and less. We are not here evaluating this tendency of modern times, we are merely taking note of its consequence for the modern parents. Our children live not with us but in society. Robert Burns would hardly be able now to write anything analogous to The Cotter's Saturday Night.

Were parents not so crassly conservative they would see that the significance of this trend of the times for them is a readjusting of responsibilities. Society now takes over from us many duties that were once thought of as belonging solely to the parent. That is to say, while our duties as parents decrease, those appertaining to citizenship increase. The home of our children is increasingly the community. To be a good parent one must be an interested citizen. It is not enough that we be merely good, we must also be active. Herein lies another reason explanatory of the incompetence of many modern parents. They have not yet caught up with the new obligations that have come upon parents through the development of civilization.

For these many reasons we acknowledge but do not bewail our incompetence. We are incompetent as were all our fathers before us. The perfect generation of parents has not yet been born. Parents who are greatly conscious of their competence are rather apt to produce incompetent children. They are wise who realize that perfection is not in them nor in their children. The hope of this generation of parents lies in the one fact that it is conscious that it does not know it all.

A Letter to Alexander Campbell

By Edward Scribner Ames

My dear Mr. Campbell:

I sat a long time looking at your name after I had written it here at the beginning of my letter. A kind of strange feeling came over me as I realized that I had addressed you. The simple act of beginning a letter to you brought you nearer. Your picture is before me. Your last letter is on my desk. Your words and deeds have been before me all my life. They have influenced me in some ways more than those of any other man. Yet you died years before I was born. It is not difficult on Sundays to feel that you are here beside me in my little chapel. I know that in the same way you are also in ten thousand other chapels and churches today. It is strange that we seldom stop to think that because of you this very building was built. Because of you it is open today. Because of you the Lord's Supper has been observed, in spite of the fact that it was observed last Sunday and the Sunday before that. And because of you, it is observed here every Sunday, simply and naturally, as a beautiful and voluntary reminder of Jesus Christ. And because of you it is a communion service in which any person may participate whether he belongs to this church or to any other church or to no church at all. In a very real sense all that is thought and done here is on account of you for if you had not been instrumental in creating this religious body which you wanted to be known as the Disciples of Christ this land would have been bought by some one else and there would now be on this spot a residence or a fraternity house. A church of some other faith might be here but not this congregation or this preacher or this atmosphere. I cannot throw off the spell of this undeniable fact that though you have been dead for six and fifty years yet you are a living power among us. In very definite and vital ways you affect our thought and speech and worship. As I think of it I wonder whether you may not be consciously present with us though we may not see or hear you.

STILL HUMAN IN HEAVEN

You know we mortals have many conjectures about our friends who have left us. Some think they have no knowledge of us because the suffering and evil of this world would disturb the peace and joy of heaven. But others like to think that good souls, like the angels themselves, look down from the celestial battlements and try to cheer us on the upward way. There is something very comforting and inspiring in this thought that people are still quite human after they die and that they do not forget us. I could scarcely imagine a man like you being so absorbed in any other world as never to think of the interests he had here. After working all your life to forward a great cause you must want to know how it fares. I can believe you go every morning to the great gate of heaven to inquire of the arriving pilgrims the news of the religious movement you did so much to develop. Those must have been days of heightened bliss even in paradise when some President of the United States, or speaker of the house of representatives, or justice of the supreme court, or great captain of industry, or scientist or distinguished man of letters, looked about upon the dazzling sights and sought you out among all the throngs to tell you how your interpretations of divine things had helped him heavenward. Or, were you more moved by the multitudes of souls who had no fame or high honor on the earth but came to tell you of their gratitude? You must have rejoiced as the years of earth were counted off to see increasing numbers entering heaven from the churches you had helped to build. From ten thousand churches with a million members many thousands must greet you every year. And if men can feel pride in heaven you may have a justifiable pride in seeing your movement take its place as the fifth in size of all protestant bodies, although the youngest of all. And it must be gratifying to reflect that it is the largest religious body which had its origin in America.

TOWERS OF VISION

But do you never hear any but the pleasantest things on that fair shore? How do you get on with the Catholic priests, and the Methodist Bishops and the Presbyterian editors? Perhaps it is a part of the marvel of getting into heaven that you are then able to see everything in a larger and truer way, just as boys who have grown to be men may sit together and look back upon their childish quarrels with perfect good nature. Or maybe you are taken forward in the course of human history by some wonderful "time machine," where you are able to see how the old controversies have been overcome and the bitterness of sectarian rivalry forgotten. I am expecting, too, that there may be towers, or mountains of vision, or some kind of exercise which will enable mortals to gain more balanced and better proportioned ideas of the relative importance of things in religion. Sometimes, in our human blindness and devotion to good causes we become occupied with little things and miss the big ones. We tithe mint, anise, and cummin and neglect the weightier matters of judgment, mercy and faith.

But there are a number of things which you did get into the proper perspective. One was your insistence that in the development of religious movements men often give so much honor to their human leaders that they obscure the fact of Christ himself. It was a wise precaution on your part to insist that your name should not be identified with the churches you established. This has not been an easy thing to observe. If one says, in order to explain his religious connection, that he is a member of the Christian church, he is apt to be met with surprise and the reply that all churches are Christian. It never seems to be entirely convincing to say, "Yes, but we do not mean that we are the only Christians. All we mean is that we are Christians only." The explanation that we have adopted this name Christian hoping that all Christians would finally use it and drop all human names and denominational appellations sounds attractive but is impracticable in the present state of the world. Therefore our gracious friends often call us Christians in our presence but in their hearts think of us as "Campbellites." Our world is so mixed that most people readily understand that one may honor a human leader and revere Christ at the same time. The Calvinists are Christians as well as followers of John Calvin. And the same is true of the Wesleyans and the Lutherans. No one wants to be thought of as accepting everything any of those great men taught, but we use their names to indicate the general attitude and the main body of doctrine.

I suppose you have been interested in meeting the souls just come to heaven to discover that those who belonged to different Disciples churches have come to hold widely different views on certain matters. If you conduct little informal examinations in a conversational way you realize that the souls who come from my church do not talk in just the same way as those from Bedford, Indiana. You may even have the surprise of finding that some of our finest souls scarcely know about your work and teaching. Yet they agree with you on the vital things. They believe in practicing union, in having no creed, in adjusting the church to the growing demands of the city and of the age. You will find that some of them have never been immersed and yet they are there in heaven talking to you. I am glad you were prepared to find that it would be so. While you were here on the earth you knew that people from all kinds of churches got to heaven. And since you have been watching the admissions through the pearly gates you have abundant opportunity to realize that those gates are very wide and the souls are very different which come trooping in from all parts of the earth. If there is written on their passports the account of their admission it must be startling to see that the qualities of honesty and kindliness, and unselfish, intelligent devotion to the promotion of health and happiness among us mortals take so large a place, and that the forms and doctrinal beliefs and ecclesiastical attachments count for so little.

FAMOUS DEBATES

There must be moments of great pathos when you remember how you were drawn into extended discussions of the priority of faith or repentance, or how the Holy Spirit operates in the souls of men, or what the precise method of naturalization is in the kingdom of heaven. I wonder what you would emphasize most if you were to come back to the earth again for another long life of religious work. I am inclined to think that you would teach many of the things you taught before, but that you would have no occasion to repeat any of your famous debates, or to engage in your controversial writings with the clergy. I doubt whether you would regard the Bible in just the same way. You would probably carry farther your studies in higher criticism and you would modify your conception of the Bible as a book of specific directions. I do not think you would consider the book of Acts quite so important and I believe you would attach more importance to the Gospels. I feel very certain you would not regard the writings of the apostle Paul as so nearly equal in importance to the sayings of Jesus. Nor would you think that the teachings of Jesus were in any degree superseded by those of his more legalistic followers. You used to make a great deal of the idea that while a man lived he could dispose of his goods as he wished but that after his death the estate had to be administered according to a will which might contain terms and conditions of bequests which did not obtain during the life of the man. So you conceived that while Jesus lived he could forgive sin and bestow blessings as he would but that after his death the good things of his kingdom could only be obtained on the more limited and specified conditions. Nor do I believe that you would have the same idea of the end of the age of inspiration. Instead of urging us so much to return to the apostolic age for guidance I like to think you would encourage us also to go to our own experience and learn from the constantly unfolding wisdom of life in the work and the needs of living men.

You would find one new idea very widely accepted on earth which illustrates this growing character of religious truth. This is the idea of evolution. Just seven years before you died, you may remember, Darwin published his book on the Origin of Species. It has taken half a century for the implications of that doctrine to become apparent to the scientists themselves and it is only very recently that men have begun to apply the principle to religion. But already there has set in a new tide in the spiritual life of mankind. It has two characteristics. One is the new freedom which it guarantees and the other is the corresponding responsibility which it involves. The freedom is due to the realization that the only authority which the past or the Bible or any persons can have over us is the authority of experience. When we read in the Bible the parables of Jesus we are appealed to by them because they are true to what we see in life around us. When we read the story of creation in the book of Genesis we do not feel obligated to accept it for literal matter of fact because it does not accord with what we know from other sources. We are able to accept many of the Biblical stories as mythical and yet as containing valuable moral instruction. We have learned much about how the Bible was written and are more and more able to make discriminating use of it.

OUR HUMAN RESPONSIBILITY

At the same time this freedom has brought us new responsibility. If we cannot rely upon the reading of the Bible to give our children all the moral instruction they need then we have to learn how to use other influences such as the atmosphere of the home, the associations of the school room and the play ground, and the gradual participation in the welfare and control of society itself. There begins to be in our secular life a kind of electric quality of expectancy and of seriousness in the realization of the fact that we are called upon to take affairs into our own hands. We have no one but ourselves to blame for poor government, for crime, for disease, for ignorance, for immorality and our soul's damnation. Neither have we any real hope for our salvation from all these things except through intelligent cooperation and social reforms in which all members of society participate. We are therefore going so far as not to wait for death and the decrees of God to settle the fate of certain classes of human beings. We are planning to see that such persons shall not even be born. Many of the things which were once supposed to be the prerogatives of the Almighty alone we have calmly taken into our own hands and administer them with so much better results that we wonder why we were timid and inefficient so long.

The moral of this experience is very applicable to religion and the church, we find. Because certain conceptions of religion are no longer in keeping with what we know about life we are giving them up. We get along better without miracles and special inspirations and infallible books. We find that the good fruits of the spirit—"love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance"—are self evident and the conviction deepens that whatever methods and instruction and forms are helpful in cultivating these are of the essence of religion, and that whatever does not produce fruit of this kind is of no consequence. No matter how many people may cherish an institution, or a doctrine or a ceremony if it is not found to be effective for nobler and happier living it is not worthy to be perpetuated.

BIRTH PANGS

I wonder if you know that the Disciples are just now suffering the birth pangs of this larger life. If there is any way for the printed page as it comes from the offices of our religious journals to be translated into the language of heaven you must have some very unhappy hours every week reading of the controversies and the predicaments which now beset us. And these differences are all over the question as to whether we have a final statement "once for all delivered to the saints" concerning the way in which a poor needy human soul shall find fellowship and membership in the body of Christ. The literalists still believe as men did in your day that the Bible is a book of rules and regulations. No amount of faith in God and Christ and man, and no degree of devotion to extending the kingdom of love in the troubled tribes of earth can justify the omission of the act of baptism by immersion. But there are wiser leaders who have grown mellow in a long service of love for Christ and the world and who believe as you used to say that the doors of the church should open as wide as the gates of heaven. The patient missionaries on the foreign fields, living in the midst of the evils and suffering of the open sores of the world, are ready for a more enlightened and a more effective conception of religion. Gradually it is coming and in the not distant future the practical ideals of your way of thinking will free these churches from their old superstitions and their outworn legalisms.

I take deep satisfaction in the contemplation of that coming day. It was your own dear dream to find the essential truths of Christianity and to set them forth in such a way that all Christians could unite upon them. In your time it was natural to suppose that those essential truths were to be found ready formulated in the Bible. You spent many consecrated hours of diligent and competent study over the scriptures, in the original languages and in the commentaries of scholars, searching for the central and saving things of the Christian faith. You put your generation under a deep indebtedness for your labors and in the light of all available knowledge in that day you carried religion forward into greater intelligence and freedom. You saw that human creeds should not be made the bonds of Christian fellowship; you taught men not to rely upon an emotional conversion experience as the guarantee of their salvation; you joined the great Protestant reformers in rejecting the doctrine of apostolic succession for the priesthood, insisting that every believer is a priest himself; you decried the divisions of the Protestant church as sinful and unchristian; and you sought to build up a spirit of reverence and worship which would refresh and ennoble the life of this great new world. You followed the trail of the pioneer into the wilderness of the west and delivered your quiet, appealing message in school houses, in homes, in the open spaces, before the great and the small, the rich and the poor, and set the hope of a more reasonable and a simpler faith in the hearts of tens of thousands. That constitutes a wonderful chapter in the history of modern Christianity. You were also wise enough to know that men would go on with their inquiries and discoveries and you welcomed the prospect of a larger fellowship and a wider tolerance among all Christians.

OUTWORN CONTROVERSIES

I take delight in confounding those who do not know your spirit by keeping my place in the company of those who belong to the movement which you inaugurated. When I meet people who have only known the Disciples in their argumentative moods or have only heard of them as some new cult, I laugh and say, "Why, certainly I am a Disciple, a good, sound, orthodox Campbellite." I believe in Christian union upon the basis of an intelligent and vital faith in Jesus Christ. When any one seeks membership in the church I do not subject him to a creedal catechism. I do not ask him whether he has had some strange vision or dream or call. He does not have to be examined by a board of deacons, or subjected to a confessional, or put on probation, or required to subscribe to any statement of faith. He is free to hold the latest and best views in any field of science. He is encouraged to think, to find new truth, to discover new methods of religious work, to become experimental and ingenious and progressive. I am particularly happy that you were not a trinitarian and did not think it necessary that Christians should believe in Christ according to the trinitarian formula. It gives me keen pleasure to go over the hymns you published in your hymnbook and find that you omitted all trinitarian phrases. But I am equally glad that you were not a unitarian. It is one of the finest gifts you have made to us, to free us from this old controversy. That conflict of the old theology belongs to a past age and it is unfortunate that men still talk in those terms. We have found out that men can love Christ and be loyal to him without believing in his miraculous birth. I sometimes think that our world waits to be shown the full import of that kind of a faith, a faith which shall unbind us from servile allegiance to the old theological doctrines and which shall yet preserve for us all the devotion and beauty and hope which they instilled. I like to think it may yet be the mission of those who have been inspired by your burning zeal for Christian union to lead the way to a new type of Christianity, a form of Christianity beyond all the forms of Protestantism yet preserving the finest fruits of that long history, a form of Christianity which will have the fervor of great missionary enterprises, the poise of scientific scholarship, and the practical statesmanship to adapt the highest idealism to the actual conditions of all ranks of society.

The Religious Quality of Mr. Lloyd George

By Lynn Harold Hough

(This is the third of a series of articles written by Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, Detroit pastor, who has just returned from Europe.—The Editor.)

A BIT of Peter Pan, a touch of Machiavelli, a mood now and then of Abraham Lincoln, enough of John Bull to make it easy for him to speak to Englishmen, enough of Celtic poetry to edge many of his words with a bright, rich flame, and a personal charm of his own, alluring and disarming: these are some of the elements which the student of men sees flashing in and out of the personality of Mr. Lloyd George.

It is always interesting to hear men talk about him. One day this summer in England I found myself in a little group where the prime minister was being very frankly and very fully discussed. One member of the party was a very distinguished American churchman ripe with years of human contact and observation and service. He spoke out with right hearty appreciation. He felt that Mr. Lloyd George had stood in a place of supreme difficulty and that he had met the demands of the hour with unusual understanding and power.

FRIENDLY OBJECTION

At once there was friendly objection from the two Englishmen who were with us. One of them was a writer whose words carry his opinions quite over the world. The other was a Free church leader of outstanding keenness and influence. Both admitted the brilliant qualities of the prime minister. Both showed entire understanding of his power over men. One spoke with complete disillusionment. The other seemed to combine admiration and distrust. Incidents and experiences and bits of analysis were poured forth. Through it all there emerged the figure of a brilliant and fascinating man who has succeeded in maintaining power without being able to maintain moral authority. But even in the most cutting criticism there was evident a wistful desire that the masterful leader should find a quality and method of leadership which could restore him to a place of confidence.

I had the pleasure of attending the luncheon given by Sir Murray Hyslop at the Victoria Hotel to four hundred

Free churchmen with the prime minister as the guest of honor. A little while before as I was leaving a certain office with a clergyman who has received the highest recognition in his own denomination, a well-known Englishman who wears his title without self-consciousness looked whimsically at the two of us.

"Here you go to listen to Mr. Lloyd George," he said, "and he will completely mesmerize you. Now you have your own opinions. When he has finished everything will be swept away except your admiration." Then with a chuckle he bade us "Good Morning." The address a little later was a marvel of skillful dealing with an audience. It was full of pungent phrases. It had a mellow mood of hearty comradeship. It was swept at times by veritable gusts of powerful emotion. But the most significant thing about it was just the evidence it gave that the speaker thoroughly understood his hearers and had set their own thoughts and emotions to music by means of his persuasive and eloquent voice.

As a thrilling emotional attack on war it was a masterpiece. As a summons to the churches to make war impossible it was electric with light and fire. When in cool blood you asked just what the Free churches of England could have done in 1913 and 1914 to prevent the great catastrophe it was clear that the speaker had never faced that critical question. When you asked what the Free churches of England could do in the future if they were confronted by a similar crisis it was equally evident that the speaker had no concrete and significant word to say.

IMPOTENT PRESCRIPTION

He had condemned the war with all the resources of a great orator. He had paid tribute to the institutions which his hearers represented as the bearer of powers for the ending of such tragedy. But he had faced none of the central problems and he had offered no words of guidance in the direction of actual solutions. The address was a triumphant piece of diagnosis. It was impotent as a prescription. Mr. Lloyd George seems to have learned that enormous numbers of people are quite happy if you will just express their feelings. They will then allow you to do pretty much what you please in the direction of action. And nobody knows how to express other people's feelings better than Mr. Lloyd George.

From a good many directions the evidences of hesitation and of hostility to the prime minister are coming in. The episode in connection with which he succeeded Mr. Asquith as prime minister has not been forgotten. And there seems to be no way of explaining it which is entirely creditable to the man who emerged in control of the destinies of the British empire. His leadership during the war is being subjected to the closest and most critical scrutiny. His curious habit of admitting to intimate friendship men whose character and way of life does not commend them has brought unhappiness to his friends.

I watched him one day this summer while some men of the cinematograph were capturing his movements and his gestures. There was something rather revealing about the scene. There is a tiny touch of the poseur about him. Perhaps one reason why he had come through the terrible years behind us with a face so curiously unmarked by the tragedy lies just in the fact that an actor need not be heartbroken by the part which he plays. One is inclined to think that an emotion is quite authentic to Mr. Lloyd George while it lasts. And one is inclined to think that he passes from emotion to emotion without any very deep sense of moral responsibility.

MAGICAL INTUITION

There are elements of great strength in this very sensitive and responsive emotional quality. It enables the prime minister to give all sorts of deputations the feeling that he completely understands them and that he is just the person to do justice to their point of view. He is able to get into the heart of any sort of subject with astonishing celerity and then to speak with astounding comprehension. Men dealing with the most subtle and intricate financial matters have found that when he entered a field new to him, he asked the right questions for a few days and then seemed to know the pass words as well as they and to speak with an apprehension of the principles involved which struck them as almost magical. This perpetual intellectual precocity has its limitations, of course. The flashes of intuition into a field which a man has not made his own by the slow process of patient discipline are not likely to remain a part of his permanent mental outfit. What he seems to see so clearly on one day may be forgotten on another.

Mr. Lloyd George is a man of ready and hearty response to the mystical appeal of religion. There are beautiful stories of wise words he has spoken about the deep summons of the religious life. The boy to whom he spoke of what personal religion might mean in his life will not forget the experience. And the Free church leader who had offered support to the Prime Minister in Downing street only to receive the reply: "Pray for me," feels the thrill of that moment to this day.

If any cause is nearer than another to the heart of the prime minister it is the cause of the common people. One of the finest things about him is his complete sense of continuity with his own childhood limited by poverty. He knows the life of the poor. At heart he is one with them. And he desires with a great desire to make their lot permanently more happy and more noble. His first impulses of thought about every subject one imagines are shot through with the fires of a lofty idealism. It is only when he is confronted by the demands of difficult practical situations that the poet and seer seem for the moment lost in the adroit politician.

PROPHETIC QUALITY

The inner fire keeps burning and though he wanders away he always comes back to its warmth and glow. The times of which one likes best to think are those when standing in the presence of a great occasion he has spoken as a prophet and not as a manipulator of men. I shall not forget his speech in the House of Commons in 1919 on the evening when the measure committing Britain to the acceptance of the peace treaty was passed. Very noble words were spoken with a sense of their far-reaching meaning. The hope for a better world was alive in his utterance.

At a great moment in the life of the emipre a dominant leader found words which rose to the demand of the occasion. When Mr. Lloyd George stands in the light of a high moment and speaks as he can then speak one has a sense of moral and spiritual possibilities in his leadership which keep expectation alive.

Many men come to their great hours early. One has the feeling that there is still the opportunity for the greatest hour of all for Mr. Lloyd George. It would crown his career with a new quality of moral vigor and spiritual authenticity should he lift himself clear from the adroitnesses and evasions which so easily beset the practical politician and put the prophet who still speaks in his heart in command of his life. And such an accession of moral authority would give him a position which he has never known and such a position as has come to few British statesmen. It is part of the marvel of his personality that he gives you the sense that this is possible. He has not reached a place of moral exhaustion. He may yet make the great adventure.

Is the Church Effective?

WE have a loose way of talking of the church and religion without differentiating between them. The church may fail lamentably without giving the least reason for saying religion has failed. It may reap great successes that mean anything but a victory for religion. The church is an institution representing more or less imperfectly the religious ideals of men. It is what its leaders make it, and history shows that its leadership has always been quite fallible. Indeed when one considers the lofty idealism of Christ and then reads church history he is filled with admiration for a religion which shines with such a radiant light through so much institutional opaqueness.

We used to talk of the "church militant" and the "church triumphant," a terminology which was a hold-over from the medieval conception of the church. To be an infallible church it had to be the perfect, institutionalized, temporal kingdom of God. That conception was the result of theocratic notions about divine right of kings, infallible popes, holy empires, and divine churches. Along with the shattering of those concepts comes the modification of ideas regarding the church as a divine institution.

The church can be called a "divine" institution only in the sense that seminary curricula are given the term "divinity" or a minister the lofty title of "divine." Both are quite fallible and errant. The church, too, is a fallible and therefore human institution. Its government is determined by tradition plus the democratic right of its adherents to modify it. Its creeds change, not with a changing gospel, but with the changing intellectual environment of the changing age. Its program reflects the ideals of the Christian faith through the oblique rays of tradition, opportunism, institutional necessity, current fixed ideas, and every bias and prudential judgment of the leadership of any particular moment. Let us face the fact squarely that the church is a most fallible institution. Then the Christian religion will not be held responsible for its errors and inadequacies but will be made beneficiary in full for every triumph it registers at the church's hands.

Saving Lives and Saving Souls

There is, however, a significance to the term "militant" that needs to be conserved. The phrase "church militant," made over into the term "militant church," expresses the idea. That translates the nomenclature out of theological mysticism into social reality. It puts the church face to the front as an institution of redemption and reform in a world that needs both. Redeeming souls becomes an enlistment of lives in a holy crusade to make the world over into the kingdom of heaven. Redemption of the individual pledges him to help re-form this half-Christianized world until it is transformed into his kingdom and his righteousness.

In the King James version the Master talked about saving "souls"; in the modern versions he talks of saving "lives." This change in translation is a symbol of the whole epoch-making change in soteriology. Now we know it is not our business to save our souls as if they were a possession, like our purses or jewels; we do not rescue precious spirits from a wicked world but redeem our lives to leaven the world itself with righteousness. The whole religious process becomes less a salvaging of lost souls and more a redeeming of a savable humanity.

When Jesus asked what it would profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own life, he meant losing that "more abundant life" he came to bring to men. Many a living Croesus is a lost life. With all his possessions he is a deformed pigmy when measured by the side of the Galilean. There are rich, gorgeous church edifices that enshrine so little true Christian idealism and are so narrowed by pride, class consciousness, ritualism and high-brow aestheticism that they would much better be dedicated to some Grecian deity than to the Nazarene. Just so there are church organizations rich in hoary tradition but poor in working machinery, intellectually sacrosanct but spiritually poverty stricken, refinedly class conscious but knowing no service for the "least of these" except a condescending charity. Many a man has lost his life trying to save his soul.

Institutional Conservation

It is something new under the sun to ask if the church is effective. The frank raising of that question by our times is one sure evidence that we are evolving a more effective church. Once we said that to save one soul was worth any amount of time and money (which is true enough), but now we are inclined to plan wisely to do the most good possible with a stated amount of time and money. Our greatest obstruction is the eternal thrusting in of institutional ends. Our greatest problem is to determine just where to leave off strengthening the institution that it may be most effective and to begin making it an effective instrument for the common good of humanity. It is easy to give loyalty and generous support to the visible instrument that registers material and numerical results but it requires much faith to put life and means into intangible spiritual and social leavening. So we tend to make our programs such that they will register tangible results. A missionary secretary expressed it pungently, if not well, when he advocated withdrawal from a field where a civilization might be moulded, through conversions were not many, by saying, "the brethren want to know how many were baptized."

We have carried institutional promotion to such absurd proportions that the most needy home fields are under-churched, if not altogether un-churched, and communities able to give are breaking down religiously under the incubus of over-churching. No religious leader or organization would admit any other purpose in building up additional churches than that of promoting Christianity. Yet in the more prosperous rural sections of this country there are four times as many churches as can be supported with any kind of an effective program and thousands of them are still receiving help from missionary organizations.

Some Survey Disclosures

A summary of the surveys of some two hundred rural counties, made by the Interchurch movement, shows that with an average of one church to every two hundred and forty persons, one out of every six of the local church organizations is still receiving missionary help. Most of these have been struggling for life year after year through inability to secure more than their legitimate portion of the possible membership in an over-churched community.

In a typical rural county in the heart of the Mississippi valley a survey, just ready for publication, lists 82 rural church organizations for 16,000 people. There is an actual resident membership of 5,452. Counting out nine "dead" organizations there are about 70 resident members to each church with not more than an average of 50 active. No church will be very effective with so small a membership. The only hope is in local church cooperation or in the stronger organizations in each community crowding out the weaker; and still missionary money is spent to succor the weaker. Out of this 16,000 people only 271 boys and 604 girls under 21 years of age are church members. Good roads, the automobile, the town where high school and movie theater attract, bring disintegration to the old rural centers of life and association, and the rural communities are reforming in both center and circumference. The churches alone reform their programs too slowly to meet the change; they are saving the institutions while losing the youth.

This is only one typical situation. Yet some leaders say that surveys are "sensational" and assertions of over-churching less than half true, and the response to these revealments is often a greater stress on denominational effort to save "our churches" from the disintegrating process than to formulate a working program to save the rural communities from the inefficiency of church divisiveness. If there is a truer spectacle of the fallibility of the church we challenge comparison. No class of folk is more responsive to religion than country people, but they face the steady and increasing loss of effective religious service because of the inability in church programming to subordinate institutional conservation to religious conservation.

London, Sept. 11, 1922

EVERY year when the holiday season is drawing to a close, the man-in-the-street is able to read the latest discoveries in science. The British Association meets this month, and a careful reader of the papers has much to arrest his thought and perhaps to disturb his intellectual scheme of things. This year once more the association has set us talking of human life, whether or not it can be explained fully in terms of mechanism. It is the old problem raised by Professor Tyndall at Belfast many years ago, only today it is raised with much new data. It is foolish for any of us to imagine that the "soul" is dismissed with costs today. The boundaries of mystery are pushed further back, but the mystery is still there, and "leagues beyond those leagues there is more sea." The press is an invaluable power in education, but it does not always shine in its treatment of the careful and precise discussions of science.

The Dean of the Association

Two years ago Dr. Barnes raised a controversy by his sermon before the British Association. He had thought his sermon almost too elementary to preach, but he discovered, and probably still discovers, how much fierce opposition there is in religious circles to the acceptance of any theory of evolution. This year the dean of St. Paul's preached at Hull, but it is unlikely that he will raise the same controversy afresh. For one thing Dean Inge is so much with us, that his critics have an unbroken field day throughout the year. After a fine eulogy of the spirit revealed in scientific inquiry he added that nowhere is there such "disinterested devotion to truth, such unquenchable faith in the power and value of disciplined intellectual labor, such bold sweeps of imagination checked by such punctiliously accurate experiment." No less than Dr. Barnes the dean calls the church to leave behind the pre-Copernican universe: "Science has affected both theology and morality in many ways," he declares, "and must affect them much further. After four hundred years, the church has still failed to adapt her cosmology to the discoveries of Galileo. Officially our clergy still have to live in a pre-Copernican universe; otherwise certain dogmas on which the church insists would have no meaning. The battle against the dead hand of authority is not yet won, but the issue is certain. The educated Christian has already succeeded in getting his creed within the framework of the universe as we know it to be, and as the people, more especially women, become better educated, there will be less resistance to the reconstruction of that part of the building which is obviously crumbling. When this necessary work is done, it will be found that religion is not a pin the worse."

Such declarations as these are valuable for the intellectual understanding of the Christian faith, and Dr. Inge is not one to forget that it is as redemption first of all that religion presents itself to the children of men. Perhaps some of the distrust raised within many hearts at the present is due to the suspicion that religion is being analyzed on its intellectual side, and little account is taken of it as a way of deliverance out of the bondage of corruption.

Evangelical Churchmen

That is why there is a distinct province and task for the evangelical churchmen of today. Indeed the key to the future of British Christianity rests in no small degree with them. They have issued an appeal after their seventh Cheltenham conference. The temper and purpose of this appeal will be welcomed by all who care for the greater matters. The broad churchman with his special concern for the intellectual presentation of the faith will not be indifferent we hope to this earnest word from his brothers whose first interest lies in the preaching of the cross. This is the appeal: "The seventh Cheltenham conference ventures to address an appeal to all evangelical churchmen. There has been borne in upon us the deep conviction that God is calling us to a united effort of evangelization, that he has opened doors at home and abroad for the entrance of the eternal gospel, and we humbly thank him that, by his grace, he has made us to know his saving truth. We frankly acknowledge that we are not in entire agreement upon several questions, and we see no way at present for a complete solution of our differences. We are humbled before God and distressed beyond measure to realize that the evangelization of the world is being gravely retarded by our dissensions. First of all, therefore, we appeal to all our evangelical brethren to concentrate upon the one objective of preaching Christ crucified to a lost world, to go forward with unanimity to do the work our Saviour has called us to perform. And, secondly, we invite all evangelicals to exercise towards one another every possible forbearance, charity, and love, believing that thus alone we shall be led by the Holy Spirit into all truth, and, refraining from any party action, leave the questions at issue to be dealt with by the operation of the spirit of God, who will surely be our guide in this hour. So, forgetting all things but the one great object of preaching the gospel to all men, we shall fulfil the prayer of our Blessed Lord 'that they may all be one.'"

The Losses of the Week

There are not a few well-known men who have passed out of the sight of their fellows this week. G. R. Sims was a great journalist. For more than forty years he wrote a column in The Referee, a Sunday paper. I believe he never received so many letters as when he discussed some religious topic. . . Mr. Cobden Saunderson was a great printer, with a noble ideal of his craft; like William Morris, who inspired him, he had an almost mystical sense of the beauty and value of great type. . . Commissioner Lawley of the Salvation Army was chief lieutenant to both General William Booth and the present general. To him the "general" was an ideal of "'the reckless out-and-out soul-saver." It was this soul-saving which gave him his chief joy in the service of the army. The only time I ever heard the general, he was in the height of his national influence; he was pleading for souls, just as simply and directly as when he was an unknown missionary in Whitechapel. There is food for thought in this.

Dr. Jowett and Parliament

Dr. Jowett denies quite strongly the rumors that he may go into parliament. It is true that years ago he urged Silvester Horne to go into parliament, but this he now considers a mistake; and he has no intention himself of leaving the pulpit for the House of Commons. This is good reading. When Horne went into parliament the plea was raised that he would be able to stand for the free church position against such Anglicans as Lord Hugh Cecil. This being interpreted seemed to mean that the free churches had no laymen able to hold their own with Anglican laymen, and therefore Horne must come to the rescue. If such were the case, and it is the case now, the remedy must be found, not in the entrance of ministers into parliament, but in the training and encouragement within the churches of the laymen, who can serve in the Senate both their nation and their church. Certainly no more certain waste of force could be devised than to send Dr. Jowett into parliament. When the late Charles Berry of Wolverhampton refused an invitation to stand as a liberal candidate, Gladstone wrote to him to say that he had chosen the better part, and Berry was much more fitted by experience for parliament than Dr. Jowett. Meanwhile in things international Dr. Jowett is taking through the press more and more a leading part. For this all the churches are deeply grateful.

The Missionary's Brain-wave

An amusing story of a Wesleyan missionary in the Fiji islands is recorded in "The Hill Tribe of Fiji," a book recently issued by A. B. Brewster. It was in the early '70's. The missionary, Mr. Langham, was visiting a part of his district still occupied by cannibals, when with his native converts he had to flee for his life. He was outstripped and was expecting the club. "Suddenly there occurred a brain wave, and he turned round sharply and faced the pursuers. Then he whipped out his false teeth, placed them on the palm of his hand and offered them to the nearest foe. With a wild yell, the enemy turned about and fled." Lest this should be thought a plagiarism from "King Solomon's Mines," in which a similar incident occurs, it must be remembered that it took place and was narrated long before that book was written.

Dr Grenfell

Dr. Grenfell has landed at Liverpool. He is to lecture several times at the Central hall, Westminster, and also speak at the autumn sessions of the Congregational Union at Hull. There are few missionaries so well known and so admired as this brave friend of the fishermen and other inhabitants of Labrador. He is one more example of the gain that comes to a missionary society when its agents have the gift of expression. A good book reaches a hundred or even a thousand where a speech reaches one. . . The assembly of the League of Nations is receiving more attention this year than last. There is a feeling abroad that it will yet play a decisive part in the settlement of Europe. . . The defeat of the Greeks arouses mingled feelings here. In former days it would have kindled the crusading spirit, but unhappily recent history has robbed Greece of much of our inherited sympathy. But it is generally agreed that the allied powers are in no small measure responsible for the Greek disaster. It is one more instance of the disastrous results which follow upon policies improvised from hour to hour.

EDWARD SHILLITO,

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Offspring of Vipers*

WE hear much criticism of the young folks of today. The girls we call "flappers"; the boys George Ade has called "19 year-old roués." It is rather interesting to note that John addressed his audience as "Ye offspring of vipers." Then they were vipers only because their parents were vipers! Whenever you find "wild" young people, you will find some "wild" parents not far away. It is quite fascinating to trace back the pedigrees of wicked young folks. The father may be steady and pious enough now, but what was he like at twenty? The mother may be devout and highly respectable now, but what kind of a daughter was she? These statements will make some folks very angry—but watch them! Wildness is often in the blood. We know the power of environment. A tree does not derive all its elements from the soil. The great roots do find much strength there; the nature of the tree is determined by the roots, but now we know that "atmosphere" has much to do with a tree's vitality. "Roots" and "atmosphere" make a tree; heredity and environment make a young person. Is the atmosphere of today really so vicious? I do not think so. I am willing to stake my reputation upon the balanced statement that the young people now alive are the best that ever walked the earth. The "Outlook" some time ago published a questionnaire submitted to the high school boys and girls of Binghamton, N. Y. The underlying idea of those who proposed this test was to find out the ethical reactions of youngsters of the later teens. The answers were convincing. Lofty and unselfish ideals were revealed. Only superficial judgments, built upon hasty generalizations, condemn our modern young people, in wholesale fashion. Bobbed hair and short skirts give no indication of morals. A girl's real modesty does not depend upon the length of her skirt. The free and easy manner of our boys affords no cue to the depth of their thoughts nor the power of their souls. Always it is a sign of age (and disagreeable age at that) to condemn the rising generation and to hark back to the good old days—yes, the good old days of hoop-skirts—noble days indeed!!! Before the war people were bewailing the degenerate youth. But when the call came, not only from under the "pearl-grey towers of Oxford" but also from White Chapel came those glorious boys who threw their young lives upon the altar. Only the fool will longer prate of the depravity of youth.

A sensational evangelist was this John the Baptist; no soft words fell from his lips. He convicted them of sin and he demanded repentance. Carlyle called repentance "the grand act." It is the fundamental act. Let the fundamentalist start here, with repentance; let him repent in sackcloth and ashes. This much must be evident, repentance is indispensable. No progress can be made until after deep and genuine repentance. While we defend our young folks from invidious comparisons with other generations, we do not softly deny the fact of sin—in both old and young. It is a far cry from the day when Jonathan Edwards portrayed sin and hell so vividly that women fainted and strong men clung desperately to the pillars of the church. Today the pendulum has swung to the opposite extreme and few are the preachers who even speak of sin. A gentleman came to me after a service a few years ago and said: "I did not like your prayer for forgiveness of sin—neither my family nor I have sinned, and frankly we do not like it." He later left the church. People do not like the idea of sin; it seems crude, beastly, a thing belonging not to our culture and refinement. Nevertheless the true preacher must thunder the need for "repentance." The coal from off the altar must burn the lips clean, the fountain of God must wash away our iniquities, the soul must be purified before power, beauty and love can develop. Every public service should begin with a confession of sin and a prayer for forgiveness and every noble life must be founded upon honest repentance. St. John the Baptist was right.

Another Communion Service

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I, too, went to a communion service not in a Lutheran or a Disciples church, but in a Baptist church. Many churches of that denomination are still exclusive and made an ordinance the test of sitting at the heavenly Father's table. There was nothing exclusive in this church. As I entered the church I would have thought I was in an Episcopal minster. The church was small but gothic in structure. There was a reverent atmosphere. On the stroke of eleven the ministers and choir entered the chancel, all robed in ecclesiastical gowns. The communion service was set on the front of the baptistry and suggested an altar, being the focal point of the whole church. The service was rich, dignified and simple. All parts of the worship moved together. There was a sermon, a full length sermon, and in the best sense of the word, an evangelistic sermon. The man haunted by sin was shown a refuge. The man entangled with evil and temptation was promised deliverance. The lives burdened with care, sorrow and grief were invited to comfort. The men desirous for service were challenged and cheered. Suddenly the prophet became a pastor and said: "Now we come to our Father's table—who may come? You say 'I am not a member of this church or denomination.' No matter! 'But I am not a member of any church.' No matter! This is your Father's house, and if this service means anything, it means that this communion is your Father's table, and here he offers you the thing you most need. It may be the forgiveness of sins: deliverance from temptation; comfort for sorrow: guidance for perplexity: inspiration for service; anything—everything. Here it is. He sets a table before us in the presence of our enemies. There is no reason why anyone should go out. Come—come for all things are now ready."

Impressively the elements were passed by the deacons. Softly from the organ came the notes of "Just as I am without one plea;" then, "Come ye disconsolate" and "Jesus the very thought of Thee," hymns which suggested our communion and cooperation with the prophets, apostles and martyrs.

At the end of the service I was near the minister and saw a man of middle age come up and heard him say: "My father was a minister and wished me to become a church member. I did not do so. But I stayed today—I gave my life to God and wish to join you in the good work." The minister said to me "That is a frequent occurrence; and some soon day when we shall make baptism a joyous but free privilege instead of an arbitrary sine quo non for Christian experience—we shall have many more." As I left that building I read the sign Baptist church and I prayed that they who compose that church may soon welcome into church fellowship as freely as they welcome to the Lord's table.

Who Is Guilty?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial, "Who Is Guilty of the Murders" should not be allowed to pass without protest. While the secular press is condemning not only the perpetrators of these awful acts but also the cowardly inactivity of the constituted civil authorities, it is exceedingly regrettable that a religious paper should come forward with anything like an excuse for the atrocious crimes. The men who did the killing were excited, disturbed, exasperated by conditions which they did not like and for which they blamed their former employers. This seems to be the suggested alibi. At another time there might be a profitable discussion of these conditions and their causes. Such a discussion should take up also the instructions given by the labor leaders to the men and consider what, if any, tendency such instructions would have to excite and exasperate them. At the present time and until the law breakers are brought before a court of justice, such discussions tend to defeat the ends of justice by shunting blame from those who committed the acts to other individuals or groups or to the present organization of society. If guilt can be evaded thus in case of the grossest crimes, where have we any safety? Cannot every burglar, wife beater and anarchist cite similar motivating causes for his law breaking acts? Therefore, without regard to the accuracy or merit of the alleged provocation, let us ask the apologist for these law breakers whether two wrongs ever made a right. And let it be remembered that a defense, "You're another," is always a confession of guilt.

Did We Say Loyalist?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of 13th July you have a criticism of the Ku Klux Klan. I know nothing about that organization and am not in a position to express an opinion upon its principles and actions. Your criticism may be just or unjust so far as I am concerned. What I strongly object to is the sentence "The Ku Klux Klan if it has its way will Ulsterize America, making our cities scenes of tragedies such as terrify Belfast." The inference is that Ulster is a terrible place and that the Loyalists are to blame. I wish to point out that Ulster loyalists are in no way to blame for the present upheaval in Ireland. They desire to live in peace and amity with all men. Ulster was prosperous and so was the rest of Ireland in 1914 when the great war with Germany broke out. Trade was booming and there was no lack of employment. But scheming politicians and mad-head agitators were not satisfied and they set about to create disorder and anarchy. An organized rebellion broke out in Dublin in 1916 and as a result hundreds of people were killed. During this time peaceful conditions prevailed in Ulster and the people were happy and contented. In 1920 the imperial government passed an Act setting up two parliaments in Ireland—one for the Protestant north, and another for the Roman Catholic south. They thus recognized that there are two peoples in Ireland different in religion, in sentiment, in ideals, in loyalty. Ulster never asked for a northern parliament, being convinced that the union with Great Britain was the best policy, but for the sake of peace she accepted it. At the elections in May, 1921, the loyalists won forty of the fifty-two seats, the number of votes recorded being: Loyalists 343.347, Sinn Fein 104,917, Nationalist 60,577, Independent 2,114, Socialist 1,887. The Ulster parliament was opened by the king on June 22, 1921, and since then has been working most efficiently. The Sinn Feiners refused to accept a parliament similar to that in the north and they are now getting a free state for southern Ireland. From the first the Sinn Feiners or Republicans have tried to undermine the authority of the northern parliament and to upset law and order in Ulster. They have carried out an extensive campaign of murder, arson and outrage. Hundreds of defenseless persons have been cruelly done to death and business premises valued at millions of pounds have been wilfully destroyed by fire. In southern Ireland the republicans and free staters are now having a general warfare, and the whole country south of the Boyne is practically ruined. The above being the facts, how can it be suggested that loyalists are in any way to blame for the bloodshed and violence which have wrought such havoc and brought misery and desolation to so many once happy homes. The real culprits are the Sinn Feiners and republicans. If these people would act as law abiding citizens and allow the trades unionists to attend to their trades and industries, Ulster would soon be again one of the brightest, most prosperous and most contented places on the face of the globe. Even under the present unsettled conditions Ulster is the only province in Ireland where there is any sense of security, and where the brigand and the outlaw do not hold sway.

Mr. Eddy on Ku-Kluxism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I don't often break into print nowadays, but I can't refrain from expressing my appreciation of and gratitude for Sherwood Elly's thoroughgoing exposure of Ku Kluxism in your pages. His articles should have wide circulation in the South.

Our Hymnal Now Ready!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have before me a copy of the "Literary Digest" of September 23, page 35. Every little while some half-baked college professor or editor or D.D. gets into the spot-light for a moment by shooting off his mouth about the doggerel that he has discovered in our church hymnals. And now it seems that you cannot stand the morbidity of our hymns and songs any longer. I would suggest that in sheer desperation, you grasp your gold-mounted fountain pen and dash off a few masterpieces. H. G. Wells may publish a new Bible soon. Let me suggest that it would be a noble work for you to edit and publish a new hymnbook to correspond with the new Bible!!

The trouble is you smart Alecs are so filled up with the lies of higher criticism, evolution, false science, etc., that you have lost all relish for the gospel of grace in verse or in any other form. Guess I've got you located, haven't I?

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Lloyd George Attends Methodist Church in Wales

The premier of Great Britain recently went back to his boyhood home to rest up a bit, and while there attended the Calvinistic Methodist church of Criccieth. He was called upon to speak and did so feelingly in the following words: "Mr. Davies has also told you that I have climbed the mountain of fame, responsibility and honor, and in one sense that is true, but, dear friends, let me assure you that the mountain is not an ideal place for any of us. There isn't much peace there—no real rest and comfort. The higher you climb the colder it becomes. How exposed and bleak it is! You are at the mercy of the storm and the tempest. The wind makes sport of you. On the mountain a man feels very lonely. Often thick mist envelops him, and he misses his way; he can see hardly a yard ahead. What is the good of a telescope in the mist? When a person thinks he is on the right path, suddenly he comes to a part where he cannot go any further, and a deep chasm opens before him. He retraces his steps and makes an effort to regain the path from which he strayed. Yes, that is the lot of the man who attempts to climb the mountain."

Five Per Cent of American Chinese Are Christians

American churches have evidently given more thought to evangelizing Chinese across the sea than to the spiritual welfare of the laundry worker around the corner. The Chinese population in this country is 61,639, having decreased thirty per cent during the past twenty years. In this population are 3,072 Christians. The statistics for the Japanese reveal much the same situation, save that the Japanese population has been steadily gaining, having increased in twenty years from 24,326 to 111,010. In this Japanese population there are 5,390 Christians. Other oriental groups are much smaller, there being in this country 2,507 Hindus and 1,224 Koreans. The home mission council and the council of women for home missions have recently gathered the facts about Christian work. In recent years great advances have been made, though thousands of orientals are still beyond Christian influence. Sixteen mission boards have a total property value of $808,150 in Chinese work and a total annual expenditure through 163 paid workers of $149,352 of which $47,559 is contributed by the Chinese themselves. Eighteen mission boards are at work among the Japanese. Their property valuation is $948,175 and the total annual cost through 168 workers $236,190. Of this amount the Japanese themselves contribute $119,173.

New Immigration Is From Protestant Countries

The new immigration laws favor the Protestant countries. Before this law went into effect, 60 per cent of the immigrants were Roman Catholics, but now the percentage is very different. In a period of nine months 21,000 English, 10,000 Scotch and 11,000 Scandinavians came into the United States. At the present time the Roman Catholic and the Jewish organizations follow up the immigrants of their faith and try to relate them with religious institutions. No

Dr. Jowett Challenges Christendom

DR. J. H. JOWETT, of London, arriving home from the Copenhagen conference on international friendship through the churches, took down the trumpet from the wall and blew a blast that bids fair to awaken Christendom to the remotest parish and hamlet. In an article published in the British Weekly Dr. Jowett calls upon all churches, Roman, Anglican and Protestant, to unite in simple conferences through which the Christian ideals of peace may be made potent in our present war-wrenched world. Following are some paragraphs from his luminous appealing and challenging utterance:

"The most commanding social necessity of our time is for the church of Christ to organize her powers against the forces which are working for international bitterness and alienation. At the invitation of the editor I return to this conviction, and I wish to give it repeated and stronger emphasis. Can any one doubt that the baser passions are burning again, engendering suspicions and misunderstandings, and driving governments into mistrust and alienation? Some of us were cherishing the fine illusion that war had banished war from the face of the earth for at least a generation. If the time has not arrived when we "hang the trumpet in the hall, and learn of war no more," we confidently thought that there would be a quiet season for the ploughshare and the pruning hook, and that in the interlude the forces of sanity and good will would gather strength.

DIPLOMACY'S HELPLESSNESS

"Some time ago I ventured to report a sentence from a conversation I had with Mr. Lloyd George. The word was uttered soon after he returned from the conference at Genoa. He declared his conviction that what was wanted in these conferences was a different atmosphere, a more imperative sense of moral ideal, and a driving power which would give the moral ideal its rightful constraints and sovereignty. 'We have not had the requisite religious force behind us, and it is for the churches to supply it.' The other day I heard Dr. John R. Mott repeat a word which he heard from the Premier of Japan, when the latter was returning from the conference at Washington. The Premier of Japan is not a professing Christian, but this was his judgment as he reviewed the verbal decisions of the conference! 'We must now look to the leaders of religion.' What is the response of the leaders of religion to the prime ministers of Britain and Japan?

"And what is the power which is to do this except the power of religion? And how are men to get these world-embracing moods and these world-inclusive views? How are they to wed these ideals to current affairs How are they to do these things except by the moral power of the Christian religion? And what is to be the organ of both power and ideal except the church of the living God? In the far-off days, of which the Old Testament preserves the record, the prophet was the organ of the national conscience. The prophet was the medium through which the voice of the Almighty sounded through the courts of kings, and broke in upon the councils of statesmen, and disturbed the plots of politicians, and proclaimed to nations the ways of righteousness and truth. The prophet appears and re-appears on all the stages of national life. You could not get rid of him. He could not be scared away by menace. He could not be bribed into silence. Visibly and audibly he was the incarnation of the divine will. But in our later days the function of the prophet has been transferred to the ministry of the church. The church of Christ bears the high glory of her divine priesthood, but added to her priesthood, nay as a vital part of it, she has to be the conscience of the corporate life. The clear clarion of the prophet is to be wedded to the mystic ministry of the priest.

"I am therefore eager that the church of the living God should play her part in the fateful hours of our own day. Let her declare the things which have been revealed to her as the unchanging will of God. She knows these things. They are the things for which her Saviour died. Let her write them across the skies! Let her proclaim them, not in muffled tones of timidity, but with all the authority which has been given to her of God. She has the light. She has the right. Let her use them. On some appointed day let the believers in Jesus Christ go to their churches, as they went in the early days of the war, and in some simultaneous act of dedication and audible declaration let them proclaim their desire and purpose for a sacred peace, and their belief in the common brotherhood of mankind. Let us incorporate this sacramentum in the usual ordinances of worship. Let it be an act, not merely of priests and ministers, but of the whole congregation. Let them rise in their sanctuaries, standing before God and man, and in some simple form of words let them assert their witness to the eth-such service is being performed at Ellis Island for the newly arrived Protestants. Immigration figures shows that the northern Europe immigrant is more likely to stay in this country than is the immigrant from southern Europe and if Protestantism can organize independent of sectarianism to take care of the immigrant peoples, there will be comfort rather than alarm for the church statesman in the contemplation of immigration statistics.

Religious Conflict in Poland

With the coming of the Polish republic, there has broken out in Poland a recrudescence of the old-time religious conflicts. The present pope of Rome was elected because of his outstanding achievements in Poland. What the nature of these achievements is may be judged by the fact that during 1921, 553 Lutheran schools were changed into Catholic schools. The remaking of the political map has weakened Catholicism in some places, but on the whole this communion has gained enormously from the war.

Peking University Will Change Site

Peking university, one of the leading educational institutions of China, is maintained by the cooperation of four mission boards, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, and the London Missionary society. At present the institution is housed in temporary quarters in various parts of the city, but a hundred acres have been purchased just outside the city limits on which the institution will be housed in the future. In order to provide the necessary equipment, a campaign for a million dollars is being launched in America. Already the theological seminary has been provided with a building which will be dedicated to the memory of Bishop Ninde. The college for men and the college for women must each have buildings and equipment.

Premier Succeeded by Another Christian

The growing influence of the Christian church in China may be realized when one learns that one Christian premier has been succeeded by another. Dr. W. W. Yen, the retiring premier, has during his entire public career refused to be aligned with a political party. He is the son of a Christian minister as is his successor, who is Dr. Wang Ch'ung Huei, one of the members of the board of managers of Peking university. These facts indicate that though the Christian religion is not yet great in the number of its adherents, it has an influence in China quite out of proportion to its numbers.

World Conference to Meet at Washington in 1925

Bishop Charles H. Brent, of New York, chairman of the Episcopal commission on the World Conference on Faith and Order, announces that the Continuation committee of that organization will meet in 1924, probably in Westminster Abbey, London, to make final arrangements for the meeting of the conference, which will be held in May of the following year at Washington, D. C. It is urged that the best preparation for the World Conference will be a large number of small conferences "of members of the same church by themselves so that they may see clearly the values of the truths for which their own church stands, and of members of different churches, so that they may learn to understand one another and the value of the other's position." If such smaller conferences are arranged, the leaders believe that the next two years will show a sufficient advance to make it worth while for the Continuation committee to meet in 1924 to consider the progress made and to arrange a program for the World Conference itself in 1925. The smaller conferences, it is suggested, should include "the officers of the churches, their best theologians and their most competent laity"; and it is urged that, in order that the whole church may be duly informed of the movement, names and addresses of persons interested be sent to the general secretary, Robert H. Gardiner, 174 Water Street, Gardiner, Maine, who will forward information from time to time with reference to the progress of the movement.

Cleveland Opens Evangelistic Campaign With Religious Census

In harmony with the program recommended by denominational leaders in joint session with the council of the Ohio Federation of Churches, the Cleveland Federation of Churches has entered upon its evangelistic campaign for 1922-23 with a house to house visitation by districts, to obtain names of persons not in attendance at church and Sunday school. From January 1 to April 1 will come an intensive campaign of recruiting, with every pastor preaching evangelistic sermons, and every church recruiting for Christian discipleship; with special meetings in individual churches; with instruction classes and personal workers' classes under the direction of pastors, and culminating, it is hoped, with large ingatherings on Easter Sunday. The Federated churches estimate that Cleveland has 230,000 non-churched residents and 47,000 children not reached by the Sunday schools. At a city-wide conference on evangelism held September 14, the program included addresses by Rev. John McNeill, of New York, and Professor E. I. Bosworth, of Oberlin college.

Bishop Fallows Honored by Colored Citizens of Chicago

Memorial services in honor of the late Bishop Fallows were held at Wendell Phillips High School, Chicago, on September 24. The services were under the auspices of the colored citizens of the city. Among the speakers was ex-Governor Edward F. Dunne.

Sunday School Attendance Will Be Promoted by Chicago Ministers

The first union meeting of the ministers of Chicago was addressed by Rev. Hugh T. McGill, of Washington, D. C., executive secretary of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education. His theme was "Building Together in the World's Best Business."

Friends Compromise on Differences

THE smaller denominations have quite as keen differences of opinion as the larger. Because the members know each other so much more intimately these differences are probably more painful. At the Five Years Meeting, which corresponds to the national convention of most denominations, and which was held recently at Richmond, Ind., the question of a creed aroused keen interest. There has been a growing demand for some kind of creedal statement which would define the position of the Quakers. This demand has been resisted by others who held that it was out of accord with the very genius of Quakerism to make a formal statement of doctrine. The following compromise resolution was passed by a well-nigh unanimous vote and ordered published by the Meeting together with the documents mentioned:

"We recognize with profound sorrow that there is in the world today a great drift of religious unsettlement, unconcern and unbelief. We desire at this time to call our own membership to a deeper religious life, a greater consecration of heart and will to God and a more positive loyalty to the faith for which so many of our forerunners suffered and died. We wish to reaffirm the statements and declarations of faith contained in our Uniform Discipline, viz., 'The Essential Truths,' 'The Declaration of Faith' issued by the Richmond conference in 1887 and 'George Fox's Letter to the Governor of Barbadoes' and we urge all our membership to refresh their minds by a careful reading of these documents which gather up and express the central truths for which we stand, now as in the past. But we would further remind our membership that our Christian faith involves more than the adoption and profession of written statements however precious they may be. It stands and lives only in free personal loyalty and devotion to a living Christ and in an inward experience of his spiritual presence and power in the soul, making the facts of our religion as real and as capable of being soundly tested as are the facts of the physical universe. May Friends everywhere bear in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus."

The reports of the Friends indicate that they have sent out twenty-two new missionaries into foreign lands since 1917. The names of 140 missionary volunteers are known to the foreign mission board but there are no funds to send these out. The sixty thousand dollar deficit was provided for and a strong board of directors was elected. Great rejoicing was found in the record of the splendid philanthropic service which Friends have rendered in the various stricken countries of Europe, particularly in Russia.

This address was intended to strike the keynote in a campaign which is planned by the churches of Chicago to recruit more adults and young people for Bible study during the year 1922-23. At this opening session of the union ministers' meetings there were present a large number of Sunday school superintendents as well as ministers.

Methodists Show Institutional Churches Successful

Rev. F. D. Stone, superintendent of the Chicago western district of the Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, reports that during the past year there has been a marked increase in membership in the churches of the district, and he states further that the increase is particularly noticeable among the institutional churches, where a social and recreational program has been carried on for a number of years. "The church looks at this," according to Dr. Stone, "as evidence that the church of today, in order to reach the community, must present a seven-days-a-week program."

"Industrial Relations and the Churches"

The September issue of the Annals, the bi-monthly publication of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, is given over to a discussion of the church's relation to the industrial problems of the times. The editors of this volume are F. Ernest Johnson, research secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and John A. Ryan, director of the department of social action of the National Welfare council. Dr. Sidney E. Goldstein, pastor of the Free Synagogue, New York, is one of the contributors. Other ministers and also trade journal editors, industrial leaders, labor union officials and social science experts have also contributed to the volume.

Methodist School for Negroes Has New President

Clark University, Atlanta, Ga., is one of Methodism's leading schools for the training of the youth of the Negro race. Professor J. W. Simmons, of the department of religious education in Southwestern College, Winfield, Kan., has been elected to the presidency and has accepted. He succeeds Dr. Harry Andrews King.

Presbyterians Lose Widely Known Mission Leader

With the passing of Dr. Charles Edwin Bradt at Presbyterian hospital, Chicago, the Presbyterian church lost one of its most useful and most widely known promoters of missionary work. He spent his last seventeen years as central district secretary for the Board of Foreign Missions. His death, which occurred September 5, was due to pernicious anemia, from which he had suffered for more than two years. Dr. Bradt was a graduate of the Wooster College and of the Chicago Theological Seminary. He early served as a pastor in Lincoln, Neb., and Wichita, Kan. One of his achievements was the organization, in 1907, of the Omaha foreign missions convention for men which set an average of five dollars a year per member as a goal for the entire denomination. Under the leadership of Dr. Bradt and with the generous cooperation of Henry P. Crowell, the every member plan was tried out in Illinois for three years, and proved so successful that it was adopted by the church at large.

Epworth League Broadcast Message on Rally Day

The Epworth League observed Sunday, October 1, as rally day. A special feature this year was the broadcasting of a message at Station KRW, Chicago. The transmitter at this station is the most powerful in the world and has a sending radius of three thousand miles, and thus the message was heard by leaguers throughout the country.

Christian General of China Inspires His Soldiers With Hymns

General Feng Yu-huiang, who is known as "The Christian General," carries his religion into his training quarters. The singing of hymns is a frequent accompaniment to the step of his marching soldiers. When a soldier enlists under him, along with his first shave and clean clothing he is given a small book containing some of the rudiments of military life and also some elementary Christian teachings.

Presbyterian Ministerial Relief Secretary Soon to Begin New Work

Henry A. Cozzens, who was appointed field secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustenation of the Presbyterian church, early in the summer, will take up his new task November 1. Mr. Cozzens has for thirty-eight years served as secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Newark, N. J.

Detroit Ministers Off for Good Season

The Detroit ministers will hold their first union meeting on October 9, under the leadership of Rev. H .B. McCormick, pastor of Woodward Avenue Christian church. The first speaker for the season is Bishop Breyfogle, of Reading, Pa. Visiting social workers in attendance at the Prison Conference of America will speak in many Detroit churches on Oct. 15. The ministers are also taking an active interest in the approaching primary fight and will provide their congregations with the lists of dry candidates furnished by the Anti-Saloon league. The evan-

Episcopal Convention Closes

THE triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal church held at Portland, Oregon, has closed. Its record is like that of most religious conventions, mixed in character. Perhaps the most significant fact in the entire legislative record was the refusal to enter the Federal Council of Churches. This refusal is not to be laid up against the clergy of the church, but strange to relate, to the lay deputies. The bishops voted 57 to 31 in favor of participation in the work of the Federal Council. The vote in the house of deputies showed that the clergy voted by a majority of five to enter the council while the lay element rejected the motion by one-half vote, that of a missionary district. Another motion was passed for the appointment of a commission to consider the matter further. The Protestant Episcopal church is thus put in the anomalous position of seeking through the World Conference on Faith and Order, Christian unity, and yet rejecting the only project in the practice of unity that has so far been able to function.

The question of the status of women in the church remains unchanged for the most part. The house of deputies was willing that women should become lay readers, but this proposal was vetoed by the bishops. The house of deputies was also willing that deaconesses should be recognized as an order of the ministry, but the bishops vetoed this as well. The bishops voted to admit women to the house of deputies but the house of deputies rejected this motion. Thus the various motions revealed an awakened consciousness of the significance of women in the leadership of the church, but because of the bicameral arrangement of the convention no motion on this subject secured passage.

It is a comfort to most Episcopalians that they will no longer have to pray "Have mercy on all Jews, Turks, infidels, and heretics." This prayer has not been conducive to missionary work among the Jews, and has brought a sense of shock to most Christians, for most people nowadays put infidels in a very different class from men of other faiths, particularly those which are monotheistic in structure.

The proposed change in the order of holy communion aroused the most violent feelings in the house of deputies. Dr. Alexander Mann of Boston, who presided over these sessions, was obliged to admonish the brethren that they were considering a Christian sacrament in an unchristian way, and he stopped the discussion for prayers. The house of deputies two days later adopted a motion which inserts in the order of communion a prayer to the virgin Mary.

The case of the bishop of eastern Oregon has excited wide interest. A new executive will henceforth shepherd the flock in this missionary district. The election of the Rt. Rev. William P. Remington, suffragan bishop of South Dakota, as Bishop of Eastern Oregon, was confirmed. Probably in no convention has there been so much discussion of insurgent bishops as in this one. The case of Bishop Paul Jones, the pacifist bishop of Salt Lake City, who resigned under fire during the war, was made the object of much popular discussion. Portland was placarded with a popular demand that this bishop be restored to active service.

"IT'S REALLY MARVELOUS TO HAVE ALL THIS RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE CONDENSED IN A SINGLE BOOK RIGHT AT MY ELBOW"

So spoke a clergyman of wide experience and scholarly training concerning the great volume,

A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS

Edited by SHAILER MATHEWS and GERALD BIRNEY SMITH

EDITED BY SHAILER MATHEWS
GERALD B. SMITH

This is a new book which every thoughtful or studious person must have. It is a whole religious library in one book—the product of a hundred authoritative scholars—clear, compact, accurate, authentic.

This book is now going to the library tables of all leading ministers, bishops and laymen who want to know and who must know.

Do You Know—

The facts as to the historicity of Christ?

What made the Mohammedan successful? That the Mohammedan is an offshoot of the Christian religion?

Why Brahminism drove Buddhism out of India?

That the Roman religion lasted twelve hundred years?

The relative influence of John Hus, Wyckliff and Luther?

The history of the idea of Heaven and Hell?

The great book "Against Celsus?"

The origin and development of Hedonism?

About the Code of Hammurabi? That this Code (2000 years B. C.) had higher morals than many men of today?

That the Immaculate Conception dogma was promulgated in 1854?

What is Jewish Christianity?

Voices of Approval from All Quarters

The New York Christian Advocate: "Useful, especially because of its up-to-dateness and non-technical treatment of words and subjects."

The Presbyterian: "It is more than a dictionary; rather an encyclopedia."

The Baptist: "A convenient one-volume dictionary likely to be used by its possessor more than many-volumed encyclopedias."

The Continent: "Convenient, compact, dependable."

The Christian Work: "The appearance of this volume is a notable event."

Religious Education: "A book quite indispensable to the private library of every minister, student and teacher of religion."

THE DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS sets forth in compact form the results of modern study in the psychology of religion, the history of religions, both primitive and developed, the present status of religious life in America, Europe and the most important mission fields, and the important phases of Christian belief and practice. It also covers both social and individual ethics. All subjects of importance in the field of religion and ethics are discussed.

About one hundred scholars have cooperated with the editors, including well-known specialists in their respective fields. The articles are written historically, objectively, without speculation or propaganda, and in so far as possible by those most in sympathy with their subjects.

Not only should every minister possess this book; every Sunday school teacher, every Bible student who takes his study seriously, should have it at his elbow. It is without doubt the most useful one-volume dictionary of religion published in decades. Do not neglect to send in your order today.

Woman's Missionary Society Will Hold Meeting in Pittsburg

The national convention of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church will be held in Pittsburgh, Pa., October 18-25, inclusive. Some conferences have never been represented in a national meeting, but with the inauguration this year of the national plan for equalization of expenses the Pittsburgh convention hopes to welcome many new friends.

Christian Protest Changes Theater Jokes

Three vaudeville circuits in this country will henceforth ban the prohibition joke. No jest which is either favorable or unfavorable to the eighteenth amendment will be permitted. This action has been taken in view of the frequent protest of Christian patrons who objected to the practice of making our fundamental law ridiculous. Were the same measure of protest registered in the offices of certain newspapers there would probably be a change in the practice of cartoonists as well.

Conference of Outstanding Christian Bodies

A conference in which some of the most outstanding union organizations of American Christianity will participate will be held in Washington, Oct. 17, 18. It is called the Conference of Allied Christian Societies Engaged in Community Work. The participating organizations are the Federal Council of Churches, the Council of Women for Home Missions, the Home Missions Council, the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education, the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association, the World Alliance of Churches for International Friendship, the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions, and the Young People's Organization. Alfred G. Bookwalter is executive secretary of the conference. The sessions will be held in the New York Avenue Presbyterian church. Among the outstanding speakers will be the following: Rev. James E. Freeman, rector of the Church of the Epiphany; Bishop James Cannon of Norfolk, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of New York, Mr. Hugh S. Magill, and Bishop Francis J. McConnell. The President of the United States has granted an audience to the conference at the White House and will speak to the assembled churchmen.

Fifteen Deaf Mutes Become Episcopalians

The provision for the spiritual needs of the deaf people of the country is being extended rapidly by many communions. Fifteen of these people were admitted to membership in St. Mark's Episcopal church in Denver on a recent Sunday. Dr. James H. Cloud, who is deaf but not dumb, prepared the candidates for confirmation and repeated the service to these people in the sign language. The sermon of the bishop will be printed in

WILSON INDEX CO.

Says John Dewey:

"...think of how much more interesting a world it will be to live in, if only composed and articulate meanings are assigned to the happenings amid which we live. If you first permitted and then took part in a give and take of ideas, in a conversation which assigned meanings to the events which willy-nilly involve us, that ennui, that fear of the future which now leads you to plunge further for an escape into busyness might be lessened. ...To find a meaning, to understand along with others, is always a contentment, an enjoyment. ... Apart from conversation, from discourse and communication, there is no thought and no meaning, only just events, dumb, preposterous and destructive." *

We thank Dr. Dewey for having inadvertently written in these excerpts the best New Republic advertisement of the season. He will not rejoice in the distinction perhaps, but that will be only because he has never had the fun of snaring the wary reader's check or of counting such Coupons

Disciples Minister Takes Commission From Methodist

Denominational fences have wide gaps in them these days. Down in Missouri, where these fences were once in good repair, Presiding Elder Robinson, of the Southern Methodist communion, arranged for forty simultaneous series of revival services. At the last moment one of his evangelists failed him. He at once got in touch with Rev. C. H. Swift, pastor of Cape Girardeau Disciples church, who was at that time away on vacation. The Disciples minister filled the appointment made for him by the Methodist presiding elder, winning eleven converts for the Methodist church.

Southern Churches in Great Building Enterprises

The Manufacturers' Record, a secular journal, has tabulated the church erection enterprises in the southern states for the past eight months, and the total for buildings costing ten thousand dollars or more is $23,612,595. During the past seventeen weeks contracts have been let for buildings at an aggregate cost of $6,776,000. In the list are some ecclesiastical structures that rival anything in the northern states. First Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of Dallas is starting a building that will cost $850,000 when complete. First Baptist church of Houston is starting in on a $600,000 enterprise. The new Baptist building at Shreveport, La., recently completed, cost $500,000. It has a ten story tower together with connecting rooms in the annex, which furnishes quarters for a Sunday school of 3,000, and rooms for twelve young people's societies. This church has its own broadcasting station, the first church in the world to establish this service independent of commercial companies. The auditorium seats 3,000 and the roof garden 1,000. The Unitarians are erecting a $400,000 building in Washington for the use of All Souls' church.

ical ideals of their faith, and their determination to have peace on earth and good-will among men. Let this be done in every Christian church throughout the world, whether it be Protestant, Roman or Greek.

"But I will go further than this. In every nation I would have representative leaders of the Christian church meeting together, not in councils of war, but in councils of peace, to express the luminous principles of our Lord on some of the grave matters which are now plunging the world in confusion and strife. Have we any guiding principles which are intended to be to men as the light of day? Let them be proclaimed in every nation with an authority which is drawn from their sacred Source and with a strength of testimony which would be derived from the act of a united church. There need be nothing elaborate about these national gatherings. There is no necessity for complicated machinery. In every nation someone would have to take the lead, and surely someone could be found to do it. Surely it would be possible in every country to find men and women who would be the originating centers of the simple organizations which are to get these councils together. Of course it would mean work and plenty of it. But the laborer in these fields would be sowing seed which would yield a hundredfold.

"As far as our own country is concerned, let us have a Council of Peace in London with delegates from every part of the empire. Let the delegates be distinguished Christian men, not merely drawn from the ranks of ecclesiastics, but also from the wider realms of commerce and art and literature and labor. Let them be broad-minded, deep-hearted men, with personal loyalty to Christ and a passion for the kingdom of God. Let us have a three days' council here at the heart of the empire, not merely to make speeches, but to visualize and demonstrate the existence of a corporate body which has in its custody the moral ideals of Jesus Christ, and which intends to give them their purposed sovereignty in the reconstruction of the world.

"What have the young leaders in the church of Christ to say about all this? If we elder men are somewhat timid, or if we are too much imprisoned in traditional ways, if we have become a little stiff in our joints, stiff in our mental movements and stiff in our aptitude to seize the possibilities of a new era, let the younger men grasp the occasion, and let them use it to establish the will of the Lord in the upbuilding of his kingdom. The eyes of the young are not dimmed, they can see new worlds building upon the horizon, and they can discern the high-road along which are to come the ransomed of the Lord with joy and singing. Let the young believers in Christ put their hands to the task, let they lay their backs to the burden and let them make our confusing day the day of the Lord."

Chicago Ministers Study World Crisis

NO ministers' meeting in recent history has equalled in attendance the assemblage on Sept. 25. Under the call of the Chicago Church Federation the men of many denominations met at the Association building to face their international obligations. The speaker of the day was Dr. William T. Ellis, newspaper correspondent and Presbyterian elder. He brought to the discussion the broad vision of a world traveller. Dealing chiefly with the present near east crisis, he declared that we may be upon the eve of a world conflict which will mean the end of the white man's civilization.

He said: "The only solution is the Christian solution. Until nations and men are ready to do what is right and what is neighborly, we shall never get out of the bog in which we flounder. What shallow persons sneer at as old-fashioned Sunday school morals is really the only type of statecraft great enough to pull us through the world emergency. The most tragic part of the near east trouble is the collapse of allied unity, the failure of civilization to function. The Turks have gone unpunished for the Armenian atrocities. The allies played politics instead of punishing the Turks at Constantinople. If they had done what is so plainly right that a heathen school-boy could not mistake it, instead of trying to grab and scheme for their own individual advantages, there would be quiet and prosperity in the near east today, instead of an upheaval which threatens another world war."

A dramatic incident of the meeting was the introduction of Dr. Hugh S. McGill, the new secretary of the International Sunday School Association, by Marion Lawrence. Mr. McGill spoke at length on the work of the Sunday schools sounding the slogan, "Bigger and Better Sunday Schools." He asserted that the peddlers of international quack medicines have misled us. The only hope of the world is a new Christian spirit that shall arise from the processes of religious education.

The large attendance and splendid esprit de corps of the Chicago ministers bear testimony of the growth of the cooperative spirit. Under the leadership of Dr. H. L. Willett, the Federation came to command wide areas of influence and developed its various departments of work. His place is now filled by Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, who serves the federation with great effectiveness, without salary, as a labor of love.

Following the public meeting in the Association building, the various denominational groups organized in separate rooms at the Morrison Hotel to discuss their peculiar problems. No topic was of more moment than the autumn program of evangelism. The emphasis was far less upon the evangelization of adults than formerly. It is now conceived to be the duty of the churches to win their children to active, cooperative, church membership before they are sixteen. Among the objectives is not only to bring the children into church membership, but to establish regular habits of church attendance.

The union meeting of ministers will be held the last Monday of each month during the coming year. Meanwhile the denominational meetings seem to drag a bit. The Presbyterians are considering the possibility of getting on without a ministers' meeting save for the meetings of presbytery. The Congregationalists are discussing the possibility of a meeting held twice a month instead of the weekly meeting. The Disciples are under way with their weekly gatherings again, having recently elected Rev. C. R. Oakley, pastor of Jackson Boulevard church, as their president for the coming year.

Are We a Nation of Low-Brows?

It is charged that the public is intellectually incompetent. Is this true? It is charged that the public is afraid of ideas, disinclined to think, unfriendly to culture. This is a serious matter. The facts should be faced frankly and honestly.

Without Cultural Leadership

The main criticism, as we find it, is that the people support ventures that are unworthy, that represent no cultural standards. The public is fed on low-brow reading matter, low-brow movies, low-brow theatrical productions, low-brow music, low-brow newspapers, low-brow magazines. We think the criticism is unfair in that it does not recognize the fact that the public is without cultural leadership. Those who have the divine spark get off by themselves. We believe the public has never had a real chance, never had an opportunity to get acquainted with the great and the beautiful things of life. Given half a chance, the public will respond.

We believe there has been enough talk about the public's inferior taste. The time has come to give the public an opportunity to find out something about philosophy, science and other higher things. And it must be done at a low price, because the average person's pocketbook is not fat. As it stands, the publishers charge about five dollars a volume, and then wonder why the people stand aloof.

We believe we have a way to find out if the people are interested in the deeper problems of life. And the first thing we decided was to fix a price that shall be within the reach of the person with the most slender purse.

We have selected a library of 25 books, which we are going to offer the public at an absurdly low price. We shall do this to find out if it is true that the public is not going to accept the better things when once given the chance. And we shall make the price so inviting that there shall be no excuse on the ground of expense.

All Great Things Are Simple

Once the contents of the following 25 books are absorbed and digested we believe a person will be well on the road to culture. And by culture we do not mean something dry-as-dust, something incomprehensible to the average mind—genuine culture, like sculpture, can be made to delight the common as well as the elect The books listed below are all simple works and yet they are great—all great things are simple. They are serious works, of course, but we do not think the public will refuse to put its mind on serious topics. Here are the 25 books:

Are the People Ready to Read These 25 Books?

Schopenhauer's Essays. For those who regard philosophy as a thing of abstractions, vague and divorced from life, Schopenhauer will be a revelation.

The Trial and Death of Socrates. This is dramatic literature as well as sound philosophy.

Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. This old Roman emperor was a paragon of wisdom and virtue. He will help you.

The Discovery of the Future. H. G. Wells asks and answers the question: Is life just an unsolvable, haphazard struggle?

Dialogues of Plato. This volume takes you into Plato's immortal circle.

Foundations of Religion. Prof. Cook asks and answers the question: Where and how did religious ideas originate?

Studies in Pessimism. Schopenhauer presents a well-studied viewpoint of life. The substance of his philosophy.

The Idea of God in Nature. John Stuart Mill. How the idea of God may come naturally from observation of nature is explained in this volume.

Life and Character. Goethe. The fruits of his study and observation is explained in this volume.

Thoughts of Pascal. Pascal thought a great deal about God and the Universe, and the origin and purpose of life.

The Olympian Gods. Tichenor. A study of ancient mythology.

The Stoic Philosophy. Prof. Gilbert Murray. He tells what this belief consisted of, how it was discovered, and what we can today learn from it.

God: Known and Unknown. Samuel Butler. A really important work.

Nietzsche: Who He Was and What He Stood For. A carefully planned study.

Sun Worship and Later Beliefs. Tichenor. A most important study for those who wish to understand ancient religions.

Primitive Beliefs. Tichenor. You get a clear idea from this account of the beliefs of primitive man.

Three Lectures on Evolution. Ernst Haeckel's ideas expressed so you can understand them.

From Monkey to Man. A comprehensive review of the Darwinian theory.

Survival of the Fittest. Another phase of Darwinian theory.

Evolution vs. Religion. You should read this discussion.

Reflections on Modern Science. Prof. Huxley's reflections definitely add to your knowledge.

Biology and Spiritual Philosophy. An interesting and instructive work.

Bacon's Essays. These essays contain much sound wisdom that still holds.

Emerson's Essays. Emerson was a friend of Carlyle, and in some respects a greater philosopher.

Tolstoi's Essays. His ideas will direct you into profitable paths of thought.

25 Books—2,176 Pages—Only $1.95—Send No Money

If these 25 books were issued in the ordinary way they might cost you as much as a hundred dollars. We have decided to issue them so you can get all of them for the price of one ordinary book. That sounds inviting, doesn't it? And we mean it too. Here are 25 books, containing 2,176 pages of text, all neatly printed on good book paper, 3½x5 inches in size, bound securely in card cover paper.

You can take these 25 books with you when you go to and from work. You can read them in your spare moments. You can slip four or five of them into a pocket and they will not bulge. You can investigate the best and the soundest ideas of the world's greatest philosophers—and the price will be so low as to astonish you. No, the price will not be $25 for the 25 volumes. Nor will the price be $5. The price will be even less than half that sum. Yes, we mean it. Believe it or not, the price will be only $1.95 for the entire library. That's less than a dime a volume. In fact, that is less than eight cents per volume. Surely no one can claim he cannot afford to buy the best. Here is the very best at the very least. Never were such great works offered at so low a price. All you have to do is to sign your name and address on the blank below. You don't have to send any money. Just mail us the blank and we will send you the 25 volumes described on this page—you will pay the postman $1.95 plus postage. And the books are yours.

If you want to send cash with order, remit $2.25.

Are we making a mistake in advertising works of culture? Are we doing the impossible when we ask the people to read serious works? Are we wasting our time and money? We shall see by the manner in which the blank below comes into our mail.

NEW BOOKS OF SERMONS

The Victory of God

By JAMES REID

"The chief distinction of this book of twenty-five sermons," says The Christian Century editorially, "is its serenity of spirit, its vitality of faith, and the artless simplicity of the art with which the preacher delivers the message. Its fashion of sermon-making is the simplest, with no struggle after striking titles, no clever twists of odd or obscure texts. Its illustrations are as apt as they are inevitable; nothing is lugged in. The culture of the preacher is manifest, but more as an atmosphere of sanity and rich suggestiveness, and his wealth of great and beautiful thoughts is matched by a nobility of expression." The British Weekly remarks: "In Mr. Reid's pages we catch the living tones of a preacher who is pleading with men so earnestly that his language grows simple, forcible, direct." ($2.00).

The Forgiveness of Sins

By GEORGE ADAM SMITH

Most American ministers know the unrivalled work by Dr. Smith on the geography of the Holy Land. His scholarship is admitted the world over. This volume contains fifteen sermons, the following being some of the titles: "Our Lord's Example in Prayer," "To Him that Overcometh," "The Moral Meaning of Hope," "Will Ye Have the Light," "The Forgiveness of Sins," "The Word of God," and "Temptation." The sermons were preached in Queen's Cross Free Church, Aberdeen. ($1.50).

When Jesus Wrote on the Ground

By EDGAR DE WITT JONES

Says Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, in his "appreciation" of the author of this book: "It is the shepherd instinct that, after all, is the greatest quality in Edgar De Witt Jones. He loves people. He believes in them. He invests even the unworthiest of them with dignity, and in the spirit of Jesus delights to serve them." And that human quality is sensed in all the sermons included in this book. Among the sermon titles are: "The Towel and the Basin," "When Jesus Wrote on the Ground," "A God Who Will Not Let Us Go," "Other Sheep," "The Lord's Leading," "The Church in Thy House," "The Peace Christ Gives," "The Ladder of Prayer," etc. ($1.50).

Sermons for Days We Observe

By FREDERICK F. SHANNON

In his pulpit at Central church, Chicago, Dr. Shannon stands as the latest in a remarkable succession of great preachers: David Swing, Newell Dwight Hillis, F. W. Gunsaulus and, since 1919 Dr. Shannon. The Biblical World remarks: "Dr. Shannon's addresses cannot be measured by the ordinary yard stick; they can hardly be criticized; it is better to enjoy them." This collection includes sermons for New Year, Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Mothers' Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas and other anniversaries. ($1.50).

The Cross and the Garden

By FREDERICK W. NORWOOD

This collection of sermons by the minister at City Temple, London, is thus characterized by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, who preceded Dr. Norwood in that pulpit: "This is a book of very real preaching of a kind not often heard or read. It is so simple, so real, so direct, so human. . . . I like the book because it is clean off the track of conventional preaching and the further we get off that beaten track and yet keep the essential genius and purpose of preaching, the better for us all. Not in years have I read a book or met a man with such a sense of reality—and that is the chief thing. It is religion dipped and dyed in the stuff and color of human life. Unless I miss my guess, this book will have a wide appeal, especially among young preachers." ($1.50).

The Safest Mind Cure and Other Sermons

By W. E. ORCHARD

Dr. Orchard, of King's Weigh House, needs no introduction to the American reading public. His fame as a preacher and prophet is almost world-wide. The "Challenge" characterizes this collection of sermons as both "fresh" and "vigorous." ($1.35).

The Finality of Christ

By W. E. ORCHARD

"The Quest of God," "Christ as a School of Culture," "The Inconstancy of Human Goodness," "Evolution and the Fall," "The Discovery of God in Thought," and "The Finality of Christ" are among the sermons included in this volume. "Great preaching," says The Christian World of this book. ($1.35).

Lord, Teach Us to Pray

By ALEXANDER WHYTE

"There is something in this book," remarks The Christian Century, editorially, "that defies all analysis, something titanic, colossal, overwhelming, which makes ordinary preaching lie a long way below such heights—a sweep of vision, a grasp of reality, a grandeur of conception that fills the heart with wonder and awe. Dr. Whyte seemed utterly oblivious of the modern difficulties about prayer, perhaps because he was a man of importunate, victorious prayer. He did not argue about prayer; he prayed. Where there is so much that is sublime it is difficult to select, but the sermons on the prayer of our Lord in the garden, on the Costliness of Prayer, on the Geometry of Prayer are memorable. . . . If one would know the secret of great preaching, it is revealed in this book, as nowhere else, in our generation." ($2.00).

THE NEW SOCIOLOGY AND THE OLD GOSPEL

By Charles A. Ellwood

EYES OF FIRE

As one looks into the eyes of modern men one sees evidence of notable ability, but little evidence of creative joy. . . . The wonderful warmth and light which come from a glowing fire within are lacking. . . . In the great creative ages of the world there are eyes of fire everywhere. . . . Men with fire in their hearts will have fire flashing in their eyes and the men with eyes of fire will renew the life of the world.

HERE ARE NEW BOOKS YOU NEED

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF RELIGION

By Charles A. Ellwood

Only an unusual volume on this subject would win the superlative praise of both clergy and university professors.

Highly endorsed by Bishops Mitchell, Nicholson, McConnell and Lines: and by George A. Coe, S. Z. Batten, S. Parkes Cadman, Chas. Foster Kent, etc. And by these university professors: Giddings of Columbia, Small of Chicago, Ross of Wisconsin, Cooley of Michigan, Hocking of Harvard, Stanley Hall of Clark, etc. $2.25

PREACHING AND SERMON CONSTRUCTION

By Rev. Paul B. Bull, M. A.

The suffering of our age is the result of the divorce of thought from feeling, of fact from value, of science from mysticism. On the preacher rests the burden of getting them reunited. A great book on preaching because a great book on religion. $2.50

THE COUNTRY FAITH

By Frederick F. Shannon,

Author of "The Infinite Artist."

"His addresses cannot be measured by the ordinary yardstick; they can hardly be criticized; it is better to enjoy them."—The Biblical World. $1.00

THE THOUGHTS OF YOUTH

By Samuel S. Drury,

Headmaster of St. Paul's School.

A book for boys (and their sisters) and their parents.

"I trust that along with any satisfaction that the boys may take in the way I have presented their point of view to their parents, they will accept in good part the home thrusts meant for their private ears." $1.25

PARENTHOOD AND CHILD NURTURE

By Edna Dean Baker, M. A.,

President of the National Kindergarten and Elementary College.

"A textbook for the Parent Training Class, with an introduction by W. C. Pearce, Associate Secretary, World's Sunday School Association, and its purpose is to bring the discoveries of modern child study to the aid of parents in the training of their children."—Lutheran Herald. $1.50

OLD TESTAMENT LAW FOR BIBLE STUDENTS

By Roger S. Galer.

An exhaustive analysis of all the material, legal in character, in the Old Testament and this mass of laws, regulations, and ordinances so arranged that the reader may at a glance ascertain every reference in regard to any particular subject. $1.25

PRAYERS FOR PRIVATE AND FAMILY USE

By Charles Lewis Slattery,

Author of "How to Pray"; "Why Men Pray."

"In the form of leaflets these prayers have been kept in the Porch of Grace Church and each year many thousands of them are carried away by those who pass through it. One reason for printing the prayers in a book is that I am told that a number of families are using the leaflets in the attempt to revive in their households the habit of family prayer." $1.00

HARMONY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS

Arranged from the text of the authorized version. With four maps.

By J. M. Fuller.

Every Bible student can use to good advantage such a volume. Forty-eight thousand copies of this work have been sold in previous editions.

The text is taken from the Oxford edition of the authorized version. The quotations from the Old Testament are printed in spaced type. $1.00

THE CHRISTIAN CRUSADE FOR A WARLESS WORLD

THE MINISTRY AS A LIFE WORK

By Professor Robert L. Webb, D. D.

Men like big jobs. Dr. Webb aims to show that the minister's job is so big today that the world is sure that he can not accomplish the mighty objectives which both men and the word of God set him. $1.00

A FAITH THAT ENQUIRES

By Sir Henry Jones

Cloth 12 mo.

"One can follow with confidence along the entire journey, and feel that the whole matter is being handled with intellectual and spiritual ability and vigor, and that the things that are vital to religious faith, experience and practice are being sustained and magnified by one who is a master in the realm of spiritual research."—The Christian Advocate.

"One of the most refreshing volumes that has appeared on the philosophy of religion in recent years."—The Continent. $2.00

THE CHURCH IN AMERICA

By William Adams Brown

The men can be counted on the fingers of one hand who are as peculiarly qualified as Dr. Brown by interdenominational experience and breadth of general training to deal in a statesmanlike way with present conditions and chart the immediate future course of the Church in America.

The big book on the Protestant Church in the U. S. that we have all been waiting for. $3.00

SPIRITUAL ENERGIES IN DAILY LIFE

By Rufus M. Jones

Dr. Jones shows how the cure for our present failures lies in unutilized powers within our easy reach. $1.50

WHAT IS THERE IN RELIGION?

By Henry Sloane Coffin

Author of "A More Christian Industrial Order"

"Dr. Coffin has kept close to those aspects of Christian truth which can be demonstrated in the laboratory of every-day life." $1.25

THE NEW SOCIAL ORDER

By Harry F. Ward

Reissue, June, 1922—reduced to $1.50

"Professor Ward's most notable contribution to the religious interpretation of the changing social order. Frank, fearless, and squarely facing existing conditions."—The Survey.

"This is one of the most important books for the citizen of this generation to read thoughtfully."—American Journal of Sociology.

THE THEORY OF ETHICS

By Prof. Arthur K. Rogers (Yale)

Author of "A Student's History of Philosophy", etc.

A fine example of the assistance that penetrating reflection can afford to the man interested in discovering and realizing the ends that make life positively worth living. $1.50

MATTER AND SPIRIT

By Prof. James Bissett Pratt

Professor of Philosophy (Williams), author of "The Religious Consciousness," etc.

Is mind all? Is body all? "Matter and Spirit" answers no. They are two and Professor Pratt has intensely interesting things to say about how their inter-action affects the reality, responsibility and freedom of the self. $1.50

PREACHING AS A FINE ART

By Rev. Roland Cotton Smith

Views the task of the preacher as closely akin to that of the artist. 75 Cents

IS THE WORLD GROWING BETTER?

By Rev. J. H. Snowden

Author of "Snowden's Sunday School Lessons," "The Coming of the Lord," etc.

New and cheaper edition. Cloth. 12 mo. $1.00

"It is a book to strengthen faith and inspire new courage for the tasks of life."—Christian Endeavor World.

STUDENT'S LIFE OF JESUS

By George Holley Gilbert

Reissue with new preface.

Prepared for students who take the life of Jesus so seriously that they wish to get at the very facts and have them set forth separately from the thousand devotional lessons that may quite legitimately be drawn.

It makes a most excellent manual for the adult Bible classes. $1.75

TWO RECENT RELIGIOUS BEST SELLERS IN A NEW SEVENTY-FIVE CENT EDITION FOR ADULT CLASS USE

WHAT CHRISTIANITY MEANS TO ME

By Lyman Abbott

Cloth, 12 mo., 75 Cents

At eighty-five, Lyman Abbott is still the student of one book.

"It is an inspiring spiritual autobiography."—Congregationalist.

RELIGION AND BUSINESS

By Roger W. Babson

Cloth, 12 mo., 75 Cents

"Running through this volume there is a current of common sense that will do anybody good—women, industrial workers and professional men as well as business men. Its plain, matter-of-fact style adds to its interest."—Adult Bible Class Monthly.

A STUDENT'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION

By William K. Wright

472 pages, 9x6, Cloth, $3.75

"This is a book for students of the Bible. A young Methodist preacher in the midst of his conference course can do no better than to read this magnificent volume from cover to cover."—Christian Advocate.

"Professor Wright is not an advocate but an investigator and he leads the students by a laboratory method to conclusions which are frankly but not dogmatically stated. We recommend it to ministers who are also students."—The Outlook.

PROPERTY: ITS RIGHTS AND DUTIES

By L. T. Hobhouse, Hastings Rashdall, A. D. Lindsay, Vernon Bartlett, A. J. Carlyle, H. G. Wood, H. Scott Holland, with an introduction by Charles Gore, former Bishop of Oxford.

Cloth, 12 mo.

"This book is worthy of earnest consideration by moral and religious teachers."—The Presbyterian.

"It ought to be read and discussed in adult classes in churches."—The Baptist. $2.00

SNOWDEN'S SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

Practical Expositions of the International Sunday School Lessons, 1923. Improved Uniform Series: Topics for Young People and Adults. Second Annual Volume.

By Rev. James H. Snowden

Author of "The Coming of the Lord," etc.

"The expository style with practical applications of this book is our ideal of popular Bible study and teaching."—Record of Christian Work.

"A real find for the busy Sunday School teacher. To begin with, the book is written by a man who has ideas and knows how to put them on paper. There is none of the obvious padding that makes the usual comments on the lesson so trying; the matter is clear, condensed, direct. The teaching points are what give the distinctive flavor to the book. They could hardly be better; they are suggestive, broad in their reach, thoroughly practical and rooted in present-day applications and deeply spiritual."—The Baptist. $1.25

Mr. Minister: Have the Superintendent of your Sunday School write for our special plan to enable him to try out the Snowden Sunday School Lessons for 1922 during October, November and December, 1922, three months' work on the Life of Christ.

HOW TO MAKE THE CHURCH GO ✣ LEACH

$1.50 NET

DORAN

A COMPLETE HANDBOOK OF TESTED AND UP-TO-DATE METHODS OF OPERATING A CHURCH AND ADMINISTERING A PARISH.

HOW TO MAKE THE CHURCH GO

A Desk Manual for the Every Day Use of the Modern Minister Executive

By
REV. WILLIAM H. LEACH

¶ The author of this brilliant and original book takes the position that the task of the modern pastor is to put the entire church at work building the Kingdom of God. To lighten the minister's burdens as an executive and to aid him in the solution of his problems Mr. Leach has here applied to the management of a Church, the psychological principles which have proved so helpful in business.

¶ The book considers the motives which move men to action, the secrets of effectiveness in Church boards and committees, the most successful methods of newspaper publicity, etc. The whole subject is treated in a very practical way and the suggested plans have all been tested in actual parish experience.

A Complete Handbook of Tested and Up-to-date Methods of Operating a Church and Administering a Parish ¶ Ministers who are seeking to adjust themselves to the new demands will find the book helpful. It will also prove the best way of getting the organizations functioning.

The Church that Cheapens Itself

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW'S recent interview about the church is in typical Shavian style. He gives the encouraging judgment that if all the churches were closed, it would not be long until others were opened with greater constituencies than ever. His warning about the church which cheapens itself might well hang in every minister's study. Dropping paradoxes, he says: "At present the church has to make itself cheap in all sorts of ways, to induce people to attend its services, and the cheaper it makes itself, the less the people attend." One thinks at once of some of the publicity devices that are resorted to in order to catch the fancy of the crowd. The publicity that brags, threatens and coaxes sounds very different from the advertising of a staple household article in our popular magazines. The slang and cheap drama that one encounters in certain pulpits is a pitiful effort to get the crowd. A congregation that laughs sin to scorn is one thing; the crowd that laughs at the preacher as well as with him is quite another. Someone started the heresy a good while ago that people would rather sing doggerel than great hymns. Big revivals and religious conventions united to popularize productions like "The Glory Song." Publishers of this type of music waxed fat upon the Sunday schools. Dignity without dullness is a possibility in any church. One never meets a truly great personality without admiring the combination of virility with perfectly good manners. A preacher does not need to shout, wave his arms or make sensational assertions to convince an audience. Phillips Brooks used to stand quietly with his hands on his coat lapels to keep them from doing any gyrations. His great audiences proved that preaching was not a gymnastic art. Perhaps the cheapest thing the church ever does is to invite into membership unprepared people. When entrance into a church is only a ritual act, or the mouthing of a religious commonplace, the world stands critically by while self-seekers take upon themselves the outer garment of righteousness. The world demands of the church the reality and the dignity of a great spiritual program.

J. Pierpont Morgan As Vestryman

AMONG the autumn books are many autobiographies, and none more interesting than "The Story of a Varied Life," by Dr. William S. Rainsford, for so many years rector of St. George's church, New York, of which the late J. Pierpont Morgan was a vestryman. There was a warm friendship between the rector and his vestryman, and we have some vivid glimpses of the great financier in a capacity not often associated with his name. They came near to falling out when the rector decided that the church must be democratic. Whereupon Mr. Morgan rose in a vestry meeting with this remarkable declaration: "The rector wants to democratize the church, and we agree with him and will help him as far as we can. But I do not want the vestry democratized. I want it to remain a body of gentlemen whom I can ask to meet me in my study." A strange remark, we may think, for an officer of a Christian church to make; and fortunately he was voted down, seven to one, by the vestry. Thereupon he declared that he would never sit in another vestry meeting. But the tact of the rector, aided by a friendship which the irate vestryman needed more than many would have thought possible, persuaded Mr. Morgan to swallow his defeat and return to his place. The story shows how difficult is the connection between rich and conservative men and the great religious organizations; and yet if the church is not democratic it is hardly worth bothering with. Also, it shows us that men like Pierpont Morgan are more helpless and more human than we realize, and that even in a materialistic age there is something besides dollars.

"When Jesus Wrote On the Ground"

A NEW volume of sermons by Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Detroit, will be welcomed by a wide circle of readers who have followed the work of that distinguished and gracious preacher. It is described accurately in its subtitle as "studies, expositions and meditations in the life of the spirit," and like all his work it reveals an exquisite touch both of insight and of art. Here is the same rich and varied culture, the same artistry in homiletics, the same aptness of illustration, the same brooding beauty, but there is growing range of thought and a deeper reach of experience—and withal the serenity of one who has gone further in his fellowship of things immortal. Devoid of mere cleverness, using no tricks of rhetoric, the style of the preacher has real distinction and charm—and the style is the man, who unites an old world courtesy with a new world vision. If there is less emphasis on the social gospel than is the vogue of the day, there is more of the pastor, the teacher, the mystic, the wise mentor of the inner life, who would lead us into the presence of the Master, and detain us there, knowing, as we are told in a passage of haunting beauty, how in that fellowship even a bitter bereavement may become a way to Emmaus. Indeed, to read the book quietly, letting its music and its cumulative assurance steal over the heart, is to have an experience of which one hardly dare speak—a sense of "the Lord of all good life" as near, real, approachable, at once intimate and august, as when he wrote on the ground.

The Churches Want No Holy War

BISHOP Cannon, of the Southern Methodist Episcopal church, has been misrepresented in a section of the secular press which claimed that he advocated the launching of a holy war. The bishop has cabled the state department from Constantinople calling attention to the heartlessness of the Turkish demand that all refugees must leave Smyrna by September 30. He calls attention to the appeal made by church leaders last July for the allied forces to investigate conditions in the near east, and asserts that had a prompt response to this appeal been made the tragedies in Smyrna might have been prevented. One may safely assert for the churches of America that they want no holy war between cross and crescent. The time has long gone when the religion of Jesus may be propagated by violence. Christianity depends upon the preaching of the gospel and the conversion of individual lives to God. On the other hand, church leaders see in a political policy of indifferentism a menace to the peace of the world. America has accumulated an authority in the world's affairs that the nation hardly knows it possesses. The world is aware that America alone of the various victors of the world war secured no material reward. This creates the impression in the minds of the nations that America is capable of idealistic action. The care of the Armenian orphans and the splendid educational service in the near east show our nation at its best. America should speak in unmistakable terms to the Turk in this international crisis. This does not mean war; it means testimony. As Dr. Speer said in a recent meeting in New York: "We are not here to feed the fires of religious hatred against the Turk, not to propose war, not to urge our government to take sides on disputed political issues. We are here to declare our conviction that religious minorities are entitled to protection, to appeal to our nation to accept its inescapable duty in aiding and establishing a righteous peace in the near east, and to insist that the Armenian people are entitled to some home of their own where they can be safe and able to take care of themselves."

Evangelizing the Ministers for Open Shop

LABOR union chiefs have not yet shown much disposition to take sincerely the potential influence of the clergy of the country, though of late there appear to be here and there signs of appreciation of the generous support which ministers have given to some of the big labor enterprises. Perhaps some labor union chiefs who believe and practice violence realize they cannot get the clergy to endorse their program. Capital, on the other hand, saw several years ago that the opinion of churchmen was important in the industrial struggle, and Judge Gary has at different times circularized the ministers of the United States with his arguments. Just now the National Association of Manufacturers is engaged in enlightening the clerical mind. This organization in a recent pamphlet says: "A revival of building would put hundreds of thousands of building tradesmen to work, reduce the heavy burden of rent, and create a demand upon many other industries which would result in still further increases in employment. But here again the forces of the closed shop bar the way." The ministers of Chicago smile as they read this misinformation. They remember that last spring there was a long labor struggle in Chicago in which workingmen were beaten down in their wages. Not only has big business absorbed all of this decrease of wages in increased cost of materials, but has even on some items gone far beyond anything known. Those who helped defeat labor unions in Chicago last spring took the money out of the pockets of workingmen and increased the dividends of the cement trust and of the lumber corporations. But in spite of the extortions of big business, some of the building trades in Chicago are so busy that contractors are bidding against one another, paying wages higher than the unions ever demanded. Thus what organized capital was able to accomplish last spring by means of a big fund and a committee to enforce the Landis award, the natural forces of supply and demand are about to undo. Secretary Hoover says America needs a million and a half new dwelling houses. The building of these furnishes the trusts dealing in building materials with their opportunity.

What Chesterson Saw in America

WHEN Mr. G. K. Chesterton landed last year to begin his lecture tour, he solemnly promised not to write a book about what he saw in this country. Happily he recanted, and his book, "What I Saw in America," is by far the best book ever written about America by an Englishman. "In international relations," he says, "there is far too little laughing and far too much sneering. But I believe there is a better way which largely consists of laughter; a form of friendship between nations which is actually founded on differences." So he does not give us a "comedy of comparisons," but a rollicking interpretation of what is most uniquely and distinctly American, from the policeman in Oklahoma to the bright lights of Broadway, rejoicing in differences, and describing all sorts of queer things with sparkling phrases, quips, conceits. prods, puns, and, of course, paradoxes. "The worst way of helping Anglo-American friendships," he says, "is to be an Anglo-American"; and we believe he is right. He knows the sanctity of difference, as he taught us in his exposition of Browning, and he never mistakes difference for inferiority. Instead of sneering at things unfamiliar, he tries to understand them—some of his explanations being fearfully and wonderfully made—and what he cannot understand he adds to his stock of mystery stories. Everything delighted him except prohibition, which he regards as a violation of the order of the universe; but apart from his lunacy on that subject, he saw and understood more of the real America than any English writer who has inspected us.

Where Denominationalism Entrenches Itself

RURAL districts were the first to feel the need of abandoning competitive denominationalism. This was indicated by the sporadic efforts of a half century ago to establish "union" churches. These early efforts to bring the community into one organization to worship were perhaps too much concerned with doctrinal and ritual differences, and probably too little concerned in working out a program of service. But their very existence was a protest. The metropolitan cities long since saw that unrestrained competition meant defeat for Protestantism. City federations were formed with comity commissions which took care of the most flagrant cases of overlapping, and through which the planting of new churches was carried on with better Christian strategy. The place where denominationalism is still brazen and unashamed is in the smaller cities. In these communities there is apparently room for the various kinds of denominational organizations. The population is predominantly native American, and the process of growth brings in still more Americans. Great edifices have been erected in these cities. The churches in such communities are the mainstay of the denominational boards. From the smaller cities come the demand for the stricter brand of orthodoxy on the part of the boards, and these demands can be enforced by the tightening up of the purse strings. It is in such locations that the progressive minister is most likely to be crucified. The business man of the small city is by no means as liberal minded as the farmer or as the typical city dweller. He probably reads less, and knows less of world movements. Of course all such communities have in them some saving salt. The choice souls whose minds are emancipated should recognize their duty to increase in their communities all the means of Christian and democratic liberalism. The public library, the lyceum course, the circulation of good literature in the homes are tools at hand for creating world vision.

Eyes of Fire

IT is possible for a very active man to have entirely dead eyes. It is possible for a very shrewd and adroit man to have eyes without that bright and kindling quality for which one instinctively looks in the journey through the world. It is possible for eyes which can gleam with the sudden flare of passion or send out sudden swords of selfish purpose to be quite without that light of the spirit which brings the surest illumination to this hard driven world. It is possible for eyes which twinkle with all the zest of deft and successful manipulation of men and movements to be incapable of that flame of creative energy which is the sure index of a vital man in a vital age.

It is rather curious how many dull and heavy eyes there are in the world today. Some of them are like burned out volcanoes. Now there is only dust and ashes where once there was vivid and glowing flame. Some of them are like lamps which have never been lighted. The shade may be beautiful in form and lovely in color, but there is no light anywhere. As one looks into the eyes of modern men one sees evidence of notable ability but little evidence of creative joy. They move rapidly. Within certain limits they see clearly. But the wonderful warmth and light which come from a glowing fire within are lacking. And in the midst of all the hurry and nervous movement one sometimes catches a furtive expression which suggests a sense of futility and a suspicion of having lived busily while somehow missing the very secret of life.

In the great creative ages of the world there are eyes of fire everywhere. These passionately inspired people are not always right. They make great mistakes. They plunge into great tragedies. But they are triumphantly alive. They have mighty and mastering and deathless enthusiasms. They see great summoning beacons on the mountains of the world. They have kindled responsive flames in their own hearts. And as you look at their faces you see only the burning power of their eyes. They meet with failure. They march upon weary pilgrimages. They die with hopes unfulfilled. But they keep the secret of the imperishable fire. They die with their eyes still glowing. And out of all their living and suffering and striving there emerge at last new and creative works of art, new and commanding institutions, and all the priceless achievements of creative civilization.

It was because he found this rich and creative quality in the thirteenth century that Henry Adams, one of the first men to voice the disillusionment toward which the nineteenth century was drifting, found a home for his spirit in the older age while he wandered in a lonely and joyless brilliancy of cynical days through the age in which he was forced to live. It is a matter of profound concern that so many men find this day in which we live an age of eyes without light. For no mental acumen and no skill in action can take the place of that creative inspiration which is the source of all the power of moral insight and the inspiration of that spiritual vision which give to all great periods their highest distinction and produce their noblest achievements in letters, in art, and in institutions.

We may think that it is impossible to produce the men with eyes of fire in our age. We are too scrupulously critical. We are too coldly analytical. We live in a century of analysis. The passion which fuses men and minds in great synthetic purpose and action is not for us. But it may well be that to reason so is to take counsel too easily with the forces of despair. It is at least clear that the men with deathless fire in their eyes did not live in easy ages. They were not men without power to analyze. Indeed the greatest of them knew all the passwords of the shrewd cynicism of their time and yet maintained contact with sources of perpetual inspiration. Because their hearts were burning and yet not consumed their eyes glowed with deathless burning passion. If we think closely and clearly we shall probably conclude that only in an age like ours is the greatest sort of morally triumphant passion possible. It was in spite of the bitter disillusionments of the seventeenth century that the noble fire of pietism came to Germany. It was in the very atmosphere of deism that the great revival came to the England of the eighteenth century. But we are not thinking merely or especially of religious expressions of the fire of creative inspiration, though it may well turn out that there is a religious source for all permanently productive idealism. We are thinking of the fact that one must fight for the possession of the fire which burns in deathless eyes and we are reminding ourselves that the fight is one which may well summon every energy of strong men in an age like our own.

Matthew Arnold once wrote some revealing lines:

> "Quench then the altar fires of your old gods, > Quench not the fire within."

It is the quenching of the fire within which civilization cannot permanently survive. It is the presence of this fire which renews the life of the world. Nothing else matters so much in this age of buzzing machines and of men who have turned their spirits into belts and wheels as the recovery of creative and exhaustless fire in the heart of humanity. The men with fire in their hearts will have fire flashing in their eyes. And the men with eyes of fire will renew the life of the world.

The Episcopalians and the Federal Council

AFTER prolonged and at times heated discussions, the Episcopal General Convention meeting at Portland, Oregon, voted not to become a constituent member of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, but to continue the present contact with that organization through the commissions on social service and church unity, and to appeal to their people to make financial contributions to the council. At earlier sessions of the convention it seemed probable that a more favorable action would be taken. In the house of bishops the proposal to unite with the council won by a vote of fifty-seven to thirty-one. But in the house of deputies, after what appeared to be a favorable action by a very small majority, a second vote was taken in which the resolution was defeated by half a vote. This negative action was later concurred in by the house of bishops, and the question was thus deferred for another three years. It was, however, decided that a joint commission should be appointed, consisting of three bishops, three clergymen and three laymen, to make a study of the entire matter and report at the next convention.

It can hardly be doubted that this outcome was fortunate for the Federal Council. Entrance of the Episcopal church among the constituent bodies now comprising its membership by so narrow a majority as was at first indicated would have led to constant friction between the two groups in the church, and diminished materially the value of the new relationship. Furthermore it would have resulted in embarrassment to the council in its relations with a hesitant and half-committed religious body. It is not unlikely that another three years of study of the problem, with the labors of a carefully selected commission as a directing agency, will result in more united action, and may find the Episcopal church ready to take its place in the council with entire conviction and enthusiasm.

That this great religious body is committed to a sympathetic consideration of the proposal is clear from its historic and insistent advocacy of church unity. No communion has spoken on this theme with greater urgency and devotion than the Episcopalians. The plan for the World Conference on Faith and Order is of their devising, and has been brought to its present promising status largely through their efforts. A very large number of the members of that body have labored earnestly and sympathetically in promotion of the various movements looking to closer cooperation among the churches, including the Federal Council. It would appear that the rightful place of a church that has taken such aggressive steps toward closer relations among the people of God should be in the one organization that stands most conspicuously for unity.

And this is the conviction of many of the most commanding leaders in the Episcopal church. Bishop Brent, whose conspicuous service as the head of the chaplains in the American army during the world war endeared him to the nation, said on the floor of the Portland convention:

"The Episcopal church is in danger of illustrating what Pope Pius IX said to Dr. Pusey, 'Why do you keep ringing the bell, and do not come in yourself?' The Episcopal church has kept ringing the bell for the people to come into the temple of Christian unity, but are still in the bell tower. We are timid as a church. We lack courage to take action."

The gifted and lamented editor of The Churchman, the leading organ of the Episcopal church, whose recent death has brought sorrow to all his editorial colleagues and a great host of admirers, said in an urgent plea to the delegates to the Portland convention to take favorable action on this proposal: "Fellowship is a creative act founded upon the Christian instinct of love. It is an act of faith because it trusts the Spirit to create through our communion with one another benefits which we have not the wisdom even to pray for. How dare a churchman with his knowledge of church history doubt such a truth? Pentecost was not the product of a council on unity. Neither was the Christian church. Fellowship prepared the way for Pentecost, and Pentecost created fellowship. There were a hundred more perilous, divisive questions to be settled and differences to be accommodated before the Christians of the first century could be bound together into the fellowship of a church than there are today separating the churches of Protestant Christendom."

The Southern Churchman of Richmond, Va., perhaps the most influential of the Episcopalian journals in the south, quotes Bishop Parsons of California as saying: "We ought to accept membership in the Federal Council. Our present relation to it is the perfection of straddling and quibbling," and the editor adds, "The fact that this church of ours is not now a member of the Federal Council is a distress to a growing multitude of her communicants. It is more than a distress. It is an embarrassment to that Christian conscience which looks upon the grievous needs of our world and recognizes the challenge which these present for a more effective cooperation in service between all Christian people."

In the Lambeth pronouncement of two years ago the bishops made this very important recommendation, that "Wherever it has not been done, councils representing all Christian communions should be formed with such areas as may be deemed most convenient as centers of united effort to promote the physical, moral and social welfare of the people, and the rule of Christ among all nations, and over every region of human life." This fine suggestion must commend itself to all thoughtful persons as a most valuable means of realizing the present spirit of cooperation abroad in the world, and of carrying it to still fuller expression. But, as The Churchman cogently declares, "In America we have ready at hand, without setting up new machinery, precisely the type of council suggested by this resolution of Lambeth. The Federal Council of Churches has been tried out and is already performing efficiently many kinds of Christian service over a vast area. If we are guided by the spirit and counsel of Lambeth the least that we as a communion can do is to open negotiations with the Federal Council that we may assure ourselves whether membership in that body is not feasible and a duty. To cooperate in a half hearted way, as we are now doing through our department of social service, does not meet the requirement of Lambeth."

Members of the Episcopal church who object to union with the Federal Council urge one of two or three difficulties in the way of such affiliation. The first is that they are not quite sure that the Episcopal church is to be counted a Protestant body. There is a strong party in the church that believes that their relationship is with the Roman Catholic church. As some of them have expressed it, their body is a Catholic church with a Protestant constituency. In worship, history and doctrine it allies itself with the Roman group. In its environment, associations and friendships it stands with Protestant Christianity. It must be remembered, however, that even on this ground the fellowship of the Federal Council offers opportunities for common service with the Roman Catholic church which no single religious body has obtained, as has been shown in the cooperation of the council with the Catholic authorities in the promotion of the conference on the reduction of armaments, and the joint appeal for the settlement of the coal strike.

Another objection is that the constitution of the Federal Council does not sufficiently emphasize the importance of doctrinal convictions and statements. But it does not minimize or depreciate the significance of such statements. It merely recognizes that the churches are themselves the responsible authorities in creedal matters, and that the function of the council is the expression of the cooperative interests of the churches, without undertaking to pronounce on questions of doctrinal character. Similarly the argument that the declarations of the council eliminates distinctions between the various points of view of the different Protestant churches on the subject of church orders is to be answered with the basic utterance of the council that in the nature of the case it cannot undertake to fix the grounds to be occupied by the constituent churches on the subject of church organization and order any more than on that of doctrine. Its field is the unquestioned area of Christian life and work. And in that area its experience has demonstrated the practicability and efficiency of cooperative service.

The various communions of the church, east and west, have manifested some degree of interest in the projected conference on faith and order. With the exception of the Roman Catholic church, all Christian groups throughout the world, so far as they have been visited and invited, have given evidence of their willingness to participate in the proposed conference. Yet the fact that the Protestant Episcopal church remains out of formal relations with the most conspicuous effort yet made to realize the oneness of the followers of Christ can hardly fail to have its influence in cooling to some extent the sympathies of the communions invited to the conference. If it has not appeared practicable to the Episcopal church to join with other Protestant churches in efforts to accomplish the common Christian tasks of evangelism, religious education, social service and interracial relations, how can it be expected that the churches can come to any likeness of mind on the intricate and perplexing problems of doctrine and holy orders?

The Episcopal church stands today very much where the Disciples of Christ stood a few years since in their relations to the Federal Council. Committed by all the sanctions of their history to the advocacy and practice of Christian union, they yet found themselves hampered in their public gatherings by a sectarian sentiment which succeeded for a time in controlling their convention policies. And this sentiment took the form of opposition to the Federal Council because the plan of cooperation proposed by the council did not include all the doctrinal items in the position of the Disciples. The demand made by the reluctant section of the communion really amounts to insistence that the denominational program of the Disciples must be accepted by all with whom intimate and effective fellowship was to be established. This was but another way of saying that as soon as the other Protestant churches were ready to attain unity by joining the communion of the Disciples, they would be welcomed. Open-minded leaders in the communion protested against so narrow and unchristian an attitude. And yet it was only after several years of agitation and education on the anomalous situation that favorable action was taken toward union with the Federal Council, and the intolerable paradox was ended of a religious body pleading for the unity of the people of God and yet refusing association with an effective means of realizing an immediate and appreciable measure of that unity.

In one regard at least the Episcopalians have broken fresh ground in this area. They have so far heeded the wishes of that half of their own body which ardently desires inclusion in the Federal Council as to appoint a commission for study of the entire question, and subsequent report. It ought not to prove impossible to agree on favorable terms of fellowship. The council is the servant of all its constituent bodies, and its purpose is to make it possible, without compromise or evasion on the part of any, to unite for such types of Christian service as are most needed today, and cannot be accomplished effectively by any denomination in isolation.

"If Winter Comes"

If winter comes, and winds blow wild and chill,
If queenly roses perish with the cold,
Be well assured that in the ashen mold
Shall bourgeon lovely gardens that shall fill
The earth with beauty. For the wood and hill,
By north wind shorn, bright robes of living green
Shall soon be wrought, unheard, unseen,
By Him who turns destruction to His will.
If winter comes—alas, and it shall come!—
Men's hearts will ache, with lonely brooding pent;
In that bleak hour shall every choir be dumb
That fills our hearts today with sweet content.
Yet Life still reigns, and soon the year will bring Maytime and joy, with all things blossoming.

The Postage Stamp

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a friend who is something of a Joker, and he inquired of me, saying, Dost thou purchase Fine Steel Engraved Portraits of Great Men?

And I said, A few.

And he said, I fain would sell unto thee a Portrait of George Washington.

And I asked him, Which Portarit, and How Much?

And he said, It is the most famous of all Portraits of Washington, but I remember not the name of the artist, nor yet that of the engraver, but it is Straight Goods. And I will sell it unto thee for Five Farthings. And I have also a Bronze Medal with the Head of Abraham Lincoln by a Famous Sculptor, and that also will I sell unto thee for Five Farthings; for I love thee, and would fain see these treasures added to thy Collection.

And I inquired of him, saying, How dost thou get that way? For I can buy thy portraits of Washington at the Postoffice for two farthings, and thy medal with the head of Lincoln do they sell at the Bank at the rate of ten for a dime.

So he did not get me that time, but it was a clever trick, albeit an ancient one. And I meditated on this portrait of George Washington that is finely graven in Steel, and selleth for two farthings, that it will go further than any other portrait of Washington known to Collectors.

And I said, Consider the Postage Stamp. It is Inexpensive, Unobtrusive, and well-nigh Ubiquitous, but how much it can convey of sorrow or joy. Hast thou a friend in Arizona? Thou canst write him a word of cheer, and drop it in the corner box or hand it to the RED man at the end of the route, and the little steel engraving of George Washington will convey it all the way. Hast thou a neglected brother in Skowhegan, Maine, there is ever available unto thee in his behalf a Postoffice and a Throne of Grace, and both of them are blessings of high order. Thou canst write unto thy Congressman, protesting against his vote, or unto thy Minister, thanking him for last Sunday's sermon, and stick on a picture of George Washington, and go to bed with a clear conscience.

And he said, All those things are worth doing, and the price is dirt cheap.

And I said, There are many more lessons of the Postage Stamp, but there is one which, though it be not new, is so important I could wish that all men might learn it. The Success of the Postage Stamp is in this, that it doth stick to one thing until it doth arrive at its destination, and achieve its result.

And he said, That, indeed, is a good lesson.

And I said, If I could cause this lesson to go with the purchase, then would I invest a large fraction of my visible wealth in portraits of George Washington, and I would stick one on every woman's mirror, and one in the crown of every man's hat, and say, If thou hast before thee any worthy object, Stick to it, like a Postage Stamp, and verily, though thou art punched and defaced, thou shalt eventually arrive.

The New Sociology and the Old Gospel

By Charles A. Ellwood

MODERN SCIENCE is gradually sifting and testing truth in every field. If there is truth in religious experience, surely it will in time be corroborated by the independent, dispassionate investigations of science. And modern science is making rapid headway into the very fields which have hitherto been occupied by religion and ethics. It is pertinent, therefore, to inquire, How fares it with the great ideals of ethical religion—the worth of love, of service, of self-sacrifice, in human life? Is the validity of these ideals, by which men have tried to build their ideal society in the past, overthrown or reenforced by modern science?

It is perhaps premature to give any definite answer to questions like these, as scientific investigation along these lines is far from complete. But it may be of interest to cite the conclusions of a few leading social thinkers whose investigations and reasoning entitle their opinions to consideration. They represent samples, to be sure, of merely one school of sociological thinking; but if the writer is not mistaken this school is the significant one in sociology at present and for the future. Many other sociologists of the highest standing whose names we shall not even mention belong equally to this school.

REAFFIRMATION OF IDEALS

It may be worth recalling that sociology started with a reaffirmation of the social ideals of ethical religion. Comte's sociology, indeed, was largely an attempt to find support for Christian ethics in science rather than in theology. Comte recognized explicitly that his ethical principle of altruism, or "live for others," was but a restatement of the principle of service which the church had long taught. In his later life, moreover, Comte saw that this principle of altruism must be grounded in the affections, or the heart. He tells us, "The intellect should always be the servant of the heart, never its slave." His great trinity was love, order, and progress. "Love," he says, "seeks order and urges to progress; order fixes love and directs progress; progress develops order and gives new scope to our love." All nations, he thinks, are aspiring more or less to develop universal love. Perhaps confusing what ought to be with what is, he asserted in his "Positive Polity" that "we tire of thinking and even of acting, but we never tire of loving." He even quotes Madame de Stael's aphorism, "There is nothing real in the world but love," with approval. All of these ideas were taken up and made a part of Comte's positive "Religion of Humanity"; but by most of the "hard-headed" social thinkers of Comte's time and since they have been regarded as sentimentalism.

The reaction against the religious idealism of Comte's sociology was led chiefly by Herbert Spencer and Karl Marx, though a host of thinkers in economics and in the biological and physical sciences followed in their footsteps. It became the fashion in sociology to repudiate, if not to ridicule, the "soft" views of the Comteans. This materialistic reaction has, however, practically run its course, and there are now signs that Comte's fundamental attitude in sociology, which we may call the humanitarian, may be reinstated. The very watchwords of modern sociology show a trend in this direction. The best of modern sociologists are emphasizing, not mechanistic and unconscious adjustments, nor even conflict, as the great building forces in the life of societies. Rather, they are recognizing such processes as socialization, cooperation, coordination, and idealization as fundamental. They see social evolution in the future, whatever it may have been in the past, not as an outgrowth of economics, but rather as a product of ethical ideals. The justification for this statement will appear in the quotations given later in this article.

PROCESS OF SOCIALIZATION

The process of socialization, which occupies such a conspicuous place in modern sociology, especially deserves attention. We may accept Professor E. W. Burgess' definition of socialization as "conscious and willing coordination by the person of his interests with those of the group." Such socialization may be, of course, with reference to a very small group, such as the family or the local community; but sociologists generally use the word as having reference to very large groups, especially to nations, civilizations, and even humanity. In general, sociologists of the school of which we are speaking would not recognize socialization as complete unless it led the individual practically to identify himself and his interests with those of humanity as a whole. It is to such socialization of the individual that the sociologists of the school we have mentioned look for the solution of the great problems of our civilization, rather than to mere external social control.

Social control depends upon constraint of the individual, while socialization would place the control within the individual, and thus it would reconcile social control and self-control. Moreover, the sociologists of this school recognize that such socialization of the individual can not be effected by the education of the intellect, but involves the establishment of right emotional attitudes and right will attitudes as the basis of a right social order. Such socialization of the mind and heart of man can be achieved, of course, only through an educational process, but when once achieved it will do much more than establish a secure social order; it will also insure social progress.

LOVE A DYNAMIC

The difficulties in the way of such a socialization of the mind and will of all individuals it is not our purpose to discuss. We would point out merely that the dynamic which these social thinkers rely upon to bring about such a change in individuals and in society is the old one, which has long been advocated by ethical religion, namely, sympathy or love. Perhaps one of the first among English-speaking sociologists to break away from the "hard" school of social thinkers, headed by Herbert Spencer, was the late Lester F. Ward. Ward not only asserted the supremacy of mind in social evolution, but also the supremacy of feeling in determining the social process; and among the feelings he singled out sympathy as the basis of altruism and so the feeling which was therefore particularly favorable to social progress.

In discussing the causes of progress he rightly stresses the influence of agitators and reformers, but he says: "There must be deeper causes that not only create the agitator and the reformer, but that also create the quality of the moral and mental soil in which the seeds they sow will take root and grow. . . . They are many, but may for the most part be reduced to one, viz., the growth of sympathy in the human breast." He concludes with the paradox, "Reforms are chiefly advocated by those who have no personal interest in them," and thus recognizes practically not only the possibility, but the actual power, of disinterested sympathy and love in human society.

CONSTRUCTIVE FORCES

Prof. Franklin H Giddings is another American sociologist whose general ideas tend strongly in the same direction. Professor Giddings finds that likemindedness, the consciousness of kind, sympathy, congeniality, and resulting affection are the true constructive forces in the building of human society. Without stopping to give quotations from his works, however, it may be permissible to hurry on to two other American sociologists whose ideas very definitely illustrate the trend which we have mentioned. The first is Professor Charles Horton Cooley of the University of Michigan, whose work in sociology has been to demonstrate the important role which "primary," or face-to-face, groups, such as the family and the neighborhood, play in social evolution. Professor Cooley shows that it is from these groups that men get the ideas by which they seek to regulate their social life in general. From these groups we get our notions of love, charity, justice, and kindliness—we get, in a word, the sentiments, ideals, and values which make us human.

All human history is an attempt to take the sentiments and affections which are natural to these groups and carry them over to human relations in general. "Those systems of larger idealism," Professor Cooley tells us, "which are most human and so of most enduring value, are based upon the ideals of primary groups." Such a system of idealism is Christianity. "Sentiment," moreover, "is the chief motive-power of life and, as a rule, lies deeper in our minds and is less subject to essential change than thought, from which, however, it is not to be too sharply separated." By sentiment Professor Cooley means "socialized feeling, feeling which has been raised by thought and intercourse out of its merely instinctive state and become properly human. Thus love is a sentiment, while lust is not." "The sentiment of mutual kindness or brotherhood," Professor Cooley points out, "is a simple and widespread thing, belonging not only to man in every stage of his development, but extending, in a crude form, over a great part of animal life." But he adds, "This sentiment flourishes most in primary groups where it contributes to an ideal of moral unity of which kindness is a main part."

CENTRAL FACT OF HISTORY

Now the central fact of history, according to Professor Cooley, is the gradual enlargement of social feeling, social consciousness, and rational cooperation. This is what explains such movements as Christianity and democracy. These are not excrescences on the historical tendencies which are socially abnormal. "One of the most obvious things about selfishness," Professor Cooley tells us, "is the unhappiness of it." Professor Cooley thinks that everything which tends to bring mankind together in larger entities of sympathy and understanding is good. He stoutly maintains that this is the normal trend of development.

In a striking passage he sums up the matter by saying, "The mind, in its best moments, is naturally Christian; because when we are most fully alive to the life about us the sympathetic becomes the rational. . . . The one in whom human nature is fully awake, 'Love your enemies and do good to them that despitefully use you,' is natural and easy, because despiteful people are seen to be in a state of unhappy aberration from the higher life of kindness, and there is an impulse to help them to get back. The awakened mind identifies itself with other persons, living the sympathetic life and following the golden rule by impulse."

HUMAN MINDS INTERWOVEN

Even stronger is the trend toward the reaffirmation of the ideals of ethical religion in Dr. A. J. Todd's book entitled, "Theories of Social Progress." Dr. Todd tells us like Cooley, that "Human minds are not separate but interwoven." "The social bond is established and rooted in the development of self-consciousness itself." He goes on to say, "We are all of us part and parcel of each other. It is the community of ourselves that has hauled us up out of the Eocene pit and made us men." Quoting with implied approval Aristotle's maxim that "Friendship or love is the bond which holds states together," Dr. Todd goes on to assert, "It is not too much to say that a man is just so much of a man as his sympathies are wide. . . . It is not some special quality of altruism or sentimentality, but simple imagination and its correlative, kindly sympathy, that form the basis of social ethics and serious social reform. It is likewise the basis of our whole social organization." Dr. Todd sees nothing in this doctrine which will emasculate men. The truth is that we are all one and that it is our business to serve. "We are freest when love and intelligence constrain us to identify ourselves with our fellows." To bring about progress, therefore, we must evangelize and educate the individual in this direction, but such education, he rightly says, will be futile unless the material factors in the social situation are also changed.

Even more striking is the trend toward the reaffirmation of essential ethical religious ideals among the British sociologists. Here it may be remarked that British social thought seems characterized by more maturity than American. It is also characterized by greater freedom of expression. Scientific taboos seem to have less power in Great Britain than in America, and British social thinkers do not hesitate to express themselves clearly, even though they may be accused of sentimentalism. Among the earlier British thinkers who led the reaction against Herbert Spencer and his "hard" philosophy, great credit must be given to Benjamin Kidd. In his "Social Evolution" Kidd pointed out that social progress is even more dependent upon the accumulation of altruism than it is upon the accumulation of material goods or of knowledge.

SECRET OF SOCIAL MORALE

In his latest work, "The Science of Power," Kidd showed that emotional attitudes are the secret of social morale and of social efficiency, and that if we could secure a right education of the emotions we might transform our civilization in a single generation into a Christian society. While Kidd at times exaggerated the factors he emphasized and neglected other factors, yet there can scarcely be any doubt as to the soundness of his central positions, as we have just stated them. It was the development and education of the sympathetic or altruistic emotions which Kidd emphasized as the main thing necessary for social progress. He failed to stress the equal need of intelligence and belittled the part which rationality might play in human society. These faults of Kidd are fully overcome, however, in the writings of such typical British thinkers as Wallas, Hobhouse, and Branford.

Professor Graham Wallas is a teacher of political science in the University of London. In his well-known work, "The Great Society," he pleads, not only for an organization of thought and activity in modern society, but an organization of good will or love. Defining love as "the common conscious factor in those dispositions which incline us to benefit our fellows," he points out that love is increasingly needed as social evolution advances. "As the scale and complexity of social organization extend, the need of clear-sighted love will extend with it." To those skeptics who maintain that love is impossible when there is no personal acquaintance he replies, "Many sociologists have contended that outside the range of our senses strong social emotion (love) is impossible. . . . This is clearly a mistake. . . . Love for those whose existence is presented to us only through our imagination may act with enormous force." Wallas holds, therefore, that the love of humanity is not a self-delusion, but is a real sentiment of tremendous power increasingly needed in modern life.

VINDICATION OF IDEALISM

Professor L. T. Hobhouse, professor of sociology in the University of London, and perhaps the profoundest philosophical thinker among English-speaking sociologists, is probably the investigator who has furnished best the scientific and philosophical background for the defense of ethical religious idealism. The results of his researches are to be seen in his great work, "Morals in Evolution." This work may be said to be a vindication from the sociological standpoint of humanitarian idealism, and so of Christian ethics on its positive side. The development of ethics, Hobhouse tells us, "has shown that when we look at matters from the point of view of common humanity it is true that there is none so lowly but he must be considered equally with the noblest, that the spirit of mild equity is better even in the interests of order than that of harshness, that it is a hard fact that hatred does not cease by hatred but by love, that the fundamental remedy for evil and for error is not physical force but spiritual regeneration." "The social type," Professor Hobhouse points out, "inherits the earth. It does not defeat itself. It succeeds." Hence, as he says in his book, "The Rational Good," "The good citizen is essentially a cooperative unit." "The truth is," says Professor Hobhouse, "that each personality is itself but a part of a whole and its harmony but an element of a wider harmony." "The moral order implies a spiritual principle which, from its most salient feature, we may call briefly the principle of love."

WORLD OF MIND A UNITY

In regard to achievement as the end of life and of personality, Professor Hobhouse says, "There is a limit to the expansiveness of faculty and achievement where there is no desire to share the fruits with all who can enjoy them. These limits disappear only when we come to the whole world of mind, aware of itself as a unity, bound together by love and reason. . . . . The ego must find an object because it needs love and it needs something to connect it with the world of mind. But the world of mind is based on love within, and has nothing without to connect itself with. Thus its end is the achievement and maintenance of harmony within." In giving this philosophical justification of love as the central principle of a harmonious and rightly developed social life, Professor Hobhouse points out that "the end must be the harmonious development, not of the individual personality as such, but of all that group with which the individual can enter into organic relation—ideally of nothing less than collective humanity."

It is Mr. Victor V. Branford, founder of the British Sociological Review," however, who, next after Kidd, has given the clearest statement of his belief that love is the dynamic to which we must look for the solution of our social problems and the securing of an ideal social order. In his little book, "St. Columba: A Study of Social Inheritance and Spiritual Development" (which deserves to be much better known), Mr. Branford tells us, "the evolution of idealism in the race is paralleled in the individual by the cultivation of love." Because "it is the property of love to change the soul into that which it loves," love is the human dynamic which makes possible the sociologist's aspiration to integrate personality and community.

LOVE CREATIVE

Moreover, "love when it looks into the future is creative," and the will to love is the will to grow holy, i. e., to integrate into sanctity and stand righteous towards every human and divine relation. "We inherit," Mr. Branford tells us, "a tradition of evil which weighs as a burden on each of us." But there is also possible for us an ideal world, and this ideal world may be entered by always acting as if we loved our neighbor as ourselves. Sympathy and love, using intelligence, or science, as its instrument, will build in time the ideal human community, and will change the whole aspect of life from one of suffering and sorrow to one of joy and satisfaction.

If these things had been said a generation ago, they would undoubtedly have been regarded as mere expressions of sentimentalism. Many would no doubt still so regard them; but it may be pointed out that they are statements made by men who are practically all engaged in the most careful study of human nature and human society. No name, for example, stands higher in the whole field of science and philosophy than that of Professor Hobhouse. It would seem, therefore, that the ideals long supported by ethical religion, and particularly by the teachings of Jesus and Paul, are about to receive unexpected support from the present day development of modern scientific social thought.

Anyone who is at all familiar with the teachings of Jesus and Paul will recognize that these conclusions by leading scientific students of human society are but restatements, for the most part, of their teachings. If anyone asks how this is possible, the student of social evolution would doubtless reply that religious idealism is based upon reflection upon the experience of many generations of men, and that its beliefs, while not exact scientific generalizations, were built up on relatively true and careful inductions from human experience. Therefore it happens that religions with their "revelations" and "intuitions" often anticipate the generalizations of science built up after the most careful research. The intelligent Christian should surely, therefore, welcome the work of science with its task of sifting truth from error in the religious as well as other traditions of the past. If we can judge from the present trend in sociology, there seems to be little danger that the Christian ideal of life will be overthrown. On the contrary, I prophesy that sociology, instead of being "the diabolical science," as once it was characterized by certain orthodox churchmen, will prove to be the great instrument by which ethical religion may not only redeem the human world but vindicate its own ideals.

The Minister Between Sundays

By Lloyd C. Douglas

THE editor of this magazine has invited me to furnish some talk concerning the week-day pursuits of the minister, as he goes about doing good, or doing badly, or doing indifferently, in the capacity in his parish. The commission stipulates that these remarks are to be addressed particularly to the younger members of our profession. All the venerable veterans in the service are hereby notified, at the outset, that the observations made in this and the subsequent papers appearing under the caption which decorates these lines are intended for the questing youth of our vocation. Our elders and betters will find very little here previously unknown to them; and it is freely conceded that this thesis might easily be elaborated by almost any of them in phrases more felicitous and in a tone of higher authority. I am writing, then, to the novices of our profession. They will kindly drape themselves about the old man's knee, and cock an attentive ear. If the oldsters wish to stand by, and make sure the clinic is conducted properly, there will be no objection. The seat of the scornful, however, has been removed from the pit, temporarily, to make room for the class.

To take immediate advantage of the privileges of senescence, let me speak briefly of my general feeling toward the ministry as a life-work, in reminiscent mood. These things are spoken for your encouragement. To say them, at all, I must be autobiographical. I am on the eve of celebrating the twentieth anniversary of my ordination into the Christian ministry. I entered this profession, which was my father's, with both eyes open to most of its exactions, many of its sacrifices, and some of its rewards. Now that a score of years have been spent in it, were I again to choose a vocation, knowing all that I do today about the ministry, I should unhesitatingly ratify my earlier decision.

In these days when so very much is being said about "an overworked and underpaid ministry," it affords me some satisfaction to express my gratitude to the church as a just and considerate employer. "Overworked and underpaid" is a fetching phrase—balanced, euphonistic, oratorical. But, so far as it relates to by own experience, it is false. Doubtless it must be true in many cases, else it would not be spoken so often; but it has not been true with me. I have not been overworked. At no time have I been so busy as some member of my congregations admitted that they were; and I think I have enjoyed more leisure than most of them. Neither have I been underpaid. My income, through the years, has compared very favorably with that of the majority of those who subscribed toward it. It has never been my right of duty to inquire how many of my confessedly overworked and underpaid colleagues might have increased their wages and reduced their labor by donning some other uniform; but I have some private opinions on that matter locked in my desk to be published posthumously when I am safe from the remarks which verily would be their reward.

"OVERWORKED AND UNDERPAID"

If one may take the risk of being irritatingly candid—the less talking you do about "an overworked and underpaid ministry," the brighter will be your chances to be able truthfully to refute that statement as it might apply to your own case. Most people are too much occupied with their own affairs to make meticulous invoice of their neighbors' actual value. They accept others at their own rating, just as the fire insurance agent takes your word for it that you have two thousand dollars' worth of furniture in your house. Only when there has been a fire does he come around with a pencil and tablet to investigate the exact state of your worldly goods. Likewise, it is only when your personal value to society is on the stand, indicted, that the public goes to the bother of making a serious inventory of you. Ordinarily, it rates you at your own appraisal of yourself. If, therefore, you go about saying that you are overworked and underpaid, most people will catalog you with all the rest of the overworked and underpaid persons of their acquaintance—an estimate which will not only do you no credit but actually jeopardize your chances to improve your condition.

It's one thing for a man voluntarily to assume a life-work, inadequately remunerated, preferring to derive his happiness from his opportunities to serve than from pleasures purchased with a good income. It's quite another thing when, having entered upon it, fully aware of the conditions indicated above, he sourly frets and complains.

Moreover, you do well to avoid contracting the silly habit of chattering about how busy you are. This is a pet American obsession. Seven persons out of every nine, in our country, are indulging in this foolish talk about themselves, obviously to create the impression that their services are in great demand. Well-meaning old ladies will tell you that you are working yourself to death. If they prefer to believe this, so be it. But it is a known fact that preachers are considered a preferred risk by life insurance companies. Only in exceptional cases do they not live to a ripe old age. Of course, if it should come to the sorry pass that you do actually work yourself to death, that will not be an unbecoming way for one to die who is pledged to follow the leading of a man whose career closed at thirty-three—but the chances of your surviving the exactions of your job are excellent. When, therefore, solicitous friends seem disposed to mourn your untimely end, superinduced by heavy labor, embrace the opportunity offered you to do some constructive counselling on the high importance of us all ridding ourselves of this insidious "busy-bee" which has fatally stung the poise of so many otherwise efficient people.

MENTAL TRANQUILITY

Above all, don't let your parishioners spoof you about your exhausting labors until you begin to worry about it yourself. Many members of our profession are making themselves ridiculous with running about, watch in hand, mopping a perspiring brow, as they attend, single-handedly, to the world's salvation. Perhaps the greatest contribution you can make to this hysterical generation is in offering a living example of mental tranquillity. He whom we serve said, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." This was one of the most alluring of his invitations to the public to accept his way of life. I doubt if you and I, as his ambassadors, will be able to make this precept sound very convincing unless we cultivate other habits of mind and conduct than those which propel us about, panting and puffing, in a state of perpetual panic and stampede.

From the first day of my experience in the ministry, my social position has been made by my office. My associations have always been with the most influential people of the towns and cities in which I have lived. I was not required to earn their friendship by long residence among them. I found the place made for me when I arrived. My family's social position has been no less pleasant and secure. When a young physician contrives to make a place for himself, in a new community, by dint of five years' diligent application to duty, people comment pleasantly upon the promptness of his arrival into their confidence. Let him remove to another town, and he has it all to go through with again. The same goes for the lawyer. But the preacher is a person of consequence in the town before he has had time to unpack his freight. This is a perquisite of our office which is not to be sniffed at. Neither is it to be ignored. Such a singular privilege carries with it a distinct responsibility. Not only may the minister step immediately into a place of social prominence in the town where his lot is temporarily cast, but he must accept that distinction and make adequate use of it. Let him bottle himself up, and refuse to avail himself of the courtesies extended him, via his office, and he diminishes his usefulness in that community in exact proportion to the depth of his seclusion.

VINDICATING THE DEACON

Much has been said of the cantankerous stage deacon—hard-fisted, narrow of vision, dictatorial, impertinent. I hereby rise to speak in the defense of the deacons and trustees. Almost without exception, the officers of the churches I have served have been men of high caliber, broad sympathies, and generous disposition, who have patiently borne with my blunders and excused my shortcomings to themselves and others, quite beyond any reasonable expectation. All this criticism of the deacon is easily explained on the ground that the general public really wishes it were better than it is; but, unwilling to discipline its character to the attainment of this creditable aspiration, it prefers to bemean the morality of those who are appointed to exemplary offices in the church, so that the gap between their respective moralities may be less offensively apparent. In other words, if, wishing to be as good as you are, I do not care to make the sacrifices involved in elevating myself, my next best course is to find enough fault with you to bring you nearer where I am. This is the plain solution of the obvious greediness with which the public receives the theatrical misrepresentations of the preacher and the deacon. It is a left-handed way of complimenting itself upon the possession of a noble sentiment. It wishes there were not so wide a chasm between its moral code and his, and, unable to bridge that chasm by rising to a higher level it tries to bring its spiritual superiors down to where the majority live.

It will be very unfortunate for you to begin your ministry with the subconscious belief that the deacon is going to cause you trouble. You do well to assume that he is your staunchest friend. Keep close to him. The better you know him, personally, the less opportunity there will be for any misunderstandings in matters of administration. And, in the event of your failure to see eye-to-eye with him, remember, before you commit any audacity, that the deacon has been living in that town for a long time before the people ever heard of you. Make up your mind that, in most matters, the average deacon is right. He is honestly anxious for you to succeed; for, if you fail, his church will be injured by that much. If, however, conditions should arise which make it positively imperative that you should go to the mat with him, in some matter of grave import, do it in his own house, in a sportsmanly manner, and not in the house of his neighbor, himself not present.

So long as we happen, momentarily, to be thinking about church officers, and the minister's relation to them, this may be the place to remark that you are the custodian of the church property. I am aware that there is a "house and grounds" committee in the board of trustees. But you must never get to thinking that if the church roof leaks it is none of your business. Fresh from a board meeting where much talk was had of the necessity of economy—one of the most popular topics of conversation at board meetings—you may be reluctant to report that the cellar wall, under the parsonage, needs attention; that the front steps are ready to fall down; that the plumbing is out of kelter; that the electric wiring is unsafe. But you are the custodian of that property; and if you let it run down, you will get little applause from the board for neglecting to inform them, promptly, of necessary repairs.

WHAT THE TRUSTEES EXPECT

And if you think to win their approbation by allowing the church, or any property belonging to the church, to fall into decay, for the sake of saving expenses, you think a poor thought. True, you are not employed as the caretaker of the church property; but you had better take care of it, anyway. The congregation will forgive you an occasional slump in the pulpit; but it will view with much regret and distaste an unmowed front lawn, an untidy back yard, unshovelled snow and ice on the walks, and an old shirt in a broken window of the attic, at the residence of the parson. While you are ambling along through your homily, on Sunday night, some of your parishioners, whose pursed lips and upturned eyes indicate a state of holy contemplation, may not be indulging in pious reflections, at all. They are gazing fixedly at an electrolier in which four lamps are dead—the same four lamps that were dead last Sunday night, and the Sunday night before that. Indeed, they are the same four dead lamps that were deceased six months ago. It isn't your fault. You are not the janitor. But, just to be on the safe side, go over the whole plant, occasionally, and make sure that such little matters receive attention. After all's said, it is your business, and you can't ignore it. Much as you may wish it otherwise, the fact that the linen collars on the choir-robes are dirty is your fault. It is your fault that the church clock is ten minutes slow. It is your fault if the organ, because of some pulmonary infirmity, breathes louder than it squawks —(to borrow a reference Mark Twain made to his accordion.) It is your fault if the church is too cold on New Year's day. Of course, it isn't really your fault—but it will be your fault, and don't you forget it!

MENACE OF PROFESSIONALISM

Now, having cleared the way for some candid talk about your ministry, let us get down to particulars. You have entered what might be called an "unprofessional profession"—by which I mean that the more "professional" you are, in the pursuit of your calling, the less success you will have in it. Some vocations affect a uniform. This saves the persons engaged in such employment from the necessity of making themselves otherwise differentiated from the public. The policeman doesn't have to swagger about, with a vengeful, bull-dog expression on his face, in order to let the public know that he is in the business of keeping order. The doctor has his little bag o' tricks by which he is known as the doctor.

Most of the younger set of preachers, who may read these words, are not in uniform. By no means am I disposed to hold in contempt the clerical garb. Indeed, there are many occasions when its usefulness so heavily outweighs its disadvantages that it is perhaps a toss-up whether it is better to button one's collar and waistcoat in front or behind. However that may be most of the men I am addressing, at this moment, are garbed in the ordinary dress of the layman.

In default of any distinguishing marks, to set forth their profession, many ministers either consciously or unconsciously contract funny little habits of posture, accent, and tone, obviously to indicate their line of business. Now if you have made up your mind that you don't care to succeed, admirably, in the ministry; that you are entirely willing always to be doing a grade of work not quite so good as that which you are potentially capable of—go to it, with all your ingenuity, and become just as affected and artificial in your "ministerial manner" as you like. If, however, you are ambitious to make something of yourself, in the ministry, and come at length into a position worthy of your ability, deal very severely with the first signs of a budding "ministerial air." Watch yourself for queer little tricks of speech. Don't fall into mannerisms. Above all —for goodness' sake, don't try to imitate the personality of some other man whom you hold in high esteem.

DISILLUSIONMENT

The other day, at a convention, I heard a fine young fellow read the Bible. He was six feet, two inches high; broad shoulders; square jaw; unruly shock of bronzed hair; tanned Indian red; hair on his hands—a regular he-man, as the vernacular has it. It did one good to look at him. He had been asked to read the Scripture lesson. I happened to know that he had been given his own choice of weapons; and I rather wished he had picked something with a lot of drive to it. He chose, rather, one of the more soporific of the sedative Psalms. I don't recall which one it was, now. In fact, I don't believe I was entirely conscious of what he was reading. My interest was wholly occupied with the Miss-Nancy way he caressed his sibilants. How that big, fine-looking animal did fondle his esses, and linger over them, and spin them out in a long, soft, pious hiss. The effect of it was so narcotic as to be almost lethal. I was sorry for him. The sight of him was excellent; the sound of him was disappointing. One got the same feeling of disillusionment, after looking at him, so admiringly, and then hearing him, otherwise, that John had when he ate the little book that the angel gave him.

MINISTERIAL "IMPORTANCE"

Some ministers may be easily identified as such by the fact that when they stop to speak to anybody on the street, every one who passes by pauses to note the oratorical inflection and wealth of gesture accompanying the great man's conversation. Just on the eve of falling into any such disgusting habits, take careful thought, my friend, for the future. Put it down as a hard-and-fast rule that the men in our profession who have contributed most mightily to the cause in which we are all concerned, kept themselves as "unprofessional" as possible. Don't—as you love your life—affect any tricks that will make you conspicuous. When you distinguish yourself, do it some other way. A very commendable modesty and shyness, manifesting itself in self-consciousness, will break out on you, like a rash, during your early experience as a public speaker.

The fact that you are a youth, and the fear that people may be disinclined to listen respectfully to you, on that account, may put you in the habit of speaking, in public, with a different inflection, a different tone, than is yours by nature. Such habits are much more easily formed than broken. I have heard preachers talk, whose native state or land none could surmise. Indubitably, there was a pronounced accent there, but exactly what it was, New England, Georgia, Kentucky, Canadian, Welsh—the most astute detective might have failed to guess. I have known young preachers—and old ones too—who seemed to be inordinately vain of a tremendous pile of unbarbered hair. This observation may be only the ranting of a depraved jealousy in me, who have so little opportunity to offend in this manner. What I am really trying to get at is this: you must be unaffected, natural, spontaneous.

UNPROFESSIONAL PROFESSION

When I speak of our business as "an unprofessional profession," I mean, also, that we must beware of too great reliance upon tools and machinery. How I have envied the dentist the glittering and awesome trinkets of his trade! With what covetousness have I not watched the doctor get out his blood-pressure thing (I fear it must have some other name than that among medical men)—his high-frequency machine—his various nickle-plated weapons! How I have wished when entering a house to make a rather difficult call, that I might have at least the equivalent of a clinical thermometer to stick under somebody's tongue, if for no better reason than that it would guarantee me a two minutes' start on the conversation! But, alas, we are of an unprofessional profession; and we may as well make up our minds to it. When it comes to actual working tools, the barber has it all over us.

This leads me to say that the young preacher should get it firmly established in his consciousness that his business is not a desk job. Young Timothy Climber, in his first year at Waggles Crossing, sees visions and dreams dreams of a brighter day to come when, by pressing a button on his desk, he may summon into his presence an alert young woman with a stenographic note-book wherewith to record his observations concerning the world in which he lives, and give utterance to the thoughts he would communicate to divers and sundry on his official stationery. The while he waits for this glorified hour to come, he beguiles the tedium of delay by surrounding himself with all the office machinery his modest income will provide. Filing cabinets, card-indices, reference systems, and cross-reference systems, devices for the cataloguing of his one hundred and sixteen books, clipping-drawers for the accommodations of his laborious scissors-work, etc., to say nothing of parish maps, bristling with red, white, and blue-headed pins to indicate the exact geographical location of the faithful, and complicated graphs showing the net gain in accessions over the previous administration. (No graph ever recorded a loss. That's a funny thing about graphs—they are uniformly optimistic.)

"ON A BUSINESS BASIS"

And if Timothy isn't on his guard against getting wound up and milled through the gearing of his own machinery, he will soon discover that it requires more time and ingenuity to fiddle with these things than their output warrants. To be sure, every young minister is to be pardoned for wanting to run his institution "on a business basis." Just a bit envious of the precision and efficiency he notes in his visit to the president of the tomato-can factory, where pushed buttons invoke clerks, and the walls are adorned with cabinets bearing classified and assorted information pertaining to the production and the market, this youth of high aims must be forgiven if he endeavors to conduct his own affairs with something of the same methodical accuracy. He even finds it pleasant to adopt the tomato-can president's business lingo, and tries to think of himself as a manufacturer. He is a manufacturer of ideals, he says.

Again, he thinks of himself as a merchant, a salesman. He talks of "selling" a new idea to the congregation, or to the board of trustees. Time will cure him of this. But if he would spare himself the discomfort of getting into this state of mind, and going through it, and recovering from it, he will do well to avoid it altogether by saying to himself: "I am not a manufacturer; neither am I a merchant; and my occupation is not a desk-job, nor can it ever be made so except at the price of my failure as a real 'minister.'" And the less machinery he clutters his office with, in the early days of his experimentation in this profession, the more rapidly he will get on with his work.

This brings me to the point of saying that the successful minister, ardently as he may search for it, agonizingly as he may yearn for it, can never find a good substitute for close-up, hand-to-hand contacts with the individuals who compose his parish. He may write or type their names, addresses, hobbies, aversions, and the names of their chilren unto the third and fourth generation, upon five-by-three red cards, and copy them upon six-by-four blue cards, and draw maps of their place of residence so beautifully that they might be the envy of the Geodetic Survey commission—but unless he puts on his hat, and goes to see them, it profiteth him nothing. He can bulletinize them and circularize them to his heart's content and to the despair of the finance committee—but it will be as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal if he has never wiped his feet on their door-mat. This is a hard saying; but it is true.

I, too, Timothy, have pooh-poohed the alleged necessity of ringing door-bells, afternoons, to inquire of people how they did, when the aroma of burning beans or scorching biscuits plainly certified that the visit was no more distressing to the caller than the callee. Ourselves when young did scorn a task requiring a six-foot man to go about wasting his own and other people's time in such manner. I think I have even said it in print. But you can't believe everything you see in print. Many people do: you mustn't. Any little group of preachers, in the privacy of a Monday morning chat, will vote unanimously that the prophet Elisha, who probably first introduced the custom of parish calling, bequeathed to his professional posterity a legacy of questionable value. But, that afternoon, all but the doomed will turn out and demonstrate their willingness to be legatees of the bequest. Now, so much has been said about the "drudgery" of pastoral calling, the refined idiocy of the custom, the terrific burden it lays upon the shoulders of the minister, that there may be room for some remarks on the other side of the case. I contend that this function of the preacher may not only be relieved of its irksomeness, but be made one of the chief sources of his happiness, if approached in the proper mood, and conducted according to certain fixed regulations, hereinafter to be set forth.

BETTER THAN BOOKS

Let the weary parson, who has always believed that his pastoral ministrations were intended to be of benefit to his parish, rid himself of this idea altogether, and decide that when he goes out to make a call, he is primarily going to get something. For example: as he sets out to visit old Mother Grimes, who, because she is half-blind and bed-ridden, cannot gain much impression of the world outside, let him seek her in the capacity of beneficiary, rather than benefactor, to learn the latest deductions distilled in her own spiritual laboratory. While he rushes about, attending committee-meetings and conference-lunches, distracted with innumerable trifling details—ninety-seven per cent of which come to nothing—this fine old soul is experiencing an enforced mysticism, which he has neither the time nor patience to learn. Here, for the asking, he may have in thirty minutes the best she's got—provided he goes for it as a humble seeker rather than a puffy, hasty, back-slapper and hand-shaker who rushes in, for a moment, to tell "Auntie" Grimes she is getting better and looking like a rosy-faced high school girl. The chances are that "Auntie," much as she may smile her appreciation of the fatuous compliment, and greatly as she may appreciate the great man's brief pause to shout noisy nothings at her, would give this brother a whole lot more than his money's worth, if he had the wisdom and patience to seek her counsel, candidly admitting her his spiritual superior, which he might probably do without committing an outrage upon the truth.

When he goes to a house of mourning, it may be hoped that he carries some word of helpfulness; but if he enters there in the attitude of a suppliant, eager to learn what spiritual resources are vouchsafed the bereaved in an hour of grave emergency, and frankly lets it be known that he is there rather to get than to give, he will descend from that place much more of a prophet than when he arrived. It goes without saying that the grieving soul, approached in this manner, feels the necessity of summoning all the spiritual energy he possesses to meet the demands laid upon him by his minister who comes questing rather than bestowing that which makes humanity rise to godlike proportions.

OUR OCCUPATIONAL LITERATURE

I wish I might put down on paper all that I feel and believe on this subject. Much of it seems difficult to write. I can appreciate the disadvantages under which they labored who have written books to us on parish problems. For the past twenty years, I have been reading everything that came along, written for and by preachers, relating to our business. Mostly I have bought these books with an eagerness more fully justified than satisfied. Perhaps it was because these works attempted to talk of too many things, under the same cover. When doctors write to doctors, they specialize. They do not scatter themselves all over the lot. One man produces four hundred and eighty-three pages on the eccentricities of the thyroid gland; another compiles nine dollars worth of information concerning sarcoma. When we preachers write to one another, we try to do it all, which may account for the fact that we fail to do any of it thoroughly.

I may only succeed in proving, again, that we cannot specialize in our talk; but I am going to try, in the group of articles for which this rambling screed is presumed to furnish an introduction, to make a few observations concerning our week-day pursuits. The technic of effective visits to the people who, for special reasons, are in need of our friendship, sympathy, consolation, and advice, will be discussed. There will also be some talk of our errands to the disaffected. What we ought to do and say in the sick room; what manner of service we may render the bereaved—these are matters I wish some old men had gone to the trouble of talking about, in my presence, when I was your age.

This is the first installment of a series of articles by Dr. Douglas dealing intimately with the every day work of the minister. Other articles will treat of calls upon the sick, at home and hospital, funerals and funeral calls, weddings, calls on delinquents, on prospectives, etc., etc.—a discussion vitally interesting to laymen as well as ministers.—THE EDITOR.

A Rendezvous With Life

By Gaius Glenn Atkins

NOW that the guns have been so long stilled that those who heard it have forgotten how drumfire sounds, so much of what the war engendered seems only a memory or a troubled dream. But the poetry begotten of those four tremendous years still endures. As long as the spires of Oxford lift themselves against the kind, gray skies of England we shall never forget the "Oxford men who went abroad to die," nor forbear to hope that down flaming roads God brought "them to a fairer place than Oxford town."

Nor shall we forget our own poet, Alan Seeger, who sang so nobly the more than willingness of youth to die for that which grips the soul:

I have a rendezvous with Death
At some disputed barricade;
When spring comes back with rustling shade
And apple blossoms fill the air.

. . . . . .

And I to my pledged word am true,
I shall not fail that rendezvous.

Though we paid a great price for it and though we have all too soon lost it, we may well thank God for the power of the human soul to take darkness, horror and death and transmute them into something high and splendid, making of them songs to sing and music by which to march. But all this does not really satisfy our deepest instincts and it has been left to a colored boy, Countee Cullen, to voice out of a truer insight, though with a lesser artistry and in confessed imitation of Seeger himself, those quenchless longings which give force to life:

I have a rendezvous with Life,
In days I hope will come
Ere youth has sped and strength of mind,
Ere voices sweet grow dumb;
I have a rendezvous with Life
When spring's first heralds hum.

. . . . . .

Sure some would cry it's better far
To crown their days with sleep,
Than face the road, the wind and rain
To heed the calling deep.
Though wet nor blow nor space I fear,
Yet fear I deeply too,
Lest death should greet and claim me ere
I keep Life's rendezvous.

I.

We are in debt to Cullen for a phrase which will hereafter belong to literature for we are all keeping—each in his own fashion—a rendezvous with Life. We are, as it were, pledged to keep an appointment which haunts us with the hope of it, draws us by the promise of it. It is always sending us down some road or other at the end of which there awaits us what we are endlessly seeking and, maybe, always missing, but without which our days are empty and life itself only a frame without a picture.

It is one of the contradictions of life that what we do blinds us to the meaning of what we do. The forces which impel us are strange to us who obey them but through all the interplay of interest and occupation there is this deeper thing—the passion of life striving to fulfill itself. The tides of folk who fill our city streets are not merely going out to business, they are keeping their rendezvous with Life. The sailor putting his ship out to sea, the farmer turning his furrow are keeping their rendezvous with Life. The explorer setting out for the Arctic or Antarctic regions, the mountaineer climbing the Matterhorn or Mount Everest, the racing driver sending his car two hundred miles an hour are keeping their rendezvous with Life, and Alan Seeger and his comrades would have kept no rendezvous with Death had they not with true discernment known that only by keeping faith with Death could they keep faith with Life.

The poet in his song, the musician in his rapture, the lover in his quest are all seeking the same thing—they, too, would keep their rendezvous with Life.

'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant
Oh Life, not Death, for which we pant,
More life and fuller, that we want.

It follows, then, that we need both instruction and understanding in this our master passion. The pity of so much of our spending of ourselves is that we fail to find what we seek. Having come, sometimes at almost infinite pains and sometimes at the cost of our better selves, to the place which we have dreamed the fulness of life to be hiding, we discover only disillusionment. Where, then, is that true hiding place of that fulness which we seek? What roads mislead, what roads are sure and true? This is life's master question. The answers to it have long occupied philosophers, inspired poets and given body to religion. Any man who would undertake finally to answer this question would claim for himself an impossible wisdom, any answer which may come within the compass of a sermon is, at its best, a partial answer. But having so recognized the limitations of what is about to be said, may I go on to indicate some of the ways in which we do not keep our rendezvous with Life and some of the ways in which, perhaps, we do?

II.

We do not keep our rendezvous with Life in the mere possession of things. Things have their varying values and a man would either be a fool or a hypocrite to underestimate them. They are at their best the fashioning of dreams or needs into corporate form. A civilization may be very justly tested by the quality of its things. Finely tempered tools, beautiful fabrics, houses nobly built and furnished are not mere things, they are incarnations of capacity, discipline, aspiration. More than that, things react, and sometimes greatly, on the soul. We cannot live in a vacuum. There are unescapable relationships between possession and personality. Not a little of our sense of self gathers around and grows out of that which belongs to us. We may, indeed, give new direction to this sense of possession, it may organize itself around that which is possessed in common as we possess churches, libraries, great pictures, cities and our fatherland, but, nevertheless, the passion for possession is rooted so deep in life as to indicate changeless value for the soul. A very great deal of our interest, great reaches of occupation center around things and if all this were taken away from us our lives would be empty indeed.

Nevertheless, things are only incidental in life and can never be made the end of it save at some cost of life itself. There is a cluttering up of life with possession which either keeps us in bondage to that of which we ought to be master, or else leaves us neither time nor strength for the greater things, or else gives us an entirely false sense of values, or else at the worst so hardens us as to make us akin to the things which have, as it were, veined our souls with their immobilities. Men lose themselves in the quest for things.

Our own time needs particularly to be corrected just here. We have such facility in the creation of things as to fill up our world with them out of all proportion. Perhaps if they were more justly distributed this criticism would lose its edge. They are too much piled up in some social regions, they are too sadly wanted in others. But even so, we are living in a thing-cluttered world and our own profound discontents and the mal-adjustments of a society which is organized around material production ought to teach us that we are on the wrong road. We need to remember how simply the supremely great have lived, in what bareness of material possession our greatest achievements have been made.

III.

Nor do we keep our rendezvous with Life in mere action. Here the matter goes deeper. A very great deal of our occupation with things is best understood not by the passion for acquisition, but by the passion for creative action. We must do something and things are what we do. If we were to take out of our lives all those interests and occupations which are a part of making and using, buying and selling things, our day would be unbelievably empty and, beyond debate, the driving intensities of human endeavor would find far less worthy and, probably, far more dangerous channels of expression. We must be kept busy, but there is a vast difference between the busyness of life and the business of life. A thoughtful critic of life has said that we are more truly judged by what we do with the margin—than by anything else. In other words, we are tested by our use of freedom and leisure. True, we cannot all be mystics or philosophers, nor spend our time wandering in the fields, or reading, or listening to music, or haunting art galleries; somebody, after all, must keep the world going. And for the most part those today who live lives of leisure, whether they spend their leisure in pleasure, contemplation or meditation, are doing it at the expense of someone else and laying only a heavier burden upon their neighbors.

It is possible, however, for a restless and forceful age whose sense of values has been clouded, to make too much of action. We are to be judged not by the rate at which we travel but by the meaning of our journey. An age which is going nowhere at sixty miles an hour may stand condemned alongside an age which mostly made its journeys on foot but left behind a Parthenon, a cathedral, an epic, a gospel or a type of character toward which we vainly aspire. Each age needs the correction of its fault by those virtues toward which it is least inclined and if the ages which found their ideals in the possession and contemplation of some external excellence, as George Crimpton Adams has so nobly said, needed the correction of practical action, an age like ours which is in the way of losing itself in action needs the even higher correction of the spirit against which it has so strongly reacted. And when action issues in friction and competition, driving us down bitter roads, engendering hate and upon occasion sending out embattled nations, in a last great frenzy of action, to undo the creation of the centuries and trample their frontiers into red mire, we have an arresting revelation of the goals toward which action, unmastered by something higher than itself, tends inevitably to drive us. It is a bitter thing when, at the end of a feverish and unresting road, we, who have sought to keep our rendezvous with Life, find that what we sought is no longer there.

OUR TRUE TASK

Our true task is to win from each day its meaning and to discover these meanings in what we ourselves are becoming. The truer answer to our consuming passion for some satisfying fulness of experience is not in the intense or unusual but in our power to win from all that life offers an added wealth of being. The soul has its own alchemy. It may transmute tears into tenderness, and struggle into peace, and burdens into strength, and hope deferred into a vaster hope, and discipline into steadfast and happy sunlit things, into gratitude and contentments.

One of the old, old ends of education—an end just now much obscured— is just that development of personality which makes possible a wealth of inner resource through our power to take from men and books, music, art, the changing pageantry of the seasons' satisfactions which feed the hunger of the soul and empowerments equal to every challenge. Here, also, is the deeper service of religion. It is more than creed or ritual, it is that enrichment of life toward God which fills with spiritual suggestion whatever touches the soul and establishes mystic communions between him and us in which life finds its final meanings and the soul its timeless peace.

In a sentence, the more richly developed the personality the more fully we keep our rendezvous with Life. We need neither the dramatic, nor the unusual, nor the costly, and least of all do we need what others may not share with us. We have material enough at hand in what every day supplies to meet our longing. We thus win little by little what we hunger for and though we are not wholly satisfied, and ought not to be, we are none the less persuaded of the real integrity of life and have, instead of hearts which eat themselves out, a deep and unfailing contentment. Now if the real rendezvous with Life be in such ways as these, are there plain, marked roads in the following of which we may be sure of keeping faith with the instincts which impel us and the God who wants to answer?

IV.

Yes, there is. To begin with, the one high road which runs through life and history—the road of duty. I confess here to a seeming contradiction. It is true that we discover life most fully in whatever is freest and surely you will answer that duty and freedom are far apart as the poles. But they are not. Freedom has its own high laws, but they are self-imposed; its own thrones of administration, but they are set up in the soul.

There is one word which masters law and freedom alike—the word "ought." We may not agree as to what it asks of us but we must agree as to its mystic and abiding sovereignty. What else is "ought" but just the testimony of conscience that there are in life laws and ends in which life is made perfect. "Ought" is the force of moral gravitation which in the end shapes the channels through which all the energies of life must take their course. There is no channel for any flowing stream, from the brook which threads its way amongst upland ferns to the valley of the Mississippi or the Amazon, which has not been channeled by the force of gravitation, and the river is free only as it finds and flows down its cosmically appointed course.

Life is like that. It has through its necessities and the will of God its predestined channels and these are always in the direction of duty. "Ought" is a hard master but its high rewards are there. There is a peace attendant upon goodness, a satisfaction in fidelity to duty which comes from no other source. Nay, if we may change the figure, duty is not only the channeled way down which life must flow, it is also the rock-hewn way up which life must climb. Not once or twice, but always up the long road which they have followed, those who hear the voice of something vaster than themselves and at any cost obey, even though the road be high and hard—

> Shall find the toppling crags of duty scaled
> Are close upon the shining table-lands
> To which our God himself is moon and sun.

V.

We keep our rendezvous with Life in the enrichment of personality. Here is something harder to analyze and harder still to clearly state, but we may fall back upon illustration. Most of us know men and women, not always distinguished, who suggest in themselves some fulness of life, some inner establishment in understandings and associations which make them distinct. We seek them out not for what they have to give but just for themselves. They are sometimes like the shadow of a great rock in a dreary land and sometimes like a flowing stream and sometimes like an interesting landscape. They are very often men who deal with elemental things. I have known farmers who, through much contact with the soil and much nurturing of growing things, have come to possess a wealth of simple understanding and a quiet kindness which puts the wise and the great to shame. I have known sailors who, through their mastery of winds and tides and a kind of dumb facing of the challenge of what is vaster than themselves in the constant reading of the signs of sea and sky, have come to possess a kind of simple steadfastness, the power of taking life as it is and waiting upon change of wind and tide, and a very great patience which has made their comradeship a constant delight.

I have known men who have shared great enterprises and built about themselves distinctive institutions, honored in name by their generation, who have gathered out of the very wealth of their opportunity a fructifying richness of soul which made all that they have done poor and negligible alongside the wealth of what they were, best understood not in their adequacy to command situations but in their friendly converse by their own firesides.

Save as we gather into ourselves the harvests of life, all else has been in vain. What we do is done, what we say is said and what we know is all too soon forgotten, but what we have wrought into our souls is permanent. It reappears in every revelation of ourselves, gives its accent to our speech, its quality and color to personality. In our human world personality is the end of life, experience has no meaning save its discipline and enrichment, possession has only its tool and action only its passing phase.

VI.

We keep our rendezvous with Life, and this is not unrelated to what has already been said, in open obedience to those qualities which are at once the light and guide of personality in faith and hope and love. You may protest, if you will, that faith and hope really adjourn our rendezvous; you may protest that life thus eludes and even deceives us, but you are wrong. You cannot for a moment make out your case as far as love goes. Love is keeping the rendezvous down roads whose chief concern is not for self but for others. Love is not asking but giving, not getting but sharing, a kind of divine scattering of one's self for the sake of others to whom love binds us by its mystic bonds of attachment and in whose happiness we secure our own. This final phrase is the secret of it.

We have lived to no good reason if we have not discovered how the fulness of life, which is really our quest, comes to us in by and unexpected ways. If we seek it directly it too often eludes us; if we forget it and go about some great business we have only to turn to find that all the while life has been our comrade with a blessed fulness of gifts in her outstretched hands. Love discovers this and is shiningly sure of it. The case is harder for faith and hope but they are really not postponements, they are merely the assumption of what we begin to possess as we assume it. Faith fills with its certainties the void of knowledge; faith adds what experience may suggest but not fully supply, and hope is as the rising of a great light, in which the way is as yet untraveled, become luminous and sure. And all this—faith and hope and love together—add to personality those qualities in which all lesser things ripen and give to self a greatness in which we are complete.

VII.

I do not need to speak of what God does for us in our quests, for all such things as we have been considering are simply God's ways of dealing out to us a satisfying fulness of life. Duty is his revelation, enriched self his creation, love our share of his spirit, faith is at once his gift and is complete in him, and hope is a God-given light or else it is darkness. There are, moreover, though this is hard to fit in words, senses of communion with him in which our restlessnesses are quieted and our deeper needs are met.

If we keep our rendezvous with Life in such ways as these, Life will not fail us.

I do not mean to say that life always brings happiness or unclouded light; we keep our rendezvous with Life in shadow as well as light, in loss as well as gain, in tears as in laughter. Nay, by the grace of God, those things which are strongest within us, that sense of power and attainment which more strongly than anything else establishes us in brave serenities, are very often the gift of the more shadowed side of life. Our greatest victories are always won on the fields of the hardest fighting. Nor does Life reveal itself to us all at once. The charm of discovery would be taken away if this were so. The wonder of life is the gradual deepening of its disclosures but always in duty and fellowship with God, the true enrichment of self and the steadfast going along in faith and hope and love. Peace and happiness become our comrades, broadening insight attends our thought and the high confidence that we are not only equal to what life may ask of us but that life asks nothing of us for which in return it does not leave us better and stronger, quiets our impatience, gives steadfastness to changing days.

So in the end we are taught that we keep our rendezvous with Life not in some finality of accomplishment but in enriched continuity of experience. The future must always hold something or else today is strangely empty. The residue of dissatisfaction which attends life even at its best is a part of its wealth. Life would not keep faith with us if it left us nothing to seek. If life be truly kind and God be truly just, even eternity itself will in the wealth of its satisfaction leave still a place for that hunger and thirst of the soul which if they be lost would be the end of life, which if they be not met in such measure as to give us power to go on would be the mockery of life, but which in their strange mingling of the attained and the unattained are, by the grace of God, Life's supremest kindness.

Who Won the Railroad Strike?

THERE were three fundamental issues involved in the railroad strike: the fight on organized labor, the struggle to retain higher standards of living made possible by higher wages, and a protest against the Railway Labor board. The specific reduction of wages ordered by the last decision of the board was incidental, only one of a series already made and expected but it was the straw that broke the camel's back.

The fight on labor organization has been nation-wide, and certain powerful railway executives saw in the resistance of their employes an opportunity to break the back of a labor organization which was tending more and more toward unity and understanding from top to bottom, with a growing theory regarding national ownership and employe representation in control. Technically this effort to break the back of the unions was made possible by the strike and revolved around the question of seniority. Actually, as the employes saw it, the attack, through the Labor board, on the most poorly paid men and those least solidly organized, instead of on the higher wage scales of the powerful old "big four," was simply a strategic attack on the whole labor movement.

On the direct wage issue the breaking point was the decision of the board against a "living wage" as a basic scale and the deliberate statement that the men must accept less than that "until the carriers are back on their feet." Convinced by experience that their wages at any period before the sharp rise in living costs which brought on the war were much less than enough to support a family in reasonable comfort, the men determined to resist the cumulative series of wage reductions which threatened to destroy the hope of maintaining a better level of living as costs went down. The board made approximately $800 the basic wage (100,000 men were allowed less than that) though no one, not even employers' organizations had put the minimum cost of living within $500 of that sum.

Loss of faith in the Labor board came from the series of decisions, 104 in number, which the roads had refused to obey; from the deliberate rejection of a minimum standard of living wage after the War board, the Wilson Industrial conference, and both President Harding and Secretary of Labor Davis had made that wage the minimum in their pronouncements; from the fact that the three members of the board, appointed to represent the public, voted unanimously with the three representing the roads on the moot issues. Such lack of confidence regarding the board may have been born partly of the suspicion that all judicial tribunals are made up of men whose bias is toward property as against human rights, and partly because of partisanship for collective bargaining as against any sort of arbitrament, but the lack of confidence was a fact in any case. It is significant of the deep feelings of the men that the strike vote was one of the largest ever recorded and was almost unanimous. This fact also disposes of the charge that leaders of labor engineered the strike into being.

The Seniority Issue

The question of seniority had nothing to do with the calling of the strike, but it became the breaking point in all efforts at settlement. No railroad strike has ever been won when seniority rights were lost. The Wall Street Journal listed more than a score of strikes where seniority was forfeited, but neglected to state that in every case the strike was lost.

To the railway employes seniority "is not a privilege granted by the railway executives, but a right earned by employes through years of faithful and efficient service." If it is forfeited by striking then any effective right to strike is forfeited. To the employers the right to grant or withhold seniority rights is a means of discipline. By depriving men who strike of it they can put effective brakes on strikes and through that power deal more arbitrarily with the issues involved.

The President's first proposal for settlement recognized this claim of the men. By his proposal the roads would have won on the issue of wage cuts. The men accepted it on the single condition that the roads also accept the Labor board's decisions. Acceptance by the executives would have meant victory for the Labor board and for the principle of arbitrament in railway transportation. Their refusal was a repudiation of that principle, a refusal of the good offices of the President of the republic, and a shifting of the battle line from the issues upon which the strike was called to that of the so-called "open shop" fight.

The protest by the executives on behalf of their "faithful" and "loyal" employes was largely propaganda and real only insofar as the question of loyalty to employer as against loyalty to fellow-worker is involved, a question but little raised in this case. The President's proposal would have protected every man who refused to strike in all his rights, and these men were the only loyal men from even the most prejudiced employer's standpoint. The strike-breakers employed had not qualified as either faithful or loyal, and they had acquired no seniority rights. Such rights are acquired only through length of service and by efficient work. The first they could not acquire in so short a time and of the last most of them were incapable without considerable training and experience. Hundreds of thousands of skilled mechanics cannot be picked up in two months' time. To promise them continued work was a part of the war tactics, like promising Japan Shangtung if she would fight. It meant that an inefficient man can acquire more as a strike-breaker than an old employe can retain if he dares to strike. As a matter of fact, all claims regarding loyalty to new employes and inability to keep foremen if the men are returned to their old places betray their real significance in the settlement by which the old employes do return "to work in positions of the class they originally held on June 30, 1922, and at the same point," i. e., without loss of seniority.

The Daugherty Injunction

The Daugherty injunction is famous or infamous according to one's viewpoint; it is at least sensational. Waiving all arguments regarding the injunction as a weapon of justice or its overt use by courts to the prejudice of labor, it can only be defended by the claim that any strike on railroads is, under the Esch-Cummins law, a conspiracy. The customary and recognized legal use of the injunction is to protect property in situations where the occasion cannot await more deliberative legal action. This power was amply used in all localities where violence or destruction of property was threatened or even supposed to be threatened. National action to that end was not required, nor did the great mass of depositions and affidavits read to the court meet the requirements of a jury hearing in naming supposed criminals or in validating testimony. In other words it was furnished ex parte, and there was no opportunity given for the labor officials concerned to disprove it.

The injunction is plainly based on the old conspiracy precedents by which every effort of labor to organize was condemned in the early days of labor organization, and through which the most damaging use of the injunction was made to labor's prejudice in the days before the enactment of the Clayton act in 1914, which was supposed to be a charter for legalizing the right of labor to organize for and peacefully to conduct strikes. Unless the acts of violence committed during the strike can be traced directly to the labor leaders as a part of their deliberate conduct of the strike it would seem that the injunction is an over-ruling of the Clayton act.

The final test of this exceedingly reactionary and sweeping use of the injunction will come in the higher courts. The method used by the attorney general and the language adopted in the injunction have so far found little commendation from lawyers, much reprobation from even conservative editors, general condemnation by welfare organizations, and bitterness from labor, whose growing distrust of the courts is deepened thereby. The attorney general chose a judge recently appointed, by his own recommendation no doubt, staged his hearing without notificaion to the men accused, used the most vehement phrases in his charges, and betrayed both his prejudice and lack of astuteness by declaring, "I will use the power of the government of the United States within my control to prevent the labor unions of the country from destroying the open shop." No railway union agreement is for a closed shop. No contract calls for the closed shop nor was that issue a part of the strike in either the vote or the order. Mr. Daugherty's declaration was plainly stump speaking. It gives rise to distrust of the fairness of his motives and gives ground for the charge that he is deliberately out to assist, with all the power of government within his control, the nation-wide fight on organized labor.

The injunction itself does what congress expressly would not do when it refused to adopt just such sweeping anti-strike provisions in the Esch-Cummins law. It overthrows the right to picket which has so often been defined and upheld by the highest courts. It calls the strike order "contempt" for the Railway Labor board and for the government of the United States though the right to strike is upheld by both. It forbids the use of letters, circulars, telegrams, telephones, interviews, oral persuasion or suggestion, arguments, entreaties, and all methods of communication in the conduct of the strike. As the New York Times, a very conservative, pro-employer journal, put it, the union leaders are "condemned to a life of silent meditation and prayer."

Counting Gains and Losses

It is difficult to count gains and losses because many of them are intangible and moral, and there are so many ways to recuperate monetary losses. Some things, however, are within the scope of reckoning. The men who go back to work return on the wage scale against which they struck. All of them lose from eight to twelve weeks in regular wages and many of them will lose seniority rights through the refusal of the "die-hard" systems to accept the Warfield-Jewell agreement. The craft unions will lose on the systems where they are replaced by "shop unions." The violence committed by the irresponsible fringe that defies law and order in every nation-wide strike reacts unfavorably for labor organization. If the Daugherty injunction holds, irreparable loss is suffered until the slow wheels of legislation can remedy the defect. On the whole labor has lost largely.

The railroads have lost millions in money unless they can recover from the public through charging the loss into the cost of operation, with permission to keep rates up until it is recouped. Equipment is badly run down at a time when business is on a big increase. The strike-breakers cost more in actual wages, through bonuses paid, than the old employes would have cost on the old wage scale, and board, working clothes, and transportation were added in thousands of cases, to say nothing of the fact that the men were grossly inefficient and thus wasteful. The good-will of hundreds of thousands of employes has been forfeited, which was a more valuable asset than the privilege of arbitrary rule. "Ninety-five per cent of this railroading is human," said President A. H. Smith of the New York Central lines, "the other five per cent is merely coal and steel."

The public loses irretrievably. It loses the millions now to be charged up to travelers and shippers by the railroads. It loses through the mal-adjustments in transporting coal just as winter approaches. It loses confidence in the efficacy of the Railway Labor board which emerges from the battle badly undone through failure to avoid the strike, through inability to function in the terms of settlement, through the acutely accentuated prejudices of labor against it, and through the refusal of the operators to uphold the President's effort to solidify its power and authority. The way to peace in labor troubles has suffered another impasse and that is the public's biggest loss in every industrial war. There is a better way than war, and when the ability as that is used in production and management is put to its discovery, it will be found.

London, Sept. 17, 1922.

IT is hard to judge when one is away from home what currents of thoughts are sweeping over the nation, but there can be no disposition among thoughtful people to underestimate the grave peril brought about by the Turkish victory in Asia Minor. It may prove the beginning of new disasters to Europe. France and England look at the near east with different traditions and varied interests to preserve. Soviet Russia and Germany are not blind to the possible escapes which a revived Turkey may open for them, and always there is the diffused Islam! Our traditional liberal policy since Gladstone's day has always been to take the side of the eastern Christian peoples, and we have had the humiliation of looking on while the Armenians whose cause we had championed have been slaughtered. At this very moment the air is full of stories of new atrocities, committed by the Turks in Smyrna. Unhappily in all near east wars the victors commit barbarous cruelties, and the Turks represent their actions as reprisals for the burning of villages by the Greeks in their retreat. But we know the Turk.

It is earnestly hoped by all responsible people that the statesmen of this and other lands will not act before they have worked out the consequences of their actions in the long future. The time is over for improvised policies. Islam is a fact; its followers cannot be silenced by the sword; they must be given a place in the sun, but they cannot be allowed to return to Europe. They must be robbed of their power to persecute the Christians of the near east. The freedom of the Straits and the protection of the harassed Christians are our chief concerns, and the government which stands for these things in a firmer yet just and conciliatory manner will have the support of this nation.

The League of Nations

The cause of international peace has found a powerful champion in Dr. Jowett. His appeal is receiving an almost universal response from the free churches. The fact that the appeal comes from one who, unlike others, has never had one foot in the political world, makes it all the more effective. It is the appeal of a Christian teacher who has lost faith in the ability of statesmen to solve the urgent problem of world reconciliation. There is a growing indignation at the failure to make more use of the league of nations with its excellent machinery. At present it has the credit of solving in a successful way the problems submitted to it, but it has been regarded by the big powers as a mere convenience, a desperate way out, a pis-aller. "The league cannot serve the world unless the world means to use it and to trust it." No more solemn reminder could be given than the following which comes from The Manchester Guardian:

"Somehow or other the terrible ghosts of the peace have to be laid: reparations, allied debts, and the chaos of Europe. The poor and the wise of the world beg the governments to try the league. They answer, 'Tomorrow, tomorrow. The work of the supreme council is not yet over.' But it sometimes happens that there is no 'tomorrow.' "

The Need for Concentration and Simplicity

That excellent journal, The Sunday School Chronicle, which has recently entered upon a new chapter in its history, makes an appreciative reference to the recent article by my friend, Richard Roberts, in The Christian Century. It refers to the article as "one of his cogent and penetrating articles" and, after outlining his positions, says: "There is much truth in Mr. Roberts' contention, though the solution of the problem is not easy. Very few churches can afford to maintain adequately three paid religious helpers, and the complete segregation of the preaching from the pastoral office would not necessarily be strength. The pulpit is suffering, like everything else, from the complexity and the multiplicity of its interests. The mind is breaking down under the weight of its own achievements. With the growth of the world's population, the facts, external and internal, that have to be dealt with are too numerous for any single brain. Salvation by knowledge is becoming a desperate undertaking. The paths of education are blocked by mountains of books. There will have to be greater specialization, and a return to the elemental facts of existence."

The Bishop's Autumn

This leads me to reflect upon the program which the Bishop of London has set forth for his autumn. He may have been moved by certain popular jibes at lazy parsons. But no one ever accused the present bishop of laziness. From October 1st till Christmas he has not an hour of his working day unpledged. He will have his public duties as bishop; he will prepare Harrow boys for confirmation; he will attend the church assembly and the House of Lords and a myriad other meetings; and he is to preach or give addresses sixty times! A writer who admires the bishop, as all of us do, has ventured to put certain questions to him and inferentially to all similar leaders. Why do they take all these engagements? Is it because churches think they alone can do the work? Is it because they have been led to think themselves that they alone can do it? The remedy then must lie not with the churches but with the men. It may be the business of the churches to ask them. It is their business to say, "No! Find somebody else. We do not mean to shorten our day of service in order to bolster up a belief that we are indispensable. No man is indispensable. You will find that out when we are dead. Find it out now and postpone the hour of our departure."

The King's Message to Free Churchmen

Not for the first time the king has shown his interest in the free churches. (It is sometimes forgotten that when the king is in Scotland he becomes a Presbyterian, for the church of Scotland is of course Presbyterian.) At the close of the war he attended a Thanksgiving service in the Albert Hall arranged by the free churches. Now he has sent a message to the Rev. Thomas Nightingale, secretary of the free church federation. Lest it should have escaped notice on the other side I enclose it. Like all the other messages of the king, it is admirably expressed: "Balmoral Castle. Your message informing the king of the organization by the national council of the Evangelical Free Churches of a movement in support of world peace has been received by His Majesty with much interest and sympathy.

"The king feels it to be preeminently the duty of the churches at the present time to declare their faith that the only warfare worth waging is against those evils which have throughout history brought upon the nations the horror of war.

"His Majesty wishes the free churches all success in their high endeavor. (Signed) STAMFORDHAM."

The National Brotherhood

It is no secret that the Brotherhood movement has been passing through critical times. Happily it found in the hour of its need a bold and able secretary, Mr. Tom Sykes. He insisted on a return to realities and published abroad the fact that numbers had seriously declined—a fact which everybody knew who had any acquaintance with those Sunday afternoon brotherhoods. The first step towards advance was to face facts. Since then Mr. Sykes has done admirable service. He is not only a good secretary but a fine speaker and has conducted missions along with Mr. Tom Holland, a tenor singer from the north. There is still a work to be done by the Brotherhoods as their secretary said, provided they "rise to the majesty of their opportunity, cultivate vision, crucify egotism, refuse to be run to gratify the vanity of the few, scrap obsolete methods, pray without ceasing and go out all the time and all the ways for the good of humanity and the coming of the kingdom of God." When we come to think of it, these conditions might well be considered by every religious society.

The Adventure of the Christian Life

Here is a fine passage from the pen of the Rev. Charles H. S. Matthews, editor of "Faith or Fear?" and other challenging books. It gives a prescription for perpetual youth. "The Christian religion, then, in calling us to a life of adventure, does but repeat, with a special emphasis, the invitation of life itself, at the same time indicating the truly adventurous path. It is thus preeminently the religion of the young and of those who never grow old. One of our best living novelists has divided men into two classes, the adventurers and the stay-at-homes, but in truth all men have within them, at all events when they are young, both the instinct for adventure and the love of home. Unfortunately many, perhaps the majority, of men as they grow older lose the spirit of adventure, and often in doing so they make home itself seem a dull place to the young. In youth it is indeed physical adventure, chiefly if not solely, that appeals to us, and of course the time must come when we are no longer fit for such adventure, but, however old our bodies may be, there always remain open to us the adventures of the spirit. To go on to the end exploring new realms of beauty, discovering, or at least making our own, new treasures of knowledge and, above all, learning to voyage more adventurously on that ocean of love which is our true environment—this is possible to us all, while life lasts: this is to gain and to keep to the end the spirit of perpetual youth, and to make of death itself but the last great adventure which this life has to offer us."

Jesus and Human Experiences

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: Some of us have been waiting long and eagerly for the promised article of Dr. Tittle's on "The Future of the Methodists." We expected a clearly phrased, discriminating and courageous analysis of present-day Methodism, and we have not been disappointed. Most of us, at least among the younger men, share his dislike for the far famed paragraph on amusements and his restlessness under the obligation to pledge applicants for membership to a belief in the speculations of the articles of religion. We too believe with him that the worship of tradition whether it be ecclesiastical or economic is a peril that cannot be overemphasized. "Time makes ancient good uncouth."

But some of us are keenly disappointed in his treatment of the authority of Jesus.—"If men believe, as many of them are beginning to do, what Jesus said, it is because what Jesus said is being verified by the accumulating experience of the race and not because Jesus said it." We do not know just who the men are whom Dr. Tittle has in mind but we venture to say that they are not Methodists. We doubt if any great number of men anywhere are accepting the leadership of Jesus as the result of studious comparisons of his teaching with the lessons of history. And whatever be the attitude of the skeptical outsider, the mind of the church has not operated in this fashion. The history of the church reveals a great company of men and women in all the ages daring to do what Jesus said, not because experience gave its sanction but in defiance of experience. They did believe certain things because Jesus said them and they became the leaders in religious and social movements against which worldly wisdom frowned but which proved to be a boon to humanity. Just now we are engaging in a crusade for a Christian social order. Dr. Tittle, himself, is a conspicuous and commanding figure in the front ranks of these crusaders. But we are not seeking such an order because it has been tried and proven feasible. It has never been tried! And reams of arguments may be written to prove that it is not feasible. But "across the crowded ways of life" we hear the voice of the son of man and we believe him. His voice carries an authority which does not wait for the detailed corroboration of experience.

It is difficult to make one's meaning clear within the limits of a letter for the correspondent's column. I do not wish to be understood as decrying the reference to experience as the corrective of social and religious judgments. I deplore both rationalism and mysticism as the arbiters of thought. What I am trying to say is that as Dr. Tittle leaves it, the authority of Jesus is no greater and no different than the authority of Paul or Wesley. All are worth paying attention to as far as experience has corroborated their dictums but no farther. Nor is the situation remedied much by the declaration that history has so largely corroborated Jesus, that we have great warrant for trusting him in those matters upon which society and the individual have not dared to put him and his teachings to the test.

To many of us, Jesus is still the supreme and sufficient authority, and we accept that authority not because of human history but of his history. We recognize all the difficulties surrounding that history. But historical criticism leaves us still a historic figure that in life and in death and above all in the life beyond death so far eludes our human formulas that we fall at His feet with Thomas saying "My Lord and my God!" The authority of Jesus to a great multitude within the Methodist church is the person of Jesus! And to many of us still it is possible to quote him even when we cannot quote statistics and to challenge the present generation in his name. Dr. Tittle refers again and again to "the testimony of the Christian consciousness." To some of us it is a source of wonder that he does not seem to share the total Christian consciousness concerning Christ.

In conclusion let me say that I have only admiration for the noble progressive Christian idealism for which Dr. Tittle stands and that I have written because I have felt that in this one matter he has failed, perhaps unwittingly, to do entire justice to Methodism and to the Master of us all! Knowing this eloquent minister as well as I do, I have more than a suspicion that, in his own life, he gives Jesus a place of authority which his words have not revealed.

The First American Bishop

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: As one who appreciates your timely words about the General Convention of the Episcopal church just ended, both as to the convention itself, and also as to the prayer book being the "basic document in all study of worship in the Protestant world," I would say that it has been the general impression in our communion, that the consecration of Bishop Seabury (sent by the clergy of Connecticut not by the diocese of Massachusetts; and there were no dioceses at the time) was prevented in England, not altogether by the opposition of the bishops of the established church but by an act of parliament which forbade the consecration of a bishop without his taking the oath of allegiance to the British crown. The good man, formerly a chaplain in the British army, waited a full year, for he was to go first to England and lay before the bishop his credentails, and failing in that he was to go to the non-jurors of Scotland.

He followed this course, the Scotch bishops intimating beforehand their readiness under certain conditions (English clergymen bore a prominent part in this persuasion.) He was consecrated there, and agreed in the concordat he made with the Scottish bishops that "if the Scottish eucharistic service was found to be agreeable to the genuine standards of antiquity," he would use his influence to have it adopted into the prayer book in America. If you will notice in the prayer book, the prayer of consecration in the holy communion has its source in the Scottish and not the English book.

The act of parliament was afterward revised to apply to the case of a foreign bishop, and Bishops White, Provoost and Madison were consecrated in England, and all succeeding consecrations have been in America. From an early document I quote: "That as it's the right, so it will be the duty, of the said church, when duly organized, constituted, and represented in a synod or convention of the different orders of her ministry and people, to revise her liturgy, forms of prayers, in order to adapt the same to the late Revolution and other local circumstances of America; which it is humbly conceived may and will be done, without any other or farther departure from the venerable order and beautiful forms of worship of the church from whence we sprung, than may be found expedient in the change of our situation from a daughter to a sister church."

A More Accurate Designation

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: My attention has just been called to a letter by a legionnaire in your issue of September 14, regarding a statement of mine in an article on America and Japan on July 13. I have not the article at hand. I had meant to guard myself so as not to imply that the Legion, as such, was responsible for any persecutions of Japanese families. I spoke of "representatives" but indirectly, from the testimony given, I should have said "certain members of the American Legion." I am glad to know that the critic is ready to have "offenders disciplined and redress made," and that he was pleased with the general tone of the article.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jesus' Temptations and Ours*

THERE is one golden key which opens every door in this story—it is "power." At his baptism, Jesus became aware that he was "The Son of God," and that the power of God was his. Under the burden and under the spell of this infinite obligation and opportunity, he was inwardly compelled to seek the silence, where he could think his problem through. I am penning these words, sitting upon a rock, among the pines and silver birches of Canada. It is Sunday afternoon, August 20, and I am in the heart of a great forest. Far away, on the lake, I can hear the engine of a boat; overhead is the deep, blue sky, all around are trees and rocks. I am hundreds of miles from my church and, for the hour, alone. This is the place to look into one's soul and settle things. Already I have made some far-reaching decisions. This is the place to write of Jesus facing his future in the silence and loneliness of the wilderness.

His big problem was: "How shall I use my new power?" Every boy and girl faces this problem very early—new power—how use it? Suppose some one should give you a million dollars—what would you do with the new power? Each newly-rich person faces this question. Few people have sense enough to use power of any sort. Give them a gun and they will kill someone with it. Give them money and they will give a demonstration of idiocy. Give them political power and they will spoil something. Give them physical power and they will turn bully or prize fighter. Give them exceptional brains and they will become scornful intellectuals and quite useless, to say the least. Who can use power? Who has the wisdom to use voice, charm, money, brains, position, or any other power to the best advantage? Power is as dangerous as T. N. T. Only the exceptional person can be trusted with any power. Seated behind a seventy-five horse-power motor and in front of twenty gallons of gas, is a good position in which to prove oneself a perfect fool. Suddenly to inherit a fortune affords the decent citizen a fine field in which to exhibit his lack of mentality or vision. Now Jesus becomes aware that unlimited power belongs to him—how shall he employ this new power?

Three temptations assail him, and let us be glad that they did—and that he overcame them. (1) So intent was he upon the solution of his problem, so absorbed in his thinking that hours passed by like so many minutes. Then all at once he became aware of keen hunger. Why not use the new power to turn stones into loaves—the stones about him looked like loaves. Could he do it? Yes—but not as the Son of God! God's Son would not use power to satisfy selfish, bodily needs. A vast field was now conquered. Thus endeth the first temptation.

(2) Why not win instant popular acclaim by performing some outstanding miracle? Suppose when the temple was packed with worshippers he were to cry out and hurl himself from the pinnacle of the holy temple, but instead of falling crushed among them, he were to employ his divine power to float gracefully down into the throng? Would they not immediately hail him as the Messiah? Could he do it? Undoubtedly—but not as the Son of God. The world is not helped on by stunts, but by regular, lawful activities. Another vast field was here subdued; and thus endeth the second temptation.

(3) Now appears the most deadly and subtle of all temptations—ambition and its realization. How many great souls beside that of Cardinal Woolsey could rise up and bear testimony to its eternal strength? "By that sin fell the angels." Jesus saw the world at his feet; he saw himself crowned King of kings and Lord of lords—the kingdoms of this earth being all his. How attain this coveted prize? Mohammed, later on, would answer, "By the sword." Others, still later, would say, "By money." Jesus felt in his soul, that only by the long, slow, painful path of sacrificial, loving service could the world, at last, be completely won. Suffering love—the way of the cross—could he not use his power to find a quicker easier road? Undoubtedly—but not as the Son of God. The whole realm of the universe now was conquered—thus endeth the third temptation. The circle of life had been swept. Pale, haggard, spent, the Master emerged from the wilderness—but he had decided how to employ his new-found power. Power is for love. Power is for service—not gratification. Profound, indeed, is this decision. Far-reaching as the stars and eternal as heaven. How will you use your powers? Will you use them as brute or as son of God? Such is Christ-like-ness.

Propose Celebration of 150 Years of Methodism

The Francis Asbury Memorial association has recently called on world Methodism to agree upon the celebration of 150 years of Methodism. In 1784 the famed Christmas conference was held and in Baltimore in 1884 the centennial of this event was celebrated. It is proposed that the various Methodist denominations should set themselves worthy goals to be achieved by 1934, and that a great celebration should be held at First church, Baltimore.

Dean Inge Has Been Invited to Come to New York

Dean Inge, of St. Paul Cathedral, London, has been invited to come to New York and preach a series of sermons in Grace Episcopal church where Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery is rector. Dean Inge is considered by many to be the leading thinker in the Episcopal church of England at the present time, though those of the ritualistic persuasion would hold that this honor belongs to Bishop Gore. It is believed by Mr. Slattery that Dean Inge will accept and that when he comes he will have a message not only for Grace church but for all America.

Some Laymen Wanted Ministerial Salaries Cut

In the Primitive Methodist church of England the ministerial salaries are set by the conference and not by the local churches. Following the war there has been a considerable increase, and, now that wages in other callings are falling, it was argued by some laymen that the ministers should take a cut also. The ministers retired when the discussion began, and let the laymen settle the question. The vote overwhelmingly affirmed the present salary standards, for it was stated by many laymen that the ministerial salary in England is still far below what it ought to be in view of the emoluments of other professions.

Layman Tells Catholics Why They Get Few Converts

The Catholic weekly called America has been printing editorials recently dealing with the question of the small number of converts to the Catholic church. In the correspondence printed in the journal there appeared recently a letter from a physician who had been an inquirer at a Catholic church, but had not joined on account of the too rigid canons of the church on divorce. He voices the following complaint of the Catholic church: "I frequently go to Catholic services and recently instead of a sermon I heard a choleric diatribe of thirty minutes because some one came to confession a few minutes after the usual hour. At another time a priest was interrupted in the midst of a sermon by a child falling from a pew and crying. The sermon was stopped, rather than interrupted, for the remainder of the speaker's time was given to an angry lecture. Here is one difficulty. Then, too, there is little or no chance to obtain instruction. I wish there was a Catholic Sunday school where grown-up Catholics could learn and to which I could go for the same purpose. I asked my dentist friend why there was none such. He said: 'I don't know.' I find him well instructed but he seems to impart his information reluctantly. There's a cause for this. What is it? Catholics should be proud of their faith, it seems to me, but they are not proud of it. There's a cause. What is it? They seem inclined in religious matters to slink and hide. They seem to endure rather than enjoy their services. To me these services seem beautiful, but not so to them."

Second Elijah Appears in China

The Peking Daily News printed recently an astonishing incident in connection with the summer drought in China this year. General Feng Yu-hsiang, a Christian man, sent out invitations to the mission churches in Honan to join him in a great prayer meeting on the parade ground. After a parade the men sang the national anthem, and the various army officers joined in a prayer for rain. The general who had called the prayer meeting offered up the following prayer: "O God, just and benevolent, Thou punishest sin and wickedness with natural calamities. We do not come to utter our complaints, but we humbly implore Thy mercy. Oh! have mercy upon me, Feng Yu-hsiang, a miserable sinner. Punish me alone, and spare all the people of the province. Punish me for the sins and crimes of all the people of Honan, but spare them, O Lord! Cut me to pieces and scatter my ashes to the wind. I am willing to go down to hell for the sins and wickedness of my people: and indeed I will praise Thy justice even in hell." Only a few hours after this prayer was offered a rain adequate for all needs fell in that province.

Smelling Committee Finds Interdenominationalism

The heresy of interdenominationalism is now regarded in the Southern Baptist camp as one of the most damning departures from the faith. When a man gets affected with this heresy, he will cooperate with his Christian brethren of other communions in Christian work. Recently a "smelling committee" from the Southern Baptist Convention has been investigating charges that Prof. Dow of Baylor University was teaching evolution and other abominations to his students. The committee secured the following explanation from the president of the university about the conduct of Prof. Dow: "The only criticism I heard for the first year had to do

Aim Blow at Oregon Parochial Schools

THE state of Oregon has the initiative and referendum. A bill recently proposed which will go on the ballot in the fall elections would eliminate parochial schools in that state. A fine of from five to one hundred dollars is provided in the bill for any parent who refuses compliance with its provisions, and each day a child is out of the public school constitutes a separate offense. While the Lutherans, the Seventh Day Adventists and one or two other organizations have parochial schools, the chief result aimed at is to put an end to Catholic schools. It is claimed that the bill has the support of the Ku Klux Klan and of the thirty-second degree Masons. It is also supported by many Protestant churchmen. Twenty-five Presbyterian ministers in Portland have decided to oppose the bill. One of the provisions of the referendum law is that the state provides pamphlets with the arguments on either side of a proposed bill. The arguments submitted in opposition to the proposed legislation are as follows:

"1. That it is the parent, and not the state, who bears, feeds, clothes, aspires for and loves the child. 2. That it is a fundamental right, inherent in nature and in the constitution of the United States, for a parent to choose the means by which his child shall be educated. 3. That dictatorial state power over the training of children—imitative of the former Prussian system—destroys independence of character and freedom of thought. 4. That compulsory public-school education of the 12,000 Oregon children now attending parish or other non-public schools would be an additional and unnecessary tax burden on the people. 5. That there has not been a single invidious fact or condition affecting public interest called to the public attention furnishing the slightest excuse for the proposed legislation. 6. That the same standards of education maintained in the public school, by law obtains in all of the sectarian and private schools; and, further, that competitive examinations in the same branches for the same grades have revealed an average superiority of education imparted in denominational schools in Oregon, the rule being that the denominational school pupils were better grounded, better disciplined and more thoroughly educated than the competing public-school pupils. 7. Unqualified support of all elements involved of the public-school system, and a challenge by all to prove a single attempt to antagonize or retard the growth of the public-school system in the state.

"And finally, by the committee of Presbyterian clergymen: 'If (the bill) is based on the philosophy of autocracy that the child belongs primarily to the state; it is an unjustifiable invasion of family authority and threatens ultimately the guarantee of our cherished American liberty.'" with the expressions wherein he deplored the presence in small towns of so many churches of all denominations when one could perhaps serve better. He was speaking from the sociologist's point of view and was not always careful to say that the single church should be a Baptist church. There being critical young students in the classes, they were quick to sense the possibility of his teaching interdenominationalism.

Preach More Doctrine, Is the Slogan

Professor Rall in a recent issue of the Zion's Herald insists upon a larger amount of theological preaching. One would expect this from the teacher of systematic theology in Garrett Biblical Institute, but it is rather surprising to find both Unitarians and Universalists voicing a similar demand. In a recent discussion conducted by the Unitarian Laymen's League almost every speaker demanded greater preaching of theology, though not so many of them were enthusiastic over the "five points" which historically have been the contention of Unitarianism. Dr. Halldorson of Winnipeg said: "This tearing down of old doctrines is out of date. Our church in Winnipeg would have been killed several times if it had not been for the generous support of the A. U. A., because of that very thing, tht everlasting cold analysis of the faults of the orthodox churches. We are fortunate in having a man now who can preach a theological sermon and make it interesting and we are all interested in it. We have had him about six months, and during the hot spell in summer I have never seen our church less than three-quarters full. If the minister does not allow himself to get into theological problems which we laymen do not understand, you can leave him alone to do his work. Our minister told me just before I left that he intended to give a series of lectures this winter on the different doctrines of Christianity, on the different books of the Bible. From what I have heard him say I believe that he can make it interesting. It all depends on this—that the preacher doesn't speak over the heads of the people." Mr. George C. Falch in the Universalist Leader says: "Following the prevailing fashion, the Universalist church has likewise reduced to a minimum the preaching of doctrine. It is easy to see how this has come to pass. Lacking the old atmosphere of hostility, with no more attacks coming from the pulpit across the street, there has been, of course, a very natural tendency to consider the battle won, and to turn our attention almost wholly to other matters."

Congregational Leaders Will "Labor" With Dr. Orchard

The recent announcement that Dr. Orchard, pastor of King's Weigh House of London, was ordained some years ago by Rev. Vernon Herford who claims to be a bishop of the Syro-Chaldean church, has produced widespread astonishment in Great Britain. Dr. Orchard now has a triple ordination in the Congregational, Presbyterian and Episcopal orders. That he should have accepted ordination at the hands of a man regarded by many as an ecclesiastical adventurer has greatly pained many Congregationalists. Dr. Horton has been appointed by the Congregational Union of England to "try to reason the whole thing out with him." Dr. Horton says of the incident, "If I accepted what Dr. Orchard appears to believe, I should have felt it incumbent on me to sacrifice everything and to have joined the Roman Catholic church. That, as I conceive, is the only logical action for anyone in that position."

Presbyterian Board Will Send Out Surveys

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions of New York is offering to mail out printed volumes of surveys made in connection with the Interchurch World Movement. These are distributed without expense except for postage. There is a volume on home missions and another volume on foreign missions, both profusely illustrated in two colors with maps and charts. A score card for rating city churches with regard to their educational facilities is an interesting feature. The religious and social life of Susquehanna county is a more detailed study which takes up the problems of American communities at closer range.

Millennial Dawn Students Hold Convention

The International Bible Students association held an international meeting recently at Sandusky, O. In spite of the misfortunes of war period when many of its leaders were in prison for disloyal utterances, the organization continues to flourish. Fifteen thousand people were present at the Sandusky meeting and the present leader, Judge J. F. Rutherford, formerly of Missouri and now of New York, had to address the meeting with the aid of the magna vox. Six hundred people were baptized by immersion. All members of evangelical churches are re-baptized when entering this association, it being held that even Baptists and Disciples were baptized without a proper understanding of the rite. Several couples were also married. There were delegates from Poland, Greece, Norway, England, Canada, Germany, Italy and Asia. The organization long ago translated its books and pamphlets into many languages and its missionary work has been done largely with the aid of the printed page. Disclaiming that it is a church, it holds Sunday meetings in most cities, and Christian people are urged to leave the churches, since the "dispensation" is past for the church.

Catholics Admit Defections in Bohemia

When the first reports began to come through of the large defection from the membership of the Roman Catholic church in Bohemia, Roman Catholic newspapers in this country were inclined to ridicule the reports. Information now comes by way of the Vatican which leaves no room for doubt. According to these sources, the Catholic membership in Bohemia has fallen from 98 per cent of the population to 73 per cent. Some of the most eminent of former Catholic prelates now wear the John Huss badge openly. The newly organized national church has 500,000 members, and other denominations have grown.

What Happened to Some Union Enterprises

The detached church is always subject to the ambitions of church leaders. Unable to secure a pastor, many such churches in the past have departed from their union ideals for practical reasons. A Methodist bishop is reported to have boasted of the "capture" of a community church in Illi-

Unitarians Differ on Pulpit Freedom

THE organization of the Unitarian Laymen's League has given the laymen a forum where they may discuss their convictions about the church and ministers. At a recent meeting of that organization a resolution was offered "Be it resolved that it is the sense of the Laymen's league that the Christian minister is within his province in presenting reasoned convictions on any matter of moral or religious import, and in so doing we pledge him our support." The preaching of the social gospel is regarded by Mr. Breaux of Louisville, Ky., as beyond the limits of a proper pulpit freedom. He said: "We all know, Mr. Chairman, what has happened in some of the prominent churches of this country because the minister has departed from the teachings of religion. We have in New York City a prominent example of an historic Unitarian church that no longer bears the Unitarian label, because the minister of that church, a man prompted by humanitarin motives and the highest ideals, chose to prostitute his pulpit chasing butterflies, principally socialistic butterflies. In my own church in Louisville we had a young minister fresh from the seminary. He tried it out on the Louisville church. All these young ministers who come from the seminaries have an idea that they can preach some one particular "ism" and reform the world. This minister succeeded by his talks—they were not sermons—but by his talks on socialism in driving all the best people out of the church. I say that is not the mission of the Unitarian church. If this minister and the minister of any church would confine himself to talking militantly the gospel of Unitarian Christianity—because it is the true church, the best church, the only church that dares to couple common sense with religion, the only church that does not insult the intelligence of its congregation,—if the ministers would confine themselves to that, our church would grow and be progressive and aggressive and accomplish the sacred mission that it has for humanity."

ois. The Presbyterians recently absorbed Hope Union church, northwest of Chicago, fter this church had maintained an inde- endent existence for twenty-five years. In owa the churches of the community type re setting up machinery to secure minis- ers, being willing to accept men from any vangelical church. Until the denomina- ions recognize the community church, as a egitimate solution of the church problem in mall communities, the wasteful process of uilding up union enterprises and tearing hem down again will continue.

Drake Secures Acting President

Since the resignation of President Holmes of Drake University, the school as lacked leadership until recently Prof. D. W. Moorehouse was secured as acting resident. He is a productive scholar in is favorite field of astronomy and dis- overed a comet, which now bears his ame. The search for a permanent president of the institution is now on. Drake the largest of the Disciples schools nd is located at Des Moines.

City Closes Up on Sunday

City conditions have quite changed he attitude of many people on the ques- ion of the proper observance of the Christian rest day, and in most communi- ies there has been a growing laxity since he war, due no doubt to the ideas rought back from France not only by the soldiers but by the religious workers themselves. In some communities the post-bellum laxity is giving away to a movement in the contrary direction. In Piqua, O., which is a city of seventeen thousand people, a city ordinance will henceforth close all gasoline stations, motion picture houses, restaurants, drug, grocery, cigar and candy stores on Sunday. A ban is being put on Sunday newspapers.

Canadian Methodists Restless Over Union Question

For twenty years the question of the union of the Presbyterian, the Congregational and the Methodist churches of Canada has been pending. A minority in the Presbyterian church has stubbornly fought the union and secured delays.

The Bible has never been published in any form in which the reading of it has been made so attractive to both old and young as in the "INTERNATIONAL"

CHRISTIAN WORKERS' BIBLE

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink, running from Genesis to Revelation, binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under the mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere reader are brought to light and tied together.

The Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority in Bible themes, has arranged on this plan Three Thousand Selected Texts.

PROMINENT PEOPLE'S OPINIONS

John Wanamaker: International Christian Workers' Bible is an advance on anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable.

Lyman Abbott: Valuable to Christian workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries.

BOUND IN GENUINE LEATHER, divinity circuit, with overlapping covers (like illustration), round corners, gold edges, red underneath. Size of page 5¼x8½ inches, beautifully printed in extra large clear type on extra fine paper; also contains Latest Teachers' Helps to Bible Study.

Meanwhile in the great northwest many union churches have sprung up owing allegiance to none of these denominations, but hoping for fellowship in the united church. The approaching general conference of Canadian Methodism will consider the outlook for union once more but with some impatience this year. Members of this church believe that the time for action has come.

Lutherans Will Face Union Question

The convention of the United Lutheran church to be held in Buffalo this month will face some urgent questions. Among these none is more pressing than the attitude of the denomination toward union movements. The United Lutheran church is not yet a constituent part of the Federal Council. The World Conference on Faith and Order has invited the Lutherans to participate and action must be taken upon this invitation. As usual in religious conventions there is some family linen to be washed. A theological seminary in North Dakota is moving into Minnesota without the consent of the convention ,and this topic will doubtless bring about heated discussion. The relief work in Europe is to be considered, and the denomination will face squarely the question whether such work should be continued.

Will the Law Enforcer Reveal His Secrets

Chicago has had no more unique ministerial figure in the past year than that of Rev. J. W. Williamson, who bore the strange title of "law enforcer' in connection with the city administration of Chicago. He was appointed to this office at a salary of ten thousand dollars a year by Mayor Thompson. Not many days ago he was summarily dismissed by the mayor after the law enforcer had had some differences with the Chief of Police. It seems probable that the Rock River Conference of the Methodist church will reappoint him to his old charge in Chicago, Normal Park Methodist church. Once back in his pastorate will he talk about his experiences telling what he knows about the prevalence of vice and lawlessness in Chicago? His relation to the city government has never been a joy to his brethren of the Methodist ministry nor to the ministers of other communions, and resolutions offered to commend his work as law enforcer have failed of passage in ministerial groups. The secular press that has been hostile to the Thompson administration has been very critical of him up to the time of his discharge, but has of late assumed a more friendly tone.

Bishops Are Getting the Money

The emergency in the foreign mission situation of the Methodist church is being presented in many cities this month. The call has been made for 20,000 gifts of $100 each, which would make a total of two million dollars and it is proposed to secure this money in cash before October 31. Bishop Edwin H. Hughes of Boston is prominent in the campaign. In some churches the people of smaller means are demanding a part of the campaign and recently in a Methodist church at Ocean City Bishop Fisher secured a loose collection of $2,680.

Will Align Negroes With Temperance Forces

at Nashville, Tenn., of one thousand Negro leaders from all sections of the country, representing prohibition, social welfare, and reform organizations, who will bring reports of the Negro's attitude toward the eighteenth amendment. Negro fraternities and clubs will be invited to participate. The Methodists have wisely taken into account the fact that the ten million Negro citizens in this country will have some influence in the defence of the present temperance standards in this country.

Great Increase in Candidates for Priesthood

While nearly all Protestant sects worry along with an inadequate supply of candidates for the ministry, the Roman Catholic seminaries in this country are being enlarged to take care of the ever increasing throng of students. New institutions are being created at Chicago, New Orleans and Washington, the latter in connection with the Sulpicians. A considerable part of the increase in the student body is due to a Catholic Student Mission crusade which now has an enrolment of 200,000. It is said that the enrolment of women for the religious orders has kept pace with that of the men. Many American students of theology are now going to Louvain university and to Paris and Rome. A favorite ending of academic work is an ordination to the priesthood in Rome.

number of smaller towns this has been done as well. The Presbyterian church at Emerado, N. D., a community of seven hundred people, has been given a Saturday night entertainment with the film. No admission is charged, and the pictures are supported by free-will offerings. This church has had seventy new members the past year, though no one would connect this interesting fact directly with the recreational program.

Big Contest on in Religious Publicity

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Oklahoma of the various denominations are now engaged in a big contest in the field of religious publicity. The various societies are endeavoring to get secular papers to print stories of the achievements of young people in religious work. Paid advertising counts on the same basis as news stories. The result has been that thousands of columns of matter have been presented to the people of Oklahoma. When the state convention meets in 1923 a fine bulletin board will be awarded to the society which leads all the rest. Exhibits will be made of the various types of publicity in use in the state.

Lutherans Will Feature Luther Translation

The United Lutheran church at its convention at Buffalo, October 17-26, will feature some old Bibles that are printed in the original translation of Martin Luther. The Bibles shown are four hundred years old. Among the interesting facts called out in connection with this convention is the statement that by 1522 there were a hundred thousand copies of the Luther Bible in the world, though printing was but recently invented and was exceedingly clumsy. The Lutheran church is exceedingly zealous in the matter of the circulation of the holy scriptures, and this anniversary will mark a fresh effort to bring the Bible to the attention of a still llarger number of people in the world.

Denominations in Illinois Hold State Meetings

October seems to be the month for holding the denominational meetings in Illinois. The Baptists begin their convention at Centralia October 17 and the same day the Presbyterians open their synod at Streator. The Disciples met at Rock Island on October 3. Four churches in Rock Island and Moline are the product of the state missionary program Prominent among the interests this year was the reinforcement of the campaign of Eureka College to secure $265,000 on a $400,000 endowment campaign. The remainder of the fund is promised by the General Education Board of New York.

Sunday Evening Club Starts a New Season

The Sunday Evening Club of Chicago began its sixteenth year on October 1. This unique organization is very largely the product of Dr. Clifford W. Barnes, a Christian layman. He was educated at Yale and Chicago and did post-graduate work at Oxford. Earlier in his life he acted as an assistant pastor and knows how to fill the pulpit on occasion. Each Sunday evening in advance of the church service, he conducts a Bible class at Orchestra Hall. Addresses were made last Sunday evening by the first speaker of the year, Sir Charles Wakefield and Mr. Harold Spender, representing a delegation of Englishmen who have brought to this country statues of Pitt Burke and Bryce.

Dr. Taylor Is Back From Bohemia

Dr. Frederick E. Taylor, president of the Northern Baptist convention, and Dr. Carter Helm Jones have traveled through Czecho-Slovakia this summer, gathering together companies of Baptists and speaking to them through an interpreter. The Muckocin meeting was quite amusing. The interpreter did not arrive, and the preachers called upon a Jewish physician to interpret. They insist he got more gospel in one evening than he had had in a whole lifetime. At Brno the leading theatre of the town was packed for two nights. Dr. Taylor spoke on the meaning of the Christian life and Dr. Jones on Baptist conceptions of freedom. In one town there were no Baptists a year ago. At the present time there are sixty church members

IN CELEBRATION OF OUR

Thirtieth (30th) Anniversary

we have published a new gospel music book, HYMNS OF PRAISE. Read what others say about it: "At last I can send enthusiastic praise of a hymn book." "We selected 'Hymns of Praise' after comparing it with eighteen other books." "We are more than delighted with 'Hymns of Praise'—a truly wonderful book."

Tens of Thousands of people—from coast to coast—sing soul-stirring songs every Sunday evening from our music books. Whole-hearted, inspirational singing is the best preparation that can be given a congregation for receiving the gospel message. Do not try to get along with old. worn out books. That is a handicap. Introduce "HYMNS OF PRAISE" and its use will greatly multiply the results of your efforts. Sample copy sent upon request. Orchestrated. Sixty days' credit extended.

On this anniversary occasion it is fitting that we should express to our friends our sincere appreciation of their good will and pledge ourselves to continue to render a little better service than is usually expected.

Do You Wish A New Hymnal?

Hymns of the Centuries is the FIRST dignified hymnal to be published with the words printed within the music staff.

The publishers of a competing book which closely resembles "Hymns of the Centuries" in form and content, claim that theirs is "The hymnal that is revolutionizing congregational singing in hundreds of churches"!

If this be true, "Hymns of the Centuries," published six years before the other, started the revolution!

The fact is, hundreds of churches are using "Hymns of the Centuries" with ever increasing satisfaction. Pastors report that their congregational singing has improved wonderfully.

"Hymns of the Centuries" was first published in 1911. So popular did it become and so successful was the plan of printing the words within the staff, that two other hymn books followed the same plan, one in 1916 and the other in 1921.

Notwithstanding this fact, "Hymns of the Centuries" is still the favorite. Why? Because it retains the old and well loved hymns set to the right tunes, while it gives ample space to hymns of Social Service, Brotherhood, the Kingdom of God and the Spiritual Life.

"Hymns of the Centuries" does not sacrifice the dearly loved hymns and tunes for those untried selections that have not proved themselves worthy of a place in a modern, usable and thoroughly satisfactory hymnal.

THE CRISIS OF THE CHURCHES

By LEIGHTON PARKS, D.D.

Rector of Saint Bartholomew's Church, New York

Dr. Parks derives a powerful text from which to plead the cause of church unity from the present crisis of world civilization—a condition, in the author's own words, "so dreadful that not a few serious-minded men are asking themselves if Western civilization is about to fail." The author sees Christian unity as the imperative need of the hour, and it is to point a way to that end that he has written this book.

and more than sixty others who are waiting for baptism. Dr. W. S. Abernathy and Mr. W. T. Shepherd have gone to Poland where conditions are less favorable than in Bohemia. They have visited Danzig, Lodz and Warsaw. In Warsaw the America workers were greeted with a great audience, and in this audience were important officials of the government.

Reinforce Mission Study With Lantern Slides

The young people and the women's societies of the various denominations will study India this year as their field of missionary interest. In order to assist in visualizing the materials in the textbook, "India in Transition" the Methodist board has gotten out a fresh stereopticon lecture upon the subject. Some older sets are also available, including "The India Mass Movement" and one called "Sarju the Outcast." The slides are distributed by the area secretary. The Presbyterians also have lantern slide sets on India which will be used this year in more churches than formerly.

Baptists See Realization of Religious Liberty

Were Roger Williams to revisit earth at the time the Baptist World Alliance meets in Stockholm, July 21-27, 1923, he would be agreeably surprised at the progress which has been made on behalf of his ideals. In many countries where religious liberty was denied three centuries ago, it is now completely established. In other countries progress has been made so the Baptist of continental Europe dares to erect his own conventicle and to carry on public services of his religion. The independency of the Baptist faith is being modified with the coming of a world consciousness in the communion. The catholic ideal is succeeding parochialism. Churches are being bound together, not by labored agreements in the field of doctrine, but by mutual service. The Stockholm meeting will reveal considerable latitude in doctrinal holdings, but a determination that the world round Baptists shall bear one another's burdens.

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

AN OPPORTUNITY TO HELP

TWO WORTHY ALABAMA SCHOOLS

DOWNING INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL
Brewton, Alabama.

This school, established in 1906, had that year an enrollment of 9; a faculty of 2; a property valuation of $4,000; and 1 building. Now the school has an enrollment of 185; a faculty of 16; 7 buildings, and a property valuation of $175,000.

This school was established to provide an education and Christian training to poor girls who, without this school, would grow up in ignorance. We need help. Work on a badly needed dormitory has been suspended for lack of funds. You can establish scholarships at this school, and lift poor girls from ignorance to light, and fit them for efficient service. Will you help?

COLEY-BLACKSHER VOCATIONAL SCHOOL BOR BOYS
Hadley, Alabama.

This school was established one year ago. We have been given 2,124 acres of land, but have only one dormitory and one small school room.

There are probably 1500 Indians in this community without church or school facilities; also a community of Negroes without adequate school opportunities. It is our purpose to try to provide an opportunity for all these. Our people have been generous, but here is an opportunity for others to help us with their money to build American citizens. Will you help? Address the president.

PAULINE TAYLOR HALL
Donation of Miss Cornelia A. Taylor, of Quaker Hill.

YOUR OPPORTUNITY

If you would immortalize yourself, here is your opportunity. You can provide money to help build, equip and maintain these two schools, which were established for those who without outside help must grow up in ignorance. We give a cordial invitation to our friends in the North and elsewhere to visit us at Brewton. We will entertain you free of charge. O, Friends, will you not hear and heed this Macedonian cry? Are We a Nation of Low-Brows?

It is charged that the public is intellectually incompetent. Is this true? It is charged that the public is afraid of ideas, disinclined to think, unfriendly to culture. This is a serious matter. The facts should be faced frankly and honestly.

Without Cultural Leadership

The main criticism, as we find it, is that the people support ventures that are unworthy, that represent no cultural standards. The public is fed on low-brow reading matter, low-brow movies, low-brow theatrical productions, low-brow music, low-brow newspapers, low-brow magazines. We think the criticism is unfair in that it does not recognize the fact that the public is without cultural leadership. Those who have the divine spark get off by themselves. We believe the public has never had a real chance, never had an opportunity to get acquainted with the great and the beautiful things of life. Given half a chance, the public will respond.

We believe there has been enough talk about the public's inferior taste. The time has come to give the public an opportunity to find out something about philosophy, science and other higher things. And it must be done at a low price, because the average person's pocketbook is not fat. As it stands, the publishers charge about five dollars a volume, and then wonder why the people stand aloof.

We believe we have a way to find out if the people are interested in the deeper problems of life. And the first thing we decided was to fix a price that shall be within the reach of the person with the most slender purse.

We have selected a library of 25 books, which we are going to offer the public at an absurdly low price. We shall do this to find out if it is true that the public is not going to accept the better things when once given the chance. And we shall make the price so inviting that there shall be no excuse on the ground of expense.

All Great Things Are Simple

Once the contents of the following 25 books are absorbed and digested we believe a person will be well on the road to culture. And by culture we do not mean something dry-as-dust, something incomprehensible to the average mind—genuine culture, like sculpture, can be made to delight the common as well as the elect The books listed below are all simple works and yet they are great—all great things are simple. They are serious works, of course, but we do not think the public will refuse to put its mind on serious topics. Here are the 25 books:

Are the People Ready to Read These 25 Books?

Schopenhauer's Essays. For those who regard philosophy as a thing of abstractions, vague and divorced from life, Schopenhauer will be a revelation.

The Trial and Death of Socrates. This is dramatic literature as well as sound philosophy.

Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. This old Roman emperor was a paragon of wisdom and virtue. He will help you.

The Discovery of the Future. H. G. Wells asks and answers the question: Is life just an unsolvable, haphazard struggle?

Dialogues of Plato. This volume takes you into Plato's immortal circle.

Foundations of Religion. Prof. Cook asks and answers the question: Where and how did religious ideas originate?

Studies in Pessimism. Schopenhauer presents a well-studied viewpoint of life. The substance of his philosophy.

The Idea of God in Nature. John Stuart Mill. How the idea of God may come naturally from observation of nature is explained in this volume.

Life and Character. Goethe. The fruits of his study and observation is explained in this volume.

Thoughts of Pascal. Pascal thought a great deal about God and the Universe, and the origin and purpose of life.

The Olympian Gods. Tichenor. A study of ancient mythology.

The Stoic Philosophy. Prof. Gilbert Murray. He tells what this belief consisted of, how it was discovered, and what we can today learn from it.

God: Known and Unknown. Samuel Butler. A really important work.

Nietzsche: Who He Was and What He Stood For. A carefully planned study.

Sun Worship and Later Beliefs. Tichenor. A most important study for those who wish to understand ancient religions.

Primitive Beliefs. Tichenor. You get a clear idea from this account of the beliefs of primitive man.

Three Lectures on Evolution. Ernst Haeckel's ideas expressed so you can understand them.

From Monkey to Man. A comprehensive review of the Darwinian theory.

Survival of the Fittest. Another phase of Darwinian theory.

Evolution vs. Religion. You should read this discussion.

Reflections on Modern Science. Prof. Huxley's reflections definitely add to your knowledge.

Biology and Spiritual Philosophy. An interesting and instructive work.

Bacon's Essays. These essays contain much sound wisdom that still holds.

Emerson's Essays. Emerson was a friend of Carlyle, and in some respects a greater philosopher.

Tolstoi's Essays. His ideas will direct you into profitable paths of thought.

If these 25 books were issued in the ordinary way they might cost you as much as a hundred dollars. We have decided to issue them so you can get all of them for the price of one ordinary book. That sounds inviting, doesn't it? And we mean it too. Here are 25 books, containing 2,176 pages of text, all neatly printed on good book paper, 3½x5 inches in size, bound securely in card cover paper.

You can take these 25 books with you when you go to and from work. You can read them in your spare moments. You can slip four or five of them into a pocket and they will not bulge. You can investigate the best and the soundest ideas of the world's greatest philosophers—and the price will be so low as to astonish you. No, the price will not be $25 for the 25 volumes. Nor will the price be $5. The price will be even less than half that sum. Yes, we mean it. Believe it or not, the price will be only $1.95 for the entire library. That's less than a dime a volume. In fact, that is less than eight cents per volume. Surely no one can claim he cannot afford to buy the best. Here is the very best at the very least. Never were such great works offered at so low a price. All you have to do is to sign your name and address on the blank below. You don't have to send any money. Just mail us the blank and we will send you the 25 volumes described on this page—you will pay the postman $1.95 plus postage. And the books are yours.

If you want to send cash with order, remit $2.25.

Are we making a mistake in advertising works of culture? Are we doing the impossible when we ask the people to read serious works? Are we wasting our time and money? We shall see by the manner in which the blank below comes into our mail.

FLASHES OF DESPAIR!

FROM RUSSIA:

"No rain. Complete crop failure in some sections; best areas yield far below normal. We are again facing a famine, the severity of which will increase with each month of the coming winter. Decreases in our district this year: Population, 23%; horses, 72%; cows, 59%."

FROM POLAND:

"The magnitude of the devastation in Poland is unsuspected by the rest of the world. There are 400 miles of battle front which have gone back to wilderness. Destitute refugees are returning to find that their villages have vanished. Many face the horror of another winter in overcrowded dugouts."

FROM AUSTRIA:

"With conditions due to depreciation of krone growing hourly worse, and distress in Vienna rapidly increasing, the call for relief during the coming winter will be far beyond the resources of any relief mission."

Such extracts typify the latest despatches received from Quaker workers in Russia, Poland and Austria.

The American Friends Service Committee, with five years of experience in the administration of war and post-war relief, has units in all three fields aiding these sister nations in their hour of need. The extent to which aid can be rendered is limited only by the amount of funds received. The overhead expenses of the Committee are met by the Society of Friends; its workers are already on the field.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

America's Children Young Pagans

THE surprise that some people express with regard to the ever increasing juvenile delinquency is hardly justified in view of the educational program provided for the average child. The Dayton News asserts that "nineteen out of every twenty Jewish children under twenty-five years of age receive no religious instruction; three out of every four Catholic children receive no formal religious instruction; two out of every three Protestant children receive no formal religious instruction. Or, taking the country as a whole, seven out of every ten children and youth of the United States under twenty-five years of age are not being touched in any way by the educational program of any church. This calls up a vital question: How long may a nation endure, with seven out of ten children and youth receiving no systematic instruction in the religious and moral sanctions upon which its democratic institutions rest?" Are the great moral imperatives instinctive, coming in the natural course of things, or are they principles which are imparted only by an educational process? Were moral principles instincts, then we would expect to find the human race the same in its conscience around the world. That is just what we do not find. People have no higher moral standards than are imparted by the instruction of the family, the tribe, the church and the nation. With the improvement in public facilities, the American family has largely abdicated its responsibility for the moral training of children, not to mention their religious training. Not long since a woman complained to her pastor of the inefficiency of the Sunday school, asserting that her little girl knew no Bible at all. The pastor's reply was a question: "How can the little girl of Christian parents be completely ignorant of the Bible even though she never went to Sunday school at all?" Why should the community bear the total responsibility of rearing this woman's children? The Sunday school may be quite as inefficient as religious educators say it is. So long as it is the only public agent of religious education, it should command the best people of the church as teachers and it should certainly be supported by the family in its modest demands for punctuality, regularity and home study.

The Creed of World Peace

DR. Jowett, in his ringing appeal to the churches to mobilize the Christian conscience against the drift toward war, proposes that we have a day set apart when the congregations of all communions shall simultaneously and audibly express their desire for a sacred peace and their faith in the common brotherhood of mankind. So far good, but why have only one day for an affirmation of faith in the fraternity of humanity? Why should such a faith not be a part of the creed of the church every day? One day, however picturesque and dramatic its ceremonial, is no sufficient expression of faith in human brotherhood. Next to faith in God, the Father, faith in the brotherhood of man is the most fundamental article of Christian belief—far more fundamental than many dogmas which are recited in the creeds of the churches year in and year out. Brotherhood is no mere poetic fancy in the teaching of Jesus; it is the very essence of his gospel. The plain truth is that Christianity has not failed, but is only now being discovered—our journey hitherto having been a slow advance toward Christianity. The discovery of what is really fundamental in Christianity will draw our divided churches closer together, and, perhaps, in a desperate hour, lead a united church into the widening breach between snarling nations and envious classes, and so rescue civilization from impending ruin. Great social ideals can only be realized under religious influence and inspiration, and for this we need an education of faith, not merely on one day, but all the time and by all the instrumentalities at command.

The New Jewish Ritual of Social Justice

THE problem before the modern world is the creation and cultivation of socially minded men and women, and this labor has only just begun. A significant token of this tendency, and of the rapid advance being made, is the new ritual of social justice in the observance of the Day of Atonement in the Jewish church. Indeed, the revised ritual of that high and solemn day, always the most impressive day in the Hebrew calendar, reads like a sociological essay, and the New York Times even detects in it a leaning toward socialism. "Great plenty and abject poverty," it says, "exist side by side. No peace of mind is possible when one lives in the shadow of unwarranted economic uncertainty and in the fear of industrial power that is felt to be used arbitrarily." All through the vocabulary is that of the modern publicist, but the spirit is that of the mighty prophet of the Old Testament. The prayers, prepared by the Association of American Rabbis, breathe the same passion for justice, responsibility, and the growing need of a more humane social order. "Affliction of the body and fasting alone cannot cleanse the soul of sin. These are the true means of atonement: let justice well up as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream. Show compassion every man to his brother; speak ye the truth every man to his neighbor. Do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God." Only by fraternal righteousness among men may we hope to realize atonement with the Father of men.

The Widespread Habit of Seeing Red

MODERN psychology has provided a new word which is proving itself convenient on many occasions. People with a mild form of a mania are supposed to have a "complex." A group of our fellow-citizens seem to have developed a "red" complex. They imagine the country full of spies from Russia. Some very worthy charities the past year have had the label "red" pasted on them, and the relief of famine in continental Europe halted. Mr. Paxton Hibben, representing Russian relief, is now being represented as a dangerous "red" in syndicated articles appearing in the newspapers from the pen of R. M. Whitney. Mr. Paxton Hibben proposes to sue his traducers in a court of law for the sake of other men who have suffered in a similar way. He has been represented as stealing important state documents in Brazil and escaping in disguise. He asserts he was never in Brazil in his life, and never employed in a consulate. It is this evil spirit of suspicion that has kept our government from coming to an understanding with Russia. President Harding stood for this course at the time of his inauguration. But the country has been sown down with the lies of conservative propagandists, and this policy has not been carried out. The present situation in the near east might have been all different had the United States carried out the President's announced policy. The worst result of the "red" complex is that men are arrested in various parts of the United States for "radicalism." This country, which was once the boasted haven of any man who wished to speak his mind freely, is now in the unenviable position of being the most illiberal republic in the world. Men of public affairs assume one of their functions to be that of a sort of wet nurse to truth. In a democracy, men have lost faith in democracy. Instead of meeting radicalism with conservatism, a cowardly spirit has sought the use of policemen and prisons to stamp out opinions that seem undesirable. Meanwhile the wave of intolerance has swept on over the church. One could find churchmen who would use the fagot if they had the opportunity. One would commend to this generation the reading of such ancient documents as John Locke's Letters on Toleration and a well known book by John Milton.

Where Home Life Fails

HOME has lost something of its sacred meaning under the circumstances of modern life. Father goes off to business in the morning before the children are up. Mother is very busy with the clubs. The children not only have their school work, but they soon wander about the community without anybody being responsible for them. The new novel by Hutchinson, "This Freedom," gives a picture of the home life of a modern woman in such convincing terms as to make it a very disturbing book in thousands of households. With his suggestion that motherhood is losing its sacred meaning and that children come to a bad end because they have never had a mother, he challenges thought. The book is one-sided in that it strongly emphasizes the failure of modern motherhood without at the same time giving an adequate portrayal of the failure of modern fatherhood. One is glad to pick up a book once more in which married love is not befouled with the meanderings of the psychoanalyst. In "This Freedom" the unfaithful mother is at least a faithful wife. She goes to her own work in the office every day while her husband goes to his. But she is not forever flirting with other men, nor dallying with possible adultery. She has an honest monagamous love for a splendid man. She is a normal modern woman in whose heart love has its rightful place, but deluded with the modern gospel of the emancipated woman, she tries to bring up her children with a nurse maid. The study of the psychology of these neglected children is deftly done. One can see just such boys and girls in every city. They are selfish, restless and unadjusted. They lack the guidance of great ambitions. Perhaps the tragedy which befalls this family of children savors of the melodramatic. One boy goes to prison and ends up in Canada a refugee. The girl dies in an abortion, and her younger brother commits suicide. The motherhood that Rosalie Ocleve denied her own children, she gives to a grandchild when at last she perceives that motherhood means sacrifice. The book will call back to the path of grateful duty many a careless American parent.

Juggling With the Destiny of Nations

UNFORTUNATELY we do not know the author of "The Pomp of Power," who prefers to remain anonymous, save that he is a Canadian, and was intimately associated with Mr. Lloyd George both in war and in peace. He writes neither as a friend nor as an enemy of the prime minister, but as a keenly interested and finely balanced observer of things at close hand. His book is a thoroughly competent and fully documented piece of work, with many close up views of Haig, Joffre, Briand, Wilson, Clemenceau, Northcliffe, and, of course, Lloyd George. It is indeed an annihilating analysis of the policies of the peace conference, the tragedy of which is told in two cutting sentences: "Mr. Lloyd George often got the better of Mr. Wilson and sometimes of M. Clemenceau. But Wilson either did not realize it or awoke to the fact too late; while Clemenceau always knew it, and when he had to bow to it he did so sardonically, as part of the game." Exactly, it was a game of dice, but always a game, in which the players were apparently more eager to outwit each other than to devise a stable peace. It was a game with the existence of civilization as the stake, in which men juggled with the destiny of nations—like the sleepy old game of whist in Washington which is said to have brought on the American civil war—and it is this idea of international relations as a game, a matter of clever dicker and deal, that must be done away forever. Hereafter the peoples will "listen in," demanding to know why they are pawns in the hands of clever diplomats about a green table. The anonymous author of "The Pomp of Power" has written a greater book than the Gentleman With a Duster will ever live to write.

"Spiritual Energies In Daily Life"

DR. Rufus Jones is not only a great scholar, but one of the noblest living interpreters of spiritual experience; and in his new book, "Spiritual Energies in Daily Life," he seeks to show busy, distracted modern folk, who are living truncated, inhibited, and undeveloped lives, how to find the rest of themselves through religious faith and service. It is one of the best books on practical mysticism so far written; a study of religion as energy, a source of power, a dynamic for the defeat of disillusion and all the grey moods that beshadow faith and personality in this after-war world. Such books are greatly needed, because the mystical element has been too much neglected, if not driven out of religious life, with the result that it leads to all kinds of spiritual boot-legging by cults of many kinds; and no man among us is better fitted to lead us in this field of spiritual exploration than Dr. Jones. Our troubles, he tells us, consist largely now of failure to lay hold of moral and spiritual forces that lie near at hand and to utilize powers that are within easy reach. Paul, Augustine, Francis, Luther, Wesley, Fox, lived in dismal times, when the world seemed bereft of vision; but they found power to transform their times and to create new types of spiritual society. That power is with us still, if we know how to discover it and use it. The chapter on "Psychology and the Spiritual Life" is a welcome relief after so many books which deal with psychology without the clear and wise insight which this book reveals, and which it expresses with so much literary charm.

The Quiet Work of Scientific Research

IN the midst of the disturbances which mark many areas of modern life, it is a satisfaction to note the ceaseless efforts which men and women devoted to the study of facts are making to master the story of the physical universe, and convert it to practical uses. Scientific inquiry is the domain in which most assured knowledge has come to assignable values in our generation. In comparison with whatever progress has been made in the fields of philosophy, ethics, religion, politics and education, over so many of which the dead hand of tradition and authority maintains its control, physical science with unprecedented ardor has pushed out into every province of investigation where actual facts awaited discovery and classification. There is a certain exhilaration in the thought that so many thousands of devoted and enthusiastic workers are turning up results daily that fit into the marvelous and fascinating narrative of the physical universe. All the sciences are making their daily contributions through the researches of tireless observers in laboratories, observatories, clinics, experiment stations, and unwearying journeys of investigation by land and sea. Most of this work is unknown outside the limits of highly specialized groups of students, or in the publications of technical journals. It makes its way only slowly into the wider area of general information. Yet it is proceeding without cessation. And if the cosmic order could be conscious of the process, as dreamers have sometimes believed it might be, there would be without question a mystic satisfaction in yielding up these priceless secrets for the enlightenment and enrichment of men. Paul talked about the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain, waiting patiently yet eagerly for the revealing of the sons of God, the disclosure of reality, assured knowledge, which they alone who are worthy to be called sons of God, the selfish seekers after truth, are competent to bring to light. When one reads of the departure of Raul Amundsen on a new quest of investigation regarding the polar zone; when the story of Donald McMillan's latest voyage to add to the world's information regarding other sections of the far north is recited; when the records of the American expedition into Manchuria and Mongolia are read, telling of astonishing discoveries of the remains of prehistoric life, matching similar fossils in Utah and Idaho; when one reads of the extensive and costly preparations being made by a dozen universities in various lands to capitalize by photographic and spectroscopic observation the solar and lunar phenomena that will be disclosed during the brief space of four minutes at the time of the approaching total eclipse of the sun, along a narrow zone touching barren tracts in Australia, and a few desolate islands of the South Pacific, he obtains a suggestion of the ceaseless and inexhaustible labor that is going on in a hundred areas to push back the curtains of ignorance, and let in the light of intelligence. And this field of physical science is but one of the many tracts where the work of the explorer is proceeding. It is just now a little more purposeful and valuable, because it is less hampered by conservatism and tradition. But it is the prophecy of what must be attempted in all the provinces of human interest. And the results in all will be as astonishing and worthful. It is reality alone that is of value. It is truth alone that makes free.

Releasing the Prophets

A NEW form of endowment has been discovered in our day. It is the endowment of men of unusual power as exponents of important ideas so that they are able to devote all their energies to the dissemination of the truths which they have come to evaluate as the supreme ideas of the age. By the discovery of such men, and their release from hindering obligations of financial character, certain great causes are receiving continuous interpretation of the most intensive and convincing order. It has long been understood that the endowment of a college, university, journal, library or other foundation is a most effective means of spreading knowledge and promoting human welfare. It is increasingly apparent that the endowment of men of high gifts is even more immediate in its results, and reaches an even wider public with the same measure of investment. It is the release of a prophet for effective proclamation of the truth.

The economic phases of the prophet's work are always an interesting study. How did the men whose names are linked with the vocation of moral and religious leadership support themselves in antiquity? And was the value of their service promoted or lessened by the limitations of their resources? It is natural to think of the men whose names are most familiar in this role as quite above the level of economic solicitude. There was something unearthly, was there not, about their calling which lifted them above the sordid needs of food, clothing and family budgets? Yet with rare exceptions it is probable that the intellectual and spiritual leaders of every age have found themselves held to rather rigorous attention to the commonplaces of financial means and ends.

Amos, one of the most impressive of the preachers of Israel in the rising period of prophecy, was a farmer whose income was derived from the meagre stock of beef and fruit which he sold in the market cities of the two small kingdoms. Micah appears to have belonged to the same agrarian class, if one may judge from his insistent denunciation of the rich landlords of the western slope of Palestine, who were making the tenent husbandmen of their region wretched with their merciless exactions. It may be that Isaiah and Hosea were men of property, at least sufficient to make a daily vocation unnecessary to them. And it is certain that Jeremiah had a sufficient inheritance from the ancestral estate at Anathoth to permit him to buy additional property when that act had the value of encouragement for his besieged and beloved Jerusalem. Of the other prophets no word has survived to make clear their economic status. But it may well be true that their support was in part derived from the so-called schools of the prophets, the only educational foundations of the age, or from the gifts of devoted friends and disciples who mediated their teachings to wider communities, set down their words in records the scanty remains of which have survived to our day, and provided for their support.

In the circle of Jesus the question of supply was variously solved. Some of the disciples were men of affairs, engaged in different forms of trade, or possessing homes and families to which they returned on occasion, and from which their needs were met. Others, like the Master, had no property or income, and subsisted on the gifts which ardent friends supplied. A little treasury was thus provided for the most urgent demands, and in those regions where the greater part of Jesus' ministry lay, hospitality was free and the needs were few. Some men of wealth joined the movement in its earlier period, such as Barnabas, but their possessions were soon placed at the disposal of the entire group in what appears to have been an ill-advised attempt at a common treasury, and the number of the poor who attached themselves to the new enterprise was large.

Paul, the greatest missionary of early Christianity, though probably a man of property in his family relations, intimates that he sacrificed it all for the faith; unless perhaps he may have treasured some portion of it for the supreme days of opportunity during his stay in Rome. At least it is certain that he labored with his own hands to support himself in the cities of his evangelistic labors, and took gifts of money only from tried and trusted brethren, such as those at Philippi. The money he was at such pains to gather from the non-Jewish churches he saw safely delivered by the hands of trusted friends into the charge of the leaders of the Jerusalem church. How much wider, safer, and longer might have been that notable ministry of the apostle's if there had been some means for his maintenance, such as the church has learned to provide in later years for the release of its representatives from the most exacting cares of self-support.

For the church has slowly discovered that there are great souls who ought to be set at liberty to employ all their powers in the notable ways which preaching and scholarly tasks make evident. The centralized and controlled churches, like those of the Greek and Latin communions, have always recognized the necessity of releasing their strong men from the routine of detail and administration for the supreme activities of public speech and private scholarship. The church of England has pursued a like policy. Nominal attachments to some cathedral or scholastic institution have provided livings for men who were thereby left free to follow in their own unfettered way the high callings of preaching or of authorship as they might elect. And the masters of church administration have felt that the funds at their disposal were well bestowed in making possible the rare achievements of such ornaments to the pulpit and the cloister. Some of the greatest names in the roll of modern British scholarip are those of men whose services in research and the opularization of scholarship were made possible by hurch foundations.

In America the duty of the church to scholarship has een obscured by the slow development of educational inrest, and the absorption of religious resources in denomiational competition Preachers, even the greatest of them, ave been limited to the parochial obligations of performg many different sorts of work. Only rarely has a great rophet of the faith been recognized as a national asset, and eleased from confining ministries to perform a broader ervice. A few colleges and universities have permitted eir ablest teachers to render to the communities and the ation the benefits they could yield. Most of the rich inds of the American academic group have been comelled to devote themselves with absorbed attention to the etails of class-room instruction, longing evermore for the eedom which at least partial release from these duties ould offer for research and writing.

As long as college and university administrations limit eir interest to groups of students in their class-rooms, d fail to understand the obligations to their communities d the nation to release their strongest men for some easure of approved and endowed service as speakers, riters, and public leaders, and as long as the churches exust themselves in denominational rivalries and the efrt to build up sectarian establishments rather than to ve some portion of their intellectual and spiritual posssions freely and as a trust to the wider world, so long ill both the university and the churches fail of their most nportant function. But both are learning, and the rease of the prophets of scholarship and of religion for suprted and generously offered service in extra-mural aces is an encouraging, though late-arriving, sign of the mes.

In the meantime the opportunity for individual promoon of the public work of strong men is increasingly aprent. In some rare instances it has been possible for ose with the most useful gifts and of great power as inrpreters of religious, educational or economic truth to ve wide-spread proclamation of these themes at their vn charges. It is a great service which is rendered when man of wealth has also a timely message to deliver as his ntribution to the progress and the amendment of the age. few such there are, and they are heard with the greater tisfaction that there can be no misinterpretation of their otives.

But those who possess this combination of ability and reurces are few. A larger group is that which could utter word of the very highest value for the enlightenment of e nation if they could be released for this purpose. Men wealth are endowing universities, churches, libraries and her useful public agencies. Why should not some of them dow a man who possesses the true prophetic spirit to end the remainder of his effective life in the nationwide terpretation of a compelling theme which all his fellows ould understand? There are a few great preachers in e nation whom it is a mistake to confine to one congreation and one city. Most men find their best results in a mited sphere. But some there are whom all the people should be permitted to hear. Some inspiring interpreters of the Bible ought to be offered freely to many localities rather than limited to one. Prophets of the social message there are for whose stimulating word a multitude waits, and they are kept in a limited circle by institutional necessity. And not a few there are who in these tense and nervous days, when the sharp edge of international suspicion and animosity seems ready to cut again into the half-healed wounds of the world, ought to become apostles of peace and proclaimers of the duty of the hour to a disturbed and distracted people.

If there is satisfaction in the endowment of institutions, still greater is the satisfaction of endowing men to perform unceasingly and through years the service one would like himself to be able to obtain. A few instances there are of this order of personal endowment. In such cases there is little danger of any limitation of the full freedom of the message. For those who are worthy to be the prophets of great truth are, like the moral leaders of old, accountable to their own consciences and to God alone for the message they voice. But their friends who make possible their work of public speech may well feel honored by the relationship and the privilege. It is the release of the prophets for their larger and truer task.

Too Much History

ONE of the sage discoveries of the distinguished newspaper correspondent, Walter J. Woof, after "looking over the situation" abroad, is, that Europe is afflicted with too much history. His final deduction from all the facts available is that "the trouble with Europe is the same thing as the trouble with America. They are both inhabited by the human race." The very profundity of this observation compels admitting that he does not "see what can be done about it." Of the less elemental and constitutional ailment, namely, the malady of too much history, he does not appear quite so hopeless. Why, indeed, should it not be possible for forward-looking populations to dispense with historical trumperies? We in America are in no such desperate state as is Europe, but even we might profit by the same relief. It is one of the refinements of religion to "forget the things that are behind." Zeal to press forward toward the things before was never a holier virtue than in these distraught times. If both Europe and America could discover, or search out, or work out, or find revealed, this fundamental religion, the way of salvation would lie before us plain and joyous. Henry Ford's scorn of history may fail to take account of its inherent benisons, but the history business is certainly overdone. He is partly right. Idolatry of racial traditions and nursing of ages-old animosities, which go far to "Balkanize" the whole of Europe, not only condemn that continent to turmoil and relative poverty, but such passions violate all the sanctities of religion, not particularly to specify the Christian religion.

Our American civilization was inaugurated with a fine scorn of grandfathers. They are slipping back into their old seat by the fireside and about the council table of state, church, and commercial enterprise, having lost too little of their old querulousness and timidity. Loyal sons will not begrudge them a degree of dignity and influence, for American civilization suffers from recklessness, as well as from reaction and conservatism. But the present distressing estate of Europe should warn our younger society of the perils of this terrible spiritual blight, this deadening irreligion which religious officialism too often champions. History cannot teach us everything. History which cultivates hate is a terrible curse. We should draw upon all the spiritual resources of a faith which bids us "forget the things which are behind."

Remembering these things behind is the essence of our current denominationalism. Inability to forget that one's father and grandfather were Methodists or Baptists, or belonged to some other one of the almost infinite variety of sects which our turbulent religious history has bequeathed to us, is the only substantial support left for the decadent and increasingly impotent denominational order. If we could truly forget this history, then the concentrated aspirations and endeavors of those who sincerely love God and their fellowmen would speedily usher in the millenium, an era of grace capable of making insipid the utmost bliss which the fundamentalist promises through his cataclysms and vanquished heresies. Here is indeed triumph for the Christian religion: let it teach all men the bane of "too much history," of loyalty to barren traditions which foment jealousies and pit race against race, nation against nation, "first families" against aspiring peasantries, adherents of historic orthodoxy against liberals and progressives. Give us a faith for today; a confidence in the virtues and vitalities of our own generation; a sense of the reality which is here and now. Would not some of us be amazed to discover in such a faith the true religion?

The Backfire

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I KNOW not how it is done, but this I know, that sometimes an Automobile doth send its spark in the Wrong Direction.

Once upon a time, which was a few days ago, a man set forth, he and his wife and his friend and his friend's wife, and they undertook a Little Ride in the Country in an Open Car. And they came upon a Railway Track, and there the Car stopped. And when they essayed to start it, then did the spark ignite the Gas,, but it went not out so as to make the wheels go around, but it Back-fired.

And about that time I arrived.

Now, the manner of my arrival was this. I was on an Express Train, and we came thundering down the track, and we turned a curve, and we struck a Car that was Blazing. For the Back-fire had set fire to the car, so that the Combustible parts of it were aflame, and its mechanism did melt with Fervent Heat. And about the time it was Red Hot came the Whistle of our Train, and the people in the Car jumped out and held their breath and said a little prayer for us.

Now, I was in the very front Coach behind the Engine, when we suddenly bumped into that car at the rate of Forty Miles an Hour, and we picked it up, and tangled its mechanism in our running gear, so that the flame of the Blazing Gasoline was about my Coach, and upon my side of it. And we went through fire, even as did Elijah, but there were no horses on our chariot, and we stopped a little way this side of Heaven, though not so very far. And the Automobile was a few pounds of Junk, and we were scorched and battered, but able to limp to the next station where they gave us another Engine.

Now there was a man upon the train who lifted up his voice and said, The great Day of the Lord is near. Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

And I said, Be silent. As for the speed, our train was not going too fast, and the Automobile was not going fast enough; and if there be any increase in Knowledge, thou has been omitted in the distribution.

And I knew that I had the sympathy of the folk upon the train, for it was not a time in which men wanted to hear talk that darkened counsel by words without knowledge. And indeed it had been for a few moments a Terrifying Experience, and there were certain that cried out in fear. For we knew not what had occurred, but only that suddenly we were Enveloped in Flame, and it seemed as if we should have been consumed.

Now it occurred to me that it was probably some small defect in the mechanism, or in the lack of skill of him who handled it and got rattled, that that machine Back-fired and balked, and a very little change in the one or the other would have taken that Car off the track and sent it humming down the road; whereas, it became a Total Wreck, and very nearly spoiled the day for us.

And I said unto myself that I had known men whose spiritual mechanism has the same faulty adjustment, so that they Back-fire when they should produce a good spark, and go steadily down the road. For there be wrecks that might be saved and perils that might be avoided if men would get a new Spark Plug in their intelligence or their disposition.

Revelation

SAY not that death is king, that night is lord,
That loveliness is passing, beauty dies;
Nor tell me hope's a vain, deceptive dream
Fate lends to life, a pleasing, luring gleam
To light awhile the earth's despondent skies,
Till death brings swift and sure its dread reward.
Say not that youth deceives, but age is true,
That roses quickly pass, while cypress bides,
That happiness is foolish, grief is wise,
That stubborn dust shall choke our human cries.
Death tells new worlds, and life immortal hides
Beyond the veil, which shall all wrongs undo.
This was the tale God breathed to me at dawn
When flooding sunrise told that night was gone.

Studies In Sin

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

I. The Sin of Spiritual Immaturity

IT has been said that the present generation "is not troubled about its sins." As there is a measure of truth in this, so is there a reason for it, namely, that the traditional treatment of sin has been theological rather than psychological, social and personal. Theology tends to abstraction. By removing its subject matter out of the context of religious experience, it robs it of much of its concreteness; and by studying sin and virtue apart from sinful or virtuous personalities, a flavor of unreality is imparted to its whole ethical system. The scriptural method of approach is very different. Scriptural theology and its implied ethics—till we come to St. Paul, at all events—being prevailingly biographical and historical, are bound up with the bundle of life and palpitant with personal values. This is also the scientific method, since actual sin is always the resultant of complex life-situations, where alone it can be studied aright. This can be done in two ways—in history and biography, as we have said, or in the great imaginative literature of the world. In the latter, however, we have a double advantage. In the first place, we have the aesthetic, intuitive approach, which interprets life more surely than logical analysis or biographical appraisements; and, in the second place, art achieves the paradox of producing "types" that are at the same time not abstractions, but of the very concrete stuff of life itself.

* * * * *

I have chosen for our first study that of a soul that never grew up ---Ibsen's Peer Gynt. The mental counterparts of Peer we already know. We call them variously "imbeciles," "feebleminded," "morons," "defectives," but their common denominator is immaturity. They are minds that have never aged, and the sociologists are issuing frantic warnings of the grave danger involved in the multiplication of this "defective" class with its sorry entail of poverty, lust and crime. Not so familiar, however, is the idea of moral and spiritual imbecility. Yet it just as surely exists. Consciences can be graded according to soul-age. Aborted characters exist as well as aborted minds. These are the ethical morons, mentally alert enough, but childish, freakish, egoistic, irresponsible, devoid of any valid sense of right and wrong. They are to be found in all walks of life, and if we sometimes fail to recognize them, it is because their moral deficiency is often hidden behind mental normality and a bank account. In Peer Gynt, Ibsen gives us the finished type of these ungrown souls.

A REAL PERSONALITY

The story itself is as irreproduceable as Faust or Don Quixote; but the character of Peer though complex, lends itself to analysis. He is no mere imaginative jeu d'esprit, but a real personality in the heroic mould—as real as Falstaff, or Wilhelm Meister. We follow his adventures breathlessly; while we despise him, there are moments when we almost love him for his unconscious knavery and exquisite "alibis." His antics amuse us like those of a naughty child. The egregiousness of his effrontery and prodigality of his invention disturb the gravity of the court even as it pronounces judgment. Besides he is thoroughly self-consistent. His life is lived on a plan from which he never deviates. But it is the plan of the nursery. He never grows up. From beginning to end, he is the boy of the Norwegian hills—the repository of weird superstitions, the creature of unbridled imagination, unable to distinguish, save in spots, between dreams and reality, the prey of moods, the despiser of conventions, the egoist, the coward, the congenital story-teller (liar is too serious a word), the incorrigible rascal, the laughable rogue. Very subtly does the dramatist suggest this perpetual juvenility by placing the action both of the opening and closing scenes in the setting of the Norwegian folklore, to which gnomes and fairies, "bogys" and "trolls" are real. As in youth, so in age, Peer is the child of fancy. Only the reaction in either case is different: the childish wonder gives way in the end to the childish terror. But the world is still that of make-believe.

CHAMPION EGOIST

As in all children, Peer's consuming interest is himself. He is the Champion Egoist. He must hold the center of the stage; he must be always "showing off"; he must himself be the hero of every fairy-tale. But what a queer, "Gyntish self" (it is his own phrase) he worships! Self-preservation, not self-realization, is his motto. Not until the end, and then only dimly enough, does it occur to him that "selves" are dynamic, not static, achievements, not gifts. Therefore, he would never grow old:

> Know you what it is to live?
> . . . . It is to be wafted
> Dryshod down the stream of time
> Wholly, solely as oneself.
> Only in full manhood can I
> Be the man I am, dear child!
> Aged eagle moults his plumage,
> Aged fogey legs declining,
> Aged dame has ne'er a tooth left,
> Aged churl gets withered hands,—
> One and all get withered souls.

And so he fears aging, refusing the only way of achieving a self. He sees the lizards on the rocks and remarks—there is as much sense in it as in most of his philosophy—that they at least preserve their own special stamp as they were "at the primal: Be." A petrified toad in a block of sandstone is for him the symbol of the self-sufficiency he craves.

It is a commonplace of child-psychology that the line between fact and fancy is not sharply drawn. To the normal child the fairies and ogres are as real as breakfast. Its "fibs" are frequently just situations in its fancy-world.

This is Ibsen's main clue to the "childishness" of Peer. He steps on the stage as an overgrown boy, dividing his time between hunting and horseplay, and living in that half-way house between fact and fancy which Shakespeare has immortalized in "Midsummer Night's Dream." We laugh at his lies—gigantic as they are—because they are no more deliberate or malicious than the child's "fibs." He does not mind being found out, since what is there to find out? He will call himself a liar, if need be, and think none the worse of himself for it. He will make the old Norse legends his own: if they are not true, he will make them true. He will ride the reindeer over the Gendin edge like Gudbrand Glesne, the "hunter of the west-hills." He will make love to the Saeter-girls like his mythical name-sake. And, to outdo all his predecessors, he will become a "Troll," wear a tail and wed the Troll-king's daughter!

CLASSIC COMPROMISES

Thus the play instinct, so necessary to the child usurps the function of manhood, and pipes the tune to which his whole life dances. If he is "shifty," it is because the world of fancy is a kaleidoscope; if he is capricious, it is because there is nothing in "make believe" to compel consistency; if he is egoistic, it is because other human beings have no rights in a universe he invents. For the same reason he is the classic Compromiser. When in drunken day dreams he falls foul of the Bogy, that weird shape which, solid yet mist like, bars his way, indifferent to his blows, and utters its oracular "Go roundabout, Peer," he is only visualizing the fact of himself, which never allows him to face a situation squarely, since there are no clear cut distinctions between right and wrong, true and false, in the empire of whim and fancy. And so he never burns his boats behind him. He is an adventurer with the heart of a coward. No crossing Rubicons for him! He will be an Egyptian—but not out and out, mind you; only "on the basis of the Gyntish I." He needs a horse, will give —well, nearly anything for it—

My kingdom, well half of it, say—for a horse! . . . .

His philosophy of life is "dodging"—

The essence of the art of daring,
The art of bravery in act,
Is this: To stand with choice free-foot
Amid the treacherous snares of life,—
To know that even in the rear
A bridge for your retreat stands open—
This theory has borne me on,
Has given my whole career its color.

A past master in protective mimicry, he assumes the form and color of any situation he happens to find himself in—a "nigger trader" in the states, a Moslem prophet in the desert. He is even, after a sort, religious, since to him religion is the Grand Compromise; hence his "repentances" are like the reflex action of the star fish which, nipped as to one of its rays, calmly sheds it and grows another—the sure sign of a primitive development. Characters, souls are not so easily put on and off again!

All of which is just the poet's way of saying that Peer has not "grown up with" Reality. His life long motto is "Let's pretend." In the deepest sense his is a lawless nature, not so much because he does lawless things—though he does plenty of them—as because he has no conception of moral law at all. When he justifies his successful venture as a slave trader and exporter of idols to China by reflecting that he himself cared for his "niggers" and exported missionaries as well as idols—it is no mere Falstaffian badinage; he believes in his "alibi;" it is as reasonable as—well, riding the reindeer; and just as he tells the latter "fib" to his mother, so he will tell this one to God—

What could I do? To stop the trade
With China was impossible,
A plan I hit on—opened straightway
A new trade with the self-same land.
I shipped off idols every spring,
Each autumn sent forth missionaries,
Supplying them with all they needed,
As stockings, Bibles, rum and rice.

For such a man there are no absolute values; he is the simon pure empiricist. Anitra, the desert girl, has rather extravagant contours. Very good:

But what is beauty? a mere convention,
A coin made current by time and place.
. . . .
In the law-bound one misses all intoxication.

Towards the end of the drama there is a passage which Ibsen certainly meant for the final pin-prick of the whole sorry bubble of egotisms and antics that was Peer. It is as if in a single flash of insight Peer did for once face reality, only to find that he had always had his back to it before. He is home again in his native hills, a broken man, yet in spirit as naive as when he left them long years before. He will dodge this issue also. If all his promised lands have proven to be only "Cape Fly-aways"; if he cannot be kaiser, as he had "played-like," of any human realm, at least he can rule over the beasts among whom he lives, and write upon his tomb—

Here rests Peer Gynt, that decent soul,
Kaiser o'er all the other beasts.

But the insight comes—

Kaiser?
  Why you old soothsayer's dupe! (laughs inwardly.)
No kaiser are you: you are naught but an onion.
I am going to peel you now, my good Peer!
You won't escape either by begging or howling.

And peel he does, one layer after another, representing the episodes—and they are no more than episodes—of his life. At last he tediously nears the end—

What an enormous number of swathings!
Is not the kernel soon coming to light?

But kernel there is none—nothing but swathings! With all his adventures he has failed to achieve a soul.

What, then, would Ibsen teach us? For one thing, in his picture of moral imbecility, he is getting very close to the reality of what the theologians call sin. From the psychological standpoint in one of its aspects sin is immaturity—the failure of the inner to keep pace with the outer, a harking back to primitive attitudes in developed situations. The soul's tragedy is that it lags behind in the race; body and mind outstrip it. Sin is the great anachronism; the sinner is the spiritual moron. This, of course, is no more than the familiar evolutionary doctrine of the phrases "the brute inheritance," "jungle ethics" and so forth, which are simply a picturesque way of saying that while we are existing in the age of steam, electricity and wireless, we are oftener than we like to think, willing and acting in the age of the flint arrowhead, or even farther back still, before the human had emerged from the sub-human. Primitive attitudes are reproduced with drab monotony in modern "sins." There is more than an accidental resemblance between the "Cro-Magnard man" who had the playful habit of knocking his neighbor's brains out to steal his venison, and the modern strong arm man who delivers his knockout in Wall Street and bags his millions. The modern divorce court is obviously a reversion to the free loves of forest and cave; and the rage of "Pithecanthropus" (if he belie not his looks) reproduces itself in the "brain storms," "crimes passionelles," "dementiae Americanae," and "hymns-of-hate" of the twentieth century.

PRIMITIVE INSTINCTS

Here we may hearken to the psychoanalysts, who apart from their wilder guesses, appear to have proved that beneath the personalities of all of us there lurks a hitherto scarcely suspected reservoir of primitive instincts and appetites that sometimes play frightful havoc with our lives. It would seem as if there were something in us that only grows up slowly, if at all—the psychoanalysts' version, I suppose, of "original sin"—to bring which under control is the task of the moralist, and to exercise it, the task of religion, which, as William James always insisted,. is itself rooted in the subsconscious. Sin is atavism. But there is a prior atavism to that of the brute; are we not all potentially "sons of God?"

It was no mere whim that led Ibsen to introduce the Sphinx scene, which has so puzzled the commentators. Peer's identification of the sphinx with the bogy is, of course, absurd; he never answers life's riddles rightly. But there is a riddle of the sphinx; and the answer is insoluble because it is never twice the same. The sphinx is Reality, and Peer would reduce it to the stuff of his dreams and childish fancies, which is the very menace of our age. We are loath to face Reality. The reality of our world has changed multitudinously and we are not changing with it. We are not growing up with the universe. The old adage is being altered to read: "tempora mutantur nec nos mutamur in illis." We are victims of ancient illusions, we cling to moth-eaten fables. Our social environment is threatening to outgrow our inherited capacity, and like Peer we invent lies to get around the truth. In politics we trick ourselves with party shibboleths that have long lost all meaning. In international diplomacy the Versailles treaty reflects no advance on the methods of Castelreagh and Talleyrand; nor did its protagonists fail to tack on the, for them, truly Gyntish rider of a league of nations. In literature, as Mr. Noyes points out, we are, in the name of realism, "reducing all reality to ashes"; books are among our best sellers that, to adopt Voltaire's saying about Rousseau, make us "want to run about in the woods on all fours." Art is declining the challenge of the New Reality and finding it easier to talk the childish gibberish of cubism, vorticism, futurism, and God knows what. Our free verse is more nearly allied to free love than we think; both are atavisms, primitive reactions to a developed reality. And as to social life, we have only to read such books as "The Glass of Fashion," Arnold Bennett's "Pretty Lady," or Colonel Repington's "Diary" to realize on the edge of what bottomless gulf of moral infantality we are treading in our Gyntish efforts > to make time stop by jigging and dancing

> And to cope with the current by capering and prancing.

THE DUAL CONSCIENCE

So much for the race; what, now, about the individual? Here Ibsen furnishes us the clue to at least one phase of that puzzling ethical phenomenon—the dual conscience. Why is it certain people, who in their private realtionships are gentle, kind, honorable, the very pattern of propriety, in their public dealings—in business, politics and what not—are hard, tricky, antisocial? The answer is: primitive souls. While, the outside of them has kept pace with a developing environment, the inside of them is still, so to speak, "in the egg." Ethically, they are living in a world of make believe. They reproduce the very self hypnotisms of Peer Gynt. Their sophisms sound like plagiarisms. The old, slave holding class justified themselves, just as he did, by extolling the care they took of their "niggers." The "respectable" brewers and distillers argued that they were engaged in > a vast trade enterprise

> That helps whole thousands in employ.

The financial pirate would balance his knavery by munificence to church and charity. The department store head who underpays his saleswomen, the employer who refuses to install safety devices, the slum landlord who maintains "lung-blocks" and "typhoid foci," are only too ready, as a rule, to write checks for rescue homes and charity societies—which would scarcely need to exist but for unjust industrial conditions. The heads of the public service corporation who are hand in glove with dirty politics and who buy the votes necessary to rob the city, by acquiescence in the "dive" and the gambling den, are not infrequently prominent members and even office holders of the church. These are not the type of the conscious hypocrite. They are just moral morons, grown men with the "ethical mentality" of the nursery. Peer would seem even to have anticipated the war profiteers, in the passage where he proposes to organize his fellow adventurers to foment the war between Greece and Turkey, while he, the moneyed man, will sit back and enjoy the profits of war financing.

> The more you eke the flames of strife,
> The better it will serve my purpose.
> Strike home for freedom and for right!
> Fight! Storm! Make hell hot for the Turks;—
> And gloriously end your days
> Upon the janissaries' lances
> But I—excuse me—I have cash (slaps his pocket)
> And am myself Sir Peter Gynt.

Is the "Sir" an unconscious prophecy of some of the British war titles?

And Peer is religious too, after the Gyntish fashion. That is to say, he is superstitious. His religion is a sort of magic, without ethical content, compounded of equal parts of childish fear and equally childish confidence. "Holy Willie" in Burns' matchless impalement of the Eternal Pharisee, has no advantage over our hero in his belief in special providence. He is rescued alone from one danger—

> No, no, it was more than a chance
> I was to be rescued and they to perish.
> O thanks and praise for that Thou hast kept me
> Hast cared for me, spite of all my sins!—
> (Draws a deep breath.)
> What a marvelous feeling of safety and peace
> It gives one to think oneself specially shielded!

But the very next moment he thinks he hears a lion and as he climbs a tree, soliloquizes—

> If I once can climb up, I'll be sheltered and safe,—
> Most of all if I knew but a Psalm or two.

He thinks that God can be bribed—

> Hist; I've abandoned the nigger plantation!
> And missionaries I've exported to Asia!
> Surely one good turn deserves another!

He has the savage's faith in formulas, and is solicitous about other people's souls. Even when in the shipwreck scene he is pushing the cook off the overturned jullyboat, he holds him a moment and says—

> By this wisp of hair
> I'll hold you: say your Lord's Prayer, quick.

It needs but little imagination to identify in current examples this sort of "religion." Long ago, Henry Drummond pointed out that there were people for whom "salvation" consisted in creeping into the embrace of a "formula," as the hermitcrab creeps into the abandoned shell of some mollusc. So the Gyntish representatives of today would substitute faith in formulas—"orthodoxy," "the atonement," the "gospel," and what not—for the ethical content of religion. Not many years ago, it will be remembered, a prominent churchman died, whose financial operations were responsible for the "wrecking" of great railroad systems, and when his will was opened, it was found to begin with a solemn asseveration of his assurance of salvation through the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ. Truly a Gyntish twist! Similar instances abound. An ex-United States senator expelled for dishonesty, boasts that he believes the "book from kiver to kiver." Among the opponents of Judge Lindsay in his chivalrous fight for the children of Denver were men who seemed to find no inconsistency in being elders and Sunday school superintendents and at the same time supporters of one of the most corrupt machines that ever debauched a city. The very word "spirituality" is becoming suspect in our churches, being so often usurped by people whose emotional natures find satisfaction in certain religious manifestations while their spirits are narrow, mean, selfish, dictatorial. Hypocrites? No more than Peer Gynt. Just tailored and millinered savages turning their prayer-wheels and bringing bribes to their Mumbo-Jumbos.

HOPE OF SALVATION

Yet for the Peer Gynts there is hope. With true poetic instinct Ibsen hints at Peer's salvation through the ideal love of a woman. As in Greek tragedy, it is Iphigenia that saves the expedition of Agamemnon, and Alcestis that passes through the bitterness of death to deliver Admetus; as in Dante it is the ideal love of Beatrice that brings him unscathed through hell and up the heights of Paradise; as in Goethe it is Marguerite—she whom he had wronged—who in the end cheats Mephistopheles of his prize in Faust's soul; as in Browning the one gleam of light in the nether darkness of Guido's soul shines when, on the edge of the scaffold, he cries,

> Abate, Cardinal, Pope, Christ, Maria, God—
> Pompilia, will you let them murder me?—

so Ibsen shows us the old, broken down man, in the grip of superstitious fear, trying vainly to "dodge" the Button Moulder, who would pour him into his ladle with other spoiled buttons—a quaint conceit: his soul a button that will not button!—and at last creeping back to Solveig, the pure image of selfless love, who all through the years had kept his image—the image of the ideal Peer—in her heart. But the whole passage must be given:

> Peer:
> Can'st thou tell where Peer Gynt has been since we parted?
> . . . . with his destiny's seal on his brow;
> Been, as in God's thought he first sprang forth?
> Can'st thou tell me? If not I must get on home—
> Go down to the mist-shrouded regions.
> Solveig:
> Oh, that riddle is easy . . . .
> In my faith, in my hope, and in my love.
> Peer:
> What sayest thou—? Peace. These are juggling words.
> Thou art mother thyself to the man that's there.
> Solveig:
> Ay, that I am: but who is his father?
> Surely he that forgives at the mother's prayer.

The Button Moulder's occupation's gone. Peer's soul begins to grow. Surely Ibsen will not deny us this parable. God's love in Christ is omnipotent. In Him dwells the image of us all with God's signet on our brow. To find ourselves in Him is salvation—even for "lost souls." "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the Righteous."

The Christ of the Andes

HIGH on the mountain you stand, Prophet-Christ,
Moulded of remnants of forgotten wars;
The highest peak was not too high for you, Guardian-Christ.
No sight-seer ever climbs quite
To your footstool of bronze,
For the road is too steep and rocky.
Only the few have seen you
Who come to bow their heads and pray.
. . . .
I think the Christ is like that!

The Man Behind "The Spectator"

By Lynn Harold Hough

THERE is something of a thrill about the very name of the Spectator. It has had to do with great issues. It has played its part in great events. It has had a high place in the realm of the mind and its opinions have not only made reputations, they have also made history. The Spectator was founded by Joseph Hume and a group of radicals in 1828. Its first editor was Robert Stephen Rintoul. Under the powerful hands of Hutton and Townsend it became the most commanding of the English weekly literary reviews. Since 1898 Mr. John St. Loe Strachey has been its sole editor and its proprietor as well.

The other afternoon I sat in the office of the Spectator listening to the quick, decisive, and individual talk of its editor. He is rather different from a good many Englishmen. You do not have to approach his mind by a circuitous route amid many silences and curious pauses. He begins at once. He loses no time. The Spectator is his very life and he is glad to talk about the paper and the ideals for which it stands. Mr. Strachey has a delicate and responsive face, and by delicate I mean sensitive and not suggestive of physical fragility. In fact he has been a great lover of horses and a typically out of door Englishman. There is a story of how when he was once visiting at the white house President Roosevelt took him out on a gallop through a driving rain, and although the expedition was testing and trying enough the English editor quite held his own with the strenuous president.

But everything about the figure and the bearing of Mr. Strachey suggests fine thinking and fine feeling and discriminating expression. Yet with all the swift and subtle movement of his mind and with all his capacity for judicial and balanced speech there is a touch of the eager boy about him. You feel that he has never lost his mood of youthful expectation. He is never quite sure but he may meet a fairy or at least a human being with magic in his heart and in his hand when he has passed around any one of life's corners.

A STRIKING COMBINATION

No end of men have possessed some of Mr. Strachey's qualities. It is the combination which is so striking. He studied law and has all the keen capacity for exposition of difficult and technical points which belong to an able lawyer. He instinctively thinks in large relations and often speaks like a judge. But on the other hand he is by his very nature a man of letters. When he was at Oxford this bit of discriminating nonsense was written about him:

> I am Strachey, never bored
> By Webster, Massinger, or Ford;
> There is no line of any poet
> That can be quoted, but I know it.

He was not a product of the English public school system and his individual experience of the things of the mind and the world of books made it easy for him to become a person of very unusual erudition even as a boy. Mr. Strachey belongs to an old and very distinguished English family. So closely have they been connected with some aspects of British rule that a certain justice once referred to "the Stracheys that govern India." The father of the editor of the Spectator was a man of rich and ripe mind and the son (who would be Sir John but for the wisdom of fortune in making him a second son), grew up in an atmosphere where books were in a very genuine sense a part of the life he lived.

His father no doubt had his share in that process whereby the son fought his way into the mastery of a style arresting and clear and capable of sustained power. But after all, the taste and the growing appreciation of the younger man were the defining matter. No father can teach literary skill to a son unless the son has the divine fire burning in him. In any event this young man of the law with a mind and heart full of the beauties of the literature of many a century himself became the master of a style which he learned to wield like a sword. It was not merely a weapon, however. By some fine magic it easily turned from a powerful, inanimate thing in the hand of a master to a child with sparkling eyes and happy grace dancing among the flowers on the lawn of a country house.

INSURGENT VITALITY

This insurgent vitality back of all the mental poise is perhaps the outstanding characteristic of the writing of Mr. Strachey when he is not severely holding himself in hand. He possesses a good deal of the instinct of the politician, a very dignified sort of politician with high principles and constant urbanity but a politician with a wonderfully shrewd understanding of the great game for all that. The Spectator has had to do with very important and historic matters and at times its influence has been really defining. But Mr. Strachey has always been ready to follow the gleam when it led him out of the old Liberal Party to become a Liberal Unionist, when it made him a Unionist without any emphasis on the Liberal and when it made him a man whose convictions prevented his accepting party allegiance. He has made no end of trouble for the conventional party men in his time. He has been characterized by the disconcerting habit of thinking things out for himself and then telling all the empire just what conclusions he had reached.

Though in a very real sense a man of the world and a man able to play with the airy creatures who inhabit that curious region—half world of fashion, and half world of the tossing epigrams of clever brains, he is also in a very true fashion a man who feels the propulsions which have to do with the eternal spirit of religion. He feels the significance of those sanctions which lie not only at the basis of the religious life of a people, but just because they so lie, are basal to civilization itself. It is a very free and exploring mind which he brings to all these matters, but it is a mind with much reverence at the heart of it.

Mr. Strachey is profoundly interested in America—I was almost about to say he is profoundly devoted to America. Abraham Lincoln is one of his great heroes, and if you ask him to name five men who stand out among his friends, two of them will turn out to be Americans. These two are Col. John Hay and Col. Theodore Roosevelt. One is not at all surprised that Hay and the editor of the Spectator very soon found each other. Both had the passionate love of letters at the heart of them. Both delighted in being part of the moving pageant of events, in standing behind the scenes and having a hand in the real decisions. Both had that combination of virility and fastidiousness which makes it possible for a gentleman to continue being a man.

Both knew the fun of verbal sword play and both had that agility of mind which moved with light and skillful step amid solemn and stately people and events. Something of the finest of the old world and the new came together when these two men became great friends. Perhaps it is not just so easy to explain the friendship of Roosevelt and the powerful editor. It may be the really understanding word is this: Under all the subtlety of mind and polish of temperament (if one may describe it so), Mr. Strachey is always a child of romance looking for a hero. And the fight for clean government, the versatility of thought and action, the out-of-door vigor of our typical American greatly appealed to him. It would have been good to have been a listener in those hours when they talked together of all the world and its leaders and its problems and its books. Much fire must have been struck from the flint of strong minds on those occasions.

OXFORD CULTURE

Probably young Strachey in his university days took more to Oxford than most men bring with them. Jowett of Balliol seems to have thought that he brought too much. Be that as it may Oxford was to him as to so many others, a dream city of the sensitive mind, and he carries as do other powerful leaders of English life the mark of his university upon him. The culture which is Oxford in a notable fashion moved out upon the world in the culture which is the Spectator.

A good many young intellectuals would be left very cold in the presence of Mr. Strachey. He does not worship their gods. He surely does not make sport for them. Does he perhaps sometimes make sport of them? He believes in the fixed stars in the universe of culture. He refuses to let some literary Einstein put the classics into the moving flux of changing things. Some of his social views are those of an honest country gentleman who sees much evil and little good in many a pregnant and radical social theory. In some things, as for instance in his thought of the church, he might find himself a little at a loss if he lived permanently in that America which he loves with such a gracious devotion. In some of these things he may speak with the voice of the past. In some of them he may speak with the voice of the future. At any rate it is always a vital voice and Mr. Strachey is always ready to give many a reason for the faith which is in him.

The Spectator is one of those papers offering to its readers what may without exaggeration be called a world view. Many Americans read the Spectator with regularity and devotion. It must be said at once that they have a more secure sense of citizenship in the life of the whole world than can be secured by means of any other periodical. If it is true that the one thing America needs more than anything else is to be lifted out of intellectual provincialism and to become aware of all the manifold currents moving in the life of the world it is difficult to imagine any better prescription for the American mind than a steady diet of reading in this commanding journal of public opinion.

WORLD VIEW

Mr. Strachey is a journalist of wonderfully keen discernment. The map of Europe and the map of the world become living things in his mind and his readers learn something of his own insight in seeing the shadows which coming events cast before. He was one of the men who was not surprised by the coming of the World War. Back in the sixties when the Civil War was raging it was said that only two men knew the destination of Sherman in his famous march. The Spectator across the Atlantic fathomed the secret.

There are some fine old portraits hanging in the office of the Spectator. Peter the Great, whom Mr. Strachey describes as the wickedest man who ever lived (but whose adventurous spirit must appeal to the editor with the adventurous mind); Cromwell, who suggests that combination of daring democracy and ruling strength which appeals so deeply to the masterful editor, form a sort of background to the life of the office from which opinion is sent out all over the world. There is a photograph of Donald Hankey, and Mr. Strachey is very ready to tell you of his own friendship for that rare and noble soldier. But you have been in the office for a really long while. You look at your watch. There has been nothing in Mr. Strachey's face to tell you of the flight of time. But your watch tells you quite remorselessly. And so you are soon moving along the streets of old London eagerly thinking of the autobiography of Mr. Strachey which will appear this fall and of what tremendously good reading it will make. By your own library lamp you are sure you will be reading it on long and happy winter nights.

Forgiveness

FORGIVENESS is a God-like attribute!
He who forgives, and who, tho' wronged again,
Again forgives, is Godlike!
And he is doubly blest
Who can forgive and then forget a wrong:—
Who can with open eye and outstretched hand
Meet the offender with some pleasantry,
Some genial word to put him at his ease,
And not reprove him for a thing that's past,
But act as though the wrong had never been.
His is a noble nature, kind, sincere;
The world loves such a man, and so does God!

Preaching in the Market Place

By Herbert Heebner Smith

CHURCH advertising is rapidly becoming the advertising of Christianity, and thereby, in the opinion of those who have thought most on the subject, is getting near to the practice of Christ himself. As the head of an advertising agency recently pointed out in an address to the Methodist ministers of New York, we have no record that announcement was made that "Jesus of Nazareth would preach in the Central Synagogue of Bethlehem on Sunday at 10 o'clock." We have record, however, that Jesus often went where a crowd had gathered and there expounded to them through the insistence of stories his principles of life and conduct.

The modern market place of any city is the newspapers of the community. There the buyers and sellers of commodities meet. There the vast majority of people of the community look for entertainment, inspiration and information. The message of the church by all means ought to be placed where those who do not resort to the stained glass environment of a house of worship may gather inspiration for their work and encouragement to higher ideals of living.

Gradually churches and groups of churches are emerging from the stage of advertising which commerce broke away from a generation ago. They are giving reasons why non-churchgoers should come to hear Rev. John Jones preach on Sunday night. They are telling the people the church has for the community something different. Witness this recent advertisement in the daily papers of Trenton, New Jersey. It occupied a space of nine inches on three columns:

THE TRANSCENDENT CHRIST

It is one of the credentials of Christianity that no one has ever succeeded in putting it into operation.

A religion that could be applied to life, as a set of blue prints is applied to a building, would be a poor and unsatisfying thing.

The glory of the Christian ideal is its alluring inaccessibility. It leads the seeker from one summit to the other, always rewarding him with new visions and ever inciting him to higher conquests. On the height of heights, overtopping the world, stands Jesus the Christ. To his moral elevation no man may attain, yet in striving toward it any man will find strength and blessedness.

He is a foolish man who criticises the church because it does not live up to its Master's teaching. The church is composed of imperfect men and women, who join themselves together in a Christian fellowship, because they realize their imperfectness.

The church is not what it should be and you are not what you should be—in these two facts lie the reasons why the church needs you and you need the church.

You will find a large number of men and women lifting their lives toward higher things tomorrow morning and evening in every Presbyterian church in the city at the closing meetings of two weeks of special services. Come—look up and be lifted up. Begin tomorrow.

This announcement was signed by thirteen Presbyterian churches in Trenton and three nearby. It was one of a series of ads run every day during two weeks of Presbyterian evangelistic services. The space was paid for by special contributions.

CHURCHES UNITE IN ADVERTISING

The six Presbyterian churches of Erie, Pa., in connection with evangelistic services in that city during February joined their advertising appropriations and ran large size ads ten days during the two weeks. These were uniformly set with plenty of white space and made distinctive by the use of a small cut of a church in one corner. One read:

ROOSEVELT SAID:

"I advocate a man's joining in church work for the sake of showing his faith by his work."

Every man and woman, boy and girl, should be identified with some church. It is the right thing to do. Church work is joyful work because it makes everybody happier.

Special meetings now at these six churches. A happy welcome awaits you. Come and help the work along.

A year ago the twenty-six evangelical churches of Portsmouth, Ohio, through a publicity committee raised $700 from merchants of the city. Space was bought in both newspapers and for three weeks preceding Easter large size space was taken to present Christianity to those who do not go to church. Each ad used as a trademark a cross with a spray of lilies behind it. One ad read:

CHRISTIANITY IS DIFFICULT

Chesterton, famous British author, is touring America. He says some very true things:

"Christianity has not been tried and found wanting. It has been found difficult and not tried."

Christianity means a fight. It is a fight by a man for his better impulses. Every sermon yesterday, worthy the name, showed you some of the paths of struggle not yet attempted.

Life is a struggle, but the least of the struggle is for material things. A man may gain a whole city but lose his own soul.

Chuch attendance helps us keep close to our best ideals. It aids when we are tempted to be a little "sharp" in our business practice, or to be less than fair.

The churches of Portsmouth call you to high ideals. They uphold Jesus Christ, the perfect man. Why should you not serve him, who has promised to "give his beloved peace?"

This ad was signed "Portsmouth Federation of Churches" with the names of the churches. Credit for the contributing firms was given by printing their names with: "These firms reinforce the church in taking its message to all people."

The Montreal Daily Star in space four columns wide and nine inches long every Saturday runs a general invitation to attend church. One recent such announcement read:

OUR HONORED CITIZENS

Who are the people in our communities we respect and honor most? Aren't they the people who believe in God and who do their utmost to practice his teachings? Do you know of prominent men and women anywhere in the world who are not believers in and followers of his word?

The advertisement then went on to suggest that people who really seek to achieve something should go to church regularly.

This ad is one of a series of ten offered to newspapers by the church advertising department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. In the first month after these ads were announced they were purchased by seventeen papers in all parts of the country. In some cases the space which the announcements occupy is donated by the newspapers as a contribution to the good of the community. In other communities ministerial associations, groups of citizens or commercial institutions have bought the space and are setting forth the advantages of regular church attendance and observance of Christianity.

ADVERTISING SERIES OFFERED

Another similar effort to get Christianity to people who do not go to church is being made through six other daily papers with a combined circulation of 100,000 by the cooperation of the Religious Copy Service of Montclair, New Jersey. One ad of this service used the night before Christmas suggested that the best Christmas gift that could be made to the town in which the ad appeared was the adoption by each individual of the principles of Jesus Christ, with the suggestion that regular church attendance will strengthen the determination to serve God and deepen the religious influence of the community.

There are many arguments in favor of weekly announcements by churches or groups of churches throughout the year instead of occasional campaigns, as in Trenton and Erie. On this idea the Presbyterian churches of Atlanta, Ga., of both north and south branches, last summer ran a series of advertisements urging church attendance and adoption of Christianity. Each was signed by the names of the churches, and pastors and the topics of the sermons, each of the dozen or more churches having three lines of space in small type under the illustrated ad which was designed to attract the attention of persons who ordinarily go nowhere to church.

One ad in this series read:

> NO ONE IS PERFECT
> Ever have the idea you are not good enough to join the church? Forget it!
> No one is perfect, but every Christian is striving toward the perfection set by Jesus Christ. Take one step at a time.
> Attend church services regularly. Study the Bible at home and in Sunday school. Perhaps you attended Sunday school years ago. You still need the same old Bible. It has a message for you and your children. Come to Sunday school and church.

It closed with this quotation: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin." A heavy line at the bottom read: "The Presbyterians Invite You. Services 11 a. m.—7:45 p. m." This ad is one of a series of fourteen issued as Church Advertising, Page No. 2, by the Western Newspaper Union and distributed through the plate service of that organization. Between 450 and 500 papers, most of them in small rural communities, have used this series during the past year. The copy and ideas for illustrations were prepared by the Presbyterian department of publicity as a service to the cause of church advertising. A similar page was prepared two years ago and another is in process.

In most of the papers in which this series appeared the ads were signed by individual churches. The material was designed typographically so that the name of the church and topic of the sermon could be added at the bottom of the space.

TYPES OF ADVERTISEMENTS

Other ads in this series sought to meet the objection that men are too busy to go to church; and that church is for women only. One urged that parents go with children to Sunday school. Another drove home that the real test of a man's religion is how he acts at home. One with a picture of a weeping girl in a forlorn bedroom urged that churches are ready to help discouraged people if met half way. In the same manner individual churches, whether in small or large communities can use paid space to attract the attention of non-churchgoers.

When you, Mr. Reader, desire to go to the theater you look over the announcements of the various playhouses. Such advertisements, however, have little or no appeal for you unless you desire to go to the theater. How much more appeal for the man who does not often go to church has the usual church advertisement of the topic of a sermon? Is it best to attempt to sell a particular sermon by advertising the topic or should we seek to sell the idea of regular church attendance to those who go now not at all or irregularly? Incidentally we can announce that at this particular branch office of the church of Jesus Christ the pastor will preach upon thus and so.

Advertising men who have given much attention to efforts of churches to attract new customers through paid advertisements almost universally agree that the best practice is to sell the institution rather than to sell the particular article (sermon), which is available next Sunday. The church and worship ought to mean tremendously more than merely listening to a particular sermon.

If it is thought necessary to confine the announcements of a church to small space this idea I have been proposing, of advertising Christianity instead of merely the sermon, can be carried out through the use of only a half a dozen words. The selection of these words and their use in a headline, rather than the name of the church as an attention arrester, is, however, a subject which needs longer treatment than present space makes possible.

If I Had Time!

If I had time to find a place,
And sit me down full face to face
With my better self that cannot show
My daily life that rushes so,
It might be then I would see my soul
Was stumbling still toward the shining goal,
I might be nerved by the thought sublime,
If I had time!

The New Church In China

THE writer has been permitted, through the courtesy of a friend who attended the great Shanghai conference of the churches in China, to see the advance sheets of the various commission reports there adopted, which contain quite the most striking and interesting material of any documents issued by a church conference in late years. For the first time the Chinese Christians had full equality of representation and voice in the deliberations, and the commission reports reflect the naive simplicity and outspoken honesty of a group of earnest folk who are without the traditions, the established ecclesiastical procedure, and the formalities of older and better organized groups.

The evangelical constituency in China numbers a full million souls, with something more than 375,000 enrolled as actual communicants in the churches. There has been an increase of sixty per cent in membership since the centenary was celebrated in 1907. And the numerical increase is far from the most significant gain, for in the past fifteen years the educated minds of China have been opened to the Christian message as never before and the ethical and social teachings of the gospel have had an influence that reaches far beyond the numbers who actually unite with the churches.

While only one in 400 has been won to Christianity outright in the country at lange, in the older missionary centers as high as one in 200 of those old enough to make confession are actively committed to Christian ideals. The population increases about one per cent per year in China, but the church membership increases by six per cent. In a few more decades this cumulative increase will become highly significant to the national life. One-half of all the living members have been won in the past ten years. At the present rate of increase there will be a million communicants in 1950 and not less than four or five million who can be counted upon to take the Christian viewpoint in philosophy and morals, for the social idealism of Christ will gain over the actual number of converts in geometrical ratio.

The Coming Indigenous Church

The one word that transcends all others in these reports is the word "indigenous." The overwhelming desire of the Chinese Christians is that there may be an independent Chinese church. They are casting no reflections on the missionaries; everywhere the reports breathe deep appreciation of their missionary leaders and of the churches which send and support them. But they long for an indigenous church, a church breathing the Chinese spirit, characterized by their own native genius, speaking in their idiom and with their oriental symbolism, guided by their own democratic voice, supported by their own largess, and taking its place in the councils of Christendom with the dignity and maturity of a genuine national experience. After a century of cradling, nurturing and training, they aspire, as youth always aspires when it approaches the period of maturity and independence through education and experience, to guide their own feet in the future. And like a well-trained youth they desire it with an ever deepening appreciation of and gratitude toward those who gave them life and culture.

Gradually and wisely the missionary leaders have given into native hands the work of evangelizing and that of administering the churches. The Chinese Christians wish that process speeded up, and to that end ask that larger training and better education be required of their native pastors and evangelists. They also ask that their stipend be so increased as to make a larger culture and a better social standing possible, as well as to retain in Christian service many who are won to secular occupation because of the better advantages to living it offers educated young men and women. They make bold to challenge the theory that support implies the right of control, and intimate that there might be a larger measure of self-support if there were a larger autonomy. They do not argue that support and control are bound up together, but they would carefully determine the question of control by the actual circumstances involved. It is very apparent that the missionary societies face the demand that, in many cases, they commit their funds to the administration of churches which are self-governing but not self-supporting.

The Chinese leaders feel the need of a type of worship fitted to native forms. They point out that our occidental forms of worship always have a more or less strange note to them, and that our western ideas of large and imposing structures for churches and other religious structures are not always in accord with their social custom. They wish to modify the litanies into something of more indigenous variety and would like to fit architectural construction more into the demands of their own custom. They even voice a strong feeling, in their deep reverence for the Bible, that they will never be able to appreciate its full power until they have a translation without the interjection of a foreign tongue or mentality between their language and the oldest manuscripts. In other words, they desire a version produced by Chinese scholars.

By the indigenous church is meant the largest possible number of self-governing churches, a native ministry over those churches, and a condition of governance whereby all church councils become councils of Chinese representatives with the missionary as loved and trusted advisor, educator and guide. Christianity will become indigenous to China when the Chinese are able to take it without a sense of its foreign aspects or accompaniments.

The United Church.

Almost, if not quite, as fervent as the desire for an indigenous church is the passion for a united church. It is not a protest against overlapping missionary work for in 83 per cent of the centers there is only one missionary body represented, and in only 9 per cent are there more than two. With few exceptions cooperation is the rule where missions are contiguous, and in the larger centers it is the controlling policy. The desire for a united Chinese church springs from their unsophisticated study of the New Testament scriptures, from an utter inability to ally our Western traditions with anything of value to them, from a futile though devoted effort to face the overwhelming odds in a non-Christian society with tools dulled and weakened by schism. They say "denominationalism diverts the attention of the Chinese church from the essential elements of Christianity."

The commission on "The Message of the Church," made up of more than four score Chinese leaders, and including none but Chinese, voices the desire for both an indigenous and a united church in prophetic terms and fervor. These leaders say: "We express our regret that we are divided by the denominationalism that comes from the west," and while not "unaware of the diverse gifts" the missionaries bring, "yet we recognize fully that denominationalism is based upon differences the historical significance of which, however real and vital to the missionaries from the west, is not shared by us Chinese." Believing "that it is only a united church which can save China," they declare that "denominationalism, instead of being a source of inspiration, has been and is a source of bewilderment, confusion and inefficiency." Moreover, they believe that the power exists within the Chinese church to realize "corporate unity." They call "upon missionaries and representatives of the churches in the west, through self-sacrificial devotion to our Lord, to remove all the obstacles in order that Christ's prayer for unity may be fulfilled in China."

This is the united voice of China's best native church leadership, uttered without constraint and unmodified by deference to councillors from the missionary organizations at home. It is prophetic of what will come to pass as the Chinese church becomes self-supporting and self-governing. There is no folly in missionary administration more unforgivable than that which thrusts our home controversies into this great missionary field, and no administrative policy more foolish than one which would hinder the native church from answering our Lord's prayer for the unity of his disciples.

The New Culture Movement

We read frequently of the "New Thought Movement" in China. The term is confusing to us in the west because it has come to designate a cult of mystical philosophy. The Chinese commission on "The Message of the Church" calls it "The New Culture Movement." The literal translation of the Chinese "Hsin Shih Ch'ao" is given as "The New Thought Tide." It had its origin about six years ago in the activities of half a dozen young men on the faculty of Pekin University, led by the Chancellor, Ts'ai Yuan-bei. It has now become nationwide among scholars and nearly all the reading public. None of the original six men is a member of the Christian church, but their one aim "is to know the truth, to follow the truth, and to make it known to others." They are questioning the reason of every custom and institution, and have stamped the word Why? on every thing. Men interested in this movement brought Bertrand Russell and John Dewey to China. The former flouted missions, and he also flouted some of our approved moral conventions rather badly in person. His marvelous analytic powers and his philosophical simplicity however did great good in stimulating the "Why?" attitude through which a new educational and social renaissance in China will be brought about. Dr. Dewey's contributions seem to have been quite constructive, though we have not seen any significant pronouncements on the missionary movement from his pen as yet.

The important fact is that these great thinkers could be invited to China and be given large hearings. M. Bergson has also been asked to come. None of the three is a professing Christian but their influence in opening the educated mind of China to the iconoclasm of a merciless analysis of all existing customs and ideologies will do good in a land where a thing is accepted simply because the forefathers did it and where custom is more powerful than law or idealism.

The Chinese church leaders testify to their deep faith in the Bible but they have no disposition to hold any notions about it that challenge science or modern learning. They say, "The Bible is not a text-book or a mere history; it is wholly a religious book." They affirm, "We believe that since the Bible is the word of God, the truth of God fears no test. It can stand any investigation of a reverent heart. We wish to make known that we fear no application of any genuine scientific method to the holy scriptures." No calamity could be greater than for Christian leaders to set the new church in China at odds with science and modern learning. It would turn the renaissance-making "New Culture" movement against it. Missionary education has been the pioneer of the new learning in China.

The commission on "The Message" was wholly Chinese, and a careful reading of that document encourages one to believe that there will be no intrusion of medieval scholasticism or western creedalism in their interpretation of Christ's great teachings. They waste not a word on theories about Christ; he is held up as one through whom we may know God and as the one to whose fullness of stature of manhood we should seek to rise. The theological expressions are as simple as those of the gospel and as bereft of the metaphysical, and state simply that God is our Father and all we are brethren. Sin is simply selfishness and acting in opposition to love; it is "more than the transgression of law." The atonement is summed up in the lucid expression, "We Christians believe that in his death Jesus bore in his heart the burden of the sin of all mankind, and opened for men the only way of escape from death unto life, the only way of access to God."

China is receiving the ancient philippics against Christianity and among her sons are those who are recoining them. But in just the same measure that the Chinese church sticks to the words and example of the Master in their simplicity will these philippics fall on soil too well cultivated to allow their growth. Our theologies are of the times and pass away. The church is fallible and grows in both knowledge and grace or ceases to represent Christ, but Christ bears no reproach and all cultures draw nearer unto him whom to know is life.

The Devil's Last Joke*

"HE who sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." God laughs, he also laughs last and therefore best. The Devil has his jokes. (I do not believe in a personal devil—I wonder if this also is heresy—could a man be churched for not holding to the happy notion of personified deviltry? O, I believe the very devil is in persons. I know it!! But as for one big, personal, Miltonic Old Nick, I simply don't accept that medieval conception. If, however, you need the Devil-doctrine in your business, hold it to your heart's content!) In Santa Claus' language, we therefore say, the Devil has his joke—and his latest is: "Prohibition does not prohibit."

Who believes this? Does anybody believe it since the Ohio primaries? We are told that large sums of money were spent in putting forth the propaganda that the eighteenth amendment was a dead letter, that more liquor than ever was being consumed, that public sentiment was tired of the prohibition farce, that light wines and beer were approved by the people as a compromise measure. All this and much more was spread broad-cast. Then the people of Ohio quietly walked to the polls—men, women, ex-soldiers, and all. They registered an over-whelming endorsement of the men who ran for office upon the dry platform. I have been seeking all the light possible on this issue all summer—honest, unprejudiced truth. I confess to a certain pessimism when beginning. I had been told of the phenomenal profits made by boot-leggers, of the corruption of certain hotels, of the private stocks of the rich, of the hip-pocket idiots among the codfish aristocracy, of the charming mysteries of the home-brew devotees, of the truck-loads of booze that moved along the highways, of the shiploads that crowded our coasts—one hears frightful tales. But I have not seen much of this. I spent two weeks in New York City. I did not see one drunk person. I saw no open saloons. Even at Coney Island the crowd is as decent as happy—no one intoxicated, everyone minding his own business. I saw no drinking in the large hotels—maybe the bellboy could get one a quart—I do not know. New York impressed me as a well-ordered, clean and respectable city.

At Union Seminary 226 ministers from twenty-five states and nineteen denominations were studying. I talked with many of these leaders—they all seemed to feel that prohibition was prohibiting. I went down to Atlantic City. I saw objectionable dancing—miserable degeneracy there—but not one drunken person. I played golf at the fashionable club. I heard professional and business men—regular chaps—order ginger ale and orangeade and drink them as of old they drank cocktails. There was no suspicious stuff. I paid a dollar for two orangeades. The place was right. I came to Canada. As you drive your car across the bridge at Niagara—the first British sign you see is: "Wines and Ales." I was concerned. That night we stopped at a hotel on the shores of Lake Ontario. I saw a room marked "Bar." I went in to see what was on sale—chewing-gum and apple-juice! Nothing worse. I picked out a man who looked like a devotee of Bacchus that night and asked him about drinks. He looked at me with a pained and parched look and confided the information that Ontario had nothing of comfort to offer. I can come, therefore, to only one conclusion and that is that prohibition prohibits. It works, even with human officers, even with inadequate power for enforcement, even with paid opposing propaganda, even with most lucrative bootlegging—it works.

*Oct. 29, "World-wide Prohibition." Isa. 61:1-9.

Meanwhile, thank God, your sons and mine are growing to man's estate without the menace of the licensed saloon. Soon a new generation that knows not John Barleycorn will be ruling the world. We have only to hold what we have gained; to fight every liquor man and measure; to keep our legislative bodies dry for twenty-five years more and the war wll be won. Prohibition prohibits—we will see that it does. We will.

British Table Talk

London, Sept. 25, 1922.

We have had a week of alarms and mysteries. It is easier to ask questions than to say anything very definite. What for example did the Prime Minister say to the representatives of the Labor party? What are the reasons which have made Mustapha Kemal able practically to dictate terms to Europe? What promises of support are there upon which he can rely? Many such questions are on the lips of people, but for the answer we must wait. It seems strange that after so much talk of "open diplomacy" we should be in the approach of war as much in the dark as we were in 1914. The two hopeful signs are these: the very evident longing for peace, which has been clearly shown in the answer made by the Dominions to the call of the Premier; and the rising value of the League of Nations. It is asked on every hand why the league was unable to intervene. The answer is clear. It would be out of the province of the league to protect Greece in the hour of defeat. There was a time when the league might have tendered its offices to Greece, but that was before the resort to arms. Nor can it be forgotten that Turkey is still outside the league. At the same time there has been growing a conviction that the league must be made comprehensive and must be given the tasks which the Allied Powers at present have failed to accomplish. Frankly I discover very little sympathy for Greece in the hour of her downfall. Those who know the methods of warfare common in the near east shrug their shoulders when they hear of a "holy war."

Industrial Disputes

At the present moment there are several disputes unsettled in the realm of industry. In the Ebbw Vale steel works, among the tramway employes, in theatre-land where the very casual and poorly-paid workers are contending for a better living and more security—these and other disputes now proceeding are not likely to be the only ones in the coming time. The fall in wages and the great volume of unemployment may bring a growing unrest upon our industry. The burden of the rates is crippling all classes, but most of all the middle classes. Unhappily these sufferers grow more critical of the schemes for relief of poverty or for education, which makes the rates mount up year by year. The Poplar local authorities are taken as an example of the wasteful management of public funds, and as a result there is a certain feeling of bitterness growing between the middle classes and the artisans. Account must be taken of this feeling, when we read of conferences dealing with the church and labor problems. The leaders may devise plans for social reform, but the rank and file are looking at their rates and grumbling at labor. This is most unjust, but it is a feeling which must be taken into account. In their attitude toward social reform the clergy and ministers of all the churches must not forget the rank and file. On the other hand, labor sincerely believes that the churches are preserves for the rich and the comfortable classes. Pastors are in its eyes, with some notable exceptions, the chaplains of the well-to-do, or at least of the bourgeois. Under such conditions it is hard to see the way of reconciliation. Certainly it will not be found in papers read before a church congress or a Congregational Union. Reconciliation to be effective must become local, between Smith of the middle classes who has received the demand for his taxes, and Robinson, artisan, who thinks Smith a parasite and his church an enclosure for the rich and the respectable. The things which move us most are not economic theories.

The Federal Council of the Free Churches and Reunion

The recent pronouncements of this council do little more than give the command, "Mark Time!" After some years of hopeful activity in ecclesiastical circles it seems as if there were little advance toward reunion to be made at the moment. The Federal Council indeed seems to indicate the need for their spokesman to weigh afresh the meaning of the language somewhat freely used in previous utterances. It is as though it said "We or some of us have spoken freely of a constitutional episcopate. Now we must think out what we mean." It is always the weakness of ecclesiastical compromises that they must be exposed to the questions of the plain man who likes to know what precisely a word means and is not satisfied to let it mean two things at the same time. I can recall a long and valuable talk with an Anglican friend, who convinced me that the 39 articles are not really so plain as they seem to be and are indeed at times the subtle expression of a compromise. Do the readers of The Christian Century remember the story of the village in which the twelve denominations agreed upon a united service? All went well until it was the turn of the Baptists to choose the hymns; these expressed their own individual convictions so strongly that it seemed wise for all the churches in future to sing their own words but to the same tune. This answered until the Presbyterians got their second wind and sang, after the others had ceased, an extra verse upon predestination. A story which has no bearing upon present-day attempts! It happened a great many years ago, if at all!

What Is the Use of Church Congresses and Union Meetings?

It is sometimes very doubtful what end is served by gathering busy men and women into one city for the purpose of a church congress or an autumn assembly. Practically these are of no value for open discussion. I have seldom found anything of importance in these conferences except in the prepared speeches. Nor is the value very great for theological thought, though here again important exceptions must be made. The church congress, for example, provides sometimes for learned papers. If the divisions are recalled of the Negro sermon, the expounderin', the argufication, and the arousement, it can be claimed that these congresses belong chiefly to the arousement section, and most of us are the better for some emotional rekindling in our spiritual life. In one of Anselm's prayers he spoke of the Holy Spirit as the Rekindler, and it is in this office that the church assembly most needs the Comforter.

Religious Education and the Churches

The Congregational Union through its young people's department has been playing an honorable part in the study of the principles and methods of religious education. A commission has been sitting for a long time under the capable chairmanship of Dr. Garvie. The books of its findings will shortly be published and should be of immense value in our Sunday schools and institutes, as well as in the larger life of the church. The two excellent papers, "Teachers and Taught," and "Teachers of Today" are now being published by the Congregational Union. It is a matter for thankfulness among Congregationalists that their churches are taking a leading part in the graded school movement, and the secretary, Rev. Arthur Hallack deserves their whole-hearted support in his valuable work.

Which?

The issue between the two main schools of thought in the present day could hardly be better stated than in the following poem, which I take from The Observer. This paper has a happy choice in its poems.

MAN AND HIS DWELLING PLACE

"A puppet, pulled by hidden string,
Or centre of experienced power,
Immortal spirit, or a thing
That casts its case, to buzz and sting,
And die forgotten in an hour;
Which part is man's? They best can say,
Who make the most of what they may.

A world, by love and wisdom planned,
Or swirl in ether, speck in space;
The hollow of a Father's hand,
Or cowering spot 'mid desert sand:
Which pictures best man's dwelling place?
They best have known, who most have striven,
Whate'er that home, to make it heaven."

THOMAS THORNELY.

And Other Things

A painful discussion has been taking place upon the payment of evangelists for taking special missions. The feeling of most men is that the safer way—the way of avoiding any stumbling-block is to pay a missioner a fixed and adequate salary. . . . A widespread interest is being shown by the press in Khama, the African chief. The celebration of his jubilee has called forth many laudatory words. One of the most striking came to me from Sir Frederick Lugard, the great African administrator, who said in a letter that he considered Khama one of the finest intellects he had met in Africa. The fact of the chief's drastic dealing with the drink traffic has been recalled. The story of his life is told in vivid fashion by my friend, John Charles Harris, in a book which the London Missionary society publishes. (Khama: one shilling) . . . The sad lot of students and rofessional men in Central Europe is awakening sympathy here. A German representative of a German missionary society speaking last week before a missionary board describes the privations through which he and others have to go. Scarcely any milk, meat once a month! Some classes are not suffering so greatly, but the professional classes are still in great distress.

Methodism, North and South

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In an article on "The Future of Methodism" by Dr. Ernest F. Tittle, there is a footnote referring to the veto power of the bishops in the southern Methodist church. As it stands this note may be misleading to readers not familiar with the law in that branch of Episcopal Methodism. The so-called veto is merely a suspensive veto, it is simply a check on legislation. The bishops can only use this provision when in their judgment any piece of legislation is unconstitutional. The general conference can pass a measure over the veto by a two-thirds vote, the measure then goes to the annual conferences for final passage. If the annual conferences sustain the action of the general conference, the bishops must announce the final adoption of the law. The purpose of the measure is to prevent a delegated law-making body from being the judge of the constitutionality of its own acts. It results in giving the large majority of the church the right to decide such issues.

There are one or two other items in the southern branch of the church which vary from the practice of the Methodist Episcopal church. For instance, the bishop is required by law to read the appointments of the ministers in the open cabinet. He cannot retire alone and revise these appointments and announce them to the conference. The final draft must be read so that the presiding elders can express their views of the appointments. Of course, the bishop has the power to make the appointments over the recommendations of the presiding elders.

There is also a difference in the vow assumed on joining the church. In the Methodist Episcopal church, the question is: "Do you believe in the doctrine of the holy scriptures as set forth in the articles of religion in the Methodist Episcopal church." In the church south, the vow is: "Do you ratify and confirm the vow of repentance, faith and obedience contained in the baptismal covenant?" The reference to faith here is to the apostles' creed, which is specifically required of all who seek baptism in the church.

The only rule in the southern Methodist church regarding worldly amusements is a general one. That is, admonishing our members "against the taking of such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus," leaving the specific application to as wide a range as this general rule may cover. From time to time the bishops have delivered pastoral addresses urging unworldliness, and naming such practices as dancing, card-playing, and the like, but it has not been made a part of the organic law of the church. As a matter of fact, we stand with our northern brethren in our antagonism to gambling and all other social practices which are detrimental to the life of the spirit, but we believe that there are more worldly practices, either prevalent or that may arise, than can be named in the general rule.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I read with interest the article by Rev. Ernest F. Tittle in a recent issue of The Christian Century on "The Future of the Methodist." The statements that "in the Methodist Episcopal church, south, the bishops have far more power" than do those of the Methodist Episcopal church and that "they can even veto the action of the general conference" relate to matters of fact in regard to which definite information is accessible. The real truth is that southern Methodist bishops have no veto power over any action of the general conference. If the general conference takes an action which the bishops regard as in violation of the fundamental constitution of the church, it is their privilege to say so, stating at the same time the grounds of their conclusion, and in such a case the act must be passed by a constitutional process. When so passed the bishops have no further authority in regard to it, nor have they any veto power over the 99 per cent of the actions of the general conference which do not involve constitutional questions. In fact the power of the bishops to temporarily arrest legislation by declaring it contrary to the constitution of the Church has been exercised on only a few occasions in the entire history of the denomination.

Nor have the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, beyond this one item, any greater authority than those of the Methodist Episcopal church. On the contrary, the latter exercise certain important prerogatives which no one would think of putting into the hands of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. For instance, they nominate to the general conference all the great connectional boards and committees of the church. One may readily see what a vast influence this gives them in determining its policies.

I wish that Doctor Tittle in his paragraphs dealing with what he terms "legalism" and "intellectualism" had called attention to the fact that, so far as legislation is concerned, the Methodist Episcopal church, south, has, in the main, been true to the general principles handed down by John Wesley. We have no other law in regard to amusements except what Doctor Tittle speaks of as "Wesley's sane admonition against taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus." And the only departure we have made from the statement in the General rules, "There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into these societies—'a desire to flee from the wrath to come and to be saved from their sins,' " is in requiring assent to the apostles' creed.

I do not claim that the Methodist Episcopal church, south, is free from blemishes or from certain of the dangers which Doctor Tittle points out. But I do not believe, on the other hand, that any good can come by seeking to make our shortcomings more serious than they really are.

A Protest

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I would like to utter a protest against the article in The Christian Century of September 21 an, "The Future of the Methodists" by Ernest F. Tittle. Dr. Tittle, in his article, does not represent the Methodist church, but he misrepresents it. This is proved by the fact that the last General Conference, the representative body of the church, gave official expression on many points of doctrine diametrically opposed to the position taken by Dr. Tittle. I am sorry that you did not select some outstanding representative man of Methodism who would give the "Future of Methodism" in harmony with the current history of the church rather than his own biased opinion, which is held by a small group, but repudiated by the church at large.

Is The Holy Catholic Church a Dream?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

Sir: There is a story told of an Episcopalian bishop, who, during the world war visited the trenches. He saw a chaplain in the distance and, turning to a soldier near by, said: "My man, is that a church of England chaplain?" The reply was brief if not quite satisfactory: "Sir, we have no religions here, we all live as brothers." Apart from the fact that the brotherliness enjoyed was the result of the church's influence, the answer revealed an attitude towards denominationalism that will have to be reckoned within the not far distant future.

Israel was the first depository of the divine will. The center of worship eventually passed from tent to tabernacle and then to the first permanent sanctuary built by Solomon. In the fulness of time Christ appeared who came "not to destroy the law but to fulfil it." He gathered about his person a group of men and women to whom he revealed the principles of his kingdom. In course of time the idea of an ecclesia became paramount and through periods of persecution and final conquest Christianity became the recognized religion of the Roman empire. In the twelfth century the period of separation began. Today there are over forty branches of the church. One denomination has fourteen branches, another fifteen, and yet another has sixteen branches. Now add to these the various cults and associations and the result will be a long line of people, rather thin.

Separate and separated divisions in the church of the living God will no more lead to conquest in the spiritual realm than scattered divisions in the allied armies during the world war would have won the final victory. There are no barriers that cannot be burned away by the zeal for Christ in an endeavor to unite the now divided Protestant groups. If the wayward children would return home the accumulative power of the spiritual families would be tremendous. If a united church would be inexpedient, then a federal church would add greatly to the work of the kingdom. There would result at least a provision for cooperative effort and a saving in men and money. The map of the world has been changed and the ideas of men regarding all social institutions have been changed. Will the church emerge from the crucible as gold tried in the fire?

The dream of a holy catholic church (believers bound together by common ties) will be realized when the people called Christians insist upon the melting away of petty differences and ecclesiastical selfishness, when Christians bear and forbear with each other in the supreme task of evangelization rather than dissipate energy in competitive societies and cults. Why was the early church so powerful? Because of the divineness of its mission, simplicity of its organization, the purity of its people, and the holy zeal that marked the program of evangelization.

Who Owns the Chinese Christians?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: An action of the convention of the Disciples of Christ at Winona this summer may be summarized as a vote "to make immersion compulsory" in receiving adherents in China and other lands. This action becomes of general moment first of all because of the growing practice of giving each denomination in China a working area, or a great section of the country, as its "field." This commendable division of territory is to prevent overlapping and competition. The denomination assigned as the leading factor in the cultivation of each particular area is expected to represent the essentials of Christianity and look after all the converts. The churches which the Disciples missionaries are affiliated with naturally received into fellowship persons who were originally members of other denominations and who live in the area now assigned to the Disciples.

The Winona convention now forces the Disciples' missionaries, against their recommendation and earnest protest, to insist upon immersion. They are to see to it that the native churches do not accept the converts of other churches without rebaptism. They must "be baptized and confess their sins." That is the indenture of baptism. All such previously have been in full and complete standing in their own denominations. Does this mean that the Disciples missionaries are instructed by the Winona convention, when the proposal is stripped of all its ornamentation, not to recognize other Christian denominations as efficient participators in the kingdom of God?

There is another and perhaps an even more pragmatic question. Who owns the churches in China? Who rules the Chinese conscience? Do not the churches of the Disciples' denomination have local autonomy? May their councils and assemblies not pass upon their own affairs? Shall Americans dictate and standardize the practice of the Chinese Christians in this or any other denomination? China is a country of ancient civilization. The new generation is charged with patriotism. There is undoubtedly restlessness at attempted foreign dictation. It is a dangerous step in morals and in relationships for American churches to try to coerce the churches of China. American missionaries are positive that it cannot long be continued, and most of them are opposed to it. The idea is distressing and hateful to Chinese Christian leadership.

One of several results will follow. All self-respecting men will withdraw either en masse or, what is more likely, singly and silently, to find more congenial connections, better adapted to democratic conditions and better suited to their consciences. Or they may simply withdraw from church connections, and drift awhile with the current, discouraged, weakened men because not given a chance for self-expression and for interpreting Christ in their own cooperative way. Church leadership will be weakened immeasurably, for in such cases there will be left to the church the dependents rather than the stalwarts, and the up-coming, young, independent, patriotic generation will think of the church as under foreign domination, and therefore with aloofness if not hostility. In previous years and over wide parts of China in other years I have observed the loss in leadership in great provinces and for great occasions caused by foreign intervention upon the liberties and leadership of orientals.

The native church is more than likely to declare its independence if foreign dictation is continued. There are great sections of China where independence is at the present moment an issue. It will be a national issue soon. We cannot blink this startling and wholesome fact. Then what hold will the American churches have upon them? If we lose our moral hold, will we fall back upon the financial? And then be treated by able and foresighted orientals with the contempt which we would deserve?

The clearly marked issue is not this or that denominational text or tenet or instruction or ruling for America. The question before the Disciples is purely an incident. There is a greater issue in the orient. It is this: when will the church of China carry out its national program, repeatedly emphasized in conference and in press, of bringing all into one church of Christ for China? Will it be necessary for them before they can reach this consummation to declare their independence? Or will American Christians everywhere cooperate with them for so great an end?

How much narrower than Christ's kingdom of God on earth are we going to expect them to be? As narrow and divided as we are?

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., a Baptist, was recently in China. He summarized his impressions in a great speech in the Martyrs' Memorial hall, a part of the Young Men's Christian Association Building in Shanghai: "It is not the ism of the Presbyterian church, the Baptist church, the Congregational church or any other church that the people of China or any country are interested in, but rather the great fundamental eternal truths of religion."

Let the Ku Klux Rule!

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: To begin with, I want to say that Mr. Eddy's conception of a leading citizen is vague. No leading citizen, whether he be a minister, Christian worker, or any other vocation under the sun, is a good reliable citizen when he will tell, or does tell any man that he is a member of the Ku Klux Klan because every member takes an oath upon his bended knee never to reveal any of the secrets of the Ku Klux Klan, nor to even talk klansmanship in public places.

Not little, but much is the Ku Klux Klan doing for the illiterate and starving humanity. Yea it is only standing for the principles of Jesus Christ. Jesus didn't pick a black man to be one of his disciples, but he did believe in educating all peoples of the world; so does the Ku Klux Klan.

The Ku Klux Klan stands for Protestantism, for it was that which the United States of America was founded upon. Wasn't there a band of pilgrims in England that came to this country because of their religious faith? No one was forced to join this little company, but all those who wanted to were permitted to become one of the same. The Ku Klux Klan does not force any one to become a member of its organization, but if a man has the same religious and national faith he is permitted to become a member of the Ku Klux Klan if he so desires.

Doesn't Protestantism have a right to form an organization, whether it bears the name of the Ku Klux Klan or any other name, that will give them an equal chance with the foreign organizations that are sapping our nation of its highest, finest and best. Why should a Protestant man kick on the Ku Klux Klan when the great "Catholic church" has kept concealed monasteries ever since America has given birth to civilization?

Ask England why she doesn't allow India to become a republic and she will say: As soon as they become civilized and educated they shall have a republic of their own. Ask the Ku Klux Klan why they don't want the negroes to hold office in the United States of America and the answers will be as follows: Can a nation depend upon a race's faculties when they haven't had one century of civilization when the white race has had centuries upon centuries? Would you want a Catholic to become the president of the United States of America? He doesn't believe in separation of church and state; he first swears his allegiance to the pope of Rome, second to his country. Furthermore, would you want a negro to become the president of the U. S. A. when you learn to know that the larger per cent of the "African Blood Brotherhood" is Catholic; the pope of Rome said that he was going to move his residence to America in 1925; you know what that would mean. Do you want to give him a royal welcome?

Doesn't a man have a right to vote for a white man instead of a black one; and also join an organization that stands for that principle if his religious and national faith teaches him to do so?

May I ask the question, haven't the greatest contributions that have been made to the world, been made under the cover of night? Do the common mass of people know what the leaders of their nations are doing? If they did the world would be in an uproar continually. Ask Wilson if he didn't turn the key in the door at the peace conference himself; he and four others divided up the world just to suit themselves. Ask Wilson if he didn't say that central Europe should be divided according to nationality. Look in your new geography and see if these five men behind closed doors didn't divide the world up according to nationality regardless of the destruction of nations.

Ask Wilson if he didn't sit in the peace conference and agree to let Japan have a big slice off of Russia (both allies). In the face of this situation the world is wondering today why Russia is friendly with Germany. Go down to Mexico and ask her if she didn't write letter after letter to Wilson asking for the portion of Texas that was totally inhabited by Mexicans, and see if they tell you that Wilson said you can have it. In the face of this situation some people wonder why Mexico is angry at Wilson.

I am one hundred per cent American. I stand for my country, right or wrong, for my natural faith teaches me that the triumphant ideals, laws, and protection of America are far superior to her few failures. There is none so good of us but what there is some bad in us.

Most great things are brought about under the cover of night. And the Ku Klux Klan is an organization that is working under the cover of night for the furthering of the education of all peoples, but does not believe in letting such races rule the garden spot of the world until their standard measures up to the standard of the Ku Klux Klan. For further information address,

Ti-Bo-Tim.

P. S. I'm a subscriber of your paper; I've talked to a number of klansmen who have told me that they would rather read your paper than any religious paper on the market to date; but if you didn't cut talking against klansmanship you just as well throw your paper in the middle of the Atlantic ocean.

Chicago Church Federation Will Seek 4,000 New Church Members

The Chicago Church Federation recently held an enthusiastic city-wide conference at the Y. M. C. A. auditorium and the Hotel Morrison, for the organization and inspiration of the 650 churches and sixteen denominations represented in the federation. Both pastors and laymen were invited to be present. The federation will make a special effort this year to increase the membership of the churches. A goal of forty thousand new members has been set, the slogan for the campaign being "For Christ and America." The campaign will run through the winter, culminating on Easter Sunday. Last year the goal set was 30,000, but the total number of accessions to the churches registered during the year was 37,000. In giving these figures, Walter R. Mee, executive secretary of the federation, states that these figures take no account of many churches which did not report and of certain denominations not represented in the federation. At the recent conference the chief speakers were Dr. William T. Ellis, of Swarthmore, Pa., who spoke on the near eastern situation, and Dr. Hugh T. McGill, newly elected general secretary of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education.

Well Known Disciples Leader Dies

Rev. A. R. Moore, well known Disciples minister and educator, died at Atlanta Sept. 22. He has served as state secretary of Georgia and later as president of Atlantic Christian college. He has been for two years past a member of the Recommendations committee of the International convention. While past middle life, he has been in apparently robust health, being an active participant in the recent convention at Winona Lake.

Take to the Open Road for Money

In order to secure $1,500,000 before the state convention in November, Texas Baptists have arranged to cover the state with automobiles, beginning Sept. 25. A meeting was held in Ft. Worth in which the plans for this unique enterprise were concluded. This drive is a part of the plan to finish out the $75,000,000 campaign. There are 2,400 Baptist churches in Texas so the task of the committee is by no means easy.

Movies and Wireless Used in Modern Church Program

Were some ecclesiastical Rip Van Winkle to appear some Sunday morning in the East End Christian church of Pittsburgh, where Rev. John Ray Ewers preaches, he would find many changes. This church now takes its turn broadcasting the service through the adjacent country by means of apparatus furnished by the Westinghouse company. The church board recently voted to buy the best moving picture machine on the market, which will be installed in the church at once and put into use. Only the better films, including educational reels, will be used. The choir will soon appear dressed in academic cap and gown. The young people come for tea at the church every Sunday evening, participate in forum discussion after a live address, and then stay for the evening service.

Episcopal Minister Gives Communion to All Christians

Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, pastor of St. John's church of Marietta, Pa., invites Christians of all communions to partake of the eucharist in his church. This action has led to some criticism, but he claims the authority of his church for this action. His bishop supports him, giving as the authority of any minister of the Episcopal church to invite all Christians to the communion the so-called "bidding prayer" of the Prayer Book. The words of the prayer are, "Ye who truly and earnestly repent you of your sins, and are in love and charity with your neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, following the commandments of God and walking from henceforth in his holy ways: draw near with faith, and

Atlanta Has First Prison Church

TWO years ago, Dr. L. O. Bricker, pastor of First Christian church of Atlanta, discovered a grave neglect on the part of the churches of the city. Twenty-five hundred federal prisoners were held in the great prison of that city under conditions which have been described by Eugene V. Debs since his release. The churches were doing no work for these men, and the penitentiary was failing to demonstrate its fundamental meaning in that it did not bring men to repentance.

Dr. Bricker organized a commission of the various denominations at work in Atlanta, which appointed six committees for various types of religious work in the prison. One of these was the religious work commission, which was headed up by Mr. W. W. Jones, a Christian layman of striking and unique personality. Mr. Jones began his work in the prison with six men. This class grew rapidly and now enrolls one hundred and fifty men.

A few Sundays ago he conceived it to be his duty to invite these men to accept Christ as their Saviour. The gospel invitation was given and twenty-three men stepped forward to dedicate their lives to Jesus Christ. Dr. Bricker made application to the department of justice at Washington that these men be allowed to go to his church for baptism. The unprecedented order was given that the men be allowed this liberty. They were transported to the church in a truck with only one guard, although it had originally been the idea that no guard at all would be furnished. The new warden of the prison was in hearty accord with the plan.

Probably no church ever had a more impressive service than that held by Mr. Bricker. The public was not admitted, and only the officers of the church and the choir were present. The converts were baptized, and Dr. Bricker set before the men a wonderful vision of what a new movement might accomplish in the prisons of the nation. The new converts affixed their names to a charter document which constituted them the unique organization known as "The First Christian Church in Prison." The Philippian jailer and the men with Paul made up the first church of this sort.

On the first Sunday morning back in the prison, the men met at eight in the morning to celebrate the Lord's Supper and to choose from their number men who should be the elders and the deacons of the infant church. Twenty-six more men came forward that morning to confess Christ and the young church now has 49 members. The church is proceeding on a nonsectarian basis and men from various communions have joined, including one Roman Catholic.

It is the purpose of this church to extend its activities in the prison until the life of every man there is touched with the gospel. Nor does the work stop here. The leader of this wonderful class in the prison has a vision of a new type of Christian movement that shall be inaugurated in other prisons of the land.

The effect of prison life in the past has been usually to school men in crime so that they left thoroughly educated in every method of defying the law. Christian students of prison life have long contended that the prisons were worse than a failure in bringing men to repentance and to a new life. They have contended for farm colonies of prisoners where the health of the men would not be broken down and where under more normal conditions of life a man might have opportunity to find himself again.

But even the prison reformers have hardly dared to dream of the regenerative power of a great religious movement that would take prison life as it is, and put hope and courage into the minds of men. Perhaps the Atlanta movement is the product of a religious genius whose like cannot be found in any other prison city. On the other hand it may be possible that Dr. Bricker has developed a religious technique which can be used by other men. If so the prison populations of the nation are on the eve of the most significant movement in their behalf that has ever come. With converted prisoners will almost certainly come a better environment for the prisoner physically.

take the holy sacrament to your comfort; and make your humble confession to Almighty God, devoutly kneeling." This position of the Marietta rector is endorsed by a number of the ministers of the Episcopal church, including Dr. Floyd Tomkins and Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas.

Task of Near East Relief Committee Increased

The war in the near east has greatly multiplied the duties of the Near East Relief. At the suggestion of the state department at Washington, appeals are being made for funds to help 500,000 or more refugees who have been made homeless by the advance of the Turks and the burning of the Christian sections of Smyrna. The Near East Relief has stationed at Smyrna H. C. Jacquith, who will be in charge of this new task. Contributions for these new refugees will be marked "Smyrna" to differentiate them from gifts made in support of the 100,000 war orphans of Armenia.

Evanston Meeting Will Be of Unusual Interest

The 113th annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will be held at the First Congregational church of Evanston, Oct. 24-27. Probably this board has never before faced such complex and apparently insoluble problems as this year. It has done a large work within the borders of the former Turkish empire. The menacing attitude of the Moslems makes the continuance of some of this work problematical. Many returned missionaries will be back from their fields of labor and will give first hand reports of conditions on their fields. The treasurer's report of the board will show receipts of approximately two million dollars for the past fiscal year. The leaders feel that to meet the needs of the coming year three million dollars must be secured. Among the special features of the program is an address by Dr. James L. Barton, who will give the survey of the entire work of the board. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton will speak on "My Impressions of the Far East." The annual sermon will be preached by Dr. Oscar E. Maurer of New Haven, Conn. The pulpits of Congregational churches, and perhaps of other churches will be filled by foreign missionaries on the Sundays nearest to this meeting. It is now more than thirty years since the last meeting of the American Board was held in the Chicago area.

Fuel Question Presses the Churches

The fuel shortage throughout the country is embarrassing to many groups of church trustees. Since the householders get preferential treatment from the dealers of course, some churches are left without any visible supply. At Middletown, Conn., the First Methodist, the Baptist and the North and South Congregational churches are considering the holding of union services this winter as in war-time in order to meet the problem. North Congregational church has a supply of coal.

City Federation Movement Grows

Throughout the country the organization of city federations of churches is helping to pull out the sting of denominational competition in local communities. Recently a thousand laymen got together at Brockton, Mass., and voted to recommend to their individual churches the formation of a city federation in that city. The meeting to consider this matter was held in First Parish Congregational church. Theological seminaries have taken account of the rise of a new religious profession, that of city federation secretary. Special courses are to be given which will assist in the preparation for such work.

Congregational Year-Book Presents Statistics

The appearance of the year-book of the Congregational Conference of Illinois makes it possible to secure up-to-date information with regard to the salaries of ministers, for this year-book dares to print the facts for every church in the state. In the Chicago Association are 108 churches and these show an average salary of approximately $2,350. This average is brought up by three churches which pay seven thousand dol-

Evangelical Denominations Seek Reunion

AT the same time the United Evangelical church held its eighth quadrennial conference at Barrington, Ill., this year, the Evangelical Association was in general conference at Detroit. The former denomination split off from the latter in 1894. Twelve years ago the parent organization initiated negotiations looking toward reunion. These have been pending ever since. On October 9, the United Evangelical conference voted 77 to 14 to accept union on the basis proposed by the Evangelical Association. The following morning the members of the conference took the train for Detroit, where they will seek such amendment to the basis of agreement as will make it possible to secure unanimous action. The Evangelical Association has 1,036 ministers, 1,626 churches ,and 118,620 members. The United Evangelical church has 528 ministers, 975 churches and 86,635 communicants. In many cities both denominations have churches, which fact has made their work in the past highly competitive.

The history of the division of these people is informing and typical. As given in a book entitled: "The Churches of the Federal Council" the story is told in this way: "The difficulties were not of a doctrinal character, but grew out of a serious difference of opinion respecting the legality of certain official acts of bishops and legislative bodies. A large minority which afterwards crystalized into the United Evangelical church held that the actions indicated were not only undisciplinary, but also subversive to the very genius of the church. The difficulties culminated at the General Conference of 1887, held at Buffalo, N. Y. At this time the dissenters to a certain action formulated a protest signed by almost half of the delegates present. The body unwisely refused to receive and record the protest in accordance with parliamentary practice. The protestants felt that they could not consistently submit to this subversion of their rights and carried their contention to the conscience of the church. The church was now divided into a 'majority' and a 'minority' camp, conferences and congregations ranging themselves in one or the other.

"In 1891, Dr. H. K. Carroll, editor of the religious department of the Independent, and an associate secretary of the Federal Council, with other prominent churchmen, sought to bring the factions together by arbitration. To this the 'minority' agreed, and four hundred and forty-one ministers signed a paper agreeing to submit to an impartial decision. The laity, in General Conference assembled, also concurred.

"All these overtures the 'majority' spurned and the 'minority,' deeply conscious of the integrity of their cause, and with humble dependence in God turned from the troubled past to a brighter and more hopeful future. The first General Conference of the 'minority' was held in Philadelphia in 1891. Pending the outcome of litigation, the old denominational name was for the time being retained. At this conference Rev. Rudolf Dubs, Rev. Wesley Stanford, and Rev. Charles S. Haman were elected as bishops. The 'minority' maintained a publishing house and church organs in both English and German languages, not, however, under official control. In 1894 the first regular General Conference was held at Naperville, Ill. By this time the division was complete."

Among the last acts of the General Conference of the United Evangelical church (assuming that there is no hitch in the union at Detroit) was a pronouncement on the question of minimum wage. The episcopal message ridiculed the idea that the minimum wage in this country should be $2,750, claiming that such a wage would amount to more than the total productive income of the country. The business men could not get too much comfort out of the message, however, for it was asserted that "many people were in a mad scramble for wealth and a spirit of character-destroying profiteering became almost the rule rather than the exception. Graft and dishonesty in business are distressingly common."

The new generation which has come on has but little personal knowledge of the schism of thirty years ago. These two denominations, largely Methodist in theology and German in their racial constituency, seem to be on the eve of a new era of constructive action in many fields of endeavor.

lars or over. Only twelve churches pay as much as four thousand dollars per year. Thirty-three churches have parsonages, but in most cases these are the churches paying the larger salaries. About fifty churches pay less than eighteen hundred dollars per year. These are the conditions in a denomination which has had a better standard in the matter of ministerial salaries than any other in the evangelical group. It helps to explain why the average term of service of a minister in Chicago is two and a half years, when one remembers that the average minister must pay rent at about the rate of $15 per month per room for his dwelling.

Presbyterians Will Hold Great Lay Conference

The consolidation of Presbyterian boards has produced inevitably some confusion among Presbyterians with regard to their work. However, this consolidation is only preliminary to a great forward movement. A Pan-Presbyterian program on the general theme, "The Layman of Today and the Church of Tomorrow," will be presented at a great lay meeting at Kansas City, December 4-8, at which leading Presbyterians from all over the land will speak. Two dinners will be held, one for women and one for men and plates will be laid for a thousand people at each.

Protestant Hospitals Unite in One Organization

The Protestant hospitals of the land, two hundred in number, are now united in a single organization, the National Protestant Hospital association, which met at Atlantic City, September 23-25. Dr. Pliny O. Clark, of Denver, served as president of the organization. He asserted in his presidential address: "We have come to the time when the dominant purpose of the association—cooperation, comity and coordination, education, service and standardization—must be carried to the highest bodies of authority in every church, so that the hospital with its program of scientific and at the same time Christian healing may become a definite part of the program of every church."

Celebrate Anniversary With Church Unity Meeting

First Congregational church, of Danvers, Mass., celebrated its 250th anniversary the week of October 8-15. On Thursday evening of that week a Christian unity conference was held with the general topic "Obstacles, How to Surmount Them." The speakers were: Rev. W. E. Gilroy, editor Congregationalist; Rev. A. C. Dieffenbach, editor Christian Register, Unitarian; Prof. Samuel McComb, Episcopal Divinity School, Cambridge; Prof. Woodman Bradbury, Baptist Theological Institute, Newton.

Former Vice-President Is Sunday School Teacher

After an absence of eight years, Thomas R. Marshall, former vice-president of the United States, is back at his task as teacher of the Men's class at First Presbyterian Sunday school in Indianapolis. During his term as governor of the state of Indiana, he met this class every Sunday. On the first Sunday with his class this autumn, Mr. Marshall spoke on the educational system of the country. He said: "It is wrong from the viewpoint that the divorce of the church from the school has relieved the school of the responsibility of the moral and spiritual training that constitute the fundamentals of right training for citizenship. While I am not advocating the teaching of denominationalism in the schools, it appears to me that it would be far better to have religious training in the schools, since in the latter generations there appears to be a lack of this necessary religious training in the homes. Few of us have the premise to assert that we are really educated. Our golf links and our various places of amusement today are filled with persons who believe, but, who like the rest of us, have shown a disinclination to make the gospel a philosophy to live by. I am in favor of any sort of education if it will help us to make better citizens for the community, state or nation, and better friends of the world."

American Influences Felt in Eastern Churches

AMERICA has an influence throughout the world today that is unparalleled in history by reason of her philanthropies and her missionary operations. The highest authority of the Orthodox church of Russia is Yedvokin, archbishop of Nijni-Novgorod. He is thus described by F. A. Mackenzie: "Tall, vivid, virile, with long finely combed hair, dressed in a cassock of unbleached linen reaching to his feet, without any of the jeweled symbols of his faith which most of the Russian prelates affect, he looks the embodiment of apostolic dignity. His dress might be that of a poor working priest. The room in which I interviewed him—office, bedroom and reception hall in one—is on the ground floor of one of the minor Moscow branch monasteries. A bed in one corner, a desk where he dealt with his correspondence and some pictures are its main furniture."

This ecclesiastic at one time had a period of service in New York. There he came into contact with Americans of various communions and he was deeply impressed with the religious toleration prevalent in this country. He also became converted to the American idea of the separation of church and state. He is the very man to guide his church in these difficult days in Russia. Though he differs with the bolshevists at many important points and declares himself openly to be no bolshevist, he has followed the policy of keeping his church free from the entanglement of politics. He boasts that none of his ten bishops has gone to prison, though in the czar's regime twenty-eight bishops were sent to Russia as well as many priests.

The reform of church celibacy is well under way. Under former church law a priest might be married if he took his wife before his ordination, but in case he was widowed, he could not seek another wife to care for his motherless children. The bishop could not be a married man. The monasteries and convents aroused the resentment of the people in the same way that they do the world over when they become rich enough to permit the inmates to live in idleness from the endowments. Under the new regime, priests may remarry, a bishop may have a wife and even the inhabitants of the monasteries and convents will be permitted to renounce their vows if they so elect.

This archbishop has given up of his own free will all the church treasure in his diocese to feed the poor. He is urging his clergy to seek some secular calling to relieve the burden on the people. Henceforth many priests will be small farmers and even merchants. This is to meet the exigencies of an industrial situation that is beyond the imagination of American people.

The welcome given to those who would introduce such American religious methads as the popular circulation of the scriptures, the introduction of Sunday schools and young people's organizations are indicative of the fundamental changes that are going on. The recent recognition given the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal church of America is said to presage a wider fellowship. The Orthodox church is to be represented both at the World Conference on Faith and Order and at the approaching World Council on Religious Life and Work.

The newly elected Patriarch of Constantinople, Meletios, is also a man with an American experience. He will work in harmony with the new order in Russia. The Russian church is no longer governed by the state and now has a church council in place of the czar as its head. This church council will be recognized at once by the national Orthodox churches in adjacent countries. The Archbishop Yedvokin declares that the Patriarch of Constantinople is going even farther in the matter of reform than the Russian church.

The chief influence in the other direction has centered in the person of that arch-conservative, the now deposed king of Greece. Constantine refused to the last to recognize the new patriarch of Constantinople. However, in the present mood of the near east, royal objections weigh little. Guided by their American experience, these leading ecclesiastics seek to liberate the church from control by the state.

tion at Union Theological Seminary, of New York. His series of outstanding books in this field has made him perhaps the leading authority of the country on his subject. Since his resignation he has accepted an appointment for a full semester's work each year as professor of religious education at Teachers' College, Columbia University. He is beginning this work with the present semester.

Federation To Be Extended to the States

The Federal Council and more than forty city federations of churches have helped very materially to marshal the forces of evangelical Christianity against public evils and to prevent the serious overlapping which has all too often characterized the work of the churches. The state organizations of the various denominations still work independently in most of the older states and the further overlapping of churches can only be prevented by the formation of state federations. Recently at a meeting at Utica, N. Y., a state council of churches was formed, with Rev. O. L. Price as organizing secretary. Significant in the list of cooperating denominations is the presence of the Universalist church. This denomination was denied fellowship in the Federal Council.

Detroit Has Large Campaign of Open Air Preaching

The evangelistic committee of the Detroit Council of Churches and the laymen's Evangelistic union have been cooperating this summer in a most noteworthy enterprise in the way of outdoor preaching. Rev. D. L. Schultz, a member of the staff of the home missions department of Detroit, was called to take charge of the campaign. Nine districts were covered. Rev. H. B. McCormick, pastor of Woodward Avenue Christian church, headed the evangelistic committee. Mr. McCormick gives the following account of the work of Dr. Schultz: "Several representatives of foreign speaking Christian organizations were also associated with them. The audiences at noon meetings were composed almost wholly of unemployed and transient men occupying the park, lying about on the grass at noon ,or sleeping there at night, and representing every nationality and every shade of belief imaginable. Practically all of these men had broken with the church years ago, if they were ever identified with it at all, and a vast majority of them expressed at the beginning no interest whatever in the church or in the preaching of the gospel. The evening meetings were composed very largely of the same class of men, with an additional number of transients, and men free from employment resting in the parks. During the six weeks of Dr. Schultz's work with these crowds of men, he delivered sixty-nine addresses, recorded more than three hundred and fifty requests for prayer, led to an open profession of faith at least one hundred and twenty men who professed conversion, and a change of life, had personal interviews with two hundred and twenty-five men, secured immediate employment for more than one hundred of them, and sent back to their homes and families more than twenty others. The total attendance at all these meetings was approximately 25,000. The workers associated with Dr. Schultz had hundreds of other interviews which were attended with good results. More than two thousand Gospels of John were given to interested men who requested them at the close of the services. In addition to these, thousands of tracts were also distributed. Hundreds of men could be seen sitting in the park of afternoons and evenings, reading the gospels which had been given to them."

Disciples Interested in Their History

In various parts of America, the sermon topics announced by Disciples' leaders indicate a growing interest in Disciples' history. Dr. R. H. Crossfield, president of William Woods college, is now engaged in giving an historical series of Wednesday evening lectures in the Disciples' church at Fulton, Mo., and Dr. W. E. Garrison, dean of the University of Chicago, has been secured by the Disciples' Ministers' Association of Chicago to lecture on this history on Monday mornings. The spirit of the founders of the movement a hundred years ago was thoroughly liberal with a strong emphasis upon toleration of religious opinion and upon the need of Christian union.

Indianapolis Has Large School of Religious Education

Typical of what is going on in a number of the cities of the land is the school of religious education in Indianapolis which this year has secured an enrolment of 300. This is the third year for the school. It meets on Tuesday evenings and does in a more effective way the work that used to be called "teacher training." Dr. W. C. Morro of Butler college is dean of the school, and ministers, educators and prominent Sunday school workers make up the faculty. The whole group studies the life of Christ this year, and then after the assembly period, breaks up in departmental conferences.

Park Dedicated to Memory of Jenkin Lloyd Jones

On October 1, the Jenkin Lloyd Jones' State Park at Tower, Wis., was dedicated and turned over to the custody of the state. Miss Zona Gale, of Portage, spoke on "Jenkin Lloyd Jones' Influence on State, Nation, and all Humanity." This method of commemorating the life and work of a great preacher is consistent with his social sympathies. His work was largely identified with great public causes outside his parish interests. The park comprises 55 acres, and overlooks the Wisconsin river, across the stream from Spring Green, and possesses scenic attractions and has an abundance of historical interest. At this place a village by the name of Helena once flourished, and was the home of a shot-making industry.

Dr. Jefferson Commended by Lloyd George

Dr. Charles E. Jefferson has returned from his three-months' ministry in London, and on October 1 was once more at Broadway Tabernacle in New York. On the evening of that day he spoke on "The Soul of Great Britain.' Before leaving Great Britain he received a letter from Premier Lloyd George thanking him for his service in the cause of international understanding. "Before you leave London," said Lloyd George in his letter to Dr. Jefferson, "I wish to express to you in official fashion my deep appreciation of the admirable service you have rendered and are still rendering in the furtherance both of church union and of good understanding between two kindred nations. You do not require me to point out to you how great is the need today to foster sympathy and mutual knowledge among the Christian peoples of the world. You have already shown by your own actions your realization of the nature of the work there is to do, and of the unique opportunity the Church Peace Union offers for its accomplishment. May I be permitted to add that the reports that have reached me leave no doubt of your own excellent ability to carry that work forward."

Minister Investigates Living Conditions in Germany

The plight of ministers in continental Europe is quite beyond the imagination of American pastors. Dr. J. F. Krueger, president of Midland college of Nebraska, spent the summer at Leipsic in special study where he came into contact with the Lutheran clergy. He reports many Lutheran ministers in Germany living on a salary of $100 per year. In the Lutheran church at Cottves, a city of sixty thousand, he found a church with an attendance of 1,500 on Sunday morning. The offering totaled 600 marks, which at the time would amount to about one dollar of American money. Half of this big collection had been given by the American visitor. In the long run such economic conditions must affect the educational and spiritual status of the ministry.

Disciples' School Becomes Union Institution

Many years ago the Disciples founded the Bible College of Missouri on the edge of the campus of the University of Missouri. This school had a successful history, but when other denominations began to form plans at the university, the Disciples put their splendid plant at their service, and the school is now operated on a union basis. There are three teachers, Congregational, Presbyterian, and Disciples. The Disciples' student body is one-sixth of the university enrolment each year, and these students are well organized in a Sunday school class under the tutelage of Professor Gibbs.

Sherwood Eddy on Another World Tour

Sherwood Eddy is one of the most tireless of the globe trotters who are interested in the world's religion. In the employ of the Y. M. C. A. he has made many previous trips, and he is now on a journey in which he will touch Japan, China, India, Egypt, Turkey, Russia, the Balkans and Germany. The result of his observations will be brought together in book form and published by Doran.

Two Canadian Ministers Exchange Views

Dr. Gilroy, the new editor of the Congregationalist, and Rev. P. W. Philpott, the newly chosen pastor of Moody church, of Chicago, were once fellow pastors in Canada. The editor of the Congregationalist recently printed an open letter to the new Moody pastor, who is coming to an institution which has not worked harmoniously with many Congregationalists. The communication asked for brotherly cooperation against the forces of sin. Mr. Philpott replies in a lengthy letter which reveals his sense of religious values. He says: "There is a truth, brother, without which love, brotherhood, everything to be desired in time and eternity fails, and that is—There is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved. I come to Moody church to preach a personal, crucified, risen Saviour—and God's promise of salvation to as many as accept and believe in him as such; and the fear of man, God helping me, shall not prevent my faithfully holding up the converse truth that refusal to accept and believe brings eternal condemnation."

Dr. Aked Opposed to American Intervention

A number of Kansas City ministers have gone on record as in favor of American intervention in the Near East crisis. Against this point of view Dr. Charles F. Aked, of First Congregational church, has registered a strong dissent. Among his arguments were the following: "General Habord is a friend of Armenia. He is on the advisory committee of the Near East Relief. He was sent to Asia Minor by President Wilson to investigate and report. He reported that if we accepted a mandate for Armenia, and if there were no war, if we only had to do police work, we should need an army of fifty-nine thousand men. What should we need if we had to fight Great Britain, or France, or a Turko-Russo-German alliance? Intervention would mean the maintenance of a great army. It would put back the hopes of disarmament and of world peace for generations. It would mean enormous taxation; the sale of Liberty bonds again; it would mean the draft once more. We could not raise a volunteer army big enough. We could not sail our battle ships over the mountains of Ararat. We should have to conscript our boys for typhoid, typhus and smallpox."

United Presbyterians Have a City-Wide Picnic

The United Presbyterian church in Chicago has a number of congregations in various parts of the city. These congregations were brought together by the young people's organization called the Christian Union, for a picnic at Jackson Park on Labor day. Wooded Island was captured by these Presbyterians, and among the features of the day were a baseball game and a speech-making fest.

Dr. Grenfell Is Back in London

Dr. Grenfell, well-known missionary, is a Britisher, and does his work in a British colony, yet most of his endowment fund up to the present time is American money, totalling about a million dollars. He has gone home to press his case with his people to secure a half million more from them, and thus make sure of the permanency of the work which he has brought to such a success. Dr. Grenfell, who is as up-to-date as any American surgeon, is now using radium on the Labrador fishermen for the treatment of cancer, of which there are a considerable number of cases. His wife, an American woman who formerly lived at Winnetka, Ill., has been teaching the native women how to make artificial flowers, a craft which provides auxiliary income among a people where it is gravely needed.

Evangelism and Cooperation Prominent in Pittsburgh

The Pittsburgh ministers who are evangelical in spirit gathered recently at the call of the Pennsylvania Federation of Churches and of the Pittsburgh Council of Churches to consider the matter of an evangelistic program for the coming season. The churches are being asked to face squarely the evangelization of their communities. The meeting was held in Smithfield Methodist church. Among the out of town speakers were Rev. B. S. Lamb, of Columbus; Rev. G. H. Black ,and Dr. C. L. Goodell.

Another Denominational Institution at Chicago

The University of Chicago is now surrounded by institutions of the various denominations who seek to conserve the spiritual life of their students and to provide for the training of ministers. The latest addition to the denominational groups is the Friends who have decided to erect at the university a Friends' Hostel which will be a permanent center for the denomination on the university campus. Denominational groups already organized include the Disciples, Congregationalists, Unitarians, and Universalists. The Norwegian Baptists have also a house for those of their racial group who are Baptist in faith. As the University of Chicago is in a sense a Baptist institution there is no Baptist house on the campus.

AN OPPORTUNITY TO HELP

TWO WORTHY ALABAMA SCHOOLS

DOWNING INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL
Brewton, Alabama.

This school, established in 1906, had that year an enrollment of 9; a faculty of 2; a property valuation of $4,000; and 1 building. Now the school has an enrollment of 185; a faculty of 16; 7 buildings, and a property valuation of $175,000.

This school was established to provide an education and Christian training to poor girls who, without this school, would grow up in ignorance. We need help. Work on a badly needed dormitory has been suspended for lack of funds. You can establish scholarships at this school, and lift poor girls from ignorance to light, and fit them for efficient service. Will you help?

COLEY-BLACKSHER VOCATIONAL SCHOOL BOR BOYS
Hadley, Alabama.

This school was established one year ago. We have been given 2,124 acres of land, but have only one dormitory and one small school room.

There are probably 1500 Indians in this community without church or school facilities; also a community of Negroes without adequate school opportunities. It is our purpose to try to provide an opportunity for all these. Our people have been generous, but here is an opportunity for others to help us with their money to build American citizens. Will you help? Address the president.

YOUR OPPORTUNITY

If you would immortalize yourself, here is your opportunity. You can provide money to help build, equip and maintain these two schools, which were established for those who without outside help must grow up in ignorance. We give a cordial invitation to our friends in the North and elsewhere to visit us at Brewton. We will entertain you free of charge. O, Friends, will you not hear and heed this Macedonian cry? whereat Alexander Pope inquires naively, "Full of what?"

"The Bookfull blockhead ignorantly read
With loads of learned lumber in his head."

And Bacon would have answered "It depends on what he reads."

READING MATTER (the stuff they put advertisements next to) in this our generation is comparatively cheap. For two cents you can buy 65 square feet of paper, weighing half a pound and entirely covered with words. For five cents you can buy 113 square feet of expensive paper, about one pound in weight, lavishly bespeckled with the writings and pictures of some pretty highly paid people.

It would seem a fairly hopeless task to try to persuade you to spend 15 cents (10 cents in advance) for The New Republic, which is printed on a rather cheap paper, has no pictures and averages only 20 square feet an issue.

And yet some 40,000 of you do it, and we've discovered that these 40,000 are a pretty discriminating crowd, too. An appreciable percentage of them are listed in "Who's Who." The large majority of them are professional men and women. Why do they read The New Republic?

Partly because they are mostly busy people and The New Republic gives them a lot of facts they would otherwise have to spend a good deal of time digging for.

But principally because The New Republic is of assistance to the most useful of all possessions—what Pasteur has called "the prepared mind."

Several million people had seen apples fall before Newton did. But it took a "prepared mind" to see that there was anything in a falling apple that required an explanation, and from it to revolutionize our conception of the universe.

That's where The New Republic can serve you—not by leading you or instructing you, but by helping you keep your mind on its toes. The proof of the paper is in the reading. Use the coupon below.

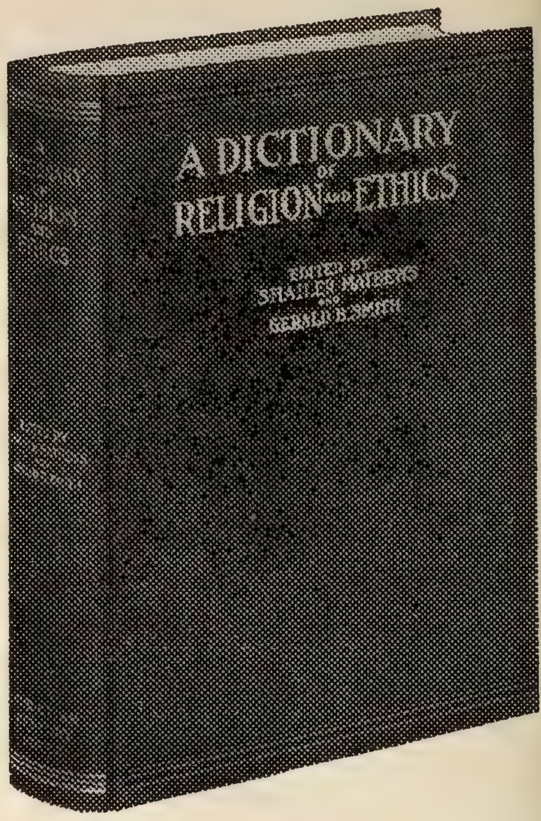
"IT'S REALLY MARVELOUS TO HAVE ALL THIS RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE CONDENSED IN A SINGLE BOOK RIGHT AT MY ELBOW"

So spoke a clergyman of wide experience and scholarly training concerning the great volume,



A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS
EDITED BY SHAILER MATHEWS AND GERALD B. SMITH

A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS

Edited by SHAILER MATHEWS and GERALD BIRNEY SMITH

This is a new book which every thoughtful or studious person must have. It is a whole religious library in one book—the product of a hundred authoritative scholars—clear, compact, accurate, authentic.

This book is now going to the library tables of all leading ministers, bishops and laymen who want to know and who must know.

Do You Know—

The facts as to the historicity of Christ?

What made the Mohammedan successful? That the Mohammedan is an offshoot of the Christian religion?

Why Brahminism drove Buddhism out of India?

That the Roman religion lasted twelve hundred years?

The relative influence of John Hus, Wyckliff and Luther?

The history of the idea of Heaven and Hell?

The great book "Against Celsus?"

The origin and development of Hedonism?

About the Code of Hammurabi? That this Code (2000 years B. C.) had higher morals than many men of today?

That the Immaculate Conception dogma was promulgated in 1854?

What is Jewish Christianity?

Voices of Approval from All Quarters

The New York Christian Advocate: "Useful, especially because of its up-to-dateness and non-technical treatment of words and subjects."

The Presbyterian: "It is more than a dictionary; rather an encyclopedia."

The Baptist: "A convenient one-volume dictionary likely to be used by its possessor more than many-volumed encyclopedias."

The Continent: "Convenient, compact, dependable."

The Christian Work: "The appearance of this volume is a notable event."

Religious Education: "A book quite indispensable to the private library of every minister, student and teacher of religion."

THE DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS sets forth in compact form the results of modern study in the psychology of religion, the history of religions, both primitive and developed, the present status of religious life in America, Europe and the most important mission fields, and the important phases of Christian belief and practice. It also covers both social and individual ethics. All subjects of importance in the field of religion and ethics are discussed. About one hundred scholars have cooperated with the editors, including well-known specialists in their respective fields. The articles are written historically, objectively, without speculation or propaganda, and in so far as possible by those most in sympathy with their subjects.

Not only should every minister possess this book; every Sunday school teacher, every Bible student who takes his study seriously, should have it at his elbow. It is without doubt the most useful one-volume dictionary of religion published in decades. Do not neglect to send in your order today.

WHO IS YOUR GOD?

Jew, Catholic, Protestant or whoever you may be, if you approve of the Ten Commandments, your God is Jehovah. For the first Commandment—as the Hebrew text reproduced herewith shows—plainly reads: "I am Jehovah, Thy God."

Exodus XX. 2.

אנכי יהוה אלהיך . . .

To approve of the principles of the Commandments and disapprove of Jehovah means not only the repudiation of Jehovah, but also of the rest of the Commandments, as well as one's own self. To grasp the significance of Jehovah only; and the general bearing of the first Commandment upon the rest of the Commandments, let any American citizen ask himself this: What would be the consequences if we should agree to maintain the same form of government as we are having now, but, instead of Americanism, call it Bolshevism?

WHAT IS YOUR IDEAL?

Free thinker, Socialist, Anarchist or whoever you may be, if common sense and common decency prompt you to approve of such fundamentals as "Honor thy father and thy mother," "Thou shalt not steal," etc., your prime ideal is Jehovah. For all the Commandments bear the stamp Jehovah as shown above. Whether Jehovah is God, Creator and Ruler of the universe, or the ideal embracing the principles of "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not bear false witness," etc., every individual is at liberty to determine for himself or herself. Like any other ideal, one cannot claim approval of its principles and disapproval of the ideal itself.

Americanism—The Religion

Since no one—who is opposed to such principles as "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not commit adultery," etc.—can claim to be worthy of being an American citizen, it is obvious that the principles of the Decalogue not only coincide with the principles of Americanism, but are wholly dependent upon each other; the principles of the former giving man the right to be called civilized, and the principles of the latter giving man the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Therefore, to eliminate both the religious and scientific fanaticisms and to safeguard the liberties as they were implanted in the constitution and Declaration of Independence, mankind should recognize that Jehovah is the God (or ideal), Americanism the religion.

Three Vital Volumes

The Christian Faith and the New Day

By Cleland Boyd McAfee, of McCormick Theological Seminary

The appeal here is not to technical theologians, but to working ministers and thoughtful laymen who, after all, build and use the theology that is living and who sometimes fear to see it change. The great days just past have given many a renewed assurance that Christianity is more vital and forceful than it has been for many a day. Its vitality may well claim the right to phrase itself anew—which means to reconstruct theology at any point where it may need reconstruction.

A Vital Christianity for Today

By Bishop Charles D. Williams

For many persons a valid Christianity is to be known by its roots. But the mind of today, Bishop Williams holds, is intensely practical and insists that a valid Christianity is to be known by its fruits. Can it meet the need of a universal religion felt by an expanding and unifying world? Can it moralize our industrial, political and commercial life and humanize our social life? Can it live with the expanding vision and increasing light of modern knowledge? Some of the chapter titles of this challenging book are: "Christianity and the World," "Men of Vision," "The Confidence of a Certain Faith," "The Gospel of Democracy," "The Uses of Life," "The Universal Christ," and "The Supreme Values."

The New Social Order

By Harry F. Ward

This book, as the title indicates, is based upon the conviction that a new order of living is both necessary and inevitable, and upon the judgment that the beginnings of that new order are already with us. The signs are clear that we have arrived at one of those conjunctions of economic pressure and idealistic impulse, of material and spiritual reality, which occasion fundamental changes in the organization of life. Dr. Ward takes up those outstanding principles which have been employed in the social progress of the western world, considers how they are being changed to meet present needs and aspirations, and in the light of them examines the significant features of various programs for the new order.

IF the small drama On the Death of a Horse in the Chauve Souris illustrates, as Balieff insists, the Greatness of the Russian Soul, it is easy to understand why Sherwood Anderson's notes on the Cincinnati river front reveal certain important facts about the mental processes of America. Admitting this, one admits also that The Nation's series, "These United States," is building a composite picture of America all the more faithful because it distinguishes instead of generalizing. While Kansas is still buzzing with William Allen White's accusation that his mother state is unsafe for poets, Nevada and Delaware and New Jersey leap into view and prove by the heat of their protests the unwelcome truth of their portraits. The series has been called the greatest journalistic undertaking of its kind in years; and the record when completed will form an important part of the written history of America.

* * * * * *

John Macy has added the ideas of his Spirit of American Literature to the rich tradition of Carl Van Doren's literary editorship of The Nation, and is making the book department illustrate the theme of his latest volume — that talk about literature is of no value unless in itself it is enjoyable. It is possible to be entertaining even about statistical works. The Nation's reviews achieve this when necessary, without sacrificing scholarship.

* * * * * *

The above reasons for reading The Nation are of minor importance compared to your certainty that you will find information which is not accessible elsewhere; and that events in Europe are pretty apt to turn out as The Nation prophesies them. At the left are mentioned a few attractive ways to see The Nation regularly.

Says: Rev. Charles W. Gilkey: "No other religious journal has contributed, either to my thinking, preaching or living, anything like the wealth of guidance and inspiration that I find in The Christian Century."

Prof. Harry F. Ward: "I consider The Christian Century the most promising venture in the field of religious journalism in the English-speaking world."

Rev. Charles E. Jefferson: "Wherever I go among men, east and west, I find they are reading your journal."

Pres. W. H. P. Faunce: "I read every paragraph in The Christian Century every week with constantly growing satisfaction. Here is a journal that puts first things first and leaves the petty things far out on the circumference."

Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin:. "The Christian Century is the only publication which comes to my home which gets a reading straight through upon its arrival."

Dr. Sherwood Eddy: "Among the few journals that have stood for complete social justice and a full social gospel, The Christian Century holds a unique place."

Pres. Ozora S. Davis: "There are some things that a man cannot get along without in these days; The Christian Century is one of them. You are fearless and constructive and are leading the way."

Bishop Francis J. McConnell: "I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian Church."

Dr. John Dewey's

Criticism of China's Missionary Schools appeared in the New Republic some months ago.

> "American missionary education [in China] has failed," thus Dr. Dewey quotes a Chinese student, "to develop independent energetic thought and character among even its most distinguished graduates. It has produced rather a subservient intellectual type, one which is characterized as slavish."

Dr. Guy W. Sarvis

Professor of Economics and Sociology in the University of Nanking, replies to Dr. Dewey's criticism in one of the most trenchant and informing articles on Christian educational ideals in China that has yet appeared.

> "Many of us who are in missionary educational work in China are former students of Dr. Dewey or enthusiastic followers of his educational and philosophical doctrines. We believe he desires to aid China in every possible way. We do not understand why, on the basis of assumption and hearsay, he has used the weight of his influence to damage institutions which, with all their imperfections, are making possible the most important contribution of America to China."

Dr. Sarvis' reply will appear in a forthcoming issue of The Christian Century.

Other Characteristic Features

"STUDIES IN SIN"

By H. D. C. MACLACHLAN

Using Tolstoi, Ibsen, Browning, Kipling, Bernard Shaw, Strindberg, Dostoiefsky, and A. S. M. Hutchinson as his background, Dr. Maclachlan is now beginning a series of articles on such subjects as "The Sin Against the Holy Ghost," "Sin and Atonement," "The Sin of Immaturity," "The Sin of the Secret Wish," "Sinning at Long Range," "Second Hand Sinning," "Sin and Punishment," and "Sin and Social Conventions." This will be a remarkable interpretation of literature and a unique discussion of modern views of sin.

"CHRISTIANIZING PUBLIC OPINION"

By SAMUEL McCREA CAVERT

The educational function of Christianity is not accomplished until the public opinion of the social order has itself been made Christian, so says Dr. Cavert in two articles about to appear in The Christian Century. These articles illuminate the concept of the social responsibility of the church.

"CHRIST AND MODERN LIFE"

Running currently with all other good things, the editors will continue to discuss and interpret the social aspects of the Christian gospel. Editorials and articles on such themes as these will be appearing each week:

"Jesus and Modern Industrialism"
"Christianity and Modern Science"
"Is Modern Business Christian?"
"Christ Shows 'The Way Out' for the World."
"The Socialism That Is Christian"
"'Christianity and Evolution"
"When Will the Kingdom Come?"
"The Future of the Community Church," Etc., etc., etc.

The Christian Century is distinguished by its candid discussion of living issues in the light of the mind of Christ.

Labor Unions in England and in America

LABOR unionism has gone much farther in Great Britain than in America. In the former country the labor union has made its peace with the employer and most of the employing class in that country are glad to have an association of workingmen with which to deal. The slugging, killing and maiming that goes with the program of our American organizations is practically unknown in that country. The unions discovered in England long since the futility of allowing hot-heads to lead the men in a righteous cause. Perhaps the biggest difference there is to be found in the fact that there are not so many unassimilated aliens, and that men of more Christian mind have acquired influence in the movement. The result is that labor in England hopes to win its cause by constitutional means rather than by violence and intimidation. The past year has been a particularly embarrassing one for the American churchman with liberal leanings. The pronouncements of the church on the industrial question are distinctly favorable to labor, so much so that they are often opposed by the employing classes. At the same time the methods used by certain workingmen in the strikes this year have been such that no respectable pulpit could defend some of them. In opposition to child labor, low wages, long hours and bad working conditions the church must ever side with the working man. But it has a moral duty to oppose evil wherever it is found. When a group of union men violate the law, it is the duty of the pulpit to denounce this violation in the same fearless way that it would treat violations on the part of any other section of the community. It is quite likely, too, that British employers, as contrasted with American, read economics rather more than their American cousins. Hence they do not have the blind reactions in labor disputes that so often characterize American business men.

Lawyer's Ethics and the Psychology of the Courts

HERE is a criticism written by one of the nation's most distinguished jurists referring to an editorial in the Christian Century of September 21, entitled "Two Contrasted Lives." The psychology of the courts is so well interpreted that we gratefully let the words of our correspondent stand in the place of editorial authority. "I knew both the men to whom you refer—the bishop and the lawyer—quite well, perhaps not intimately, but I knew their general characteristics and their public work, and agree that you have perhaps stated in a large measure, correctly, each of their characteristics; but I disagree very positively with you in your statement, two-thirds of the way through the editorial, that 'British judges are far less complaisant to the indirections and trickeries of shrewd and unscrupulous attorneys than is the case in American courts.' I do not think that criticism is well founded. I believe the judges of the courts in this country are quite as insistent on the ethics of lawyers in their courts as are the English judges. I have given this topic quite careful attention for years and have studied the actions of the English courts, as compared with the American courts, for some time because of similar criticisms that I have heard from other sources than from this editorial. If the lawyer to whom you refer in this editorial had the characteristics that you suggest therein in regard to winning law suits, I do not think, because of that fact, he had as much influence with the courts as he would have had had he been known as a lawyer who was seeking correct results rather than one who wanted to win a law suit. I am very confident that lawyers who have a reputation of being tricky and of being desirous only of winning their cases, regardless of the merits, are greatly handicapped by such a reputation with the courts. I happen to know that the lawyer to whom you refer was engaged by the liquor interests of this country, with another great lawyer, to try to obtain a decision in the supreme court of the United States, holding the eighteenth amendment unconstitutional. I also happen to know that other leading lawyers of Chicago were applied to to take up this case to seek to obtain its unconstitutionality, and after examining the subject they advised their clients, the leading liquor men, they thought the law was constitutional and would be so held; and I feel very certain that the lawyers who advised their clients that the law was constitutional stand much higher with the courts of this state than does the lawyer who took the case and obtained a large fee and yet had the case decided against him by the supreme court of the United States. No one who knew the lawyer to whom you refer, would attempt to question that he was a very bright man, intellectually—perhaps one of the keenest lawyers we have had at the bar in Chicago for years, but I am very certain that his reputation, to which you refer in your editorial, was a handicap rather than a help to him in the trial of cases in the courts of this state."

The English Brotherhood Movement

READING the reports of the annual Conference of the English brotherhood movement at Leeds makes one wonder why the movement failed to take root in America. Springing up in response to a deep need in Britain, it has become one of the outstanding forces for practical Christianity in the United Kingdom. The third lecture on the John Clifford Foundation was delivered this year by Rev. Tom Sykes, general secretary of the movement. It is a trumpet call for practical Christian fraternity in a world dying of hate. Taking for his theme, "The Challenge of Brotherhood," the lecturer showed how fundamental brotherhood is in the teaching of Jesus—no mere metaphor, much less a by-product, but central in fact and prophecy, sonship being the divine logic of the primordial fact of the fatherhood of God. Once the fact of the fatherhood of God is treated, not as a theological idea, or a vague whiff of sentiment, but as the primary fact of spiritual being, new brotherly relations in industry, politics, and religion—now seemingly fantastic and incredible—will become the natural order of life crowned with community. "The fundamental test of religion today is whether it is capable of solving the problem of how men shall live together"—that challenging sentence gives the keynote of one of the most stimulating, illuminating, and thrilling utterances of recent times, forthright, courageous, shot through with flashes of creative insight and prophetic passion. The lecturer, a brilliant young man of the Primitive Methodist connection, by his vigor of mind, his adventurous faith, his practical capacity and prophetic fire, has shown himself to be one of the really constructive leaders of practical Christianity in Britain. His ringing appeal recalls the unfinished sentence of the last sermon of David Swing: "We must all hope much for the gradual progress of brotherly love—"; indeed it is our only hope.

"Americanism: A World Menace"

SELDOM have we been brought up with such a jerk as when we read the following title of a book announced in an English literary journal: "Americanism: A World Menace," by W. T. Colyer; preface by Tom Mann. It is described as "An exposure of the motives and methods of politicians, big business men and their creatures in the United States, and a warning of their danger to the whole world." The book is to be issued by The Labour Publishing Company, 6 Tavistock Square, London. No copy of the book, so far as we are aware, has yet reached America, but it is very significant that a book of such title should be published anywhere—doubly so when it is published by men of the English labor movement, whose leaders have a forward-looking spiritual-mindedness hardly known in the ranks of American labor. Time was when America was looked upon as an asylum for the oppressed, a refuge for those tormented by the tyranny of the old world. What has happened to justify, or even to suggest, a book describing Americanism, of which we have been so proud, as a menace to mankind? What is it that our men of politics and big business are doing that should cause a fine-minded humanist to warn the world against Americanism, as against a plague? Here is cause for searching of heart by Americans, and especially by Christian men, to see what we mean by Americanism, and why it is that our nation is regarded as a danger, a thing to be dreaded if not despised. Is Americanism to take the place of Prussianism in the mind of mankind?

Wanted: A Church Big Enough for God

BRAND, in the wonderful Ibsen drama of that name, started out to build a church big enough for God. In his little tumbledown church by the fiord the pastor broods almost to madness on the greatness of God and the littleness of his people—their little-mindedness, and, worse still, their little-heartedness. So the little old church is pulled down and a larger one is started; but by the time he has finished it his thought of God has grown until the new church seems too small. It is a perfect parable of our enlarging thought of God, brought to mind at the moment by the recent report of observations of the Magellan clouds by Harvard astronomers. The Magellan clouds consist of three small nebula in the southern heavens, visible just after crossing the southern tropic, in the latitude of Rio de Janeiro—two bright, like the milky way, and one dark. What has hitherto been described as "small nebula" now reveals itself as another universe, so to speak; a system of suns and stars so distant that it takes light 110,000 years to reach us. It includes stars 10,000 times as bright as our leary little sun, cloudy only because of their unimaginable istance—a "sky mark" first detected by the German as-ronomer Hevelius three centuries ago, and named in honor f the circumnavigator of the globe. This new unveiling f the far-shining City of God makes our earth seem in-nitesimal, and our gibbering speculations like the hum of sects. So, on every side, the walls of the universe are ushed back into the infinite, and if we are henceforth to hink of God at all, it must be in terms worthy of his ugust and awful majesty. Exclusiveness must be ex-luded, and littleness of mind must be lost in wonder and we under that bright southern sky, where God gives us a limpse of a splendor which makes our theologies seem ke children playing with the toys of religion. A petty eligion cannot long survive in so vast a universe; we ust have a church big enough for God, and a faith to see e infinite lighted by the glow of intelligence and the armth of love.

dmund Burke and ames Bryce

OTHER great Britons, like Chatham and John Bright, have been champions of America, and many great olitical thinkers of Britain, like Hume and Mill, have een teachers of America. But Burke and Bryce have een both champions and teachers. Our high schools study urke's "Speech on Conciliation," and there is hardly a ollege where Bryce's "American Commonwealth" is not sed as a text-book. It is in a peculiar sense fitting that emorials of these two friends of America should stand the national capital. Nor should it escape notice that oth Burke and Bryce were Irish born, which, if it does ot account in part for their sympathetic understanding of merica, makes it doubly appropriate that their names be onored anew in the year when the Anglo-Irish difficul-es have ceased forever—let us hope—to poison Anglo-merican friendship. Burke stands a century away on e distant slopes of time, speaking to us in a richly appar-lled eloquence. Bryce is nearer to us, intimately known nd greatly beloved, uniting a genius for friendship with n amazing knowledge, and tireless as interpreter between ations. As the figures of Washington and Lincoln are amiliar in London, so Burke and Bryce have a place in ashington; and we have a right to rejoice that our civ-ization, in spite of its faults, has produced such men ho, in their contribution to the moral integrity of his-ory, are worthy peers of the mighty ones of the ancient orld.

resident Harding's nique Opportunity

AMERICA has suffered much from party politics. It is an old trick with us to put the mantle of party oyalty over many things which could not stand the clear ight of day. "My party organization, may it be always ight, but my party organization, right or wrong," has been he watchword of all too many of our voters. We entered he war, a nation unified by a noble moral enthusiasm. We ame out of it a country reduced to moral isolation by partisan politics. The moment the league of nations became a victim of party politics it was doomed to failure as far as America was concerned. After our period of moral lassitude we are being forced to the place where we will once more think in the terms of the life of the whole world. And such thinking can only be successful if it is lifted completely above the realm of party jealousy and party rivalry. There should be evolved an American program to which men of good will in every party can adhere. In Britain there are many who hope for something like a reversal of American policy to come about after a defeat of one of our political parties. Nothing worse could happen than the tossing of this great issue into the maelstrom of party manoeuvering for tactical advantage. That way lies the folly and failure of which we have learned too much already. Enough has happened to give us the opportunity of a new start. It should be made fearlessly by President Harding and it should be made in such a fashion that it is clear that he speaks and acts as the head of the whole country and not as a President who is working simply in the name of one political group.

Passing of a Journalistic Hero

THE death of William Austin Smith removes a comrade who had made himself the hero of progressive Christian journalism in America in the barely five years of his editorship of The Churchman. He had transformed that conservative Episcopal weekly into a journal that was read by thinking Christians of all denominations, and many socially-minded people no longer in contact with any form of organized religion. One may marvel at the courage of the man. Time after time he was compelled to lay aside his work because of physical limitations. By nature and training a pastor and preacher he would no sooner begin to make his mark in a parish than he would be forced to relinquish his task to regain his health. Finally in 1917 he was called to The Churchman, a position which he felt was suited to his physical limitations. But for a brave man with convictions to edit such a paper proved to be no easy task. Dr. Smith could be no mere time server. No more could he make himself an exponent of the interests of church officialism. And to see his subscription list steadily shrinking must have started emotions in him which only a fellow editor can imagine. The old conservative readers of The Churchman fumed, fretted, and finally renounced the paper. But Smith kept on proclaiming the social gospel as though unaware of the adverse opinions, the harsh criticisms, of old Churchman readers, until even they were beginning to proclaim him a prophet.

The end of the world war marked a crisis in his life. To him the great conflict had been all that it was supposed to be—a war to end war, a war to bring democratic brotherhood to a strife-torn world. But he came to realize as few Christians have done, that brotherhood and peace could never come from fratricidal strife. In a paper read at a small conference at Lake Mohonk last May the genius of Dr. Smith's insight reached its climacteric expression. With relentless logic he tore off the shams and hypocrisies of statesmen and churchmen in his denunciation of the folly and wickedness of war. The same impulse of liberalism and justice prompted him to write boldly on other vital issues. He demanded the release of those political prisoners, jailed for saying what he now felt to be truth; he fought for churchmen who he knew were unjustly assailed, his editorial on Bishop Paddock being a notable example of this; he denounced ecclesiastical legalism and obscurantism, always insisting that his own communion take its stand beside the other churches for a crusade against the social, economic and political evils of the day. Yet in his vigorous writing he was always impersonal, seldom controversial, never anything but humble and tolerant.

Nearing the Danger Line

IT is a source of pride and satisfaction to men of good will that so many organizations both within and outside of the church have set themselves to the achievement of notable objectives in the fields of relief work, care for young men and women, the defense of the nation against the liquor traffic, the protection of the Lord's day, the distribution of the Bible, and other wholesome activities too varied to be specified. It is the disposition of the typical American to be generous when his interest is enlisted. He gives freely to the promotion of the causes that have been called to his attention, and often in his willingness to assist attractive enterprises, or in his eagerness to do quickly what he does, he fails to take time to verify his first impressions regarding the value and trustworthiness of the innumerable appeals that reach him.

This impulsive habit of the average citizen has resulted in the initiation and promotion of a multitude of organizations for the public good, most of which it is a satisfaction to approve, but whose very multiplicity encourages capricious and unsupervised campaigns for funds. The rapid multiplication of these nation-wide appeals is only surpassed by the wilderness of tag-days, which in most of the larger communities threaten to follow each other with such rapidity and indiscriminate insistence as to make the entire system odious and self-annihilating. But at least it may be said in behalf of the tag days that somebody authorizes them, even though that authority may be as partisan and biased as has been proved to be the case in Chicago, where the really meritorious appeals have been swamped in a succession of semi-private and sectarian solicitations.

The nation-wide agencies of relief and welfare are for the most part worthy of approval. Such organizations as the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the American Bible Society, the Student Volunteer Movement, the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Sabbath Observance League, the American Sunday School Association, the Layman's Missionary Movement, the Near East Relief, the Red Cross, various Russian Relief agencies, and other organizations of like nature perform excellent service within more or less clearly defined areas. Some of them are much more effective and necessary than others. Some are active and vigorous, and some more or less moribund. But all are worthful in their purposes.

Yet it is manifest that they are all of them operating within the general circle of Protestant church membership. In some instances a wider circle is included, but virtually all of them are Protestant agencies. They draw their support from the Protestant churches, and are directed by officers who have Protestant connections or affiliations. Yet in no case are they responsible to the Protestant churches from which they draw their sustenance. There is absolutely no way in which the churches whose members supply their treasuries with funds have any voice in the projection of their plans, the limitation of their activities, the organizing and determination of their budgets, the expenditure of their funds, or the auditing of their accounts. They are independent institutions, self-originated, self-perpetuating and self-determined. Excellent Christian men and women are found on the directorates of most of them, and no one doubts the general high level of their programs. But the churches as such have no voice in their control.

This is a mistake and a danger. It leaves each organization to an independency which rarely ever fails to suggest question and invite criticism. It is rarely the case that these questions become insistent and this criticism alarming. Yet it cannot be doubted that there is a growing demand that causes that are constantly appealing to the public, and particularly the Protestant public, with eloquent demands for increased support, should make clear their merits and responsibilities to some competent group of church representatives, acting in behalf of the entire company of denominations that support such agencies. A demand of this sort is not alone the right and duty of the churches. It ought to be the first proposal of the soliciting causes. They need to make the request in self-defense.

The Young Men's Christian Association passed through a period of violent criticism and attack during the late days of the war and in the times immediately following the armistice. Some of that criticism was the result of hostile propaganda, some was due to mistakes which were unavoidable, and some was justified. The organization was directed by Christian men in whom the nation had a large degree of confidence, and the manifold service rendered by it during the war was sufficient at last to quiet to a large degree the dissatisfaction which had been aroused. Yet the chief weakness of any defense the association could offer was the fact that it was an independent institution, self-controlled, and outside the reach of any direct supervision by the churches whose representative it claimed to be. If the association had invited at the first the supervision of its plans, its budgets and its appeals by a representative group of men vested with the authority of the cooperating churches, half of the clamor against it might have been silenced at the start. The trouble was that the churches themselves were half doubtful regarding the situation.

At the present time there are other meritorious causes vhich are near the danger line of suspicion and attack. Two or three separate forms of Russian Relief have been organized, besides the American Relief Administration vhich is practically a governmental agency. They have not been able to agree as to facts or methods. All of hem have secured considerable sums of money for the care of various groups of Russians. In such an enterprise every sympathetic American must feel a deep interest. But there is no clear and convincing voice to speak egarding the merits of the different appeals, or to make plain the wisdom and economy of their administration. A certain amount of participation can be secured by any agency that presses its cause with urgency, quite apart rom any intelligent public opinion regarding it. That is he opportunity which the undiscriminating American people offer to all projects, good and bad alike. But a ust and worthy relief work, depending largely upon Protstant interest for its support, could gain enormously in he power of its solicitation by seeking the interpretation nd oversight of some selected and authoritative group hosen by the churches as such, and capable of clearing p the confusion now prevailing in the public mind.

An even more urgent instance is the Near East Relief. t is a matter of deep satisfaction that a noble work of mercy has been projected and carried forward for years vith marked efficiency. To it and the Christian public, hiefly the Protestant public of America, are due high raise for thousands of lives saved, and for unremitting fforts to deliver an ancient people from the galling yoke f persecution. Yet the situation in the near east is far rom clear. The work of relief is threatened with politial complications which have a sinister look. Beyond the ormal gestures of international courtesy the government s cryptically silent and inactive regarding the entire sitution in the Levant. There is genuine danger of an outreak of criticism as caustic as that which threatened the oung Men's Christian Association four years ago. The Near East Relief owes it to itself and all its friends to ecure at the earliest moment the careful scrutiny of its ntire program and plan of campaign by a competent roup of Christian leaders, who are not the appointees f the organization, nor a self-constituted company, but the hosen representatives of the churches from whose gifts he Near East Relief is in large measure sustained. This no criticism of the work, in the necessity and sacrificial haracter of which we fully believe. It is an appeal in ehalf of a movement that is nearing the danger line of tack at the very moment when it is most urgently needed.

The day of the irresponsible and independent agency ppealing to the Christian public of America is passing way. Even denominational drives that make no account f the total program of the church of God in the nation e increasingly irritating and unjustified. And when oranizations like the Salvation Army, claiming the priviges both of a church and a movement, project their reeated campaigns for funds, there should be some method f determining the scope, purpose, actual needs and real esults of the enterprise. For all such supervision there required a carefully selected board or commission, chosen with full authority to represent the cooperating group of Protestant churches from which most of the money for these various agencies is derived. It might well be a permanent board, for its functions would be continuous and invaluable. And it is but a question of brief time until such an instrument of inquiry and recommendation will be an inescapable necessity.

A beginning has already been made in this direction. The Federal Council of Churches is the one body that represents the cooperating Protestant denominations in their authoritative capacity. It submits its budgets to their strict and exacting scrutiny. If the machinery thus set up for study and approval does not meet all the needs of the situation, the Federal Council itself ought to join with the other interdenominational, interboard, and extra-denominational agencies in asking for a fully credentialed body of reference, review and audit for every organization that makes its appeal to the Christian public of America. In that manner alone can the churches be safeguarded from the misadventures of capricious and undiscriminating campaigning, and the agencies that can stand the test of exacting inspection be saved from the ever-imminent muck-raking exploitation of captious critics.

Our Clamor for Leaders

OH, for a Moses to lead us out of this wilderness! The futile cry still sounds out. Our history and exegesis are not accurate: the function of a Moses is to lead into the wilderness, not out of it. We have not brought to bear upon this serious question of leadership a discriminating democratic mind. Most of us feel that a strong, dominating champion would soothe our anxieties, solve our problems, and confidently point out the way for us to take. Yet if Moses is our model, as he is our unfailing proverb, we have little to hope from such leadership by way of settling us snugly in an estate of undisturbed contentment. Most will perhaps agree that we are already sufficiently deep in the wilderness, and the last requirement is a Moses to lead us in farther. A Moses can bring us out of houses of bondage, but if the world is not out now it is mainly because the too clearly discerned perils of the wilderness have driven us back to the security of old serfdoms. The evils of the old bondage are known, at any rate, and, over against the terrors of the untracked wilderness, they are quite the choice of multitudes.

Nor do we seem more content to follow to the end the slashing generalship of a Joshua. There is little dearth of the Joshua type of leader. But we do not trust or follow that kind long. They are in disfavor for their scant success. They can hack their way through obstacles to a certain point, leveling cities and slaughtering encumbering populations, but the territory they thus clear for the peaceful habitation of the faithful is very limited and the peace they win is exceedingly insecure.

We are quick to set up popular idols, but we are not less quick to topple them from their pedestals. The mortality among popular statesmen and political chieftains is frightful. Those of outstanding strength and conscience are often scared out of assuming the role. "The ingratitude of republics" has driven many an ambitious statesman into a despairing grave. Should not much bitter experience teach democratic society that its leadership as well as its ideals must be democratic? We must discard magic. We must not hope that a superman may be discovered who will wave a wand or flash prodigies of wisdom or energy, and achieve in a moment, without popular foresight and intelligence, the desired redemption. Democratic salvation does not come by such means, and its seeming achievement by the hero, either of the sword or the tongue, is a delusion from which society can only awake to despair.

When democratic society shall learn the art of a truly democratic leadership, steady progress and a confident community of intelligence and resourcefulness will more than compensate any loss of sheen from the tombs of heroes whom we first zealously slay and then as zealously canonize. He is the true leader who draws out the resources of the many and sets moving the triumphant energies of cooperation. Individual names may not stand so high on the roster of the great, under the regime thus established. But the joy and the soul enrichments of the multitudes will abundantly compensate all such trifling losses.

The Undesired Food

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE is a Little Lake, and beside the Lake a Cottage, and there do we go, I and Keturah, in the Summertime. And back in the woods is an Hut, where I study. And the squirrels scamper over the roof of it, and little birds get inside in strange ways, and the winds are soft, and the Lake doth ripple in the sun.

Now I left this place one day, and went into the City. And I have a suspicion that I may possibly have eaten something which did not wholly agree with me. For when I went to bed I was so Dizzy that I had to hold to the bed to keep from pitching into the Lake. And when I essayed to sleep, I slept not, save it might be for fifteen minutes, when I awoke with a dream.

And the manner of the dream was this, that they brought me Food, and required of me that I should eat thereof. And I did not want Food.

And they brought me Roast Turkey, rich and brown, and I shrieked out in horror. And they brought me Lobster Salad, and I cried as it were Bloody Murder. And they brought me a plate piled high with many kinds of Cake, and I howled in agony. And they brought me Ice Cream, and I begged them to take it away. For I was on an Hunger Strike, and my soul abhorred all manner of Food. But all that night I dreamed of Food, and I awoke with an Horrible Nausea, and the necessity of eating the Food of my dreams. For that Food was compulsory.

Now I have seen the time when I have been so hungry that Very Plain Food was a delight, and I like Good Things to Eat; but I did not want any of them that night. And that experience lasted one night only, but that was Plenty Long Enough.

And I considered this, that what God provided may be never so good, yet may it become abhorrent to him that hath perverted his own taste. For what is Good Musick to him who hath cultivated a love for Jazz? And how shall he love the things that are lovely and of good report who soaketh his miserable soul in that which is vile?

And I prayed unto my God for myself and for my fellowmen, saying, Oh, my God, who hath filled this world with that which is good, yet which men pervert to purposes that are evil, grant unto us that we may enjoy the good which Thou hast made.

For God hath not denied unto his children that which is good, but they themselves do often render themselves incapable of getting good out of it.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

In Shakespeare's Town

IN this old town, by Avon's quiet stream,
Great Shakespeare dwelt, and built, of fact and dream,
His deathless plays. Within these simple walls
He sat and mused, and lo! dark castle halls,
Proud palaces and gruesome caves were there
To tell their tales of kings and ladies fair,
Of clowns and shepherds; fairies swarmed about;
Dead armies thronged and put their kings to rout;
And even witches hovered at his side
With presage dire; fair maidens loved and died;
And mad philosophers held forth with him
In argument of life; in battles grim
Brave men went down, while cruel lances gleamed—
Thus life passed by, while Shakespeare sat and dreamed.

To the Poets

AS city dwellers, pent by dust and heat,
Repair to mountain heights to slake their thirst,
To feed their famished souls, so we, fret-cursed,
Come to your founts to drink your wisdom sweet.
We weary of the drab and toilsome marts;
At eventide our spirits drag, forlorn;
Then what a boon to find your songs of morn,
Of buoyant hope! You lift our drooping hearts
From bitter thoughts to psalms of love and praise;
Cares fly away and trouble seeks its den,
While youth returns to light our path again;
Our feet are set upon eternal ways.
Pure Keats, blithe Burns, and Shelley, morning star,
Desert us not, who still must travel far.

The Seer

THOUGH part of all I meet,
I walk my way alone;
Knowing the hearts of men—
To them, alas! unknown.

Education for Democracy

By Ralph Goodale

WHEN after the war we took one hasty moment for thought, this truth was at once apparent: that our democracy was not so secure as we had supposed, and that it might disappear unless the character and intelligence of our citizens were improved by education. There never was a conviction better founded. Democracy rests upon enlightenment, as the failure of democratic experiments has proved in Mexico, in Russia, to some degree in our own land. In an instant we decided upon education; and in order to save democracy, hosts of our young people —entered the technical laboratories and the machine shops!

A more absurd and more serious blunder cannot be imagined. For education is not technical training, and no amount of vocational equipment will improve the democracy of our nation. From the technical schools we shall have better medical service, safer railway cars, cheaper sugar, better business methods, an increasing control over nature—good things, all of them. But we shall never have from them the personal qualities that cement a democratic society. Democracy flourishes better, to be sure, among men who are properly ambitious; but once given the ambitions, democracy is not increased by the skill with which those ambitions are realized. It depends rather on the quality of men apart from their vocations; it rests on the intelligence with which citizens read their papers, on the care they take with their children, on their avoidance of display, on the simplicity and rightness of their tastes. Far from creating democracy technical skill may exist in a nation without democracy at all, as democracy may exist without great technical skill. Germany before the war led the world in technology; and Germany was not democratic. In fact, a nation of trained but uneducated citizens, being unable to control itself, will inevitably fall into the hands of the few capable men.

THE VALUE OF EACH HUMAN LIFE

The very sentiment of democracy is a thing to be cultivated; it is not so common at present in the United States, perhaps, as we think. For consider what a democracy is. Not, surely, a hypothetical society in which all are equal. Nor is it a society in which all have equal opportunities for self-aggrandizement; for though such a condition is still beyond us, it amounts in itself to nothing more than a competitive aristocracy. A democratic society, rather, is one whose aim and interest is the value of each separate human life, no matter how obscure. Its basis is the perception of a truth, a conviction that the precious qualities of human nature are to be developed everywhere. In an aristocracy, Tom and Dick live for the benefit of Harry, who is supposed to embody some special kind of excellence; in a democracy, Tom, Dick, and Harry are all seen to be valuable in much the same way, though to different degrees. An ideal democracy is a farm, with every square foot cultivated for the best it can produce; an aristocracy is left largely uncultivated, under the assumption that most of the land is sterile.

This knowledge of the worth of human life in itself, which is the basis of democracy, is not easy to attain. It is obscured by class and race feelings, by advantages or disadvantages of birth, by wealth, by a sense of the possession of brains or the lack of them, by ambition, by the purest empty conceit; it is of all truths one of the hardest to hold solid in our hands, and it is altogether Christian and altogether necessary to our ideal of society.

INCULCATE DEMOCRACY IN THE CHILD

And since this knowledge is hard to attain, its growth in the child's mind should not be left to chance. Education may be used to create the perception which underlies democracy, or, as is usual in aristocratic states, to destroy it. The "gentleman's education," in spite of its virtues, accustoms its possessor to the idea that he has special privilege; and it gives him a tolerant kindness toward less fortunate men which is the pleasant aspect of a mental deficiency. In America our private schools and our colleges often produce this aristocratic temper; parents send their children to school to receive a mental stamp that will identify them as members of a caste. On the other hand, the professional training which a man of ability rightly receives may, by itself, be so egotistic, narrowing, absorbing, that it will make of him a more pernicious *aristocrat than any of the old regime. It makes no difference whether that training is in farming, pharmacy, or phonetics. Heaven save us from the domination of the successful man who knows nothing but his vocation! There is also danger in any school that students of unusual ability may become intellectual snobs. We must run the risk of all these misfortunes, of course; gentlemanly character, scholarship, professional skill, are too valuable to be lost. But if we are to preserve the spirit of democracy, we must also cultivate with determination a wide interest in humanity and a wise humility, else the very desire for democracy will disappear.

But there are other reasons for non-professional education in a democracy. If the citizen is partisan, or is brutish, or knows no more than his trade, the demagogue takes control with the certainty of natural law; and to free himself from the demagogue, the citizen himself will finally decide for an aristocracy. For democracy means power—a power which must be exercised intelligently and honestly, or democracy will fail. And no student of the problems of this generation will deny that the citizen needs a degree of wisdom which does not come easily. We must solve the problems of international justice, of wage regulation, of birth control, or our masters will solve them for us.

THE AIM OF DEMOCRACY

And if the forms of democratic society could persist without culture, it would not be worth while. One wise king would in his own person be worth a whole race of dull, debased, and powerless men. But our aim is to develop in every individual every characteristic in which human nature can take pride. That is what democracy means. And we must not misunderstand our object, or the noblest activity of modern civilization, the strenuous attempt to raise the common man, will end in failure.

*"Aristocrat" in a bad sense. An aristocracy of wisdom is quite possible in a democracy.

Of our educational agencies, the community and the home are the most natural. The child adopts the aspirations and tastes of his community as a matter of course; and under ideal conditions the schools would have no more to do than to develop the tastes already acquired.. Conditions now are not ideal, however. The home and the community form the child in their own image but the image is not what it should be. Their power is conservative. Where a general advance is necessary, the leadership must be taken by the less effective agencies of education, the press, the church, the school, and the college. These are faulty enough: not to mention the press, the church is often timid and over-careful for its own preservation; the school, under present conditions, must set tasks which are a bore to the students; the college has the same handicap, and in addition fails to serve the poor, and spends an insane proportion of its energies in athletics. Yet these are the agencies that can do the work, and that will do it if the friends of democracy will take possession of them. And some time we shall see these special instruments cease to be whips swung by outsiders, and become organs of the community, which will have relieved them of the necessity for propaganda: the church will be a center of communion and worship; the press, a forum; the schools and colleges, a means of teaching the young what the adult public already practices and approves.

THE IDEAL CITIZEN

I have often been interested to imagine the citizen in an ideal democratic society. It is foolish, no doubt. You and I probably should not agree on all points; but should we not discover at least that all the necessary virtues of our ideal citizen would be virtues of private life? He would be a hard-working man, I suppose; but he would take his vocation like a sportsman. In his leisure hours—for he would have them—he would set his ambitions in their perspective, and would not rate them too highly. He would be interested in public affairs, and, from habits of thinking, reading, and talking, would have the right to judge public affairs. He would not be weighted down by the Thing That Has Been Done, nor deceived by the Thing That People Are Doing. He would have activities outside his profession—in the church, or in the community, and possibly in the arts. If he were a reader, he would not content himself with adolescent romances and joke-books, but would find the nourishment he needed in history, biography, fiction, and poetry. Not an impossible picture; such men already exist in considerable numbers; indeed, we should not have even the semblance of democracy without them. But given a citizenship of such men, such as education can produce, it is hard to see how our democracy could be extended by more skilful use of concrete or by improvements in airplanes.

We have not sufficiently realized, nor have our schools, how important the private life of the citizen is. We have been content to insist upon earnestness and honesty in business; beyond that, for leisure time, if we have allowed leisure time, only a certain genial good-nature. Leisure time has been for relaxation, time-killing. We have, in fact, sneered at any one who had a serious interest in life outside his vocation. But it is just here that we must improve our ideal, or be lost. Democracy is not an assured success. It is still being tested and plenty of intelligent people predict its failure. And if it fails, it will be because of the mental incapacity of the citizen. As the population increases, as world problems become more pressing, as life becomes more complicated because of our contact with other peoples and because of the progress of mechanical science, the poverty-stricken mind of our "average man" will not do. A population whose leisure time is dissipated in the intoxication of automobile driving, in whirlwind movies, in vaudeville, in Gene Stratton Porter sentiment, in skimmings from the city scandals, cannot bear the load of society. Such a population will be shoved aside—indeed, it is now being shoved aside—and placed into the industries for which it is prepared; where it will produce, efficiently enough, for the sake of the few who have been educated in mind and character.

What Germany Has Paid

By H. N. MacCracken

AFTER four years of peace—save the mark!—Europe still rings with the cry, "Germany must pay!" Not a newspaper in France or French-speaking Switzerland but echoes the phrase every day. The Premier of France the other day, dedicating a monument to the French soldiers (and others) who drove the Germans out of the Argonne, affirmed the old articles of faith to a great and approving multitude. The French chamber of deputies inscribes it as the sole plank in a fast disintegrating financial platform. Germany will pay it all. So often has it been said, or shouted, that now a national amour-propre has been awakened, and the subject is one upon which one no longer thinks but only feels.

The cry rings in France's neighbor-land, too, Belgium. It finds loud echoes in some powerful circles in England. The majority of Americans agree with the sentiment. The bankers of the world have nightmares to the tune, and the problems it suggests to their waking hours are the most serious in a world full of engrossing difficulties.

The writer has no solutions to offer, no defense to make against the program of making Germany pay. The purpose of these few lines is to suggest to some thoughtful Americans that Germany has paid already in some measure, and that even those who would visit upon her all the punishment due to beginning the most terrible war in the history of civilization may well pause to reflect upon her fate after four years of armistice,—not peace—as the bankrupt of civilization.

In territory Germany has lost Upper Silesia, her richest province for raw materials, the Saar Valley and its mines, and Alsace-Lorraine, with a million and three-quarters of inhabitants. She has lost all her colonies, with their resources. In trade, she has lost most of her foreign properties and credits, her merchant marine, and her custom in all countries of the Allies. She has lost all her gold, and all her credit as a nation. She has lost millions of men in the flower of their age, and children in their period of growth. But it is not only in material ways that debts are paid. In moral, social, and spiritual ways the debts are sometimes much harder to bear.

ISHMAEL

Germany is today Ishmael among the nations. She is in a moral encirclement vaster and more bitter than the entente King Edward and his advisers built around her imperial ruler. Not a German ventures abroad today without the morbid fear of somewhere paying the penalty of national ostracism. If he seeks to put out a hand of friendship or atone for the past his hand is dashed aside.

Two years ago French Protestant leaders refused to meet their German fellow-Christians in conference without a formal apology first from their guilty colleagues for the part played by Germany in the war. This summer, in Geneva, a French cleric went to a German lady at a reception in the house of a Genevese professor, and announced to the dismayed guest that their nation was doomed to hell, and demanded that she agree with him. She burst into tears and left the room. At the international conference which both attended there was evident the settled determination to keep the German delegates in a state of isolation socially and spiritually. Such experiences, repeated again and again in European society, leave their iron in the soul.

The intellectual classes of Germany have paid terribly in suffering due to the fall in exchange. Their salaries have never kept pace with the drop in the mark's purchasing power. The spiritual leadership from such men and women is like the cold draughts in an unheated house. The shabbiness, the underfeeding, the atmosphere of settled depression all have their share in a psychology of despair which is only too contagious among other classes.

In spite of surface indications of prosperity among German workers, also, Germany has paid and is paying heavily in trade depression and finance. Who will leave money in a bank when it dwindles in value day by day? Who will extend credit when that credit can be met at half the cost in a week? Thus the processes of disorganization of commerce, slowly but surely eating their way into the social fabric of German life, presage ruin to the keen observer who looks beneath surface conditions.

OSTRACISM

Such bodies as the International Research council have recently taken action against letting German scientists enter their meetings. Germany is not yet a member of the League of Nations. Turn where he will, the German of 1922 is confronted with the flaming sword of world ill-will.

"And bitter, dark, and unexplored,
The alien deserts wait before."

His nation goes down to bankruptcy unregretted anywhere. And not only is this due to the passive indifference of those who have ceased to think about him as a world inhabitant, but he meets the active hostility at every turn of those he has injured most. And there is no sign that this will change for a generation.

This is not said to excuse Germany. But there is something to be said, before the World-Court of Moral Justice, about the possibility of the wisdom of a moratorium in the ostracism of a nation. Did not our own President say that we had no quarrel with the German people, and this at the very height of the war? Shall we repudiate this utterance, characteristic of American magnanimity as found in Lincoln? What will be the consequences to the world of tomorrow, if seventy million among its most gifted people are condemned to a generation of exile?

The Smile

By Arthur B. Rhinow

ON the roof of his house in Anathoth, the old priest lounged with the air of one who was acquainted with every finesse of comfort. His couch was soft, and the draperies of the canopy were rich. His shrewd face was a study in smiles, befitting the corpulency of his body. Occasionally he reached for the silver cup, and sipped the palm wine like an epicurean. He was an influential man.

Before him stood Jeremiah, the young prophet.

He did not mind the rays of the sun, hot even in the late afternoon. Plain was his garb, and plain the hood, shading lean features, set with luminous eyes. After a glance, a loving glance, at the famous hills of Benjamin, rising in a half circle to the west and northwest, he turned to his host.

The priest sipped and smiled. His voice was musical.

"I asked you to come to me," he began, "because I have something to tell you that is for your own good. You are the son of a priest, and I want to do all I can for you."

The prophet tried to smile in return, but it was hard.

"I want to talk to you like a father," the priest went on. "I want to tell you that you take things too seriously. You look like a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, full of lamentations. You must learn to look at the bright side of things. Don't let the corners of your mouth sag. Learn to smile, smile, smile. Look at me."

He raised the cup, and there was a pause.

"You know I am a man of affairs and responsibilities, and the burdens of my office are heavy. But I have learned to take things as they come. I take them with a smile."

The young man was about to speak, but the priest silenced him with a languid wave of the hand and a deprecating smile.

"Life is sweet," he continued. "Why not enjoy it? Judah is rich and prosperous. There is so much to be proud of, and to enjoy. Of course, there are poor, but there will always be poor."

His fingers and his eyes fondled the cup.

The prophet was silent. He was struggling with a surge of sadness. How could he smile! How could this priest before him smile! A film gathered over his eyes, illumined by a fire within. The surge found expression.

"The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle dove and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

The priest raised his hands. There was an attempt at indignation, but his features hardly lost their bland composure.

"Are you blind?" he expostulated. "Do you not rejoice in the sweeping reformation of our good king Josiah? The high places have been leveled to the ground; the Asherahs have been destroyed; and the altars of Baal broken down; and the vestments of idolatry have been burned in the valley of the Kedron. The black-robed priests of Baal have made way for the white-robed priests of Jehovah. The reformation has reached even Ephraim and Manasseh, for Assyria is weak. Jehovah be praised."

The film in the eye of the prophet glowed as he answered. Was it he that spoke or another?

"Will ye steal, murder, commit adultery, perjure yourselves, and then come into my presence into this house which is called after my name?"

The priest lowered his voice.

"If you are not reasonable, you will be disliked. Already you have lost favor, and the priests are beginning to hate you. We want to keep things smooth, and your ravings are annoying. You go too far. You have prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. That makes me smile. The temple! The home of Jehovah! Impossible! Certainly not while Josiah reigns; and he is young. And if after us—"

He shrugged his shoulders, smiled, and refreshed himself.

Long had the emotions of the prophet been repressed. Now they overwhelmed him. Like one possessed he poured out his predictions.

"I tremble for sorrow. The walls of my heart will break. The enemy comes up in dense, huge masses, like clouds, his chariots rush on like a whirlwind, his horses are swifter than eagles in their flight. Woe to us, we are destroyed."

The flow of fervid eloquence did not cease until the passion had been spent. The sun was setting, and the hills were roseate, but on the face of the prophet perspiration mingled with tears. At last he stood as one waiting for a reply from the couch. When no answer came, he bent over to look. Alas, the priest was fast asleep, an infantile smile on his chubby face.

Mysticism and Adventure

By Arthur Bardwell Patten

If mysticism is the immediate consciousness of a loving God, what has it to do with anything so tremendous as the audacity of faith? But why should not the consciousness of God be as tremendous as it is tender, and as robust as it is delightful? If it is a terrible thing for the sinner to fall into the hands of the living God, it must be a tremendous thing for the saint. The hands of the living God are not only corrective hands and comforting hands; they are also courageous and masterful hands. Nothing less than an audacious faith can even conceive the God who is the architect of a new heaven and a new earth. The four-square glory of a New Jerusalem, stone-built out of lively and loyal men, is no mere pious dream, but the most daring and audacious enterprise in the universe. When we realize that it means all our cities and all our citizenship, reared into a commonwealth of God, can we doubt that the faith that shall claim and construct this vision must be the most tremendous of adventures? The sweetest mystic fellowship is just this yoke-fellowship of believing men in the creative companionship of their Father and of their brothers. This is indeed the master-mysticism, for it is communion with the master will of the good God who is building a civilization of good will on earth.

But the Bible tells us to be humble. What fellowship have humility and audacity? Much every way. To be humble enough to accept the will of God and do it is the most forthright thing in the world. "Not my will, but thine be done" means not less will, but more will. To be humble enough to quit our own wilful tangents and to get into the orbit of the divine will means a tremendous forward movement along the whole trunk-line of God's adventuring purpose. To walk humbly with God we must love mercy and do justly in the heroic contacts of exacting service and of exalted citizenship. Humility is neither reclusive, nor obtrusive. It is the trustful confidence of souls dynamically dependent upon the world-will of almighty God. So the meek inherit the earth, and the little flock is freed from fear and given the keys of the kingdom. Christ himself is the Lamb of God—but he is also "the Lamb in the midst of the throne." And it is enough for the disciple that he be even as his Lord. So humility is quitting one's petty will, and doing the sweet, but sweeping will of God, till the kingdom come, and the will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

It was a luminous formula that came out of the experience of the great war: "Religion is just betting one's life that there is a God." And that is life's best bet. It breathes at once the humility of trust and the audacity of faith. And it is certainly the voice of true mysticism, for it pledges devout but dynamic contact with God for great ends. It ventures to prove God by practicing his presence at whatever cost. Here then is no betting on any man-made wheel-of-fortune, but rather staking one's very life on the divine providence in human affairs. Here are loyal acceptance of the integrity of the world, intrepid advance into the moral order, and hence the assured discovery of what soldierly souls have recently called "the real thing."

AUDACIOUS FAITH

To bet one's life that there is a God is to live like a son of God. Then only do men begin to know how excellent is God's name in all the earth. This is at once the childlike trust and the chivalrous faith of the eighth psalm, through which alone men deeply realize that God is mindful of them and visiteth them. And when men thus bet their lives God takes them into the high places of delight and of dominion, and puts all things under their feet. Jesus Christ appropriates this excellent psalm, changes its "ordained strength" into "perfected praise," and draws all men unto himself as the Prince and Perfecter of adoring and audacious faith. He spoke the devout but dauntless word, "I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," and he staked his life even on the cross for its fulfilment. History has vindicated the sublime audacity of his faith.

There have been many brothers and sisters of the Christ who also have staked their lives on the vision of God and on the validity of heroic goodness. Such a one was Mary Lyon, the founder of Mt. Holyoke College, who was able to say, "There is nothing in God's universe that I fear, but that I shall not know all my duty, or shall fail to do it." She was a practical mystic whose audacious faith builded even better than she knew, and became an emancipating ministry to the womanhood of the world.

DOGMA AND DEMONSTRATION

God is not a dogma, but a demonstration. Paul, who spoke many words of theology, yet did not put his dependence mainly on the logic of thought, but rather upon the life of the soul, for he declares, "My speech was not in persuasive wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Paul was at once simple enough and audacious enough to prove all things, and to hold fast, and hold forth, that which was good. He had staked his life upon God in Christ, and so he himself had found God as a Christian.

It is said that Mrs. Humphrey Ward once in her young womanhood fell into the lassitude of doubt. But she was rescued by a challenge to audacious faith. Sitting in her garden one day, she was roused by a voice in her conscience: "Act as if I were, and you shall know that I am!" She too made life's best bet, and staked her soul and her service for the knowledge of God. Conviction came with the creative purpose. By such faith worlds are framed, and that which is unseen is made into that which is seen. By such faith arks of salvation are built for families and nations. By such faith kingdoms are subdued, righteousness is wrought, and promises are fulfilled. And this is mysticism—the living knowledge of God. It may not be the medieval type, but it is the Christian type, and must be the modern type.

In line with this interpretation is Dr. Joseph Fort Newton's vivid definition: "Religion is the instinct to explore God." All exploration is audacious, and the supreme audacity essays the supreme task—the acquired experience of the living God. Man the discoverer must meet God the Revealer right where God is touching life today. If man trusts only the past and has no conquering faith now, he is not a mystic. One may have a world of archeology without a wisp of audacity. Others have labored, but we enter into their labors vitally only as we take our place in the laboratory of the present, and like Agassiz make that laboratory our sanctuary. Every man must win the world anew, and win a new world besides—if he would be a mystic and not just an inherited memory. To change the figure, we are to be the continuators of the spirit of the apostles and prophets. So only can we build on their foundation, and make Christ our chief corner-stone. We can know God today only as we have fellowship with him in discovering the design and rearing the beauty and strength of the temple of divine sonship and human brotherhood.

SCIENCE JUSTIFIED BY FAITH

Scientific experience and progress are no exception, for they too wait upon the audacity of faith. Mr. Edison bet his life that there was a world of undiscovered wonder and worth, and he staked all to win its secrets. His intuitions have been almost uncanny. No saint could be more audacious in believing in God than Mr. Edison has been in believing in Nature. The process is the same for saint and scientist—intuition, initiative, discovery. The invasion of any undiscovered country is an adventure of faith and the exploration of mystical religion give just as valid findings as do those of modern science. But the religious validity is not only equally trustworthy; it is vastly more valuable. Surely real religion and real science should adventure happily together, for they pursue the same method. And then the fundamentals of their faith lie alike in the domain of the intuitions. How akin to the great pronouncements of religion are the great postulates of science? The great scientists really stake their experimental lives on the Dependability of Law, the Boundlessness of Space, and the Everlastingness of Time; while the great saints in turn stake their experimental lives on the Trustworthiness of the Moral Order, the Limitless Life of the Good Spirit, and the Immortality of the Human Soul. And again these are not matters of inference; these are concerns of intuition. To the audacity of faith, universal dependability is only another name for universal divinity. It is high time for the scientist to bet his life that the world has a Soul, and that he has a soul himself. And he is always practically, if not pronouncedly, doing so. Then it is certainly high time that the devotees of religion should accord to scientific conclusions the deepest respect, even as they desire for their own convictions the highest regard.

Modern science and mystical religion are at once in their procedure. Both are pragmatic, and neither must be dogmatic. Both are concerned with the experience of reality already attested; and both are also concerned with the experimentation, adventuring and audacious, by which alone new experiences of reality are acquired. As for the future—in the eagerness of their quest, religion and science should always be allies, and never antagonists. Both must be more for the dynamic and less for the dogmas. The psychology of religion, and not its metaphysical philosophy, is the domain of the mystic; and herein is the heaven of everlasting moral and spiritual adventure. In this heaven, Christian romance takes the place of credal rationalism, and static contemplation passes into vital communion with the wonder-working Will of God.

THE LURE OF THE UNATTAINED

In the mystic life every man must discover for himself what others have discovered before him. He has the advantage of their light and leading, but he must ratify their findings in his own conscience, and carry on for himself. Yet while everything once discovered has to be rediscovered, we do not stop at that. There are more worlds to conquer. "Into all truth" is Christ's challenge to the adventuring mystic. For the ardent worshiper, as for the eager scientist, there are waiting wonders. And even the Almighty himself awaits "the revealing of the sons of God," before the expectations of his new creation can be fulfilled. "In the beginning—God." And still we are always in the dawn of a fresh beginning with God. For us the most tremendous and vital beginnings are now, and tomorrow, and forever. Certainly spiritual discovery everything else, to have free play for his own thoughts. will keep pace with scientific discovery, and match every material advance with some mystic adventure of reverence, righteousness and love. In the remote beginnings, God wrought without us, but now, in the realm of the new humanity, and of the commonwealth of men, "Surely the Lord Jehovah will do nothing, except he reveal his secrets unto his servants the prophets." Do we dream the wonder of these secrets, and will we do the works until the wonder dawns into day? But only immortal day can satisfy the adventurous dream of the soul. Everywhere else the dream is coming true, "and God doth make divinely real the highest form of our ideal." So ours is not only an intimation of immortality, but an intuition—a present experience of the reality of eternal life in God. As man's sense of reality has never failed him with each onward step, so surely it does not fail him at the threshold of death. Man has always been going westward with pioneering certainty; and when at length it shall be said, "He has 'gone west' indeed," it will be but the crowning realization of the continuing life in God. The assurance of keen and knightly souls confronting death is not only the pilgrim's password to immortality; it is more—it is the experience of immortality itself, of the "indissoluble life" in God. When Charles Frohman, standing on the deck of the sinking Lusitania, exclaimed, " Why fear death? Death is the most wonderful experience of life," he had already laid hold on immortality, and was living the mystic romance of two worlds, in the conscious triumph of the undying soul.

The Focus of Personality

By Sidney M. Berry

[The preacher who recently declined a call to succeed Dr. Jowett at Westminster Chapel in London has been succeeding him for ten years at Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, the pulpit which Dr. Jowett relinquished when he came to New York's Fifth Avenue church. Yet the work of this gifted preacher, Rev. Sidney M. Berry, has received but little attention on this side. Now comes the announcement that the Revell company is about to publish a volume of his sermons, to be entitled "Revealing Light." These sermons are unusually effective examples of the newer preaching. The present sermon, chosen from the volume, will whet many an appetite for the whole collection.—THE EDITOR.]

The Glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.—2 Cor.:4:6.

IN the reticences which keep us from speaking frankly about religion to each other, in the growth of traditions which have ceased to represent living thoughts, in the lack of real religious education and the wide diversity of religious views, the central theme of all religion has become obscured and confused in the minds of men. The name of God, which above all things else should stand for the same thoughts, is understood in many different senses. Variety of outlook and belief must, of course, enter into religion as into every other sphere of life. It is wise and right that it should. The narrowly dogmatic view which may be described as the spirit of the drill sergeant in religion has had its day. It has ceased to command the respect of the modern man who demands in religion, as in Freedom and variety there must be. A dictated religion, whether the dictator is the state or a priesthood, is as dead as all dictated things must be dead.

But giving full weight to that fact it can never be well with mankind or religion when in the simplest and most elemental doctrines there is a lack of common ground. We may disagree and enter into controversy about such questions as the best method of church government and the means by which we shall express our worship, but religion can never guide men in their common life if they are not agreed in the main about the nature of the God whom they worship. Indeed the tragic separation of the civilized and nominally Christian nations sheds a lurid light upon this very question. The nations are sundered from each other in those thoughts which should never fail to bind them together. The God to whom they make appeal in the declarations of their leaders is not the same God. He is spoken of as the God of one nation alone.

This also has its counterpart in our own religious life. One finds that conceptions of God differ so widely that the one name stands for a hundred conflicting thoughts. Superstition is still rife. Dark and cruel thoughts of God darken the spiritual horizon. The soul of Christianity is hardly understood by the man in the street. Now and again, religious discussion is stimulated from unexpected quarters, as in the case of writers like Mr. H. G. Wells, and the controversy which follows reveals what a sad confusion of ideas exists in the public mind. All these things tend to show the need of some resolute attempt on the part of Christian teachers to clear the ground, and to set forth in simpler outline the God whom we worship and the gospel of his love which the church exists to teach. For let us make no mistake. Old habits of religious thought and life share with the political and economic framework of society in the general flux and change. The things which were merely conventional will be destroyed. Only the things which cannot be shaken will remain. The false worships, the idols both of the mind and the market-place must perish with the world which is passing away. The new world will depend upon the new worship. Can we gain some little glimpses of it? Can we aid each other to see and to believe that in our little measure we may be helpers of the world in its agony?

REDISCOVERY OF GOD

I want to speak here quite simply and frankly. One of the first effects of the life and teaching of Jesus was to make God more real to men. You find the wonder and surprise of that re-discovery of God on almost every page of the New Testament. Religion in that age had grown hard and fixed and conventional. Its worship had become formal, its creed was set, the pride of old thoughts and old ways had entered into the soul of those who taught it, and it made them unsympathetic to everyone who did not conform to their requirements. There were many then, as in similar conditions there are always many, who without any fuss or open rebellion had simply put religion on one side. It was not that they had ceased to be interested in the greatness of the subject, nor in all cases that they had become outcasts on account of moral failure, but that in the organized expressions of religion they found no appeal. Some who continued in the routine of religious duties found no spirit in the performance. God was lost in the maze of religious machinery. Jesus brought him back to men. His teaching was so simple and direct and human. Men who had an inattentive ear in the synagogue found themselves in the crowd which gathered round this strange Man from Nazareth as he told of God in story and simile, under the sunshine of the hillside with the blue waters of the lake flashing below.

FRESHENING RELIGION

The thrill came back to religion. The staleness and weariness left it. It was all so fresh and wonderful and real, this talk about God which made him seem human and near. Jesus did not talk about laws and ceremonies like the scribes did, reading out of an old book. He told the story which was uppermost in his mind, took the latest incident out of daily life, and made it speak of God. Gradually round him there grew up a company of those who had been hungry of soul for years, many of whom did not know they were capable of that hunger at all until they came into touch with Jesus. A strange company they were, many of them, to all appearance, the wrecks of society, the objects of the social frown. Here there was one of the hated tax collectors who had taken good care to line his own pocket; here again was a well-known woman of the town who had sold the purity of her body in the market where souls are exchanged for coin; and on the fringe of that strangest of all gatherings were the few people of position moved by curiosity and perhaps something deeper, but who kept on the fringe because they had position and feared to be compromised. But Jesus drew no distinctions between them. He dealt with the prostitute on the same terms as the Pharisee. Were they not both God's children, did they not both need his forgiveness, his love and his care?

It was all desperately outrageous from the conventional point of view. It sent shudders through the synagogue. The old ladies of both sexes whispered and frowned and turned up their eyes. As it grew, they held religious conferences about it, at which the scribes and Pharisees laid their clever plans, their little traps so that they might by trickery save the cause of God. It is all a wondrous picture, realistic to a degree, of the religious world in all times—the honest at grips with the dishonest, truth filtering its way through muddy banks. But nothing could stay the progress. You can never stop the progress of any man who makes God real to his fellows, and that is what Jesus was doing every day he lived and taught. But, then, gradually there came a change as the message deepened its hold. The person of the Teacher came to the front. Jesus never set it there. He kept as near to the background as he could. But he could not be hidden. Men watched him at work, healing the sick, going out of his way to bring rest of heart to some poor slave of sin or sorrow, and they watched his eyes as he spoke and worked. Then they found this strange thing, which men always discover, that the attraction of the teaching was inseparable from the personality of the teacher.

PERSONALITY AND SPEECH

Another man might have said every word that Jesus said, and it would have failed to move the heart. When he said it everything was changed. The word had wings, because of the lips which spoke, and the heart which uttered itself. It was not only what Jesus said which drew men and women to him, but how he said it,—the tone of the voice, the look in his eyes, and sometimes it was what he left unsaid which seemed most remarkable of all. True they did not understand him at times; a sense of distance separated him from them; they walked behind him on the road while he went on alone. But there was a wonderful intimacy as well. The relationship between Jesus and his disciples was of such a kind that one of them could lay his head on the shoulders of the Master. That speaks volumes in itself. Of course at the end when the cross came in sight they miserably failed to understand. But later, when, after the resurrection they came to understand, they saw how Godlike it was. Do you wonder that when they came to speak or write to others about the story which they had witnessed with their own eyes, they spoke of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ? That was where they had seen the glory of God for themselves. I like the touch of intimacy in the way the truth is phrased—"the glory in the face." Not just the glory of God in Christ, but the glory of God in the face of Christ. It was natural that they should put it in that way. They had looked into his eyes amid changing circumstances, seen it in the sunlight of the Galilean days, watched the smile as he took children in his arms, seen the look of deepening compassion as he healed some poor broken body or sorrow-stunned soul. They had seen his look filled with love's tenderness, and they had been present when the anger of a heart which hated injustice and hypocrisy painted itself on his face. For them the whole story had meant God, and it had all been expressed on the face of the Master.

What is our response to this same truth which they had left for us? It cannot be quite the same as theirs. We have never looked into the expressions of that face. To some it seems a story of the far away. God forbid that we should fall into the grip of sentimentalism about a subject so great as this, and yet for myself I confess I have never lost my feeling for the hymn of childhood:

I think when I read that sweet story of old
  When Jesus was here among men,
When he called little children like lambs to his fold
  I should like to have been with him then.

Have you ever thought what it would mean to look into the eyes of Christ and watch him at work?

NOT A FAR AWAY STORY

And yet even now it is not a story of the far away. Read the gospels as you would read any other book, let it lay hold of your imagination, and it will be true for you that the glory of God shines in that face clearer than anywhere else on earth. I know that it does not answer all the questions that we ask about God. There are many things left out, and perhaps purposely left out. You will not find in Christ any detailed guidance about God's omnipotence and omnipresence; it was enough for Christ to call him Father. About many of our great and difficult questions there are only slight clues and vague suggestions in Christ's teaching. We often long for light on these things, and yet I wonder if it is not better as it is. God's glory is not in the wonder of his power and not in the myriads of his worlds. True, these are part of his glory. All beauty, all greatness, all law reveal his mind, but it is his love which takes us to his heart, and is the secret of his creation. That is God's glory, the thing he prizes most and the revelation of it in its fulness is in Christ.

There are gleams of it elsewhere, for this as St. John says, is "the light which lighteth every man which cometh into the world," but for the full unveiling you must come at last to Christ himself. Test, by the glory which shines in him, the dark and cruel ideas of God, and you will soon see them for what they are. Put by the side of that matchless truth and him who reveals it the conception of a God whose ever watchful eye is quick to discover evil, the kind of celestial detective of the narrower sects, and by the side of Christ's thought it passes as a nightmare passes when the sweet morning air and the morning sunlight comes in at the open window. Put by the side of Christ's revelation of God, the dark forbidden picture of one who sends sickness and suffering, who is jealous lest our joys become too dear and our human loves too deep, and again, the conception vanishes like a bad dream nurtured in a disordered mind.

CHRIST THE CORRECTIVE

Place by the side of Christ this swaggering militarist talk of a God of battles reeking with blood and slaughter, with his favored nation and his emperor servants, and it all sounds hideous blasphemy, worse than the atheism which denies altogether. Under the tyrannous burden of these false thoughts the world has long groaned. Human lives and human happiness have been sacrificed on the altars of the false gods. Even Christ's own truth has been travestied until it seemed little better than the paganism it supplanted. Now men and women long for a new note, a new uplifting of heart, a new direction of mind and purpose. Where is it to be found? In a fresh return to the truth that the glory of God shines in the face of Jesus Christ, that he is the way to the true God for all men and all nations.

My closing word is to the younger men and women, and it is about a question in religion which often troubles the mind. Some of you are not quite sure about your attitude to that article in the creed of the churches which declares that Christ is divine. You are puzzled by the metaphysical abstractions which pretend to define that divinity. May I say that it is much better not to try to start at that point at all. Christ's first disciples were driven to the conclusion that he was divine because he and he alone, had made God real to them. They had found the true God for the first time in him. That is always how the truth of Christ's divinity comes home to the heart, and it can come in no other way. His first word is "Follow me," and if a man starts out on that path he finds before he has gone far that from the depths of his heart comes the old spontaneous confession of faith, "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." The creed grows out of life. It is not a starting point but a goal. Set out on the pathway of discipleship in the ways of practical living and you also, out of the depths of experience, will come to the creed of the prophets and the saints.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

IT was my first opportunity to see the Lion after my return from Europe. I ran quickly up the steps and in a few moments was seated beside him in the capacious room where he has spent so many hours of reading, so many hours of study and so many hours of pain. I found him busy with that remarkable volume "The Legacy of Greece" edited by that man of the Greek spirit, R. W. Livingston, to whom we owe not a little in the misunderstanding of the meaning of the spirit of Hellas for the world of today. In this volume Gilbert Murray, Dean Inge and eight or nine others have poured forth copiously from their treasures fact and comment and interpretation until we have the Greek achievement and its significance put before our minds in the most masterful fashion.

"Here I come to find out what has been going on in America while I have been away, and I find you buried in a world which is dead with all too little hope of a blessed resurrection," I began after our first greetings.

"If you believed that you would never admit it," my friend laughed back. "You must be very hopeful or you would not call Athens dead even in jest."

He held the book in his hand, turning its leaves with a sort of affectionate tenderness.

"It's really rather remarkable how much of the best of it is gotten into this book," he went on. "The Oxford University Press has put us all in its debt again. And somehow there is a new accent here. It isn't a book of weary classicists fighting for a forlorn hope. It is the book of a great group of experts who know that civilization cannot survive without the thing which has cost them such long years of patient mastery. One begins to see that already the air is clearing after the world war and in England at least men are beginning to see the utter poverty of a world which forgets Attica. They make you feel too how amazingly the Greeks possessed the qualities of the scientific mind. The chapters on Biology and Medicine are a revelation."

"Then you would say that the modern scientist is to learn to love the Greek because his mind is so much like his own," I interjected.

My friend made a little grimace.

"You think you have me there," he said. "But you haven't. It is only that a modern scientist may learn a preliminary respect for so accurate an observation as that of which the Greek mind was capable and then may go on to learn things undreamed of in his whole thought about life."

The Lion was twisting his fingers about in a way which he had when he was getting at the heart of something.

"Did it ever occur to you," he asked, "that the saddest thing about evolution since man has come on the scene is just that we have a curious way of failing to carry forward the gains of each stage of development into the next. We say 'either—or' instead of 'both—and.' It is really very tragic for in this fashion we manage to forget a significant truth for nearly every new truth we discover. We have forgotten enough to furnish with fair completeness a half dozen civilizations. And that is just what gives such tremendous importance to such a book as 'The Legacy of Greece'."

I let the idea play about my mind for a moment. Then I ventured to turn the thought of my friend back to a remark he had made a moment before.

"But you really feel that the Greeks in our universities are becoming more confident?"

"I am not so sure about ours," he replied. "But I am very sure about those on the other side. All the cocksureness has been knocked out of the European civilization. It is with a more humble and teachable mind that men on the other side are approaching all their tasks. And they are ready to sit down very quietly and listen to the voices from the older world. Out of this new humility great things may come to mankind. Such a book as 'The Legacy of Greece' has the stuff of intellectual renewal in it."

"And America?" I asked.

The Lion looked at me long and deeply.

"You are just back from Europe," he said. "You must have seen it."

He was silent for a moment. Then he added:

"When America has learned the meaning of its moral isolation, it will be ready for all the other knowledge which enriches the mind and nourishes the soul."

The Social Program of the Chinese Church

"FROM a Christian point of view, the social needs of China are overwhelming and insistent." Without science or modern knowledge China has been without sanitation, hygienic methods, organized philanthropy, or social democracy that reached beyond primitive neighborliness. Confucius put her social organization on a family basis, and in government, religion, and economic relations a simple paternalism ruled. Thus China became a people more than a nation, and reverence for the fathers bound her to the past.

Now she has been rudely awakened and is slowly turning her four hundred million faces to the future. At the "point of the lancet," and by means of the school book the missionary has turned minds gently from somnolence to inquiry, but the thundering of the battleship and the carving of her lands into concessions also aroused her in fright. A people less patient and reflective might have failed to differentiate between the benevolence of the foreign emissary of religion and good will and the exploitation of the commercial entrepreneur. While foreign governments planted military outposts on her borders and sent exploiters into her interior, the missioner planted ideas in the minds of her youth, built institutions of benevolence in her cities, and carried good will into her homes.

Now the era of military exploitation is waning and the new learning is leavening the life of the masses. As old customs are submitted to the scrutiny of that new learning there is something more needed than an ideology. The bonds that knit men into a social whole cannot be rudely and iconoclastically severed without endangering a people's moral life. The new roads must be built without stopping the traffic. The intrusion of modern industry, with its machine equipment, can transform the New China into a social inferno just as the introduction of modern military weapons could turn her into an invincible conqueror. Arm the old illiterate conservatism against the world and it would be well nigh irresistible through numbers. Arm the new industrialism with the old primitive labor code, and it would bleed the rising generation white. Call rural China into industrial cities without either physical or moral sanitation, keep the long day of a primitive, self-governed hand industry, allow the old usurious practices to continue, let the child still be looked upon as the property of the father, and turn the old paternalism into an organized plutocracy, and civilization would spell hell to the new China, in just the measure that machine industry supplants that of hand loom and village smithy.

The Social Message of the Chinese Church

"We believe that sin is not only fundamentally an individual problem but that it is also social. We believe that an unjust economic order, an unrighteous political regime, unfair treatment of any human being or of any group, is unacceptable to the righteous and loving God." Expressing their gratitude for the social message the missionaries have brought, the Chinese commission on "The Message" "calls upon the whole church to proclaim justice as a part of the love of God, and to apply Christ's teaching of justice and our social life." They do not speak in general terms alone but "call upon the church to mobilize all her forces to work for the regeneration of the home, of economic conditions, of political standards, of educational, industrial and commercial life, so that we may hasten the speedy coming of God's kingdom."

It is not beyond fact to say that the youth who go back home from a college course in the west go either to become social reformers or to use their greater mental powers to make more for self in terms of money or position. The former are perhaps in the majority, but even the latter usually promote any sort of modern social undertaking that does not too much interfere with their personal aspiration. This Christian commission asks, "Are we anxious to reform society? Then we must first be anxious to reform ourselves." In the gospel they find "two appeals, one to the individual and the other to society," and then say, "suppose we change the form of government without changing the heart of the men who carry on the government; suppose we change the customs of society and do not change the members of society; such a proceeding is as if we were to change the liquid, but not change the medicine in the liquid."

They are, however, under none of our illusions that all that is necessary is to make a man a church member. "There are still too many points in which the church condones the faults of society, thus permitting her light to be hid under a bushel. The thought of Christ concerning the regeneration of society is in many points opposed to the present state of things. Hence the followers of Jesus have made up their minds that they must accept the plan of Christ for changing the world, and gradually make it an actuality. The reform of society in China is most urgent, and love should be the foundation of the new social structure."

The commission on the present state of Christianity in China says that "the release from their age-long bondage of the womanhood of China is perhaps the most important change which has ever taken place in the sociological history of mankind, the ultimate effects of which are quite beyond the wisdom of man to predict." They find that the words "service" and "sacrifice" are finding real meaning among the youth with the new learning and that "there is a growing class-consciousness of power among the Chinese students which is available not only for political but for social reforms."

The New Chinese Republic

The greatest political need of China today is a self-sacrificing patriotism. The masses have no voice except as patriotic leaders speak for them and plead their case. Great progress has been made toward the new political order; the dynasty is overthrown and democratic national consciousness is on the way. In the period of ferment things look bad and there is much disorder, but as a gray old Russian professor said recently in Moscow, "it is bad we know and there are many wrongs, but the future holds hope and even the present is better than the past." In other words the pains are birth-pangs. Without some sort of breaking-up there can be no building up. Before spring, winter must always come.

The Chinese commission calls "upon all Christian pastors and other teachers to Christianize the rapidly developing national consciousness, that we as a nation may be witness to the whole world of the wonderful gift of the peace loving nature with which God has endowed our race. Believing "that God has a special mission for each nation on this earth; that each nation has a definite contribution to make to the progress and enrichment of humanity," and feeling keenly the "yoke of accumulated national humiliation," they "call upon the whole church to exert her influence to demand from time to time adequate hearings from the nations of the world for our claim to the inalienable right of our nation to her sovereignty and to unfettered opportunity for development and growth, and ask that the church should work with untiring zeal through some definite program to promote such international service as will attain the end we seek." They find in the teachings of Christ faith "in the possibility and necessity of international brotherhood" and believe that the church in China, "in the development of which different nations have had a share," possesses thus a peculiar duty and an endowment to promote international friendship and good will.

Another commission, headed by a missionary, says "no one can hope to have any deep influence on the life of China today unless he can enter sympathetically into the attitude of the Chinese towards other countries." Her "emergence from isolation is one of the most dramatic facts in the history of the last century;" and in the history of the world, might be added. The ability of the missionary leaders to enter into their life and feelings and their "power to develop trustworthy leaders through Christianity has demonstrated their value to many who were deeply prejudiced against a foreign religion." The missionary has never mixed in politics, but his schools, his democratic ideas, his social ideals, his home life, and his benevolence have been a most potent influence. A government official, when asked when the revolution began, replied, "the day Robert Morrison landed in Macao." Today the premier is a Christian, the president in Pekin is very favorable to Christianity, and the president in Canton, Dr. Sun, is a life long Christian, who, as father of the republic, has been elected president of all China by the old and only constitutionally elected parliament. In Canton, where the experiment is being tried of governing one homogeneous section in an efficient, modern and democratic manner, his son, also a Christian, is mayor. The influence of Christianity is out of all proportion to its members.

The Church and Its Community

The report of the commission on "The Future Task of the Church" is one of the most forward looking religious pronouncements in our time. It covers every phase of practical Christian work, devoting special chapters to city, village and rural church programs.

Facing China's poverty and finding the problem of home, community and church building almost insuperable in the face of it, they declare "that the application of the gospel to social problems means nothing less, in the long run, than the complete abolition of poverty." Thus in village and rural missions they propose to devote much attention to "making two blades of grass grow where one grew before," and in the city field to procuring a living wage and better incomes in any way possible. Along with evangelism they hope to enlarge upon every type of community work that will put better foundations under home and community building. To the school and hospital are added agricultural and manual art and hand-craft courses, studies in economics and the social sciences, community sanitation and personal hygiene, the arts and practices of social organization for mutual welfare, and training in technical research. They seek to set up "Credit Societies" like those which the Y. M. C. A. and certain missions in India are using so fruitfully to defeat the usurer and buy homes and business for the humble. They propose that the native church insist on Christian ethics in industrial relations and demand a social code for the workers approximating that of the "Social Principles" of the Federal Council of Churches in America.

The institutional church is commended as having proved itself in China. The old native communities, with their ancient customs and utter lack of modern social living, cannot be reformed by merely preaching to individuals. The converted individuals have to be shown what Christianity means in terms of the arts of civilization. It might be said that the first symbol of a civilized man is the tooth brush and of a civilized community a drainage system. In the church in these ancient communities should center the place of instruction and example for all these modern arts of living together. The kindergarten, the hand-craft school, the class in preventive hygiene, the community club, the library, the training ground for community action and leadership, whether for better roads and sidewalks or an improved system of apprenticeship, the germinating center for a public school, a resting place for coolies and rickshaw men, and a score of other things are instrumentalities that will help build the kingdom of heaven in communities whose first paradise will be a bit of modern social improvement. They propose the adoption of the survey method to discover the needs and give knowledge for a workmanlike method of work.

All this work is a tilling of the soil and a preparing of the fields for better seed sowing and the culture of souls. Just as we must first have a Christian man—not merely a churchman who may smugly obstruct social betterment as no part of the work of the church—so we need a community that is Christianized in its community ways to give fit soil for the cultivation of spiritual and moral life. To this end the churches should direct recreation especially into channels of character building. "What use will humanity make of its leisure?" asks Maeterlinck; "upon its employment may be said to depend the whole destiny of man." The recreation of our youth can subtly undo all that our homes, Sunday schools and churches seek to do, or it can become the greatest agency for their assistance. So these wise leaders in China propose to make the recreation of young China a major interest. If young China can be taught healthy outdoor games, and how to play them with good sportsmanship and in a clean moral way, the future of her civilization is safe.

London, Oct. 2, 1922.

IN the life of a church the new year begins not in January, but in October. When the harvest is past and the summer is ended, the various groups within the church begin their service afresh. Back from the sea or the moors, refreshed by the pause of the summer, some with insight and enthusiasm quickened by summer schools, the members of the church start out upon a new session. October is the month of re-beginnings; and all who love the church of Christ love this time of revived hope, and rediscovered fellowship. In one of the Harrow songs there is chanted the praise of this month:

"October! October!
March for the dull and sober,
The suns of May for the schoolgirl's play,
But give to the boys October."

For other reasons than those which move the boys, there are many within the church who feel the same joy in October; there is a tang in the air; the languor of summer days is over; friends are returning from all sides, and there is a chance of starting afresh upon some joyful adventure for the kingdom.

The Near East

Today the cynic among us is declaring that we shall have to look to the military to save us from war. General Harington in Constantinople has won the praise of all men for his patience and tact. We are not out of the woods yet, but if we do come out, we shall owe our escape to him more than to others. It has often happened before that the great soldier has been a great peace-maker. Kitchener ended the Boer war at least a year before the civil authorities would have ended it. This is no argument for militarism, but if anyone is to be trusted with the military machine, it is not the civilian. It is surprising how little the average citizen has been disturbed during the past week. By some instinct he has believed that there would be no war. He did not want war, and therefore declared that war would not come to pass. On the whole, he rather likes the Turk, on the somewhat insufficient ground that the Turk is a gentleman, and on equally imperfect data he dislikes the Greeks. If there were a war, which may yet happen, though today it seems more remote, he would find it hard to work up the necessary wrath against Mustapha Kemal. At present it is clear that he is sore about France, but more hurt and puzzled than angry.

A French Centenary

It is a hundred years ago in November since the Paris Evangelical Missionary society was formed. Throughout its history it has been most intimately related to our London Missionary society. Its first counsellor was a Congregationalist minister in Paris, the Rev. Mark Wilks; it was Dr. Philip of South Africa who induced the young society to undertake work in Africa; one of the first missionaries married a daughter of Robert Moffat; in Madagascar, in the Loyalty islands, and elsewhere the society has been our very good friend, and we join in wishing it godspeed at the beginning of the new century. Its numbers are small compared to those of other societies, but for two hundred missionaries to go forth from the small band of French Evangelical Protestants is no small achievement. It is not the totals, but the proportions that matter.

Dr. A. Herbert Gray on Evangelism

Dr. A. Herbert Gray, the author of "As Tommy Sees Us," has spoken words upon aggressive evangelism which deserve to be repeated. He declared that he had always been uncomfortable in every evangelistic mission he had seen; and that for three reasons: "There was implied in it an untrue view of scripture. It was almost entirely characterized by a conventional theology—or by no theology at all; and I have never yet known a revival which revealed any adequate sense of the social implications of Christianity. Many have been characterized by an extravagant and narrow puritanism in which a great fuss has been made over trifles."

Faith and Health

The visit of Dr. Benson to London has revealed once more the widespread interest there is in the relation of faith and health. Dr. Norwood, of the City Temple, where the meetings were held, has spoken some needful words of warning, not indeed against the belief that there is a healing which may come in answer to prayer, but against the false emphasis which many are laying, and against the cherishing hopes which are certain in many cases to be disappointed. He encouraged his hearers to cast themselves upon the love and mercy of God, and to draw from his spiritual resources. This might mean healing, or it might not, but they who have the spiritual gifts have the chief thing. That there is an obsession with the physical among many of us today, no one will deny. It is a reaction against a false dualism and a neglect of the body, but like most reactions, it has gone too far, and it is necessary today to remind some seekers that there are other quests which come before that of physical health. Dr. Norwood, in his vigorous and transparently honest manner, has done us a service by recalling us to the true proportions of things.

And Other Things

Several groups are leaving for India, among which are the London Missionary society, which has important problems to face, and the Anglican Mission of Help, both of which are due to depart about the same time. From the side of India we have welcomed Mr. K. T. Paul, the gifted Indian leader of the Y. M. C. A. . . . Dr. Grenfell begins his lectures tonight under the chairmanship of Sir Arthur Steel Maitland, and on Wednesday he will have another distinguished statesman, Lord Milner, to preside for him. . . . The Rev. Tissington Tatlow, of the Student movement, received last week token of the esteem and affection in which he is held. For twenty-five years he has held his post, and no one thinks he is left behind in the progress of the years, for he has an amazing power of keeping in touch with the swiftly-changing line of students. . . . It is noted in the papers that Mr. R. H. Tawney is very ill. His life is one which can ill be spared; indeed there are few of whom it can be said with so much confidence that they have so distinctive a gift to offer as the author of "The Acquisitive Society." . . . Two congresses are held this week in Yorkshire. The Church Congress at Sheffield, the Congregational Union at Hull. Neither body is legislative in any effective sense, and the weakness of all such occasions for the declaration of ideals is that no one is bound by them, and they commit nobody. . . . There is an international conference in London on the "Reaffirmation of the World's Moral Ideal" from October 15th to 22nd. The program is very strong and varied; the president is the Bishop of Southwark, and among the speakers are Dr. W. Adams Brown, of New York, Pasteur Merle d'Aubigne, several bishops, Sir Rider Haggard, and many others.

Some Home Truths About the Church

"The criticism that with most justice can be brought against organized Christianity is not that it is teaching what is false or only partially true, but it is teaching what is true in an unlovely and inhuman way. The church has lost the hearts of the people because it has mislaid its freshness, reality and radiance. If these can be regained, restatement may then follow. There is a sense in which we church-people appear to those who watch us like Alpine climbers who after boasting of the height they were about to scale take their ice axe, their rope, and other equipment, and are discovered later proceeding cautiously up Ludgate Hill. Now Ludgate Hill is that gentle incline which leads from Fleet street to St. Paul's."—The Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard in "The Challenge."

BOOKS

THE CHURCH IN AMERICA. By William Adams Brown. 378 pp. (Macmillan, $3.) Christian union halts for the lack of a convincing doctrine of the church. A systematic theologian more interested in the living present than the dead past has wrought out a fresh doctrine through observation of contemporaneous religious institutions.

THE COMMUNITY CHURCH. By Albert Clay Zumbrunnen. 169 pp. (Uni. of Chi. Press.) This careful and scientific study of the various aspects of the community church movement throughout the United States has gone far to standardize methods, points of view and spirit for eight hundred congregations of Christian believers who are bent on cooperation in their local communities.

FACING THE CRISIS. By Sherwood Eddy. 241 pp. (Doran, $1.50.) Better far than its title, this book deals not with frenzied fear of coming calamity, but with reasoned attitudes toward current problems in the fields of theology, sociology and international relations. It is well calculated to help men who are going through the doubt period with regard to religion.

HOW TO KNOW THE BIBLE. By Robert A. Armstrong, 205 pp. (Crowell, $1.15.) The title is too inclusive for the book deals with the Old Testament, but there is combined a popular method and a modern view-point which is difficult to find in biblical interpretation.

SNOWDEN'S SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS. By James H. Snowden. 390 pp. (Macmillan, $1.25.) Modern, evangelical, dignified and popular seem a combination of attributes impossible to find in a treatment of the uniform lesson. A theological professor of sound learning addresses himself to the thousands of plain folks who teach the children of the churches.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE PEACEMAKERS. By Fred B. Smith. 239 pp. (Macmillan, $1.75.) The gossip of a globe-trotter, set down in entertaining fashion, throws some light into certain dark corners, but is lacking in a fundamental grasp of the big problem of internationalism.

CHRISTIANITY AND PROBLEMS OF TODAY. Bross Lectures at Lake Forest. 159 pp. (Scribners, $1.25.) Five lectures by eminent scholars deal with topics chiefly social in character from the viewpoint of the evangelical believer.

THE GOSPEL FOR TODAY. By R. A. Torrey. 216 pp. (Revell, $1.50.) The revival of a belief in a personal devil, a forensic judgment day, a physical hell of brimstone, and emotional conversion is the big task of the Christian church according to this Fundamentalist leader. The great hinderers in this work are the theological professors, particularly those of the Methodist persuasion.

SOCIETY AND ITS PROBLEMS. By Grove Samuel Dow. 594 pp. (Crowell.) A general manual of sociology for the use of the college student, written by a professor of a denominational college who must keep one eye on the racial prejudice of his community and the other on the watch-dogs of orthodoxy. In spite of his handicaps, he has produced a serviceable book.

PREACHING AND SERMON CONSTRUCTION..By Paul B. Bull. 315 pp. (Macmillan, $2.50.) As a homiletic guide provided by an Anglican clergyman of undoubted orthodoxy for the guidance of young men who wish to learn to preach like the author, this manual is to be adjudged a success.

Why Do We Believe Jesus?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of October 12, Dr. Albert Edward Day, of Canton, Ohio, discussed Dr. Tittle's admirable paper on "The Future of the Methodists." Dr. Day "ventures to say" that those who believe what Jesus said, not merely because Jesus said it, but because it is "being verified by the accumulating experience of the race," are not Methodists. At least one Methodist, the writer of the present letter, wishes to challenge this proposition and to challenge the foundation on which it rests.

Why accept Jesus as Lord and Master? Dr. Day explicitly denies that either experience (which obviously includes history), "rationalism" or "mysticism" gives us any ground for faith. The natural inference is that Dr. Day is a thorough-going skeptic. But no; he says, "We hear the voice of the Son of Man and we believe him"; that is all there is to it. The innocent bystander then may say, "We hear the voice of Mohammed and we believe him; the voice of Buddha, and believe him; the voices of Nietzsche and Mary Baker Eddy and believe them." On Dr. Day's premises, why not? Nothing is gained for religion in the long run by following the path of the double truth.

No one can speak for Dr. Tittle save himself; but I should be surprised if he meant by the appeal to experience what Dr. Day interprets him to mean. The ideals of Jesus have, of course, not been adequately tested in experience; but they appeal to us as true precisely because, insofar as they are tried, they are found to satisfy our mind as a whole. The principle of reason is that of a coherent world, a meaningful interpretation and organization of experience as a whole.

In Dr. Day's waste-basket are to be found all historical and mystical experiences, and reason itself. There, and not in his letter, are to be found the makings of the test of religious truth. If all who appeal to social and mystical experience as the grounds of a reasonable faith in Jesus are to be excommunicated ipso facto, where will the fathers of Methodism stand in the judgment—not to mention St. Paul and St. Augustine, St. Thomas Aquinas and Martin Luther?

Labor's Leadership

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your correspondent, Mr. Sparks, in the issue of September 14th says, "The country as a whole is becoming impressed with the fact that there are some high grade, responsible, capable executives among the leaders of organized labor." That is exactly what the country is not impressed with. I have recently traveled several thousands of miles in the central and eastern parts of the United States mingling with people of all classes and the strongest indictment I find against organized labor is that its leadership is as red as it dare be and as godless as can be named. Suppose the head of organized labor in this country was a man whose blood and training had brought him into sympathy with the highest religious and moral ideals of our land. That type of man would have gone to Herrin, Ill., and stayed there until the ends of justice and righteousness were obtained, and by so doing would have scored one for organized labor.

I wonder just how much the public is impressed with the character of the leading labor leaders in Chicago, for instance. When the names of Debs, Foster, Goldman and others of their manner are mentioned, indeed, the American people are "impressed." If organized labor in this country would begin at the top and on down through local unions would give us an American. Christian leadership, men who would come into our churches throughout the land and announce a program of righteousness, using the weapons of a godly warfare, instead of guns and dynamite, then the American people would be impressed in a way that has never yet obtained.

At present union labor is working double shift to deepen the gulf between itself and the public. The reckoning has already begun and the severity of the judgment that falls will depend on how rapidly organized labor can align itself on the side of justice, honesty, and true Americanism. The American public is not unmindful of the fact that our regular stated coal strikes are voted by members of the American Federation of Labor who owe allegiance to foreign flags and who can neither read nor write our language nor cast a vote at our elections. According to union labor, black men are unfit for membership in its ranks, but the red scum of eastern and southern Europe are entirely eligible to come here and be given the power to tie up the industries of this entire nation and freeze our children by the tens of thousands out of our public schools. A tyranny second to none the world has ever witnessed.

I am interested in the articles that your regular contributors write in defense of organized labor as it is functioning at present. If two or three of them would don overalls and work in the average union machine shop for five years they would get a new string for their fiddles and a new song for their books. To some, parlor bolshevism is a delightful seance.

Faith and Experience

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the issue of October 12 Mr. Day writes interestingly about the reasons why men believe on Jesus. He says that in his judgment men do not believe because the wisdom of his sayings has been verified by experience. He thinks that because the Christian social order has not been actually tried men do not attempt it by reason of experience, but by reason of Jesus' history. May we not say that the history of Jesus is not mainly what is written in the New Testament. That is by itself a very meager account. But the history of Jesus is written in the results of his teaching, and in the experiences of his followers. It is only those who are "willing to do his will" who know that he has authority from heaven. The story of the New Testament alone would not affect me, I am sure, but as fast as I can verify it I verify my confidence in him. And having that confidence I follow his word beyond the place where experience can take me. Then I venture out on faith.

The Blessing of Denominationalism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: With much interest I read the article "The Denominations: Tragedy or Comedy?" by John R. Scotford. One thing is certain, whatever denominations may be, they are permanent. In time there may come the amalgamation of the various Christian bodies but who living today will be alive to witness such a miracle? I do not altogether like the phrase "tragedy or comedy" applied to the denominations. The inference is that they are either useless in wreck or in folly. Denominations are neither tragic nor foolish. Were, however, denominational lines set aside it would be both tragedy and comedy for any one great body to attempt to run the whole affair.

It is no more possible to set aside denominational lines than it is possible to set aside color or national lines. The community church is supposed to be altogether non-denominational; in some respects it is, yet in every community church there are members, and not a few, whose pride is to boast of heredity, religious ancestry and their foreign extraction. With them there is always a hyphen before the "American." The pride of blood is something hard to expunge. The chances are denominations will continue to exist and prosper. They may not be either tragedy or comedy, but they certainly may be either a blessing or a curse. They are a blessing when they co-operate. Many of the denominations are already cooperating. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ has done that much. What has already been done by the few denominations in the body can be done by all, if they would but put aside their unearthly presumptions. When denominations hold themselves aloof by the spirit of superiority or the claim of apostolic succession or the monopoly on salvation there is nothing that can ensue but a curse.

The church as a whole is anticipating progress. This dream will never be realized till all the bodies get together, not in a merger nor organic union, but in the spirit of trust and friendship and work together along their different lines among their different people and classes for the salvation of souls. Denominations are here to stay. Why worry about that? The many are better than one. If there were one which would it be, Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist or Salvation Army? Would one do the work of all in all the different ways among all the different classes of people? Does any one do all the work of the many now?

The many are better than the one. Voltaire was not so far from the truth of the matter when he wrote in his "Letters on the English" these words: "Were there but one religion in England, there would be a danger of despotism, were there but two, they would cut each other's throats. But there are thirty, and accordingly they dwell together in peace and happiness."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jesus, the Great Physician*

PEOPLE are intensely interested in the healing of mind and body. Mental torture and bodily pain are so cruel and persistent that relief is eagerly sought. Various cults of faith-healing have long existed. Indian philosophies worked toward peace and rest. Christian Science seeks bodily health and a mind harmonized. Rufus Jones, the Quaker, talks of "harmonized men." The latest sensation is Coue, the French gentleman, who moves about his beautiful garden, suggesting health. His method of auto-suggestion is now the subject of intelligent conversation. Coming into his garden, Coue found a blacksmith who had been unable to use his arm for ten years. "You can lift it," said the doctor. "No, I cannot," replied the man. "Say to yourself, 'I can lift my arm, I can lift my arm.'" The man began to repeat it over and over. "Now lift it!" said Coue with great authority—and the blacksmith raised his arm above his head. "Now go back to your forge and light the fire," said Coue. Even more remarkable than the fact of his cures is the fact that he accepts no money for all his work. Read his book.

Recently I listened to a series of lectures on "Shakespeare." I was amazed at Shakespeare's knowledge of what we now call "psychology." He never knew our word, but he did know men and women. Therefore he could unfold the minds of Prospero, Lear, Hamlet, Macbeth, Brutus, Falstaff and all the rest of his superb characters.

Now Jesus never studied either medicine nor anything akin to so-called Christian Science, but as he knew men he was able to minister to the whole man—to his physical needs, to his sinful soul, and to his mind diseased. Jesus made no mistakes and therefore he did not ignore the body. No careful student of the words and works of Jesus can fail to be impressed by his ministry of healing. Sick, broken men called out his loving consideration. His presence was health. He made people whole. I know a doctor whose entry into a sick room is better than a medicine. Before he comes the room is full of apprehension, fear, disease, death. He enters—the atmosphere changes, fear vanishes, disease fades away—health, happiness, abundant life possess that room. Jesus was harmony. Jesus was health. His very presence drove out devils, cured disease, and established sanity, harmony and well adjusted life. Jesus was a radiant personality. We have discovered an element called radium; it illumines, it cures. Jesus was in harmony with God; sin never touched him with its devitalizing power; he was crystalline love; he was strong will; his look was life. Jesus healed men as the lark sings. There is nothing unscientific in all this. Our science is imperfect; we know imperfectly. We are rapidly changing our ideas of medicine. New and better methods of treatment are constantly being developed.

Jesus was a great physician; he cured body and soul—why should we ignore the body? The church should advance healing. I have often wished that my church had its own hospital, where we could care for our own sick and where others could come under our influence. We do help Dr. Osgood in China and that is something. The hospitals have gotten away from the churches in many cases, but the social workers are bringing them back toward the church. Medical missions, dispensaries in settlement houses, Christian visiting nurses, and Christian doctors and nurses bring health and peace through distinctly Christian channels. Wise and good ministers are of untold value in sick-rooms, while the Christian spirit expressed in beautiful mothers and in noble homes continues to bring peace, joy, health and full life in many ways. The church must concern herself with the health of men.

Is Liberalism Losing?

The achievements of the past three years are superficially disappointing.

The nations of the world, after a war to end war, are still enmeshed in the toils of the old diplomacy and the pre-war militarism.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

tells you what the liberal mind of England is thinking about the serious problems of today.

Week by week it has an unbiased discussion of international politics, a complete presentation of important general news from every country, and a full book review that keeps the reader posted on the best in current literature.

Given an hour or two of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly will keep a man's knowledge of the world in repair and enable him to be an authority in that subject in which it tells most to be an authority—one's own times.

Fruits Meet for Repentance

When Bishop Nicholson preached from a step-ladder in the Chicago loop district this past year he was casting bread upon waters, as all preachers do. Recently a business man who came to see him, reported on that street audience. This business man has an employe who once stole twenty dollars from the firm. Since hearing the sermon from the step-ladder, the employe has made restitution of the money. A new open-air preaching station will be opened soon in the loop adjacent to the corner where the new Methodist Temple is being built.

Successor Found for Dr. Coe

The resignation of Dr. Coe from the chair of religious education at Union Theological Seminary made a wide breach in the faculty of that institution. The trustees have acted promptly, however, and announcement is made of the appointment of Harrison S. Elliott who in recent years has been acting as editor of the splendid publications of the Association Press. Under the leadership of Mr. Elliott, the study manuals of this press have been of outstanding quality, and it has been this service which recommended Mr. Elliott to the teaching position.

Catholic Newspaper Confesses Failure in Relief Work

The Catholic weekly, America, makes an interesting confession in a recent issue of the paper. Discussing the starvation in central Europe and the raising of funds to save human life, it charges that the Catholic church has been impotent in the face of a great opportunity. Its indictment is in stronger terms than Protestant papers would care to formulate: "It is estimated that, since the war, more than 300 American societies or organizations have been engaged in some form or phase of European relief. Not one of them has been a Catholic organization.

And this in the face of the fact that the vast majority of people in Ireland, Belgium, France, Italy, Austria, Hungary, Bavaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Jugoslavia are Catholics. It is the Catholics who have suffered most during and after the war, and yet no American Catholic organization of any kind has gone among them. Individual Catholics have been more than generous to the Red Cross, the Hoover Mission and even to the Y. M. C. A., but no organized effort of any kind has been made by American Catholics to set up a society here. The Protestant Mr. Hoover has done more in one month in Poland to retain life in the bodies of starving Catholic Poles than all the Catholics of all the world have done. And this statement stands in the face of the magnificent relief which came from certain Catholic Poles in and around Buffalo and Chicago and from that unobtrusive Catholic prelate who had his abode on the banks of the Tiber and who almost alone, of all the Catholics of the world, has been genuinely solicitous for his starving children."

University of Chicago Announces Preachers for Autumn

The religious life of the students at the University of Chicago is carefully studied and provision is made for their care. Among the methods used is the appointment of eminent ministers from various parts of America as University preachers. The first university preacher for October at the University of Chicago was Professor Theodore Gerald Soares, head of the department of practical theology, on Oct. 8. On Settlement Sunday, Oct. 15, the work of the University of Chicago Settlement in the Stockyards district was presented. Dr. Francis G. Peabody, of the Harvard Divinity school, Cambridge, Mass., will be the preacher on Oct. 22; and Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, of the Central Methodist church, Detroit, Mich., on Oct. 29. The first preacher in November will also be Dr. Hough, who will be followed in the same month by Bishop Charles D. Williams of Michigan, and Rev. M. Ashby Jones of the Ponce de Leon Baptist church, Atlanta, Ga.

Union Plan Evokes Caustic Criticism

No critic of the recently elaborated plan for union which has been worked out by the bishops of the Anglican church and the Free churchmen is more caustic than Dr. T. Rhonda Williams, pastor of the Congregational church at Brighton. He shows that the requirement of baptism bars the Quakers and the Salvation Army from the union plan. The exclusion of the Quakers particularly grieves this Congregational writer. His estimate of the whole document is that it is disingenuous, covering up difficulties with clever phrases rather than facing them with constructive thinking. His criticism will doubtless have large influence in the making of opinion on this matter in England. He says: "When the report discusses the nature of the ministry it shows that the concession made by Free churchmen is the acceptance of the Episcopate, and Anglicans seem to concede the retention of the Presbyterian and Congregational orders with bishops who shall be representative and constitutional. How this is to be done is not explained, and is certainly not clear. The authority of the whole body is to be given to a minister in ordination by a bishop. And yet our Free church negotiators assure us that they have not consented to be reordained, and the interim report does not speak of reordination. But whether it means that only men coming into the ministry in the future are to be ordained by a bishop, one cannot tell. To me it is not at all clear how a Congregational minister could remain a Congregational minister and yet make an ordination vow to obey his superior officers, which I suppose would be the case in ordination by a bishop. These points are not at all elucidated in the report.

"All I can say is that I shall go to the end of my day without reordination. The conference was agreed that the various ministries which had grown up in the different denominations have been 'manifestly and abundantly used by the Holy Spirit.' In that case I cannot see why the Anglican church should not use them as they are. If they are good enough for God, they surely ought to be good enough for Anglicans.

"As to creeds, we find that the Apostles' creed is to be used at the baptismal service and the Nicene creed to be accepted as a sufficient statement of the corporate faith in Christ of the United church. It is carefully said, however, that 'a reasonable liberty of interpretation' is to be granted. We know quite well what this means in practice. It means prevarication. We subscribe to certain words as an objective standard of truth, and yet we are at liberty to interpret them quite differently. Where, in that case, is the objective standard? Why should the church make ministers take vows in certain words and phrases when they cannot mean what the words convey to the ordinary man?

"One of the negotiators told me that what brought him to consent to the acceptance of the Nicene creed in this report was the ingenious way in which one of the bishops explained that taking the Nicene creed only meant that we were to express a sort of loyalty to the church, which adopted the creed in the fourth century! If that is not a shuffle, I do not know what the word means. The time has surely arrived when it is necessary for the church to be absolutely sincere and honest in its message. To keep on repeating old creeds when we do not half believe them is not honest, and it cannot be good for the spirit of the man who does it, or anybody else. If this is the price at which to buy unity, I am quite certain that many of us are not going to pay it. The real way to unity is to lay the emphasis on spiritual religion and the good life, not on doctrinal or ecclesiastical considerations at all. Earnestness in the former and freedom in the latter is the real way to secure that unity of the spirit which is the only bond of peace."

city. The various fad religions have taken large space, one daily paper running over a column a week of announcements of spiritualistic meetings. Dr. Smith proposes that the evangelical churches shall advertise by neighborhoods, and has worked out a plan which will cost only two dollars a week for the minimum space.

Why Don't the Methodists and Lutherans Trade?

In the United Lutheran church there are 395 more ministers than there are parishes. This anomalous situation arises from the fact that several constituent denominations have come together, and in many communities local church union has taken place among the Lutherans, who now have a superfluity of ministers. Meanwhile, the advertising columns of certain Methodist papers contain advertisements from various district superintendents who are seeking men. When a town of eight hundred with a modern parsonage and a salary of sixteen hundred dollars has to be advertised, something is wrong. Why not arrange some kind of an exchange between Methodists and Lutherans, for Methodists have too many churches and Lutherans too many ministers?

Religious Journal Starts Moving Picture Department

Realizing that the use of motion pictures in the churches is quite beyond the experimental stage and that there is need of a reliable source for clean pictures, the Christian Herald of New York has recently established a motion picture bureau. Every single foot of film that is distributed through the Christian Herald Motion-Picture bureau will be inspected and stamped with the guarantee of the Christian Herald that it conforms to the highest standards of morals and good taste. A library of unusual excellence has been formed and additional subjects are being constantly added to it. Far-reaching plans for the production of pictures of unusual artistic merit with missionary backgrounds are being formulated, but the output will include all classes of film. There are Bible stories, travel reels, comedies and dramas with clean, wholesome stories for entertainment, natural history subjects, camping, hunting and fishing pictures, exploration, and everything else that would go to make a diversified entertainment for a mid-week evening or to provide the illustration for a Sunday evening lecture. The Christian Herald believes the church is entitled to consideration in the making and marketing of motion-pictures. It believes the motion-picture industry is making a big mistake in refusing to have business relations with the religious and educational institutions of the country. The church and the school, next to the home, have more to do with molding the lives of children and young people than any other factors in our national life. On them rests American culture. On them rests the moral growth of the generation. The almost universal attendance at motion-picture theaters makes the film an extremely important influence that must be taken from commerical hands and placed under the control of devoted and consecrated men who will use it for the highest purposes."

Adventist Denomination Holds Convention in Kansas City

The Seventh Day Adventists held their fall conference at Kansas City Sept. 20-27. Their statistical reports are impressive. They conduct operations in 108 countries, divided among 8 division conferences, 51 union conferences comprising 139 local conferences and 160 mission fields, with 15,009 evangelistic and institutional workers in their employ. The denomination is working in 179 languages, publications are issued in 100, and "connected with the movement are also 204 institutions, representing, together with conference organizations and church buildings, a total investment of $30,399,461.49 and an aggregate annual income of over $23,000,000." The number of organized churches now stands at 4,730, an increase of 189 during the year. The membership of churches is 198,088, an increase of 12,638 during 1921. This church observes tithing, and the money given for church purposes last year was $8,508,056.19.

Federal Council Opposes Ku Klux Klan

Without using the name of the organization, the Federal Council of Churches has taken action which seems directed against the Ku Klux Klan. The following statement has been issued from the offices of the council: "The administrative committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America records its strong conviction that the recent rise of organizations whose members are masked, oath-bound and unknown, and whose activities have the effect of arousing religious prejudice and racial antipathies, is fraught with grave consequences to the church and to society at large. Any organization whose activities tend to set class against class or race against race is consistent neither with the ideals

Bryan Causes Trouble for Public School

THE campaign of William Jennings Bryan against evolution resulted in an attempt at medieval legislation in Kentucky last winter and has brought to grief, many an honest teacher in a denominational college who would not deny his educational faith. But still other ugly evidences of intolerance are appearing, not the least threatening of which is the fact that the smaller and more conservative denominations are growing unfriendly to the public school. Dr. G. H. Trabert in a recent issue of the Lutheran voices the following opinions with regard to the public school: "Children and young people who have been taught to reverence an almighty and omniscient God, and who have been led to believe that man is the crown of God's creative work, should not be led astray by teachers who believe that the account of the creation, as given in God's holy word, the Bible, is a myth, and so have their religious principles undermined, their conscience degraded and all reverence for Almighty God destroyed. Has the state a right to interfere with the religious convictions of its people as long as they are loyal to the government and uphold its sacred institutions? Has it a moral or legal right, through its schools, whether it be public schools, or normal schools, or state universities, to tolerate teachers or professors who, under the disguise of science (so-called) try to lead away the youth from the religious convictions received in the church and the home? It is an undeniable fact that irreligion is alarmingly on the increase throughout our country. In many cases those who have departed far from the teachings of the Bible claim to be very religious, but it is irreligious all the same. The teachings of some of the professors in our public institutions of learning is the crassest irreligion. They try to undermine the faith of our youth, and so aim a blow at the religion as taught in God's word, the result of which is the demoralization of the nation."

This writer does not hesitate to suggest that the Lutherans should everywhere organize parish schools where the pure word of God would be taught without the deadly heresy of Darwinism. Probably a less sincere attitude is that of the Brotherhood of the Old Order, Amish Mennonite church of the state of Indiana, which recently hired an attorney and prayed to be relieved from that portion of the law requiring attendance of children of high school age in the public schools of Indiana. The Mennonites charge that their children are taught evolution and higher criticism and for this reason they wish the children exempted from the requirements of the law. As a matter of fact, they wish to put their children to work on the farms before they reach the age of sixteen. Among other items in the reply of the state board of education are the following: "The State Board of Education begs to remind the petitioners that their religious freedom is no more violated by the law requiring high school attendance, than by the law requiring attendance upon the elementary grades. The petitioners are in error in their contention that 'a firm and sincere belief in the inspiration of the Bible' is in any way contradicted by the curricula of the high schools. Higher criticism, evolution, and the denial of miracles, against which the petitioners protest, are not in the course of study prescribed for the high schools."

The whole discussion helps, however, to illuminate the legal status of the teacher in the public schools, seldom found, who uses his position to make open attacks on religion and to propagate Ingersollian views. The teachings of Bob Ingersoll have no more legal standing room than do those of John Calvin.

of the churches nor with true patriotism, however vigorous or sincere may be its professions of religion and Americanism. Evils of lawlessness and immorality, however serious, can never be remedied by secret, private and unauthorized action. They must be handled by the state and by the recognized forces of education. For groups of individuals wearing masks and concealing their identity to pass judgment on men and women and to carry out humiliating measures of their own devising, is subversive of every principle of civilized government, and undermines respect for the established agencies of law and order."

Topics Proposed for Discussion at Local Conferences

In preparation for the World Conference on Faith and Order in Washington in May, 1925, the continuation committee proposes that conferences shall be held in various parts of the country. At these conferences the same topics that were discussed at the preliminary meeting in Geneva in August 1920 will be once more considered. These questions are: "The church and the nature of the reunited church; what is the place of the Bible and a creed in relation to reunion? What degree of unity in faith will be necessary in a reunited church? Is a statement of this one faith in the form of a creed necessary or desirable? If so, what creed should be used? or what other formulary would be desirable? What are the proper uses of a creed and of a confession of faith? What degree of unity in the matter of order will be necessary in a reunited church? Is it necessary that there should be a common ministry universally recognized? If so, of what orders or kinds of ministers will this ministry consist? Will the reunited church require as necessary any conditions precedent to ordination or any particular manner of ordination? If so, what conditions precedent to ordination and what manner of ordination ought to be required?"

American Carries Aid to Russian Clergy

Answering the needs of the world in these times is the occasion for setting up new forms of fellowship. The Federal Council of Churches recently sent Dr. John Sheridan Zelie to Russia where he spent the summer in famine relief, with special attention to the clergy of the Russian church. He found them among the most needy of all classes. Families on the edge of starvation have hardly recovered from their surprise yet that religious organizations in America not in communion with them and not seeking intercommunion should bring in Christ's name the relief that saved the lives of men and women. Dr. Zelie persistently refused to talk politics while in Russia or since his return home, sensing that political discussion has been the chief hindrance to success in humanitarian work in Russia. Dr. Zelie gave food packages to 126 women volunteers in child feeding work. Their reply was pathetic: "Knowledge that others in far-off America, separated from us by thousands of miles continually think of us, makes our stormy path less difficult. Life feels less hard and less ugly. We feel we are not alone and have more courage for our work."

Charges Selfishness Back of Community Church Movement

No new religious movement comes quickly to success without being made the object of attack. Dr. K. W. G. Miller, a Methodist minister of Des Moines, in a recent issue of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, holds that the community church movement arises out of selfishness. "The real essence of it all is in the fact that a good many of these organizations were begun in an attempt to dodge responsibility for a world program." Meanwhile the community church pastors are taking particular pains to call attention to their missionary giving. St. Paul's Union church of Chicago supports two missionaries on the foreign field. Park Ridge Community church in the same area is giving this year two and a half dollars a member for Armenian relief.

Preachers Speak for Ku Klux Klan

With the Federal Council opposing the Ku Klux Klan and practically every religious newspaper of the country unfavorable, it is rather astonishing to find preachers taking the public platform and advocating its cause. The Klan recently held a large meeting at Convention Hall in Kansas City. The public press reported every seat occupied. The note of the meeting was opposition to the Roman Catholic church. Among those making addresses at the meeting were Rev. E. L. Thompson, pastor of Jackson Avenue Christian church, and Rev. J. W. Darby, pastor of Central Christian church. The people present were urged to scratch their tickets and vote against all persons who were not Protestants. The members of the Klan were not robed as is customary at the public meetings. It is noteworthy that the editor of the Menace was on the program.

Bishop Scores Preachers for Poor Sermons

Bishop McDowell of the Methodist Episcopal church is a little impatient with the preacher who imposes drivel on his congregations with the defense that he is "preaching the simple gospel." Among the hot shots which the bishop gave the preachers in the Central German conference at Indianapolis recently were these: "No man who does not have the brains and the disposition to think should enter the gospel ministry. The

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HYMNAL EVER PRODUCED BY THE AMERICAN CHURCH

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity
Hymns of Social Service
Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

so-called simple gospel sermons, the boast of many preachers, usually contain nothing more than pious commonplaces and intellectual mediocrity and drivel. The expression 'simple gospel' is used often to excuse intellectual nakedness and destitution. A good question for any preacher to ask himself is: Would you go to church to hear the kind of sermons you preach if you did not have to do so?"

Hoosier Church Celebrates Centennial

First Baptist church, presided over by Rev. Frederick E. Taylor, president of the Northern Baptist convention, has recently celebrated the centennial of its organization. At the time of the founding of the church, Indianapolis was a muddy little village on the banks of the White river.

Church People of Chicago Are in Politics

The social service department of Chicago Presbytery has taken display advertising to oppose the candidacy of Mr. Anton Cermak as president of the Cook County board of commissioners. This office is said to be fourth of fifth in rank among the public offices of Illinois in the matter of influence and money spent. Mr. Cermak is a Bohemian who has secured much popularity as a convinced advocate of the wet cause, and as the head of nullification societies. He is being opposed

What is The Daily Altar?

IT IS A GUIDE and inspiration to private devotion and family worship. Presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these hurried and high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost. this beautiful book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

The authors of the book are Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison.

ESTIMATES OF THE BOOK

The Christian Advocate: This compact volume will be very helpful in the stimulation of family worship. a grace that has been a diminishing factor in the family life of Amerca for some time. It will be a great advantage to the religious life of the nation if this asset of faith and prayer can again become effective among us. And this book, with its excellently arranged selections for each day, will be of large assistance in that direction.

The Homiletic Review: If we are to meet, successfully, the great and growing number of problems in this eventful time, it is necessary that the quiet hour of meditation be observed as never before. For only a mind nicely poised, only a spirit daily enriched and nourished and guided by an unselfish purpose can adequately meet the situation. Every aid, therefore, to thoughtfulness and prayer should be welcomed, as we do this manual before us. It has been prepared "with the purpose of meeting in an entirely simple and practical manner some of the needs of individuals and households in the attainment of the sense of spiritual reality."

The Presbyterian Advance: For meeting the need of those who would enjoy the privilege of daily prayer, but scarcely know how to begin, the authors have prepared this excellent and beautiful book.

The Central Christian Advocate: Beautifully bound, this book with its tasty and neat appearance, prepares one for the equal taste and care in its contents. Of all books for devotional use, this one in appearance and contents cannot be too highly commended.

The Christian Standard: The binding and make-up of the book are beyond all praise.

The Christian Evangelist: This book is beautifully arranged, handsomely bound and typographically satisfying. It should be a real help toward restoring the family altar.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D.D.: "The Daily Altar" is a bit of fine work. It certainly provides something to grow up to. Unlike many books of devotion, it is free from pious platitudes and pays the highest respect to the intelligence of its readers. Its devotional spirit is pervasive.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor Emeritus The Christian Evangelist: The book is happily conceived, happily worked out and most beautifully bound.

Bishop Will Contest Heresy Charges

Among the bishops charged with heresy at the recent general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church was Bishop William Montgomery Brown of Arkansas, who has made public the correspondence that passed between him and other bishops of the church. He will not resign from his place as bishop, and will contest any charges that are preferred against him. He admits that he does not hold to a literal interpretation of the Genesis stories nor to the Paulinist plan of redemption. He further charges that no other educated person does. It is now up to the bishops to make the next move.

Editor of Churchman Comes to Sudden Death

Rev. William Austin Smith, editor of the Churchman, a leading publication of the Protestant Episcopal church, died recently in a New York hospital at the age of fifty. He has conducted his paper on liberal lines, and during the past year has been outspoken on Christian union and world peace. He was a Harvard graduate. His pastorates were in Milwaukee, Wis., and Springfield, Mass. He became editor of the Churchman in 1916. His passing is an irreparable loss to the progressive wing of his church.

AN OPPORTUNITY TO HELP
TWO WORTHY ALABAMA SCHOOLS

DOWNING INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL
Brewton, Alabama.

This school, established in 1906, had that year an enrollment of 9; a faculty of 2; a property valuation of $4,000; and 1 building. Now the school has an enrollment of 185; a faculty of 16; 7 buildings, and a property valuation of $175,000.

This school was established to provide an education and Christian training to poor girls who, without this school, would grow up in ignorance. We need help. Work on a badly needed dormitory has been suspended for lack of funds. You can establish scholarships at this school, and lift poor girls from ignorance to light, and fit them for efficient service. Will you help?

COLEY-BLACKSHER VOCATIONAL SCHOOL BOR BOYS
Hadley, Alabama.

This school was established one year ago. We have been given 2,124 acres of land, but have only one dormitory and one small school room.

There are probably 1500 Indians in this community without church or school facilities; also a community of Negroes without adequate school opportunities. It is our purpose to try to provide an opportunity for all these. Our people have been generous, but here is an opportunity for others to help us with their money to build American citizens. Will you help? Address the president.

PAULINE TAYLOR HALL
Donation of Miss Cornelia A. Taylor, of Quaker Hill.

YOUR OPPORTUNITY

If you would immortalize yourself, here is your opportunity. You can provide money to help build, equip and maintain these two schools, which were established for those who without outside help must grow up in ignorance. We give a cordial invitation to our friends in the North and elsewhere to visit us at Brewton. We will entertain you free of charge. O, Friends, will you not hear and heed this Macedonian cry? NEW BOOKS OF SERMONS

The Victory of God

By JAMES REID

"The chief distinction of this book of twenty-five sermons," says The Christian Century editorially, "is its serenity of spirit, its vitality of faith, and the artless simplicity of the art with which the preacher delivers the message. Its fashion of sermon-making is the simplest, with no struggle after striking titles, no clever twists of odd or obscure texts. Its illustrations are as apt as they are inevitable; nothing is lugged in. The culture of the preacher is manifest, but more as an atmosphere of sanity and rich suggestiveness, and his wealth of great and beautiful thoughts is matched by a nobility of expression." The British Weekly remarks: "In Mr. Reid's pages we catch the living tones of a preacher who is pleading with men so earnestly that his language grows simple, forcible, direct." ($2.00).

The Forgiveness of Sins

By GEORGE ADAM SMITH

Most American ministers know the unrivalled work by Dr. Smith on the geography of the Holy Land. His scholarship is admitted the world over. This volume contains fifteen sermons, the following being some of the titles: "Our Lord's Example in Prayer," "To Him that Overcometh," "The Moral Meaning of Hope," "Will Ye Have the Light," "The Forgiveness of Sins," "The Word of God," and "Temptation." The sermons were preached in Queen's Cross Free Church, Aberdeen. ($1.50).

When Jesus Wrote on the Ground

By EDGAR DE WITT JONES

Says Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, in his "appreciation" of the author of this book: "It is the shepherd instinct that, after all, is the greatest quality in Edgar De Witt Jones. He loves people. He believes in them. He invests even the unworthiest of them with dignity, and in the spirit of Jesus delights to serve them." And that human quality is sensed in all the sermons included in this book. Among the sermon titles are: "The Towel and the Basin," "When Jesus Wrote on the Ground," "A God Who Will Not Let Us Go," "Other Sheep," "The Lord's Leading," "The Church in Thy House," "The Peace Christ Gives," "The Ladder of Prayer," etc. ($1.50).

Sermons for Days We Observe

By FREDERICK F. SHANNON

In his pulpit at Central church, Chicago, Dr. Shannon stands as the latest in a remarkable succession of great preachers: David Swing, Newell Dwight Hillis, F. W. Gunsaulus and, since 1919 Dr. Shannon. The Biblical World remarks: "Dr. Shannon's addresses cannot be measured by the ordinary yard stick; they can hardly be criticized; it is better to enjoy them." This collection includes sermons for New Year, Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Mothers' Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas and other anniversaries. ($1.50).

The Cross and the Garden

By FREDERICK W. NORWOOD

This collection of sermons by the minister at City Temple, London, is thus characterized by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, who preceded Dr. Norwood in that pulpit: "This is a book of very real preaching of a kind not often heard or read. It is so simple, so real, so direct, so human. . . . I like the book because it is clean off the track of conventional preaching and the further we get off that beaten track and yet keep the essential genius and purpose of preaching, the better for us all. Not in years have I read a book or met a man with such a sense of reality—and that is the chief thing. It is religion dipped and dyed in the stuff and color of human life. Unless I miss my guess, this book will have a wide appeal, especially among young preachers." ($1.50).

The Safest Mind Cure and Other Sermons

By W. E. ORCHARD

Dr. Orchard, of King's Weigh House, needs no introduction to the American reading public. His fame as a preacher and prophet is almost world-wide. The "Challenge" characterizes this collection of sermons as both "fresh" and "vigorous." ($1.35).

The Finality of Christ

By W. E. ORCHARD

"The Quest of God," "Christ as a School of Culture," "The Inconstancy of Human Goodness," "Evolution and the Fall," "The Discovery of God in Thought," and "The Finality of Christ" are among the sermons included in this volume. "Great preaching," says The Christian World of this book. ($1.35).

Lord, Teach Us to Pray

By ALEXANDER WHYTE

"There is something in this book," remarks The Christian Century, editorially, "that defies all analysis, something titanic, colossal, overwhelming, which makes ordinary preaching lie a long way below such heights—a sweep of vision, a grasp of reality, a grandeur of conception that fills the heart with wonder and awe. Dr. Whyte seemed utterly oblivious of the modern difficulties about prayer, perhaps because he was a man of importunate, victorious prayer. He did not argue about prayer; he prayed. Where there is so much that is sublime it is difficult to select, but the sermons on the prayer of our Lord in the garden, on the Costliness of Prayer, on the Geometry of Prayer are memorable. . . . If one would know the secret of great preaching, it is revealed in this book, as nowhere else, in our generation." ($2.00).

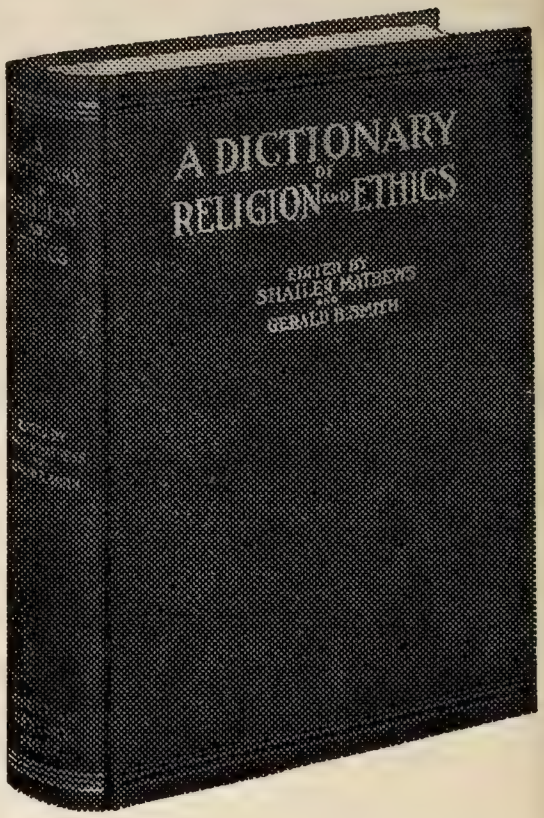
"IT'S REALLY MARVELOUS TO HAVE ALL THIS RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE CONDENSED IN A SINGLE BOOK RIGHT AT MY ELBOW"

So spoke a clergyman of wide experience and scholarly training concerning the great volume,



A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS
EDITED BY SHAILER MATHEWS AND GERALD B. SMITH

A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS

Edited by SHAILER MATHEWS and GERALD BIRNEY SMITH

This is a new book which every thoughtful or studious person must have. It is a whole religious library in one book—the product of a hundred authoritative scholars—clear, compact, accurate, authentic.

This book is now going to the library tables of all leading ministers, bishops and laymen who want to know and who must know.

Do You Know—

The facts as to the historicity of Christ?

What made the Mohammedan successful? That the Mohammedan is an offshoot of the Christian religion?

Why Brahminism drove Buddhism out of India?

That the Roman religion lasted twelve hundred years?

The relative influence of John Hus, Wyckliff and Luther?

The history of the idea of Heaven and Hell?

The great book "Against Celsus?"

The origin and development of Hedonism?

About the Code of Hammurabi? That this Code (2000 years B. C.) had higher morals than many men of today?

That the Immaculate Conception dogma was promulgated in 1854?

What is Jewish Christianity?

Voices of Approval from All Quarters

The New York Christian Advocate: "Useful, especially because of its up-to-dateness and non-technical treatment of words and subjects."

The Presbyterian: "It is more than a dictionary; rather an encyclopedia."

The Baptist: "A convenient one-volume dictionary likely to be used by its possessor more than many-volumed encyclopedias."

The Continent: "Convenient, compact, dependable."

The Christian Work: "The appearance of this volume is a notable event."

Religious Education: "A book quite indispensable to the private library of every minister, student and teacher of religion."

THE DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS sets forth in compact form the results of modern study in the psychology of religion, the history of religions, both primitive and developed, the present status of religious life in America, Europe and the most important mission fields, and the important phases of Christian belief and practice. It also covers both social and individual ethics. All subjects of importance in the field of religion and ethics are discussed. About one hundred scholars have cooperated with the editors, including well-known specialists in their respective fields. The articles are written historically, objectively, without speculation or propaganda, and in so far as possible by those most in sympathy with their subjects.

Not only should every minister possess this book; every Sunday school teacher, every Bible student who takes his study seriously, should have it at his elbow. It is without doubt the most useful one-volume dictionary of religion published in decades. Do not neglect to send in your order today.

Three Vital Volumes

The Christian Faith and the New Day

By Cleland Boyd McAfee, of McCormick Theological Seminary

The appeal here is not to technical theologians, but to working ministers and thoughtful laymen who, after all, build and use the theology that is living and who sometimes fear to see it change. The great days just past have given many a renewed assurance that Christianity is more vital and forceful than it has been for many a day. Its vitality may well claim the right to phrase itself anew—which means to reconstruct theology at any point where it may need reconstruction.

A Valid Christianity for Today

By Bishop Charles D. Williams

For many persons a valid Christianity is to be known by its roots. But the mind of today, Bishop Williams holds, is intensely practical and insists that a valid Christianity is to be known by its fruits. Can it meet the need of a universal religion felt by an expanding and unifying world? Can it moralize our industrial, political and commercial life and humanize our social life? Can it live with the expanding vision and increasing light of modern knowledge? Some of the chapter titles of this challenging book are: "Christianity and the World," "Men of Vision," "The Confidence of a Certain Faith," "The Gospel of Democracy," "The Uses of Life," "The Universal Christ," and "The Supreme Values."

($1.75, plus 12 cents postage.)

The New Social Order

By Harry F. Ward

This book, as the title indicates, is based upon the conviction that a new order of living is both necessary and inevitable, and upon the judgment that the beginnings of that new order are already with us. The signs are clear that we have arrived at one of those conjunctions of economic pressure and idealistic impulse, of material and spiritual reality, which occasion fundamental changes in the organization of life. Dr. Ward takes up those outstanding principles which have been employed in the social progress of the western world, considers how they are being changed to meet present needs and aspirations, and in the light of them examines the significant features of various programs for the new order.

Recent Books of Unusual Merit

The Nature of Scripture

By Prof. A. S. Peake

"So far as criticism is dominated by rationalism or seeks to dissolve those historical facts which are vital to the very existence of Christianity, so far I also disavow it. The only criticism for which I care is the criticism which has an open eye for the actual phenomena of Scripture and so great a reverence for truth as to accept the conclusions to which these phenomena direct us."—From author's preface. ($2.00.)

Progress in Religion to the Christian Era

By T. R. Glover

These lectures are unique in that they bring before us in one glorious sweep of historic vision the religious development of the Greek, the Roman and the Hebrew peoples as a preparation for Christ's coming. ($2.00.)

Religion and the Future Life

Edited by E. Hershey Sneath

The ten contributors are well-known scholars, among them Professor Breasted, of the University of Chicago; Professor Jastrow, of the University of Pennsylvania; Professor B. W. Bacon, of Yale, and Franz Boas, of Columbia University. The volume is the result of a remarkable seminar conducted by the editor at Yale for the purpose of studying the history of the belief in life after death in religion and philosophy. ($3.00.)

The Revelation of John

By Arthur S. Peake

Dr. Peake is generally acknowledged as one of the greatest theologians in Europe, and his latest book is a complete justification of that high distinction. A scholarly, spiritual and poetic treatment of the Apocalypse for Bible students and Christians everywhere. "Certainly one of the sanest and most instructive books on the subject," says London Quarterly Review. ($2.50.)

A Literary Guide to the Bible

By Laura H. Wild

The author, who is professor of biblical history and literature in Mount Holyoke College, holds that there is now needed such a book as this, which will help the Bible student so to realize the art and beauty of Biblical literature that he can read it along with other world masterpieces. Chapters on Folk Lore, Historical Narratives, Poetry, Drama, Biblical Oratory, etc. ($2.00.)

Creative Christianity

By Professor George Cross

This work, by Professor Cross, of Rochester Theological Seminary, is a contribution toward reshaping inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us, so that the coming generation, nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today, may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs. ($1.50.)

The Quest of Industrial Peace

By W. M. Clow

This book, by the author of "The Cross in Christian Experience," begins with an analysis of the causes of the present industrial unrest and describes the massing of the conflicting forces. It gives a sympathetic exposition of experiments attempted in correcting industrial troubles. It closes with a constructive message in which the Christian ideal of relationships in society is outlined and applied so as to find the only path to industrial peace. ($1.75.)

The Iron Man in Industry

By Arthur Pound

Here is a refreshing modern argument for such education of our industrial workers that they may be equipped profitably to enjoy the leisure with which the automatic machine—"the iron man"—now provides them. To his wide experience as laborer, manager and employer, Mr. Pound adds an imaginative quality which lends an unusual interest to his book. ($1.75.)

The Preacher and His Sermon

By J. Paterson Smyth

The author of "How We Got Our Bible," for many years a professor of pastoral theology, here presents the ripe fruitage of his wide experience and observation. This series of lectures was delivered before the students and junior clergy in the Divinity School of the University of Dublin. ($1.25.)

The Open Fire and Other Essays

By William V. Kelley

Of these fifteen essays, the two on Robert Browning alone are worth the price of the book. "In Dr. Kelley's mind," says The Christian Century, editorially, "we have a true wedlock of evangelical piety and the noblest spirit of the Renaissance. Here is a spirit rich with the fruits of years of patient reading over the whole field of human thought." ($2.00.)

The Son of Man Coming to His Kingdom

By Principal Alfred Gandier, of Knox College
Toronto

"Jesus did not live in a vacuum," says Dr. Gandier. "To understand his life and teachings we must know something of the religious, moral and intellectual atmosphere in which he lived and moved—and of this the Jewish Apocalypse formed no small part." A frank discussion of the meaning and value of the Apocalyptic hope. ($1.25.)

What's Best Worth Saying

By Richard Roberts

Ten addresses, delivered for the most part to college students. The titles are: "On Creeds," "Of Faith," "Of Evil," "Of the Cross," "Of Jesus," "Of God Above and God Within," "Of God as a Society," "Of Spiritual Freedom," "Of the Joy of Life," "Of Love Among the Ruins." ($1.25.)

EDITORIAL

World Peace Waits On Better News Service

UPON the most casual information nations make up their minds about sister nations. Speaking at the recent meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Kenneth S. Beam, of Tokyo, gave a list of films shown in Tokyo in a single week. Among those listed were "O Mabel" and "The Toll of Sin." The kind of film that goes to Japan has created the firm conviction on the part of the Japanese people that the American people are characteristically immoral in their family relationships. On this side of the water one can find business men who believe that Japanese are characteristically and universally dishonest. He may never have known very many Japanese but this generalization sticks in his mind. The newspapers that are carried from country to country carry the story of the crime and the disorder of the nations. Few are the writers who have learned the art of making the goodness of the world interesting to newspaper readers. America is in a position of unique leadership in the world. The whole world is being told by a lying propaganda that the prohibition laws in the United States are a failure. But if a generation of experience shows them to be a splendid success, nothing will stop the civilized world from following in our footsteps. Just now a bad news service hinders the world-wide progress of the temperance reform. How seriously our attitudes are taken is seen in the fact that Japan at once took the cue from us in the matter of disarmament and has promptly scrapped her ships according to agreement. Diplomats assure the missionaries that the Turkish massacres in the near east will stop when the United States speaks a firm word. But the worst has never come to the notice of the American public in general. America has a sleeping conscience on Armenia today because of the lack of accurate and detailed information. The brotherhood of man cannot come until all nations have reliable and independent information with regard to the conditions in the farthest corner of the earth. This makes the spiritual development of great news agencies of primary importance.

Fundamentalism and 100 Per Centism

FREQUENTLY, of late, our Fundamentalist leaders have issued voluminous warnings against the spread of what they call "infidelity" in the modern pulpit; meaning by infidelity the modern point of view in thought and faith. Such warnings are accompanied by terrifying predictions of impending anarchy, communism, and all the other nightmare hobgoblins conjured up by the post-war hysteria to frighten us—things worn as thin as toy balloons. At the same time the Fundamentalist theology is held up as the last fortress and bulwark of 100 per cent Americanism, the final prop and support of the social structure, without which black ruin and red, raw anarchy befall all the world and the rest of mankind. It is very interesting, this alliance between reactionary theology and reactionary politics; "birds of a feather flock together." Both know how to "treat 'em rough," both canonize tendencies in American life which otherwise would not dare show themselves. The spirit common to both is neither American nor Christian, being intolerant and ruthless, and at bottom a fundamental scepticism. It forgets the memorable saying of Edmund Burke, which is as true of theology as it is of politics: "A state without the means of change is without the means of its conservation." No, the real conservative is the man who has the courage to follow the ways of the holy spirit as revealed in the unfolding of thought, the growth of faith, and the slow advance toward a more Christian social order.

Religion is Good Copy

DOGMATIC religion has ever been tabu in the newspaper offices. No editor outside the denominational press would dare risk his circulation by printing discussions of blood atonement, the second coming, baptism or apostolic succession. But in these days when religion is being talked in terms of the New Testament emphasis upon life and conduct, it has been found in many sanctums that religion is actually good copy. The Ladies' Home Journal realizes that no interest is more central in the minds of the women of the country than the churches and the evangelical faith. Many of its articles are frankly for the purpose of aiding the churches in their work. One would think it strange to pick up a copy of the Atlantic Monthly and find in its pages no religious article. Dr. Frank Crane has found a pulpit for millions in his familiar talks on every-day religion. Even William Jennings Bryan is back in the newspapers since he has begun the discussion of the Sunday school lessons. The newspapers once featured chiefly the back-room gossip of the church. Editors sent reporters out to hunt down scandals on ministers. But that day is passing. While the ministerial sinner can expect no favors, and no one desires that he should have any, nevertheless the newspapers have found something to say about churches and ministers and religion that is not cynical, but constructive. The layman is no longer surprised to find an occasional religious editorial in a secular newspaper. The churches should not miss the lesson of this new appreciation. It is not to "old-time religion" that this editorial clemency is being extended. It is in the fresh and modern interpretation of the religion of Jesus that readers of great journals have interest these days. Just so far as the churches continue to modernize their message and their methods may they hope to find favor in the offices of those who mould the opinions of the masses.

The Freedom of the Pulpit

ARE ministers really free? How far is a sermon the full deliverance of the preacher's mind upon the theme that he is seeking to interpret? Counsels of prudence are given the younger men continually by ecclesiastical leaders. Horrible examples are exhibited of men who became radical in their utterances and who came to a bad end ecclesiastically. As the family grows in the parsonage the minister is often inhibited by haunting doubts about the support of his family. It takes a brave man to denounce the sins of some of his leading people at the cost of his church budget. It is the sense of repression upon the minds of men which accounts for the enormous leakage from the ministry of the evangelical denominations today. Our modern psychology tells us how unhappy a mind may become when any persistent desire must be as persistently crushed and repressed. That is the reason that every now and again some young minister explodes, and does some very unwise thing. In a perfectly free situation his convictions would have been uttered in a constructive spirit. In an atmosphere of heresy-hunting they come out under pressure of emotion and resentment. Of course there is a liberty of hearing as well as a liberty of speaking. Perhaps in the long run the minister who is out of accord with a majority of his people must expect to find a new field. But hearers will have to become accustomed after awhile to listening to sermons that contain new ideas as well as old ones, for the new brand of educated minister is no slave to tradition. He has been taught to think for himself. Congregations have a similar right. Differences of opinion between ministers and their congregations should not mean a break of friendship as under the old orthodoxy. A minister is not like a shyster lawyer who will defend any cause for a suitable fee. He takes his orders from on high and must be able to stand not only before bishops and secretaries, but before the Lord of all the earth. The mind of the best minister is characterized by this sense of spiritual responsibility.

Saving and Spending

MONEY is made to be spent. Thriftlessness is bad, to be sure, but, if there can be degrees in utter badness, miserliness is worse. We do well with our save- the-pennies campaigns, and in the inculcation of thrift in our schools. Americans are too happy-go-lucky. They do not save enough. But the land wherein citizenship is bound up, sealed and riveted by the stock-and-bond-holding mind is in a bad way. American labor is reckless of time-honored ideals and institutions because it is too little inclined to establish property rights in them. Thriftlessness is the mark of the moron, and the moron majority is what ails our civilization. All this we have on good authority, and have accepted as conclusive, perhaps. But generalizations which cover the universe open their seams in the stretching. Maybe the moron neglects to store up capital. But a similar thriftlessness is not less clearly the mark of much of the most fruitful genius from which society has profited and still profits. The human graces are notoriously blighted in the mind bent upon storing. Hoarding and profiteering are social vices, and the community suffers from them all the time; it suffers tragically in every event of economic strain or crisis. Nowhere do the virtues of generosity, and open-handed sharing with the unfortunate, and numerous other social graces which spring from and generate them, so abound as among these same reputedly thriftless laboring people. Liberal ideas and progressive aspirations thrive most and best among the unpropertied, or the meagerly propertied. The reckless I. W. W. agitator who has nothing to lose and a wild chance to gain by anarchy is doubtless a grave menace to any orderly civilization, but not less disastrous is the influence of the skinflint, the miser, the hoarder. Americans may be happy-go-lucky, but they are also selfish and grasping. That is, some are one and some are the other. Who will choose between them? The wise man will make no choice. Thriftiness which would dry up the springs of human kindness, and turn the open-handed, care-free spender into the calculating, conscienceless profiteer, is a terrible blunder.

Christian Conscience and Political Criticism

THE first step toward political regeneration is sound political criticism. A keen intellect and a discriminating conscience must be applied to the whole contemporary political situation as a preliminary step to all forward movement. A campaign of education must precede the campaign of action. It is just a little disconcerting to find that the church is not more obviously capable in this matter of developing the type of men who apply the keenest sort of conscience to the problems of our political life. To be sure the church is not to become an efficiency expert in party organization. We are not forgetting the separation of church and state. But after all the church does furnish a set of standards and a set of ideals by which at last all life must be judged. And it ought to be sending out into political life all the while men who without a touch of ecclesiastic partisanship do see our whole political situation with eyes which have been cleansed and sharpened by the conscience of Jesus and who have clear and powerful words in which to appraise our activities in the name of those great insights which they have learned from the gospels. We have already produced an amazingly effective body of social criticism in this very fashion. But in the political field the church has seemed singularly sterile. If the new political leader is to come, the church must provide that nation-wide moral awareness regarding political affairs which will give him soil in which to work.

Two Steps Toward Normalcy

RAYMOND ROBINS recently made so concise and effective an utterance on behalf of the release of all war prisoners and for the recognition by the United States government of the de facto government of Russia, that his words should be given the widest possible hearing. "We favor," he said, "the unconditional release of all war prisoners, first, because we believe in freedom of opinion. We know that force against ideas is the oldest failure in the history of mankind. Second, because we know that these men were convicted under wartime statutes which have since been repealed. We know that they are guilty of no crime known to the present laws of this land. Third, because we know that every other nation has released its war prisoners. We know that American institutions are not the weakest among the nations, and that we do not have to fear for the foundations of our government more than all the other peoples of the earth. We know that we are not the most unchristian and malignant of the peoples of the world." As to Russia, he said, "We favor the recognition of the government of Russia, and the resumption of trade relations with all nations with which we are not at war: first, because we know that the soviet government is the de facto government of the Russian people. We know that for nearly five years that government has held power and holds it still, and with more certain grip today than at any other hour. We know that the soviet government of Russia has raised the greatest armies in Europe, has won peace through victory on four fighting fronts, has put down insurrections—and survived the greatest famine of modern times. We know that the Council of the Peoples Commissairs is the oldest executive cabinet in the world. Second, because we want the markets of the world restored and open for the products of our factories and our fields. Some of us voted the Republican ticket in the last national campaign. We thought that the plank in the Republican platform, "We pledge the party to an immediate resumption of trade relations with every nation with which we are not at war," meant what it said. We know the economic restoration of the world is impossible until the vast raw materials of the Russian land and the consumption power of the one hundred and eighty millions of Russian people is resumed. Third, because we sympathize with a great people struggling to be free forever from the greatest tyranny of modern times. We do not forget that this nation was born in revolution. We are weary of propaganda lies and liars and tired of the blind and stupid policy of secret and illegal war against a people six thousand miles away. First we intervene with force, then we use the terrible and merciless blockade, and when the famnie comes that we have helped to make, we spend fifty millions of the American taxpayers' money in relief of starving millions of little children—while other millions die. We are sick of our government being used as a stalking horse and collection agency for the imperialists of the old world."

Secular Business and Moral Idealism

THE moral aspirations of earnest-minded business men will find both an interpretation and an organ in the Ethical Culture Society in New York where Dr. Felix Adler, the founder of the society has organized under the simple title, "Business Men's Group," a project for the actual practice of moral idealism in everyday business. The group includes men who seek, in the words of an address recently delivered by Dr. Adler, "the vindication of their moral nature in their daily occupation." Dr. Adler's address discusses the motives of business enterprise from the spiritual point of view. He says that the evils inherent in our economic system and which "are more and more eclipsing its incidental advantages," spring from a false motive—that of pecuniary gain. This is "an inversion of the right moral order." A successful physician or surgeon "would certainly deem himself insulted if his success were measured by the aggregate of his fees. . . . The business man, on the contrary, positively consents that his success shall be measured by the 'money that he makes'." Dr. Adler expects the time to come when "avarice will be ranked with gluttony." An interesting part of the argument is the statement that low standards of living among workers resulting from the tendency to keep wages at the lowest practicable minimum, "is directly responsible for removing the prudential restraints that check the inordinate increase of population." As for the argument that our economic order promotes initiative and enterprise—"those qualities which constitute the chief claim on behalf of the present system"—Dr. Adler finds their value indisputable, but remarks that "the amount of initiative and enterprise at present available in society is far too limited." The human race would be greatly advantaged by the liberation of the latent initiative and enterprise in the great multitude of mankind. He turns this argument directly about to show that initiative is gratified by accomplishment and the rendering of needed service, without reference to money reward. Work itself affords great satisfaction as the labors of scientific and professional men prove. "The business man ought not to demean himself by declaring that he is baked of meaner clay than they." Dr. Adler proposes that the ethically-minded business man "abjure the false motive" and put himself on a salary, fixing the amount of income which he will use for his genuine human needs, "studying a fine simplicity in his manner of living." Dr. Adler contends that a business must render three kinds of service: it must produce needed goods, it must react favorably upon the culture of the sciences and arts that enrich life, and it must promote the moral development of the workers themselves." This, we should say, is the realization of Christianity by direct action—the candid attempt by men of earnest spirit to work together in a fellowship of purpose to bring their daily secular interests and vocations into conformity with their own highest moral ideals.

Dr. Lyman Abbott

THE passing of Dr. Lyman Abbott, at the ripe age of eighty-seven, takes from among us one of the greatest and most beloved figures in the religious life of our generation. Tribute will be paid to him as author, editor, scholar, and citizen, but, when all is said, it was as a minister of Christ to his age that he was supreme. Many a minister, in England and in America, hearing the news of his translation, must have felt as the young prophet felt when Elijah was taken away: "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" Any true reckoning of the personal religious forces in America in the last thirty years that left the influence of Dr. Abbott out of account, would reveal either ignorance or prejudice. There have been greater preachers, profounder scholars, and more astute ecclesiastical statesmen, but as a leader of spiritual thought he stood in the front rank. It would be hard to name another who united so symmetrically so many abilities of diverse character with such uniform excellence, who commanded a wider influence, or whose touch upon the life of the world was more immediate and fruitful. Indeed, he has been so much with us, touching the life of our time in so many ways, as guide, teacher, and engaging companion, that it is difficult to realize that he has passed from among us.

As editor of the Outlook and its predecessor, the Christian Union, he spoke to a large company of thoughtful and cultured people in all parts of the land. His books dealing with theology, biblical criticism and exegesis, and the Christian life—both in its devotional and in its social expression—were a blessing to the generation that received them. As a preacher—after a somewhat lonely early pastorate in New York—in Plymouth church following Beecher, and later in great churches, colleges, and universities all over the nation, he was unique and winsome, as much for his sympathetic understanding of the difficulties of the modern mind in respect of religious faith, as for his power of lucid exposition and luminous appeal—qualities in which he had few peers and none to surpass him.

In the transition of Christian faith from its older forms and interpretations into the vast world unveiled by science, by the advance of democracy, by the increasing intricacy of social life, he was a sure-footed guide to whom a great multitude owe an unpayable debt. His clarity of thought, his pellucid style—not a mere idiom, but a style as transparent as sunlight—his warm sympathy and fine poise of reason, his ready and wise counsel, his loyalty to all things true, beautiful and abiding, his single-hearted devotion to his Master, made him a teacher who quickened, liberalized, and fertilized his fellow men. Throughout his long life, after he had found himself, he united a deep and vivid evangelical faith with a wide liberality of thought—ready to welcome the latest achievement of philosophy and the last found fact of science—and pointed the path along which the greatest Christian advances will be made in days that lie ahead.

A young man of quick, versatile and practical intellect, he was preparing for the law, when he fell under the spell of Beecher, whose incomparable eloquence made incandescent by a living and gentle experience of God in Christ was like a revelation. The great preacher made the young man glad about God, set him on fire with a vision of Christ, and sent him to a new study of the gospels, where he learned that religion is a life rather than a law, that God is a father rather than a judge, and that character is salvation and destiny. What in Beecher was a series in vivid and creative intuitions became in the logical mind of Abbott an order of extremely simple and all-transfiguring ideas, which he taught with many variations of insight, emphasis, and practical application. At eighty-five he wrote "What Christianity Means to Me," setting down in the mellow glow of sunset his ripest thought of God as immanent yet personal, fatherly and forgiving; of history as the orderly, progressive unfolding of the divine life; of Christ as the supreme manifestation of God, the utmost of the divine that can dwell in human form; of religion as "the life of God in the soul of man"; of the world and its processes as the subject of redemption; of the eternal life lived in time. So there was light at eventide—the light of morning made tender and prophetic by the touch of twilight.

It is too early to estimate the service of Dr. Abbott as a religious teacher, much less to appraise his total achievement. Except to say that he was a mediator, rather than a creator; an expounder rather than an explorer; a builder of bridges between the old and the new. In the field of theology, as in the discussion of current social and industrial issues, he was a middle man rather than an extremist. This held good in respect to his attitude toward capital and labor, temperance reform, religious education, and Christian unity. His desire seemed to be to help form a sane and considered public opinion that should represent the conviction and sentiment of the Christian mind on great questions. It was this judicial quality of his thought, aided by his power of clear statement and his lawyer-like instinct of looking at all sides of a subject, that gave weight and worth to his leadership.

On his personal side Dr. Abbott was a charming companion, a stimulating talker, a loyal friend who took time "to keep his friendship in repair." Albeit a wee wisp of a man, of comparatively frail physique—reminding one of Dr. Clifford, of London—he had an amazing capacity for work. Two principles governed his labor: first, not to do anything himself that he could get others to do; second, to take his rest before any work, and not as a restorative after it. He knew how to put aside his work and leave it behind— and, like Dr. Clifford, he knew how to sleep at will. It took him years to find out that he was not destined for the law, and still more years to work out his principles and methods of preaching. There were disappointments betimes, and finally a complete reversal of his earlier ideals. Indeed, it was not until fairly late in life. after feeling his way along, that he actually found himself in his sphere of influence and power. The honors and prosperities of his later years were nobly won, nobly used, nobly worn, with a reverence which added dignity to humility, and a gentleness that gave strength to power.

The greatest thing in Dr. Abbott was not his work, but himself, his spiritual personality, his Christian character. Gentle, helpful, sunny, never morose, eager, expectant, he was a Puritan in his passion for righteousness and a Christian in his genius for fellowship. The ruling motive of his life was for spiritual truth and achievement, and if the fire of a prophet flashed in his moral enthusiasm, there was something of the philosopher in his simple common sense. Withal, he had won the serenity which comes to those who believe and who obey; the serenity of Storm King on the Hudson, the mountain at whose foot he lived during his later years—the serenity of "the on-coming evening and the star-crowned night," when faith becomes trust, and experience a revelation.

The Camera

A Parable of Safed the Sage

WE went, I and a friend, unto a Notable Celebration. And I spake unto him, saying, There will be interesting sights and people, and we could use a Camera.

And he said, My Camera is no longer with me. Some one wanted it more than he thought I wanted it.

And he lifted up his eyes ,and behold, across the way, the Shop of a man who sold Cameras.

And he said, I know this man, and he will lend me a Camera.

And I said, I will buy the Films from him.

And the Camera Man was Very Courteous, and he took a Brand New Camera, and said, I am glad to loan it for so Worthy a Purpose.

Now that day we saw many things that we wished to Photograph. And at each of them did my friend point his Borrowed Camera, and Press the Button.

But on the next day, when he took the Films to be Developed, behold, there was not a blessed thing on one of them. And when he investigated the Camera, behold, the Shutter was out of order, and it had never once opened all that day.

There had been Wondrous Sights that were visible, and the Sun was bright, and the Film was new and Sensitive, but the Camera never once opened its eye.

There be folk who go through life in that fashion. They have eyes and see not; ears have they but they hear not. The earth is full of things which they might see and from which they ought to learn, and they go through all the Motions, but they Register Zero in Results.

So I look out upon mankind, and I pray as the Prophet of God prayed for the young man, Open his eyes that he may see. For the mountains are still full of Chariots and Horses with Power and Victory possible for him who hath eyes to behold.

Autumn

NOW is the dream-time of the year,
And the soft West wind
Gently woos to sleep
The leaves, swift-falling, gold and red and sere;
And the wild flowers,
Born of summer hours,
Prepare for slumber, knowing winter near.

Now is the dream-time of the year,
And the sad, sad heart
Dreams of summer days,
And of tender hours, now vanished, and more dear;
And the heart cries out
For the hopes that lie
By the wayside dead, and drops for each a tear.

At Evening Time

I KNOW not what the long years hold
Of winter days and summer clime;
But this I know: when life grows old,
It shall be light—at evening time.

I can not tell what boon awaits
To greet me, with the falling night;
But this I know: beyond the gates,
At evening time, it shall be light.

The Genius of Christianity for the Unexpected

By Charles W. Gilkey

"THE great thing about Christianity is that no one can tell what it will do next." So wrote Joseph Fort Newton in his London diary on May 10, 1918, at the end of some very discerning comments on one of the most arresting and significant figures in the British pulpit of today. It is small wonder that a personality so vivid and a message so extraordinary as that of W. E. Orchard should provoke this penetrating insight. Emerging first as an ally of R. J. Campbell in the stormy controversy over the new theology, he speedily became impatient with the futile negations and spiritual impotence of much modern religious liberalism, and began what he calls his "trek back to Christ." It was a quest for reality and power in religion that carried him out through and beyond the conventional liberal gospel. "For him Christianity was dynamite, not jam, a stroke of lightning, not a stick of candy. . . .- If he was anxious for religion to be liberal, he was far more concerned that liberalism should be religious in a radical, creative, deep-going fashion, issuing in heroic moral action. As a result, he found himself an orthodox heretic among liberals and a liberal among the orthodox; and that is where he stands today."

BOTH MODERN AND MEDIEVAL

There is literally no telling what surprise will be in store for the visitor who joins the large and eclectic congregation that gathers from all over London to listen to this original and audacious prophet of a Christianity that is at once radically modern and mediaevally conservative. I heard there last summer a profound and highly metaphysical reinterpretation of the ancient doctrines of the creation and fall that would have gone clean past the interests, if not indeed straight over the heads, of almost any American congregation that I know; and yet a week or two later he was applying the Lord's prayer to modern social problems in a fashion so radical that many Americans would have called him a bolshevik. In one of the famous pulpits of British Congregationalism, he is the apostle and expounder of the "Free Catholicism": but if you ask the real reason for the crucifix behind him as he preaches, the sign of the cross with which he pronounces the benediction, the brilliant robes in which he celebrates the communion after every service, the use of the rosary and other external aids to private devotion which he recommends from the experience of the saints, you will find his explanation of all this different mediaevalism rather nearer to the most modern psychology than to essential sacramentarianism. In the midst of an elaborately ritualistic service, he uttered one free prayer the like of which for soaring spontaneity of devotion I have rarely heard in any church—as those who have come to know his little volume of prayers called "The Temple" will quite understand. A few days afterward, from a public platform, he poured forth the most passionate and convincing indictment of war as a means for settling human disputes, and the most moving appeal to the Christian conscience to have done with it forever at whatever cost, to which I have ever listened. Americans would label him a pacifist—but he would glory in the charge! Recently he said: "Some of you have been reassured about me lately that I am not going over to Rome, after all. I am not so sure. I may! But why are you not afraid that I may join the Salvation Army? Because equally I may! What I hate are the middle ways."

RELEASE OF SPIRITUAL FORCES

Now is all this simply the religious expression of a strong, unconventional, and complex personality in the pulpit of King's Weigh House, Partly so, no doubt. But even deeper and more powerful than Dr. Orchard's marked personality, are the religious faiths and forces that are finding expression and release through him. And is not Dr. Newton right when he traces these faiths and forces back, not so much to the individuality of one preacher, as to the peculiar genius and perennial vitality of Christianity itself? "The greatest thing about Christianity is that no one can tell what it will do next."

Certainly this would seem the truer as well as the wider statement if one considers also two other great contemporary prophets to whom not only London, but all Britain is listening. Dean Inge of St. Paul's, who clear-eyed, fearless facing of the unpleasant facts of the present and dangerous possibilities of the future has won him the title of "the gloomy dean," proves to be not only a frank doubter of ancient miracles and modern democracy alike, but a great student and expositor of that timeless type of Christian mysticism to which the hungry heart of our over-wrought age is beginning to turn not only with psychological curiosity but with, he declares, "Such is the type of faith which is astir among us . . . unmistakably wistful longing. It allows us what George Meredith calls 'the rapture of the forward view.' It brings home to us the meaning of the promise of Christ that there are many things yet hid from humanity which will in the future be revealed by the Spirit of Truth. . . It makes no imposing show in church conferences; it does not fill our churches and chapels; it has no organization, no propaganda. . . But in reality it has overleapt all barriers; it knows its true spiritual kin; and amid the strifes and perplexities of a sad, troublous time it can always cover its hope and confidence by ascending in heart and mind to the heaven which is closer to it than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet."

MISS ROYDEN

One is of course prepared for novel impressions and experiences when one goes to hear Miss Royden at that Congregational downtown church that was turned over to her to become the home of her Eccleston Guild, when her own Anglican communion could find no place for the multitudes who throng to hear her preach. Hers was the most effective sermon I heard in more than three months in Britain. She is as outspoken in her pacifism and as radical in her social thinking as Dr. Orchard, and far more articulate and radiant than Dean Inge with "the interior splendor of religion." It is significant, by the way, that in Britain the clerical jingoes and Hun-haters seem plainly enough to have lost whatever influence they may have had during the war; and that the mind and conscience of the nation, particularly among its younger generation, is seeking spiritual guidance today from leaders like these three, all of whom maintained throughout the war a distinctively Christian position, and two of whom are out-and-out pacifists. Miss Royden is a surprise, not only in the unassuming and irresistible directness and effectiveness of her preaching, but in the well-poised richness of her personality. The daughter of a former Lord Mayor of Liverpool, born into a home of wealth and position whose traditions were high church and ultra tory, she has become a radical, a pacifist, and a lay preacher! Educated at Cheltenham College, Cambridge, and Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford (where she took honors in modern history), she became the first woman lecturer (on history and literature) under the Oxford university extension scheme; then a conspicuous leader in the law-abiding suffrage movement and an expert on the welfare of women and children, and now she is preaching to crowded congregations, largely of young people, such moving and unforgettable sermons as the one I heard (after she had previously denounced the Russian policy of the British government and announced a collection for famine relief) on, "Be still, and know that I am God!"

ON THE CONTINENT

The truth of Dr. Newton's remarks on the unexpectedness of Christianity appears in a new aspect when the student of contemporary religion crosses to the continent. Surely there is nothing more thoroughly disciplined to a wellnigh mechanical routine than Roman Catholicism in its native land. But it is in Italy that Giovanni Pappini, long and widely known all over Europe as a skeptic and iconoclast, a disciple of Nietzsche, and a bitter critic of Christianity as a gospel for weaklings, has since the war been literally "converted;" and has just published after more than a year's work a life of Christ written from the point of view not so much of a literary artist or historical student, as of an ardent lover like St. Francis himself. "The social questions, Pappini thinks, are never to be solved by violent revolutions, which only change the externals, but by every man undergoing in his soul that true revolution which will change the face of the world. The war taught him that all efforts of man after happiness by force or cunning fail miserably, ending in blood and tears. There is no hope but in listening to Christ."

And it is in Catholic Italy that there has recently appeared what one exacting critic has described as "the finest religious literature . . . since the Confessions of St. Augustine": "A Soldier's Confidence with God, Spiritual Colloquies of Giosue Borsi."

> It is a spiritual diary not meant for publication, but for the comfort and strength of the writer in the trenches. It is not the work of a cloistered mystic, but of a young man of the world, poet, scholar, amateur actor, dramatic critic, commentator on Dante, darling of the salons of the gay world of Rome and Florence. His father was hostile to the church and brought up his son in that atmosphere, but, like Augustine, he had a wonderful mother whose piety finally won him to faith. He was killed in action, November 10, 1915, while leading his men. In his pocket they found a copy of Dante and a farewell letter, which thrilled all Italy. So the Colloquies came to light, like a white star to guide the souls of men, war-weary and bewildered, into the Presence. Its abject humility, its awed intimacy of fellowship with the divine, its gem-like beauty of style—bright, yet tender—make it an everlasting possession.

The student of modern theological thinking will find in Switzerland a particularly interesting example of the truth of Dr. Newton's remark. She, like her neighbor Germany, was among the first countries to feel the full force of the modern movement in theology; and for nearly a century now her study of the Bible and her theological thinking have been dominated by the liberal point of view. In social questions also the Swiss church has been progressive, and many of its leaders have been, in spirit if not in name, Christian socialists. But of late many of the younger men graduates, some of them from German as well as Swiss universities, have been coming to feel that there is no spiritual salvation in liberalism as such, but all too often a lack of creative power. Bitterly disillusioned by the war as to German culture on the one hand and allied good faith on the other, they have sought refuge for their religious faith in a transcendent conception of the kingdom of God, waiting beyond the utmost reach of men to be revealed when God shall will it, and his church be humbly ready to receive it as his gift. This very modern Swiss school feels itself the lineal descendant of Paul and Luther, and has spiritual affinities with both the apocalyptic of the New Testament and modern premillenarianism—though it entirely repudiates the literal exegesis on which the latter is built. It is significant to find back of it, along with other purely continental influences, the same sense of dissatisfaction with the spiritual impotence of much modern liberalism that started Dr. Orchard on his quest for the free catholicism of the future. As one of its most active preachers and thinkers, Dr. Emil Brunner, put the matter in a striking sermon last summer on Jesus' answer to the paralytic borne of four, humanity always comes to Christ with an urgent plea based on its immediate and keenly felt needs,—only to be met with something else and deeper that it hardly knew it needed. He always surprises us!

EXPECTANCY

Has not this quality of unexpectedness been a marked characteristic of Christianity in every period of its productive vitality and creative power? Certainly it was true of Jesus' own appearance in the world. Men were looking for something no doubt, and there was a widespread attitude of expectancy among all groups in the Judaism of his day—as the messianic literature, the popular political uprisings, and the preaching of John the Baptist alike indicate. But the contrast between what they expected and what God actually sent, has been put in four lines by George Macdonald:

They all were looking for a king
To slay their foes and lift them high.
Thou cam'st, a little baby thing
That made a woman cry.

PAUL THE RADICAL

Paul came as even a greater surprise if possible to the early church. Those first Christian disciples were evidently expecting to go on as good Jews within their ancestral faith, fulfilling the law to the letter and awaiting the imminent return from heaven of the crucified, risen, and ascending messiah. But suddenly, out of their most aggressive persecutor, came their most radical leader, declaring that Jesus had superseded the old law, from whose burdens Christians were now free; and going forth himself, the first great Christian missionary, to preach the good news all over the empire to Gentiles as well as Jews. Paul's gospel of spiritual freedom and expansive power has been like dynamite in the church ever since; no one can tell what it will do next. Luther went back to it as a spiritual dynamic behind the reformation; and it is from Paul, as Professor E. F. Scott has pointed out in his inaugural address at Union Theological Seminary, that creative religious impulses continue to come to our modern world.

There was of course an almost universal stirring and expectancy abroad in the Europe of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and there were powerful economic, political, and intellectual forces at work under the surface, apart from which the Reformation cannot be understood. But the spark that set off this complicated and tight-packed mine was unexpected and unpredictable—the bright flame of pure religious experience in the soul of a German monk. It produced tremendous results in so explosive a situation; but its coming was as sudden as the descent of the divine fire to earth.

Men were lamenting, and with good reason, the religious formalism and impotence of the eighteenth century in Britain and America. But who would have guessed that the itinerant preaching of an Oxford man through the villages of England would ignite with its evangelical fervor the Wesleyan revival; or that the haystack prayer meeting of four Williams undergraduates would inaugurate a period of missionary expansion in nineteenth century Christianity far more influential as a worldwide apologetic than any system of theology taught in an institution of learning?

RELIGIOUS ADVANCE

Our present contention does not depend upon any inner connection or consistency between these conspicuous movements in Christian history, or upon any particular theological theory as to the nature of the supernatural or the ways of God with men. It simply points out that in religion as in any other phase of human experience, it is of the very nature of life to surprise us with the unexpected. However much one may know about the family history and traditions of two parents, it is hazardous business to predict in advance what will be the type, much less the personality, of their offspring. Within the household of Christian faith there are similar surprises presumably in store as to what "children of the kingdom" God will raise up to carry forward his great enterprises upon earth.

All this suggests the difficulty of passing accurate judgment on contemporary religious movements. Gamaliel's wise advice to the Jerusalem council has its message today to liberals and conservatives alike. There are many Christian business men in this country who look with genuine anxiety on the consideration by the Christian church of social and international problems, and say frankly that they think the Interchurch investigation of the steel strike a serious mistake. But it is interesting to find that same investigation widely regarded among British Christians as heartening evidence that the social conscience of the American church has not lost its edge through the corrosion of our material prosperity, nor been given for safe-keeping into the vaults of big business in return for generous financial contributions. They hold this "serious mistake" to be a characteristically Christian evidence of moral vitality and a timely declaration of spiritual independence. That it may possibly have been needed, one might suspect from a recent comment of the leading liberal weekly of Tokyo, whose non-Christian Japanese editor was moved by what seemed to him the truckling of some foreign officials of the world's Sunday school convention before non-Christian Japanese politicians and men of wealth, to this remark: "The demoralization of religion is beyond description in America; but that is no reason why Japanese Christians should imitate American believers."

PREDICTION IMPOSSIBLE

Still more does this truth suggest the impossibility of predicting with any accuracy the religious developments of the future. It has long been a favorite occupation of liberal thinkers to write articles and give addresses on "The Religion of the Future" or "The Coming Christianity;" and naturally such essays in anticipation have usually given us "the substance of things hoped for." As if religion any more than life itself could be accurately forecast by either logic or desire! If a man cannot foretell with any certainty the character and career of his own children—much less their descendants—the church is as little likely to be able to predict the type and tendencies of her spiritual heirs. Who among us, liberal or conservative, would have even guessed a decade ago that one of our most conspicuous contemporary religious phenomena would be the fundamentalist movement, with its bald literalism of Biblical interpretation, its cocksure dogmatism, and its partisan bitterness in condemning different opinions —all of which we had supposed the twentieth century had outgrown? Or who would have guessed that the controversy between science and religion—or rather the insistence that there is and must be such a controversy— which seemed to have passed with the nineteenth century, would break out again with such virulence on so slight a provocation as Mr. Bryan's tirades against evolution?

But more important than such warnings against hasty ptimism, is the real encouragement to faith and hope for he future which such considerations bring. Contemporary bookkeeping can never list all the assets or resources of the social and spiritual movements on whose fuller relization our hearts are set. We simply cannot see in what Nazarene carpenter-shop the coming messiah, in what chool of Gamaliel the future great apostle, may even now be in unsuspected training, whose influence shall turn or uicken or even create the currents of the future. The ong postponement of our eager hopes for social justice and international peace, the disillusionment of such periods of reaction and pessimism as all the world has just passed hrough, may at any moment be cut short by the emergence on our present bondage of the Lincoln who shall proclaim and achieve a new emancipation. It is out of the matrix of just such widespread moral convictions and social expectations, that real leaders are born. If this seems too roseate an optimism for the unknown future, it has at any rate certainly happened in the actual past.

CREATIVE FORCES A SPECIALTY

Nor is this encouragement to faith confined to the prospect of outstanding leadership; it applies to the generality of men as well. The current of public opinion, like Niagara below the falls, will suddenly produce from its mysterious depths new eddies that become the most conspicuous forces in the whole stream. The quick transformation of Elizabethan into Puritan England, which J. R. Green so vividly describes, the sudden swirl of militant idealism that after three years of self-regarding caution swept America into the great war, are familiar instances that have made history.

Now it is at once the actual record and the confident claim of the Christian religion, that it specializes in the production of these creative forces which change the course of history both for the individual and for society. As evidence it points to unnumbered "conversions," from the case of Paul down to that of Pappini, that have transformed individual lives; and to social movements, from the days of the apostolic church, and the crusades as Wells sees them in his "Outline of History," to the modern missionary movement that is leavening the new orient. Admitting the constant danger of deterioration and temporary sterility, as they are painfully evident in church history both past and present, it reminds us nevertheless that its great reformations and recreations have always come from within, born of its vital energies breaking forth anew in unexpected places and ways. And it relies on these creative powers to produce the continued succession of "saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs," that has never failed to this day.

In all this experience and confidence, however, Christianity's ultimate reliance is not only on itself, but even more on the guidance and power of the living God. It believes that these creative energies, active thus in all human experience and notably in its own history, are not so much its own as his. Its hope and expectation of the coming of his kingdom upon earth always includes therefore a reliance on these cooperative divine activities—which it freely admits are at the time unpredictable in detail—that must seem wholly unwarranted to those who do not share its faith in the providential guidance of a living and mighty God. In this larger sense a trust in the divine providence is a profound element both in Christian experience and in Christian faith. It is this element which, after a great mass of crass literalism and external detail has been frankly discarded, remains for some of us the vital religious core at the heart of the New Testament eschatology, and of what the pious terminology of today calls "the blessed hope." For after all, the kingdom for whose coming on earth we labor and hope and pray, is to Christian faith not simply the kingdom of man, wherein his aspirations for justice and brotherliness shall be at last achieved (though assuredly it includes all these); it is explicitly the kingdom of God, wherein his purpose of love and power shall be revealed in ways which it "hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive." Therefore its confident proclamation is always, to the twentieth century as to the first, the "good news" of a genuine gospel. And therefore also the presence of the unexpected, both in its content and in the process of its realization, is simply the fulfilment of that characteristically Christian faith classically expressed in the words of William Carey: "Attempt great things for God; expect great things from God."

No Sea

"And there was no more sea."—Rev. 21, 1.

NO Sea?
O God, how lonely that will be!

Some place on Heaven's topmost wall I'll steal,
And sit me there through all the sunset glow
To peer across the lucent ether field
To some far flood, whose ebb and flow,
Unsheens the glory of the twilight hour—
Once seen from Patmos as a lake of fire—
But I will see it in the sun embowered
As some great amethyst with crimson gyre.

Let me sit there again when comes a storm,
When seems the sea a host with banners white,
(Such host as seen in some apocalypse),
Whose battle line is marked by bound of foam.
How it will thrill me, too, when comes the fight
Where sea and ship contend in mortal grips;
And I'll ask God to steer the good craft home.

No Sea?
The ever-moving sea,
The symbol of thy constancy!

O take me, God, up to some rampart high,
Where I may see the endless tides go by.

The Background of Denominationalism

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

PROTESTANTISM is barely four hundred years old. It was born in turbulence. Erasmus "laid the egg" of the Protestant reformation, but he bitterly reproached Luther for "hatching a game-cock," and Luther came to hate Erasmus and his doctrines with as cordial a spirit as that with which he favored popes and vatican prelates. The excesses of the Anabaptists were as roundly reprobated by eminent leaders of the Protestant movement as were the corruption and spiritually barren formalism of the papacy. There were periods of the sway of Protestantism more accurately styled a riot than a reformation. On the other hand, it succeeded only in adding a thin veneer to old lifeless cults in certain regions. It cut off large sections of the church from official relations with Rome, without bringing forth satisfying evidences of inward regeneration. The national churches of portions of northern Europe were called Lutheran, and were severed from the Roman see, but their rituals and their ideals have identified some of them more closely with Romanism than with anything which we should consent to call Protestant.

LOOSE TERM

This Protestantism is exceedingly difficult to lay hands on. We use the term very loosely, indeed. We usually assume we are talking about something tangible and definite when we pay our tributes to Protestant Christianity, and claim for it the highest honors in Christian history. But experience shows that we dare not come to particulars in defining the term, lest we fall out among ourselves and come to blows. Religious groups of considerable influence in American society, and embracing hundreds of thousands of reputable and useful citizens live under the sense of being deliberately snubbed, of being treated with un-Christian intolerance, because we organize our Protestant councils and conferences and alliances, and offensively leave them out. On the other hand, groups embracing other hundreds of thousands of quite as reputable citizens, who are included in these councils and conferences and alliances, use every opportunity to cast slight upon the term Protestant and upon the ideas it is commonly believed to stand for. We find it very difficult, in other words, to make our category of Protestantism hang together. It was not securely welded into one substance in the first place, and we have never succeeded in giving it a cohesion which would permit our even defining the term accurately.

Our American doctrine of the separation of church and state is so new and startling and experimental as to be among the least solidly based innovations of modern life. In spite of upheavals incident upon the world war, and the disestablishment of certain historic churches, multitudes throughout Christendom still look at it askance. Our generation in the United States is so completely committed to it that it never occurs to any of us to raise a question about its value or its propriety. There are great masses of American citizens who cannot really understand what is meant by an "established church," just as there are multitudes in other countries who cannot believe a system Christian which does not put religion upon an official, state-sanctioned basis. Few of us realize how recently this change took place in our own society, and how bitterly it was resisted and resented by the ministers and church officials of that day. It is less than a hundred years, yes, less than ninety years, since the last "sovereign" state of the American union disestablished its church, and remanded religion to the functioning of voluntary organizations.

To achieve this separation cost as severe a fight, and generated as bitter animosities as any public issue of our history, barring perhaps the preservation of the political union and the abolition of chattel slavery. Thomas Jefferson was the recognized leader of the movement, and so bitter were the attacks upon him that multitudes believed him an atheist. John Fiske reports that in 1800 when he was first elected to the Presidency, timorous and pious maiden ladies of uncertain years in New England, ran and hid their Bibles, on learning of his election. They and many others were sure American society was relapsing into paganism, and that the sanctions of the Christian religion would be lost in an atheistic regime. Jefferson was more deeply hurt by these attacks than by any others throughout his public career, his letters would seem to show, though his consistent public policy was to disregard his traducers. Few public men in American history have revealed a more sensitive religious nature, though he is the only one in the long list of Presidents whom cataloguers and almanac compilers cannot identify with one or another of our religious sects or denominations.

DENOMINATIONAL ENTRENCHMENT

We are accustomed by this time to acclaim this arrangement, the separation of church and state, as one of the chief glories of American statesmanship. Perhaps it is glorious, but its achievement was not the conscious triumph of a far-seeing social discernment. The plan has not worked out at all as Jefferson hoped it would and intended that it should. He had no idea that great, endowed, property-holding corporations would develop under the sanctions of religion. He did not see the need of churches, and believed that they would in time disappear, or would be reduced to informal assemblages of those who might still desire to maintain worship as a social function. He persistently refused to identify himself with any church, and one of the keenest disappointments of his old age was his witnessing the more and more secure entrenchment which the various denominations were gaining in American society, especially through acquisitions of property. This he sought to forestall in framing the constitution of his own state of Virginia. Relics of these restrictive laws are still on the statute books of states closely affected by Virginian influences.

Probably, if we could get at the thoughts of eminent fathers of the republic, other than Jefferson, we should find deepest in the minds of those who joined with him in projecting this doctrine of the separation of church and state, a desire to evade the exceedingly difficult issue of fitting a religious program into the delicate fabric they were constructing. They wished to see church and state separated because the church was too much for them: building a democratic political state was task enough. They must indeed have despaired in their day of fabricating a democratic scheme which should express religion. They were a hundred and fifty years nearer than we are to those terrible social upheavals which attended the spread of Lutheranism and Calvinism and Anabaptism. And they knew more intimately still the capacities for unreasoning rancor which lay in New England Puritanism, Maryland high-churchism, Virginian free thinking, and the numerous and often mutually antagonistic ecclesiastically importations from the "reformed" countries of Europe. The easier, and indeed the only safe course for their, at best, very unseaworthy ship of state, was to throw the churches overboard, allowing them to sink or swim, live or die, as the event might determine. It is a tribute to the inexpugnable vitality of religion in the human order of affairs that the churches did survive, and have thrived in a manner which would have amazed, even more than it would have disappointed, good Thomas Jefferson, had he lived to this day.

SCHEME AN ACCIDENT

Again, it will vindicate our modesty if we shall appraise this scheme of religion and politics in the light of its historic origin. It is not the product of statesman's acumen and far-seeing design. It is an accident. It is the offspring of laissez faire. It has the dignity, and some of the other characteristics, of Topsy: it has just growed. Whatever of divinity we may find in it, we can properly attribute to the inscrutable grace of God which is often triumphant in outcasts and foundlings. No inspired statesmanship planned the religious system under which our society today operates. Politicians resorted to it as a makeshift, an evasion of an issue too big and intricate for them to handle. Ecclesiastical leaders resisted and denounced it with a vindictiveness which sometimes failed to stop anywhere near the boundaries of Christian charity and forbearance. Events forced it, and through the irrepressible vitality of religion we have made a virtue of a repugnant necessity.

Can the American people be induced to restore the old regimen of a united state and church, contrive an established institution of ecclesiastical religion as an official function of a political democratic state? Nothing is more inconceivable. Of course such a thing could never happen. Not the highest churchman in the land suggests or even desires such a thing. All Americans of whatever religious faith or tendency are thoroughly agreed upon the American doctrine of the separation of church and state. But this does not deter an increasing number of thoughtful Americans from reviewing the history of the rise of our present system, and speculating upon how our society can correct some of the serious consequences of allowing so essential a department of the social order to be left to chance events and influences. There was no intelligent and conscious statesmanship put into determining the status of religion in American society. It may be too much to expect that the fathers of the republic should have assumed this exceedingly delicate charge, in addition to their sufficiently difficult task of building a democratic political state. But their sons will be very dull if they do not realize that this neglected task still remains to be attended to. Our society suffers sorely because it has not been sufficiently well attended to. Even the political state which the fathers nobly and sagaciously contrived, suffers serious hurt from the long-continued neglect of the task, which was, at the time, and under the conditions, too much for them.

HURRIED REVIEW

This hurried and partial review may seem partial in a double sense of the term, in that it tarnishes the glory of eras and epochs and doctrines and programs which we have grown accustomed to think inviolate. But the Christian era has not been all Christian. Such Christian features as the western civilization has disclosed during the past nineteen hundred years have come by the infusion of motives and influences which have not waited for names and labels to sanction them. Nor have names and labels sanctified other motives and influences which left age-long trails of blackness and despair behind them. Protestantism we cannot even define accurately, and it has not produced a consistent or completely wholesome civilization. Part of the epoch it has assumed to dominate has been glorious, and part of it has been characterized by turmoil and intolerance and even un-Christian hatred. Finally, the historical events which gave us our American system of "free" churches, and the consequent multiplying sects or denominations of Christians, lay no tributes of statesmanship at the feet of either ecclesiastics or politicians. The two opposing groups contended until a truce was declared or forced, and eventually the truce was found to be so satisfactory to both groups that we have erected upon it a monument of social faith and practice.

Now multiplying shortcomings and evils of our religious order are compelling us to take new thought. The fact that we live in, and have advanced so far through, the Christian era and the epoch of Protestantism, we realize may signify little or nothing. To vindicate essential Christianity we may need to do what has been necessary again and again, in the past, namely, re-order the scheme of things under whose sanctions Christian purposes are expressed. To save our society from the fruits of neglects and over-reachings which have befallen here and there throughout "Protestant" history, we may need to resort to measures as drastic and far-reaching as any which have marked the past four hundred years. It would seem likely, even if experience had not made it so plain, that a system born under such conditions as gave rise to our American denominational program, should break down. So far from feeling alarm that this is true, and reproaching the "radicals" who suggest measures of relief, we should muster a courage worthy of the fathers in essaying to order aright what they were too busy in safeguarding our political liberties to attend to.

ANALYSIS NECESSARY

To analyze the shortcomings and difficulties we suffer in our religious order, and to suggest the logical steps by which we may meet the issues which everybody sees are there to be faced, is the manifest duty of Christian leadership. No one, however maliciously disposed he might be, need go out of his way to uncover difficulties and defects. They are among the commonest complaints and laments of both the secular and religious press. We are not agreed as to the degree of their seriousness. But we all are sure that something serious is the matter with our churches and the cause of religion. We are proud of our "free" churches, as over against the rigid and formal religious institutions of other Christian lands. We believe a better type of Christianity and Christian civilization results from our kind of organization than from theirs. We herald our mounting figures of additions to church membership, of contributions to missions and other benevolent causes, and gain periodic reassurance from the zeal implied by the bewildering variety of church agencies and activities. But nobody remains satisfied. Our most exalted leaders in all denominations scarcely mount a platform for public address but that they sound a warning. The most glowing reports of advance on mission fields and triumphs of churches at home have proved so little capable of quieting the general doubt and anxiety that nobody remains unaffected by the prevailing bewilderment. It is not possible to scare the lions out of the way by asserting that they are not there, nor will it suffice for us to huddle up at the farthest point on the road to which our courage will carry us, and vent our anxieties in blaming the conditions upon one another, or the devil, or the pope, or the appalling indifference of fallen human nature to things spiritual. Brave men will follow a braver course, face the facts and seek a way through or around. And this we ought to be able to do, whatever are our differences of opinion, in the most friendly spirit of cooperative thinking.

TWO CONCLUSIONS

Two conclusions we cannot retain our reason or self-respect, and reach. One has already been set aside: we cannot revert to clearly outworn programs, and merge our religious institutions in a dead and formal officialism. The freedom of religious faith which has been achieved, partly by accident but very much, first and last, by the brave insistence of far-seeing fathers, we shall never surrender. And the other delusion we shall certainly avoid is that which has at least for the moment bewildered many Russian leaders. Religion has not been rendered effete by democracy. Some kinds of religion, some institutions of religion, are doubtless bound for the discard through the advancing triumphs of popular education and popular government. There will not be place in a democratic Russia for a czarist orthodox church, but religion, pure and undefiled, is not the "opiate of the people." Religion must prove the inspiration of the best achievements of democracy, and the bond which holds men in the indissoluble brotherhood of mutual and unselfish service. It is because our American democracy is reaching out and up toward such wide and exalted achievements that the ineffectiveness of our religious program has become so disconcerting. The kind of churches we now have cannot serve the purposes of religion in such an aspiring society. We all feel this, and lament the fact, however bewildered we may be before the necessity of ordering differently. Through dispassionate and courageous counsels the way will be found. Religion cannot fail or be lost. But we can. Religion will guide the way to right progress and bind society in the great brotherhood of love and service. And we can give it free course.

Mr. McAfee will contribute further articles analyzing and estimating the denominational order of the church and suggesting certain principles of reconstruction. Other writers, among them Bishop Thomas Nicholson of the Methodist church, will speak in defense of the denominational order.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THERE were two books beside my friend's bed on the little table the other day when I entered his room. One was Paul L. Haworth's "United States in Our Own Times." The other was Frederic L. Paxson's "Recent History of the United States." I picked them up rather idly but soon became interested following the individual markings which showed the trail of the mind of the Lion as he had gone through these books.

"Better fifty years of America," I began to paraphrase with scant regard to accent or rhythm, when the Lion interrupted me.

"It really is better," he declared. "You read the story with a good deal of amazement even though you have lived through it. The terrific speed of the thing fairly startles you. Everything seems to be trying to happen all at once. Events seem too big for the men who take part in them. You feel as if you are watching a crowd of boys taking a joy ride on an elephant. You feel as if you are watching a crowd of precocious children let loose in a laboratory and playing with forces mighty enough to blow up a town. But there is a purpose in it all. And there is mind in it too. These children are wonderfully mature and able as organizers if they are innocent of many of the things which have given richness and ripeness to the world. They see clearly and they think directly and they have a sort of clean vigor in spite of their voices. They have the promise of youth and once and again you see a light in their eye which in its own tell tale fashion reveals what a wealth of noble idealism they will produce when once they grow out of the day of irresponsible childhood into the day of maturity."

"Do you get all that from Haworth and Paxson or do you plow it up out of your own mind?" I asked when the Lion paused for breath.

"They give me the raw material," he laughed back. "I will confess that I hand it on to you worked up a bit."

He waited a moment. Then he continued:

"The amazing thing about all these wonderful and able Americans is their invincible habit of youth. They keep believing things about which most of the world has become cynical. They keep doing things most of the world has given up as impossible. You feel as if you have been living in the twilight in Europe and now for the first time you come out into clear and hopeful day with the sun shining and the most wonderful and inspiring air blowing all about you. Of course the twilight has some fine things in it we haven't managed to get into our sunlit days. But at least we are witnessing the adolescence of a race that is coming and not the decadence mellow and autumnal of a race which is going."

"As a matter of fact, I have read both these books," I said at length. "I liked them immensely. The fact that I read most of Professor Paxson's book in a steamer coming home from Europe made it all the more interesting. But it did leave some long and serious thoughts as well as some proud and happy ones."

"You felt that the epitomizer of the ages hadn't epitomized sufficiently?" asked the Lion.

"Not quite that," I replied. "But I was struck by the omissions in both books. I was immensely impressed by the fact that men could write a history of the last fifty years and have so little to say about some things. The study of the subjects not discussed in these volumes would be an interesting commentary on American life during the period."

"I am not sure that it would be a just one," replied the Lion. "You have to read a large number of biographies of scholars and the men of letters and statesmen and preachers if you want to get a composite picture of the life of the mind in America during the last fifty years. And when you put it all together you will find that the period has been more rich and fruitful than you might suppose."

"There have been no end of rare flowers," I argued back, "but I am talking of the flowers in all the gardens."

The Lion smiled one of his happy inscrutable smiles.

"The rare flowers are getting in numberless gardens," he said. "By and by they will be blooming in all our hearts and then it will be possible to save America from the leaders without vision and the men without citizenship in the great human world."

"Precisely," I flashed back. But just then I was called to the telephone and so did not have an opportunity to follow up my advantage.

The Human Preacher

By Lloyd C. Douglas

At the risk of seeming repetitions, my instinct of self-defense enjoins me to state, again, that this series of papers is addressed to the younger men of our vocation. To the old-timer in the ministry, the advice herein contained will be as coals carried to Newcastle. In the article following this I wish to consider the minister in the delicate and beautiful relationships of the sick room. But before pressing the button at the front door of the house where we are to make our "sick call," I would like to pause and make a few observations concerning the attitude of the minister toward his congregation in their week-day relationships. And I wish to write in such a fashion that not my minister reader alone, but my lay reader also may find benefit in what is said.

Most people, in our time, are disposed to say that they like a "human" preacher, by which they mean their preference for a man with whom they can talk without restraint —a man full of jovial kindliness, ready wit, and an unreserved spirit of comradeship. And because the young preacher knows that this is the case, he is tempted to become just a bit more chummy and confidential with certain of his parishioners than is necessary to his qualifications as a "regular feller."

Now and then, some youthful prophet needs to be warned against an attempted insulation of himself against congenial contacts with the members of his parish; but not many men, entering our profession, today, are in jeopardy of paying the penalty of recluse habits or monastic mood. If any caution is in order, here, it must plead for more quiet reserve. He is very fortunate to whom there has been vouchsafed the gift of wit and a keen appreciation of humor; but when this fact becomes the chief attribute predicated of him by his friends, the more serious functions of his minority are rendered difficult. I take no personal pride in the fact that I am a solemn old owl. Doubtless it were better for me if I knew more funny stories. Sometimes I have almost envied my colleague of whom the neighbors said: "Oh, our new preacher, Reverend O. B. Merry, came to call, the other night, and he certainly is a brick! L-a-f-f? We all howled!" But there is a temptation for the witty new preacher to become slightly stampeded by the maudlin appreciation showered upon him; and, unless he practices a fine restraint in the indulgence of his delightful gift, he may live to recall, with humiliating abasement, the occasions when he had played the buffoon and clown. There is a happy middle ground somewhere between depressing solemnity and riotous foolishness which the preacher will do well to locate. In his endeavor to avoid wearing the gown and cowl, it is not necessary that he should put on cap and bells.

For a whole millennium and a half, the rank and file of Christian laymen held the priest in more or less veneration. The man in the cassock was an ambassador of God. True; we disposed of the priesthood, in the churches of protestantism. An organized revolt against sacerdotalism ordained "the universal priesthood of all believers." But, for all that, not enough time has elapsed for "race memory" to fail in its recurrence to the age-long belief that the spiritual head of a parish is, somehow, a man set apart. Let the young minister bear this fact in mind. The public will appear to want him to be exactly like the layman. Great applause will reward his every exhibition of "humanness." They want to see him with his coat off. And, just because they want to see him with his coat off, there must be some pretty good reason for his keeping it on until the hour arrives when there is a tremendously good reason for his taking it off. Everybody seems to have a strong desire to get back of the stage to see how the storm and lightning effects are produced; but once he has done so, the inquisitive is never again quite as deeply stirred by these phenomena.

AMBASSADOR OF GOD

The young minister dares harbor no silly notions to the effect that he is expected to assume a "thus-far-and-no-farther" attitude toward his lay friends; but he should be aware that the less his parishioners know about his choice of breakfast cereals, the weight of his underwear, the name of his favorite hair tonic, his aches and pains, the habits and customs of his private life, etc., the more effectively he will serve them in the grave emergencies of their lives when they look instinctively to him for spiritual guidance with an expectation probably far in excess of his actual ability to exercise the same.

It is best, then, not to talk very much about yourself, your little likes and dislikes, your plans and hopes, or your former exploits, in college and elsewhere, regardless of their character, whether they are to be pointed to with pride or viewed with alarm. It is extremely hazardous, also, to talk about your wife and children. The quaint remark that little Bobby made to his sister Geraldine, in the course of a juvenile theological debate, may be delightfully funny when you tell it; but the chances are too many that by the time the merry quip has been passed through the sixth translation, it shall have taken on a solemn air and ponderous proportions. And your wife's decision that it is cheaper, in the long run, to buy tinned peaches than to can them herself, may be a moral issue of great heat and four dimensions after the narrative has been manhandled for a week. Your reminiscence of the boyish prank you and three other fellows played on old Professor Darius Powder may evolve into a felony which, had justice been served, would have jailed you for life. I hope I do the saints no injustice. For the most part, they are the best people on earth. But they like you so well that everything you say is of interest. They try to repeat your best yarns about yourself to the neighbors. The neighbors, equally interested in you, endeavor to spread these tidings. By and by, somebody, whose affection for you is under somewhat better control, takes up a mangled fragment of your minstrelsy, and yelps it so discordantly that you, when you hear it, call down imprecations upon your own head for being so foolish as to load your enemy's gun and wait his leisure to pull the trigger.

Be wary about extending confidences to intimate friends, in the parish, concerning administrative matters. You must not tell anybody about your disappointment that the board of deacons had not seen fit to o. k. your request for a more expensive contralto. You might consider it perfectly safe to explain your position in the matter to the musical Stafford family, who put you up to it; but it is not safe. The Staffords are very nice people. They would cut off a hand rather than do you damage. But they are human. I would not imply that you are to discredit the ability of anybody in your parish to keep a secret; but if is so much wiser not to have secrets. You will sleep better o' nights if this is your fixed policy. Incidentally, you might let your wife have a chance to share your feeling on this subject. You will find it to your advantage to avoid talking too freely about parish problems in the presence of Robert and Geraldine. They are only little children, and you cannot expect them always to show, by tactful silence, a more excellent judgment than you yourself displayed when you gave them custody of private information.

PARISH CONFIDENCES

Don't talk too much about the details of your business. Don't confide to Brown how you intrigued the friendship of Smith. Never tell anybody anything that was said to you in the course of a conversation in which a confidence was extended. Understand me—I do not mean that you might be so unwise and unethical as to violate a confidence. I mean that if, in the conversation with John Jones, which he opened by telling you that he thought of selling his car because his wife was leaving to spend the winter with her parents—a conversation that he continued by telling you the sad fact that he and Mary hadn't been hitting it off very well and heartily wished there might be some other solution than a separation—if you should be so injudicious as to remark to William Robinson, next day, who is looking for a car, that you think John Jones is ready to dispose of his—and Robinson goes to Jones and inquires—and Jones asks Robinson where he heard that the car was on the market—he may have reason to wonder how much more you told Robinson, in confidence, concerning your mutual friend.

Nothing that ever happened at a funeral is funny. Whether you are a fundamentalist or not you may put this down as a fundamental. This is a hard-and-fast, seven-days-in-the-week, eternally true principle—there is nothing humorous about a funeral. You may think you can recall circumstances in your own experience or related to you by other preachers out of their experiences where something happened at a funeral. But you must never repeat any story—real or fictitious—anywhere, of anything that ever happened at a funeral, calculated to provoke a smile; for you have no way of knowing that you will not be back, within a week, in that very house where your yarn made such a tremendous hit, trying to offer comfort to a family who recall that you found it possible to see something funny in a funeral. All such jokes are absolutely taboo!

HUMOR AND NEAR PROFANITY

There is a certain school of humor which depends pretty largely upon either real or near profanity for effective ornamentation. You will do well to avoid repeating any stories which involve the use of profane phrases. There are a host of undeniably witty stories based upon quaint perversions of Bible texts; but you tell them at the risk of making it difficult to repeat such texts correctly in the pulpit without arousing the memory of certain people there of the good story you once told in this connection. I recall, with some chagrin, a bit of attempted facetiousness I committed when referring, in a sermon on present-day morals, to the discussions concerning the scanty dress of the period. I said the woman appeared to be "taking little thought for raiment." It was considered extremely good, as many jokes have the credit of being, which are about two points nor'east of good taste; but it was a long time before I felt quite up to repeating seriously in the pulpit, certain golden phrases from the Sermon on the Mount. The story of the little boy in Sunday school, who offered as his scriptural contribution for the day, "Many are cold but few are frozen," had better be told by somebody other than yourself if you expect, some day, to avail yourself of the services of one of the most significant statements in the New Testament.

Before convincing you that your conversation is to be "Yea, yea," and "Nay, nay," with literal exactitude, let me speak briefly concerning a more profitable type of communication. You are to be loaded to the gunwales with stories about people you have known. You should be in possession of a wealth of narratives for the sick room, concerning the fine type of "Christian sportsmanship" displayed by people under heavy fire. As your experience increases, you will be able to remember the case of the man whose physician had just given him ninety days to live and who sent for you, not to condole with him, but to tell him how he might most effectively invest his last three months in high-grade service to his fellows. You can very tactfully tell the chronic neurasthenic the story of the woman you knew who spent her last eleven years in bed, hopelessly crippled with rheumatism, practically dead except for her beautiful mind; and how men and women, singly and in groups, used to visit her for the sole purpose of sitting for a little while in the presence of so radiant a soul.

PROFITABLE CONVERSATION

The admonition you might heartily wish to extend to your friend and parishioner, the manager of the wheelbarrow factory, concerning the human elements in industry, can easily avoid any appearance of impertinence if projected through a narrative. Having called at the office of Mr. Scroggins, the wheelbarrow man, and having exchanged with him the usual greetings, you will talk about fishing trips, in which he appears to have a great interest; this will remind you of a fishing trip you once had on the Au Sable River, near Grayling. You will tell him all about the trout hatchery up there, and of the interesting Hanson family, who originally planned and financed it for the benefit of sportsmen. This will set you to talking about "Old Man" Hanson, who owns practically all the lumber industries in Grayling and for forty years has kept so close to his men that he sustains a first name acquaintance with them; how Mr. Hanson still continues to go about with baskets of jellies and other goodies, visiting convalescents in families of their employes; how there is a little heart-to-heart conference every morning at nine o'clock of the foremen connected with all the shops—in which each man is asked for suggestions and advice concerning the proper conduct of the business as a whole. You can tell him truthfully that there never has been a strike in Grayling and never will be so long as the "Hanson brand of Christianity" is working on full time.

Plan your talk so that when you leave a place the people you have seen will know but little more about you and yours than they knew before, but are possessed of a new idea about themselves and their possibilities.

And this brings me to say, that a minister should plan carefully in advance, the conversations with the people he proposes to call upon. Every call should involve a specific errand. He should be able to propose some specific form of service—possibly to be rendered through the church, but not necessarily so; or carry some message fraught with the raw materials, out of which his lay friend may fabricate new courage and a more sturdy faith. It will be well to keep constantly in mind the motive set forth in that significant verse of Ella Wheeler Wilcox:

> "I gave a beggar from my little store of wealth some gold:
> He spent the gold, and came again, and yet again;
> Still cold and hungry—as before;
> I gave him, then, a thought—
> And through that thought of mine,
> He found himself—the man supreme, divine.
> Fed, clothed, and crowned, with blessing manifold—
> And now he begs no more."

[Mr. Douglas' next article will be entitled "The Sick Call."]

For Him who Calls his Heart his Own

FOR him who calls his heart his own,
No song have I to sing;
Yea, he shall walk the world alone
Through every haunt of spring;
And where the rose lifts up her head
About the lanes of June,
No soul shall listen for his tread
At morn, nor under moon.

And when the sere leaves fall, and fly
Like ghosts before the wind,
He, like to them, shall wander by,
And not a solace find;
His breast shall be a chamber cold
And cheerless as the day,
His only friend a miser old
That, grumbling, turns away.

Missions and the Education of China

CHINA is turning to republican government with only 15 per cent of the population literate. Some one has said that her choice lies between a benevolent autocracy and democracy; but there is no such thing as a "benevolent" autocracy, and there can be no all inclusive democracy until there is popular education. Her choice is rather one of direction. In what direction will her evolution be—toward an autocracy which would of necessity be militaristic, or toward a democracy which rests on a rapidly developing system of education?

The times are ripe for a military genius to seize power as an autocrat. The ferment of revolution always affords such opportunity and military regimes have set themselves here and there all over the land. It is quite possible that the issue was settled when Wu Pei Fu defeated Chang Tso Lin before Pekin. General Wu promises democracy and progress, and with such men as himself, President Li, and Sun Yat Sen in the forefront of affairs the signs of the moment point in the direction of democracy.

China began turning from the old to the new in education after the Boxer rebellion and the surrender of the old Empress Dowager to the inevitable. The real beginning came with the revolution, led by Sun Yat Sen, in 1911. The task of setting up a public school system for 400,000,000 people is stupendous under any circumstances; when it is complicated by a provincialism and conservatism that is unsurpassed and by a period of revolutionary break-up, it becomes a work of generations. To find more than 4,000,000 in the schools at the end of a decade, with a more or less complete blue-print of a national system in hand augurs success.

Missions and Education in China

The missionaries served as pioneers of education in China as they have in every non-Christian land. The first schools were part of the evangelistic enterprise but the present schools cover every field of modern education and are conducted without reference to membership in the church like the church schools in America, that is, they are educational rather than evangelistic agencies. Of course their chief emphasis is upon character building through Christian instruction but they seek to make educated Christian leaders rather than merely converted men. The sum total of the educational enterprise in missionary hands is little less than marvelous. There are more than 200,000 young people in all grades from the kindergarten up to the university receiving instruction in practically all the professional and vocational subjects given in the United States.

As the government develops a public system of education the missions plan to withdraw from all but the cultural and character building types of instruction and special training for religious work. The latter, to the members of the educational commission of the recent Shanghai Conference, means anything in the world but sectarian service. Already three-fourths of the higher grade theological schools are cooperative or union schools, and the goal is a thoroughly cooperative and unified system of schools, distributed over the various provinces without duplication or schismatic instruction. The commission asks that schools near each other be combined, the poorer ones closed, and foundations for new ones made without special reference to denominational enterprises.

Missionary education has been pioneering but it will continue to pioneer only so long as there are no governmental schools to meet the needs. Vocational and technical schools are conducted as a means of stimulating government or private foundations. The nation needs schools of mining, agriculture, medicine, law, and all the other professions and skilled vocations, hence the missions attempt, not to meet the national need but to stimulate the demand and furnish the example. Emphasis is being placed upon medicine as fundamental to health and social progress, upon agriculture as a means of lifting the masses out of poverty and giving the new order a material foundation in prosperity, and upon the training of teachers as a means of assuring instructors for the coming school system.

Sinicizing Christian Education

The educational commission bases all its recommendations on the thesis that education in China shall be Chinese. They are decisive in their determination to see that missions shall not foster an exotic group of westernized folk in China. They are against all parochialism. They desire to preserve every valuable element in the native culture and to "sinicize" Christianity as well as Christianize China. To that end they recommend that native teachers be employed to the fullest possible extent and that salary scales be raised as rapidly as possible, that the curricula be arranged upon lines accommodated to Chinese culture as far as it can be done and still include all that science and modern education require, and that the missionary educator retire as rapidly as competent Chinese can take his place, not only from teaching but from executive positions. Beneficent as foreign instruction has been, the barrier of language and of another tradition exists; instruction in a foreign language leaves the student thinking more about the meaning of words than of their content; and a foreign instructor can never quite orient himself in the full mental environment of the native student.

The new national system of education is founded largely upon the Japanese model. There is a primary, middle and higher or collegiate division. The primary division is divided into an elementary school of four years and an intermediate department of three years. The middle school covers four years, paralleling our eighth grade and junior high school, and the college supplies two years' preparatory and a full four years' collegiate course. The commission recommends to the country the adoption of a division into six years each of elementary and middle schools with four years of higher education, as best fitted to Chinese needs. They are especially desirous of promoting normal instruction and hope that the more primary instruction will be rapidly supplied by the public schools. They wish to take for their own work the middle school, where the impressionable adolescent can receive instruction in character, patriotism, and social service.

Christian Education and Social Progress

There are three great emphases in present day Christian work in China. They are unity, education and social service. The educational commission emphasizes these three things as do all the other commissions. The desire of the leaders in the Chinese church, both missionary and native, is, first to convert men to Christ and then to turn them into emissaries of social progress for the whole people. They are not seeking merely to save a few souls out of the welter of that world but to build a Christianized civilization within it. To this end they are working to make Christian education a socializing process.

They say frankly that if the new China comes without endowing the leaders with better social motives than those that characterize the industrial and commercial systems of the west it can bring ruin to multitudes. They point out to the native church that the western church has been remiss in its social teaching and that it has not made the term "Christian civilization" a synonym for Christian ethics. They hope to preserve family reverence, community solidarity, the philosophical idea of a moral unity in the universe, the cooperative feature of the guild system, and the pacific spirit of the people in the New China. From the west they would bring science, a face to the future, and a spirit of progress without the militaristic regime, the over-vaunting individualism and tendencies to exploitation which have denied Christianity its full expression in our western social life and progress.

Science is the contribution of a Christian civilization to the world only in so far as the Christian teaching about the worth of personality and the value of truth seeking have availed to promote freedom of inquiry. But Christianity in China bases social progress upon the achievements of science and scientific methods. It brings medicine, practical charity, sanitation, physical education, engineering, agricultural instruction, and every scientific attainment of the west among its gifts. It would have the Chinese learn to use them and receive their benefits without allowing the reactionary attitudes of a by-gone church to prejudice their attitude toward Christianity. It would give them material progress without an accompanying lop-sided materialism. It would preserve for them the principles of the Great Master without imposing upon them the "ologies" of western traditions. It will succeed in the measure in which the hands of the men who know China are left unfettered of our "isms" and institutional restrictions.

London, Oct. 9, 1922.

AFTER a few more crises (and hitches between) we are once more told tonight that we can look forward to peace in the near east. These crises have proved a little trying to our tempers. We—I mean by "we" the nation—are decidedly angry with the statesmen who have been responsible for our policy in the near east, because this policy since 1918 has been chiefly the Premier's. The word appears to have gone forth that he must go. "Ll. George M. G." is the decree of Lord Rothermere, the successor to Lord Northcliffe, of Mr. Strachey of The Spectator, and of Mr. S. L. Garvin of The Observer. Furthermore, Mr. Bonar Law, the former leader of the Conservative party, wrote a significant letter last week, a letter which is read by some as a sign that he is prepared to come back as premier if the office is to be let. So altogether Mr. Lloyd George is in deep waters. He may fight for his position, or he may advise the king to send for another statesman to form a government. I give my prophecy for what it is worth. Unless some very startling change takes place in the near east, I do not think the premier will surrender his office to another. He will hold on till the election. But even he can scarcely believe at the moment that the country is with him. Give it time, he may think, and much may happen before the election.

Humiliations

Great Britain at the moment is decidedly short of friends among the nations. In the west and in the east our credit has sunk seriously since the armistice. And during the past month for several reasons we have lost ground in the near east. In China we are considered the friends of the Japs, and we share in the sullen suspicion with which the Chinese regard their neighbors. In India, and throughout Asia Minor to the Balkans, we have to face the hostility of Islam. In Europe we have still the smoldering anger of our former enemies and the distrust of some of our former allies. These are the facts: they may be due to our virtues or to our faults, but they have to be faced. At the moment there is a desire to make a scapegoat of Mr. Lloyd George. But of course no one man can bear all the blame or enjoy all the credit of such a state of things. There must be some cause which goes deeper in the roots of our national life. The suspicion is growing that the peace, made after the war, was not only ethically unsound, but politically foolish. It was not peace, but the transference of war from one plane to another. But we desired it, and it is scarcely fair for a nation which voted the present government into office on the understanding that Germany must pay and the kaiser must be hanged to throw all the blame upon its chosen representative. The kaiser is going to be married, and it is not Germany but we who are still paying five shillings in the pound income tax! Therefore, we are saying with some vehemence, "Lloyd George must go." We are in reality tragically helpless.

The Congregational Union

The meetings last week appear to have been full of life, and the speaking clearly reached a high level. There was no mistaking the power of Dr. Jowett. His great speech will have been reported in America so that I need not repeat what he said. Dr. Jowett is rapidly becoming a foremost apostle of peace, and after many years of supreme power in the pulpit he is winning a new place for himself on the platform of international idealism. The papers gave his speech unusual prominence, and it is a matter for thankfulness that there is this gifted speaker to put passion into the advocacy of peace. Mr. Yates, chairman, spoke with his characteristic grace and lucidity upon vocation. There was an animated meeting upon "business and religion," and my friend, Mr. Belden, came in for hot criticism from certain business men. He was told "to keep to his last," but it is too late in the day to warn Christian preachers off this field. There is always a stage when the spokesmen of the church, as it faces new demands, are warned off the ground. By all means let the church be willing to profit by the counsels of its business men, but upon the ethics of business life the church through its instructed speakers has a right to make its voice heard, and when all is said and done, the business men sometimes discuss the peculiar interests of the preachers!

Criticism of the Church

In a frank discussion of the critics of the church, the Rev. "Dick" Shepherd has been making some needful counter-attacks. He points out the contradictions, involved in these criticisms: "The church has failed—because it has ceased to be Catholic, because it has ceased to be Protestant, because during the war the clergy did not fight as combatants, because some of them did, because the clergy are too immersed in practical affairs, because they are too immersed in what they call "matters that are spiritual," because there is too much dogma, because there is not enough, because the clergy are all of one class, because the clergy are not of 'the type they used to be.'" The writer adds words to which many of us will say a loud and fervent amen. "I grow more and more skeptical of that mass of men which is supposed to be standing in the ante-room of organized religion only waiting to pass into the fold until such time as the churches are 'brought into relation with modern needs and thought.' For some it is more attractive to be in opposition than to accept the responsibility of service which is demanded of those within."

An Historic Shout

We cannot hope to hold our own in this country with America in the matter of shouts, ordered and concerted shouts. But on Saturday last the 60,000 Scouts who welcomed the prince, gave the biggest shout heard in these islands since time began. As I looked at them closing at the signal upon the platform where the prince was, I confess that I felt thrilled. Here were 60,000 boys, pledged to the Scout law, strong and clean and full of laughter. What might they not do for our nation and for the world! And these were but a small section of the brotherhood, so I wished that instead of being a sober chaplain to my troop, I could be amongst that charging crowd, to whom the future belongs. The prince looked bronzed and did his part as cheerfully and whole-heartedly as he always does. B. P. was there and a number of the famous—ambassadors, seers, and others—and it was good to see them, but the memory which remains clearest is that of the vast host of boys and their shouting. What a shout! It would seem as if the walls of any Jericho would fall before it. It was on a Saturday, and the busy minister had four services on the Sunday, but he did not grudge the hours spent in the rally.

"The Lord of Thought"

This book has already received notice in the columns of The Christian Century. It is certainly a book which counts. There are several reasons for this. It represents in New Testament criticism a strong reaction against the interpretation of the gospels by the apocalyptic school of which Dr. Kirsopp Lake is so powerful a member. It is a plea for the intellectual consistency of the teaching of Jesus. He who taught men to forgive their enemies could scarcely be responsible for any teaching, which thinks of God as a God of vengeance. Moreover, the book is a fine plea for the missionary enterprise as the sublimation of patriotism. That is a splendid truth. Here are the words: "An instinct may be deliberately sublimated, that is, consciously directed into a worthy channel, so that it makes for itself an expression which is of service both to the individual and to the community. The sublimation of patriotism is to be found in the missionary spirit which, with no thought of the glorification of its own church, qua church, is filled with the enthusiasm of a message and a vision which it desires to see the property of the world at large."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jesus, the Great Teacher *

A DIAMOND has many facets. Turned, it flashes in every color, catching every beautiful ray of light. In four studies, we are considering four angles of Jesus' service: as a physician, as a teacher, as a friend and as a missionary. These are only a few of the countless expressions of Jesus' personality. As physician, we see him graciously caring for men's bodies. As teacher, we see him bringing illumination to men's minds. As friend, we see him attracting the entire person to himself. As missionary we see him going to carry the good news and sending forth his healed, enlightened and saved disciples to the ends of the earth to win others to the Master.

Today, it is as teacher that we view him. Think of those teachers to whom you are most indebted. Out of the scores who have touched your life the majority are forgotten, only a few stand out; only a few have left lasting and enduring influence. Some were not interested in you, but only in salary—they were a curse; some were not interested in you, but only in pure knowledge—they left no enduring mark. Some, however, loved to teach and loved teaching because they loved boys and girls. We call them natural teachers. They love their work as all the best artists do. All creative souls toil not for money, for honors or material rewards. One day Millet stood, with his wife, looking in at a shop-window at a picture, which he had recently sold. Both were silent. Both felt alike. Presently the wife spoke: "That picture is not worthy of you." "I know it," he replied, "but you know we needed the money." Again silence, then she pressed his arm. "We can starve," she said quietly, "but we can never paint a picture like that again." From that hour Millet put his soul into his work and his next picture was "The Angelus," a picture that has touched the soul of the world—simple peasants bowing while the evening church bell rings.

We have already seen that a doctor cannot yield to the mercenary temptation, no more can a teacher. In fact, all professions and eventually all work must be lifted above the money motive. This message should be preached from every pulpit and taught in every Bible class. There is no more reason why business men should work for money while teachers toil for service, than there is for a doctor to hold one standard and the trader another. If the double standard of sex morality is passing among intelligent people, so the double standard of work-motive must pass. Service and nothing but service must be the driving motive of all work.

We are cursed by wooden teachers! People of low motive, scant education, selfish ideals. I have seen children's lives almost wrecked by such cynical, uninterested pedagogues. Occasionally, however, we come in touch with the genuine teacher. Loyola founded the teaching order of the Jesuits. One night he stood, as the bells sounded midnight, on a hill in Paris and dedicated himself body and soul to God. Soon after we hear him saying: "The power of the church lies in teaching; if God will confide only one boy to my care I shall be content." Soon he had a school of boys, not long after hundreds of teaching friars. The time came when princes sat in his schools. This is the secret of the Jesuits' phenomenal influence. A teacher must have personality. I lectured last week before a group of young people, who by the most careful tests had been chosen to become teachers. Not only mental brightness, but personality was demanded of these prospective teachers. The superintendent of this school is a genius—he knows teachers. A teacher must, in addition to knowledge of the subject, possess an unusual interest in the pupil. That brilliant university professor who said to his class, "I do not want any of you to speak to me on the street—my relation to you is purely that of instructor," was no teacher. I can give you his name and address! You can easily recall the teachers who have inspired you. I can recall six or seven in all my career in grade school, academy, college and university; nor would I overlook two or three exceptionally helpful Sunday school teachers. Jesus had every quality of the supreme teacher. He was master of his subject, his personality charmed and inspired, he loved his disciples, he burned himself up in service, he created, in his followers, the desire to imitate the Master. Surely he was the "Great Teacher" and we all will do well to sit, humbly, at his feet, listening for the pearls of wisdom, and catching the spell of his supreme personality.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Press and Public Information

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I rise from the absorbed perusal of Alva W. Taylor's article on "Anti-Labor Propaganda" in the issue of September 21, with a sense of the utter helplessness of the American public in the face of the perjured special dispatch writers of our great daily papers. In conversation with an ex-member of our California legislature, who helped Hiram Johnson clean the state of Southern Pacific boodle politics some dozen years ago, I asked him how it was that our belligerent senator managed to beat Moore by over 70,000 in the late primaries, when press reports indicated such a tidal wave of desertions from the ranks of the voters. His reply was to the effect that not one anti-Johnson paper in the state of California was honest enough to tell the truth about the whirlwind campaign which Johnson conducted. Mendacious reports of small attendance, lack of enthusiasm and wholesale withdrawal of support filled the columns of such papers as the Los Angeles Times and San Diego Union. Quite the opposite was the truth. One particularly despicable piece of slander was bruited about with much glee, to the effect that Johnson had stood for vice conditions in the San Francisco exposition, and that Moore was the man who had cleaned up the fair. Figures of previous elections were made up out of whole cloth to prove that Johnson's strength in certain quarters of the state was purely fictitious. Highly paid special writers produced whole columns of malicious matter highly prejudicial to the character of Senator Johnson.

Quite irrespective of the question whether a voter proposed to support the senator or not, the reading public of California was entitled to the facts, and certainly did not get them—until the day after election when the ballots spoke louder than the paid propagandists. That nobody who knew the Los Angeles Times and San Diego Union believed a word they wrote about the campapign is a shameful commentary upon the moral character of those two papers.

For weeks the same journals declared that the railroad strike was broken, the railroads victorious and the strikers all back at their jobs or their places all taken by intelligent, high-minded scabs; yet day by day paid advertisements have appeared in these same journals, calling for machinists, oilers, boiler-men, etc., "under strike conditions" to work on the Southern Pacific, Union Pacific and Santa Fe.

If it were not too shockingly unethical, it should provoke a merry laugh, to note how blunderingly stupid said papers are.

Historic Russian Hospital

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the city of Moscow, some two miles from Kremlin, is a hospital which promises to be the scene of one of the most important and beneficent chapters in the history of American relief in Russia. This is the historic "Old Catherine Hospital," which had its beginning in the reign of Catherine II. It was my happy fortune, this past summer, to visit this institution as a member of the committee of the American Medical Aid for Russia. I found it to consist of several large buildings—administration and dispensary, surgical, obstetrical, etc.—together with smaller buildings, all on a plot of ground, eighteen acres in area, consisting of beautiful park land, with trees, grass, flowers, and open pasturage. The hospital had some 400 beds, with accommodations for 450 workers. In happier days it provided for a total population—patients, physicians, nurses, orderlies, servants, etc.—of more than 2,000 persons. The grounds are now rough and unkept, and the buildings in disrepair, several of them mere ruins. Equipment is old and broken, and supplies inadequate. In the obstetrical wards, I saw scores of mothers lying on bent and rusted iron beds, without sheets or pillow-cases, and covered only with strips of burlap, old shawls, portiers ,and what not.

During the past year the American Medical Aid for Russia, organized under the direction of a group of distinguished American physicians, raised a fund sufficient to purchase a hospital equipment adequate for a first-class institution. The following have been bought and are being shipped to Russia as rapidly as possible: operating room; laboratory for clinical, pathological, and bacteriological work; X-ray department; drug store; disinfecting apparatus; complete equipment for bakery, kitchen and laundry; ambulance and 500 beds fully equipped. The Society has sent to Russian equipment and donation in kind approximately $60,000.

Under an agreement formulated between the Moscow health authorities and the society, the old Catherine hospital is now being put in first-class repair by the Soviet authorities and placed in charge of the American Medical Aid for a period of one year. Having already equipped the hospital as described, the society agrees to provision both patients and staff; meet all the running expenses of the institution; supply it with an abundance of first-class material; install American methods of administration, nursing and treatment; and in general maintain the institution as a modern hospital of the highest standard. At the end of one year, it will be returned to the Soviet health commission of Moscow as the model hospital of the city.

For this great work, the sum of $200,000 is promptly needed. My colleagues and I are agreed that such an undertaking initiated in the name at once of American science and beneficence, will make an irresistible appeal to our fellow-citizens and enlist their generous support. It is to be noted that the Russians are doing their part in placing buildings and grounds, fully restored, at our disposal. We in turn bring to the relief of people just emerging from years of cold, starvation and disease, and still in dire distress, the full equipment and personnel of a modern hospital. To thousands of men, women and children, we shall give immediate health and healing; and by our example of model hospital administration, set loose an influence in Russian life which will be a blessing for generations to come.

Local groups of the American Medical Aid for Russia are being organized in the great cities of the country for the raising of funds. The officers of the organization are: Mrs. Henry Villard, Chairman; Arthur S. Leeds, Treasurer; Frances Witherspoon, Executive Secretary. The National Advisory Committee of scientific men includes such distinguished names as those of Dr. Charles H. Mayo, Dr. M. J. Rosenau, Dr. Lewellys F. Barker, Dr. Haven Emerson, Dr. Harvey Cushing, Dr. Morton Price, Dr. M. W. Ireland, Dr. Joseph Goldberg, Dr. Walter B. Cannon, Dr. Jacques Loeb, etc. Individual contributions are solicited, and may be sent to the American Medical Aid for Russia, 103 Park Avenue, New York.

The Ku Klux Klan

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I rarely write to the editors of the papers I read but I feel much constrained to do so in this case and tell you how heartily I approve of the stand you are maintaining regarding the Ku Klux Klan. The letter of "Ti-Bo-Tim," in the issue of October 19 is enough in itself to make a man feel that such an organization as that which he represents cannot possibly further those agencies which bear the name of Christ and whose aim is human brotherhood. The whole tone of his note is absolutely intolerant and out of keeping with the spirit and ideals of America.

I am always amused when I read of men threatening to stop your splendid paper because your articles do not suit them. Well, you do not always say the things I think you ought to say but I love and admire you all the same and make your paper my birthday gift to my thinking friends. You see, your paper would be of no service to those who do not think. Not one of the several good papers that enter my home weekly has laid me under such obligation as has The Christian Century, and my case is typical of many others known to myself. Go right on and speak your mind and we will back you in any effort to eliminate this tomfoolery that works in secret and seeks to terrorize the helpless. I cannot for one moment imagine the Christ acknowledging such an organization.

Southern Methodist Law on Dancing

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In a recent article commenting on one by Dr. Tittle, Dr. F. N. Parker says: "The only rule in the Southern Methodist church regarding worldly amusements is a general one. That is, admonishing our members 'against the taking of such diversion as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus," leaving the specific application to as wide a range as this general rule may cover." In an article called forth also by Dr. Tittle's, Dr. E. B. Chappell writes: "We have no other law in regard to amusements except what Dr. Tittle calls 'Wesley's sane admonition against taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus.' " It would seem that both of these brethren are in error with reference to dancing between the sexes. This is an actionable offense under the existing law of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The bishops of the church are the authoritative interpreters of the law and their constructions are recorded and are binding upon all committees of investigation and trial. Their ruling as to dancing is found in paragraph 763 of the disciplines of 1922. It is as follows: "Dancing. It is contrary to the spirit of the discipline and of the New Testament to teach modern dancing or to practice promiscuous dancing, and such a case comes under the rule of the discipline forbidding 'improper tempers, words, or actions.' " This decision as to dancing was made in 1858 and has never been modified by the bishops. It is true that until about a decade ago there was a standing pastoral address of the bishops against worldliness in which they named dancing, card playing and theatre-going as amusements in which, in their opinion, Methodists should not engage. This address was substituted by one in which only general terms were used but this did not operate to change the above quoted authoritative interpretation of the discipline as forbidding dancing between the sexes.

The Tariff as a Peace Instrument

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Let us reorganize our theory of the tariff. Let America use it as a practical and powerful instrument for international disarmament. We will then enforce a high tariff, both export and import, against any and all nations which do not disarm. With progressive disarmament will come progressive reduction of trade restrictions. Those nations which join us in abolishing the facilities for mass war we will join in mass free trade, and with no others. A zollverein of peace and trade, in which all the incentives of good neighborliness will have free play. Trade is legitimate and a necessity; mass war is barbarism and we will make the one outlaw the other.

To accomplish such a high purpose will require the focusing of the disinterested powers of public opinion, the press, the church and social institutions. America will challenge the plotting old world chancelleries much more than in the Washington conference. The tariff, now the fattener of the privileged, would then become an international lustrum. The financially impecunious nations of Europe could take it or leave it; but they would have to take it, and disarm. A high tariff, for good-neighborliness, a shining social asset standing off mass war; decreasing, vanishing when no longer needed as each nation comes into good relations. A new rapprochement between America and peace-minded peoples. Automatically, along with the decreasing tariff to those who disarm, would be a prohibitive export and import tariff against those who are preparing mass war.

It may be objected: Our theory of the tariff is not altruism but income; or, the tariff is not a national but a party policy. To which we may answer: When the soul of the people is aroused, old shibboleths will give place to ideals. America will not participate in the league of nations, but she must find a way to exert herself powerfully in restraint of mass war. Mr. Harding is committed to it. And is not he the most potent of potentates; while he serves? We set before him a plan to bring about a new association of nations, definite and freed from campaign verbiage. Everyone will know exactly what is meant. Of course, congress stands in the way of a tariff with a halo, but "What are they amongst so many!" as Tiny Tim would say.

Cleveland, O. ROBERT E. LEWIS.

In Defense of History

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I beg leave to differ with the view expressed in your editorial under the caption "Too Much History." No nation was ever injured by too much history, but both nations and individuals have been injured by too little. For about a score of years I have been a close student of American history and have often been amazed and chagrined at the stuff that is palmed off on us as history. Most of our school histories are more or less misleading. It is not true that "The Fathers" were, on the whole, a superior class of men. Not a few of them were far from being the models of virtue and probity they are popularly supposed to have been. Not a few of them engaged in transactions that would have disgraced them in our day, if nothing worse. If the men who were in charge of our government from about 1850 to 1860 had known the history of the slave trade there would have been no sectional war because they would have known that a conflict in which slavery was an issue would end in its abolition. The famous decision of Lord Mansfield about 1762 was the beginning of the end and from that date the governing classes in England began, for the most part reluctantly, to prepare for its abolition. I listened to many speeches during that decade and never once was that phase of the question touched upon. It was propaganda and not history that plunged Germany into a ruinous war less than a decade ago. For a whole generation previously, the youth of that country were given heavy doses of propaganda, bowdlerixed history, and taught to believe it was the "real thing." We have no guide for the future except the experience of the past and as our personal experience does not extend very far we have to rely on books. The more genuine history our young people know the better for them and their successors.

Preposition Makes Real Difference

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your account of the Episcopal convention, October 5th, there is an error which as a deputy to the convention I beg to correct. You state that "The house of deputies adopted a motion which inserts in the order of communion a prayer to the virgin Mary." The prayer was not one to the virgin Mary but one in which the grace and virtue of the virgin with the saints are commemorated, namely, "for the grace and virtue declared in thy saints from the beginning of the world in the blessed virgin Mary, and in the holy patriarchs, prophets, apostless and martyrs, etc."

Moreover, though passed in the house of deputies this prayer was afterwards deleted by the house of bishops and later with this action of the bishops the house of deputies concurred.

Dr. Abbott Passes Away

America lost one of her foremost journalists and theologians, when Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Outlook, died on Oct. 22. He has been active on his journal until the past few weeks, which is remarkable in view of his years, for he would have been eighty-seven years old in December. He has talked familiarly about death in recent years and called it "the last great adventure." Dr. Abbott was the scion of a famous old family of New England and lived true to its best traditions. Educated for the bar, he was early interested in theology, and in 1860 became pastor of the Congregational church of Terre Haute, Ind. He was also pastor of New England Congregational church of New York, and when Henry Ward Beecher died, Dr. Abbott became his successor for nine years. It is in the field of letters, however, that Dr. Abbott was most distinguished. He wrote continuously on religious themes in the Outlook and early espoused the social view of Christianity. His "Theology ot an Evolutionist" and "The Evolution of Christianity" are still consulted in theological libraries. He wrote a life of Christ, a life of St. Paul, and a life of Henry Ward Beecher. The last is one of the best accounts of the great preacher of Brooklyn. In later years his writings have taken a more devotional and mystical turn, though ever true to the liberal presuppositions on which he built his faith. His character was marked by singular serenity of spirit. He has enjoyed the friendship of great men, not the least remarkable of which was his intimacy with Theodore Roosevelt. His sons, Ernest and Lawrence, continue his work in journalism.

Veteran Episcopal Rector Closes His Work

Having reached the age of seventy, Dr. James S. Stone, veteran pastor of St. James' Episcopal church of Chicago, has resigned to make place for a younger man. During these arduous years of service in which he has seen his parish change its racial complexion many times, Dr. Stone has sought ever to adjust himself to changed conditions. Secular newspapers have commented cynically on the pension of six hundred dollars a year which he is to receive from his denomination, but Dr. Stone has hastened to silence the critics by assuring them that his congregation will never allow him to suffer financial distress.

Bible Sunday Will Come Late in November

Even the Bible Society has brought its message into dramatic form this year, and is proposing to furnish the churches an exercise called "Undelivered." A small leaflet in colors has been issued for distribution to the people. The churches are being asked to observe Bible Sunday as the time for preaching upon the place of the Bible in modern life. The society takes an offering with which to extend the circulation of the scriptures.

W. C. Pearce Greets Fellow Disciples in Chicago

W. C. Pearce, a secretary of the World's Sunday School association, returned to Chicago from his world tour on Oct. 24, and within a few hours was addressing a group of fellow Disciples in the annual meeting of the Chicago Christian Missionary society. He spoke of his observation in many parts of the world, and expressed his conviction that only the understanding and putting into practice of Bible truth would solve the world's ills. The convention sessions extended two days during which the various departments of the Disciples work in Chicago had their innings. The attendance exceeded that of any preceding year. Dean W. E. Garrison reported on the work of ministerial training at the Disciples Divinity House. The women are laying their plans to cooperate with the national campaign for a wom-

American Board Meets in Evanston

FOR the first time in thirty years the American Board has met in First Congregational church in Evanston, Ill., giving Congregationalists and others in this area an opportunity to attend the sessions. The great church was filled for the four days of the conference, and various special luncheons and dinners brought together large groups.

The speeches were of high order, and to select from them is invidious. However some of the themes discussed were of peculiar timeliness and interest to the general public. The near east is in the center of the world's vision these days which made the Wednesday morning program of great significance. Rev. Ernest A. Yarrow and others insist that the half has never been told of Turkish brutality. To set this forth, Mr. Yarrow told of exploring a valley last spring where two thousand dead bodies are unburied. They were covered with snow during the winter and were mostly the bodies of women and children with occasionally the body of an old man. These people had been herded into a valley and brutally murdered, but this atrocity was never mentioned in the press. He told of groups of people being driven into the churches and done to death with axes. When he demanded that the American government do something about these atrocities, the whole audience gave mighty applause. His message was greatly reinforced by that of a native, Mr. George C. Michaelides of Smyrna.

Rev. Kenneth S. Beam of Tokyo gave an account of the misinformation that one nation secures of another. In a single week Tokyo saw the films, "O Mabel," "The Toll of Sin," and several of the most sensational and erotic films produced in America. In consequence many Japanese believe that family morality in America is practically nil. On the other hand the missionary interviewed a business man in New York and discovered that this man believed that all Japanese were liars and dishonest. The speaker asserted that the greatest need of the time was a news agency that could make goodness as interesting to past, and which could give each nation of the world a true conception of the life of its neighbors. That Japan is really changing was made plain by Rev. Marion E. Hall, who said he found a place where the statue of an old stone god has been replaced by a picture of Theodore Roosevelt!

Financial receipts for the past year fell off and though the board had a large debt which it hoped to reduce, the debt is now still larger. The secretaries threaten that they will have to close up a whole mission in order to eliminate the debt. The total receipts for 1921 were $1,967,496.35, compared to the 1922 receipts of $1,901,079.36. There was a large loss in the church receipts and individual gifts, but since the legacies were much larger than for thirty years past they helped in considerable measure to save the day. The increase of legacies this year as compared with the previous year was more than $80,000. The woman's boards, which are three in number, operating in the east, middle west and extreme west, are an important element in the situation as one can see by examining the receipts from this source, $557,306.58, which is included in the grand total given above.

Secretary Cornelius H. Patton reports that 53 missionaries were appointed during the past year, 34 for life service and 19 for term service. One of the peculiarities of missionary recruiting is that there is a dearth of ordained missionaries to do the preaching. The young people who enroll seem to prefer other branches of the missionary service. In the Congregational denomination 207 missionaries are supported directly by particular churches or individuals.

A ringing challenge was given the Christian world in the statement that no American board missionary needs to write home for instructions what to do with any union proposals on the foreign field. They are given carte blanche to go ahead with any project of this sort. No more liberal position toward union of mission churches on the foreign field has been taken by any board in America. The Congregationalists do not seek to Congregationalize the non-Christian world, but to Christianize it.

an's fund of a million dollars to meet present exigencies on the foreign field. A symposium on city work was held in which Dr. William Clyde Smith of the Presbyterian city board participated. The various types of city churches were set forth in addresses by the various pastors. Although the Disciples in Chicago do not have a strength corresponding to that in the nation, Secretary Rice prophesied that the addition in the next twenty years of a million and a half people to the population of Chicago would give the Disciples their opportunity.

American Catholic Hierarchs Meet

The archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic church in America recently met to consider the problems of the church in this land. The Catholic Welfare council, a social service organization which has been under fire, was approved, and will continue its work. It was agreed that social service work in general should be given greater prominence in the program of the church. A committee was appointed to draw up a statement to the American people on the attitude of the church toward the public school. Plans were laid for the better care of Catholic students at state universities. Twelve national and more than twelve hundred local organizations of men are now federated, and put under the direction of the hierarchy. A similar merger of women's organizations has also been effected.

Recounts Progress of Open Air Gospel

Rev. Mark Williams in a recent article in a secular paper tells the story of the remarkable increase of street preaching in the east in recent years. This summer Rev. John McNeil preached in Central Park, and Rev. Henry Van Dyke read his poem, "The God of the Open Air." A. B. Trania has conducted open air services this summer under the direction of the Brooklyn federation of churches. Among others the Bosworth brothers preached in a tent in the metropolis all summer under the direction of the Christian Alliance. Mr. Williams makes the following interesting observation about the quality of the preaching he has heard: "My conclusion as to the open air and tent meetings of New York is this: They have brought the gospel into the open air, but the gospel is still a very much enclosed individualistic and unpoetic affair. If Jesus preached today in the open air, he would have given us a hundred new, creative parables and stories from the picturesque life of our own day. We have gone back to the manner of the scribes and Pharisees. We preach from lines and precepts and texts. We appeal to old things in a world brimming with new things. Surely the gospel of the open air should be a spirit of greater freedom, and as new as the morning should be the appeal of the new heavens and the new earth. Of course, the matter remains the same as human need is the same, but the manner should not be that of grandfather's tales, mumbling reminiscences, but the adventures of faith to hidden treasure and uncharted worlds. Still challenges the religion of the open air, which gray walls cannot prison nor somber Puritanism blight. Surely we need the sunlight, the wind from the heath, the lightning from the mountain, the larger liberties and excellencies of a wider and healthier faith."

Y. M. C. A. Will Face Fundamental Issues

The very basis of its organization will be put under the microscope at the international convention of the Young Men's Christian Association at Atlantic City, Nov. 14-19. Local associations are now electing delegates to the meeting, and several thousand men will assemble at Atlantic City in November. For many years there has been a question whether the Association should limit its membership to the members of evangelical churches, a discussion which will be opened up again this year. There will be an impressive exhibit of charts and pictures which will set forth the work of the association. Dr. John R. Mott will preside over the meeting, and some eminent leaders of work among men will take part in the program.

Want College Men to Pledge Service

The officials of a number of missionary societies have set out on the quest of young men who will devote a year or a part of a year to idealistic service before entering upon their business or professional career. Among the religious organizations presenting this appeal in the colleges are the Disciples of Christ, United Brethren, Southern Methodists, Northern Baptists, and the Quakers. The plea is presented to the young men that they have been maintained by society in school while others labored and that they owe in return something to the community. The Quakers already report the signing up of four men for a whole year of donated service. This service may be rendered in any kind of community work, or in specifically religious work.

Intercommunion Between a Number of Churches

The long quest of the Anglican communion for a recognition of their order by the Eastern Orthodox church has at last been rewarded with success. All national churches that recognize the authority of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Moscow, Jerusalem, Antioch and Alexandria will henceforth practice intercommunion with the Episcopalians. Similar arrangements have been set up with the Swedish Lutheran church and the Old Catholic church. A commission has been appointed to work out the details. The following is the form of the concordat: "We do solemnly declare our acceptance of the sacramental acts each of the other, and that they are true and valid. And, holding fast to the truth once delivered to the saints, we pronounce that intercommunion is desirable and authorized for all our members wherever and whenever it is deemed convenient and practicable by the proper local ecclesiastical authorities."

Dr. Tipple of Rome is Touring New England

Rev. Bertrand M. Tipple, president of the Collegio Internazionale Monte Mario, of Rome, recently addressed a large mass meeting in Greater Boston. He is in this country to answer the question, "What is the Methodist church doing in

German Lutheran Churches Unite

THE Protestant reformation produced as many different denominations as there were separate political units, and when these political units were later welded into the German empire, there was no corresponding church union. Various princes served as the heads of these state churches. At Wittenberg on May 5, 1922, occurred the dramatic end of this long era of division and inefficiency. A federation of the various ecclesiastical bodies was formed, with sufficient elasticity to allow for the variety of practice which is found in the German churches, and Dr. Moleer was selected to be the first head of the united church. The heads of twenty-eight church governments were present, as well as the minister of public worship of the imperial government. A public procession moved through the streets of Wittenberg to the old church of Luther. The legal document which consummated the agreement was placed on a table brought from Luther's study and this table was placed between the graves of Luther and Melanchthon. The delegates came forward and signed the paper, adding some quotation from holy scriptures. Wreaths were placed upon the tombs of the great reformers. Handel's "Hallelujah" and Luther's 'Ein Feste Burg" brought the service to an emotional finale.

When the news of consummation of the union was telegraphed throughout Germany, the church bells rang all over the nation. The Lutheran church was pronounced spiritually dead by many observers before the war. Freed from the bondage of state control, there has come since the war a great increase of popular devotion to religion. Those who advocate an Erastian church can only be humiliated at the results secured in Germany during the past four hundred years. The young people of the German churches have organized several societies which would correspond loosely to the Christian Endeavor and Epworth League movements of this country. The theological seminaries are now achieving a new freedom in their work and young men are once more presenting themselves as candidates for the ministry of the church. The church of Martin Luther will yet be heard from in the council of evangelical forces which faces world problems.

Rome?" He has lived in Rome for thirteen years, and on account of his service to Italy has been twice knighted by the king. During the war he carried relief to thousands of needy families in the peninsula. The college he has founded is not on one of the seven hills of Rome, but is to the north of the city, a direction in which the city is growing. It attracts Protestants, Masons and other emancipated groups in Italy, and is growing in clientele as rapidly as the equipment permits. Dr. Tipple will remain in this country until the first of the year.

British Societies Torn By Controversy

The device employed by the conservatives in American denominations to make the missionary societies pass upon the moot theological questions of the denomination has been carried beyond the sea, and at the present time a number of British societies are in serious discord. Conservative Baptists charge that the officials of the Baptist Missionary society are unfaithful to the gospel. The London Missionary Society has been compelled to send a deputation to India to investigate charges that the missionaries are issuing hymns and prayers from which the name of Christ has been deliberately removed. The Church Missionary society has the most serious disagreement since the extremely orthodox in its constituency profess to find "the poisonous fumes of modern teaching finding their way into the ranks of the C. M. S." These wish not only the officers of the society, but also the missionary candidates, to subscribe to a belief in the infallibility of the Bible, but strangely enough they propose to make an exception of the first three chapters of Genesis. The Dean of Canterbury has resigned as vice-president, and other of the more moderate evangelicals have also resigned. A committee has been appointed which has the delicate task of trying to bring together the various angles of sentiment.

Trotzky Out Against the Church Again

The Bolshevist regime has a stiffened backbone since Lenine has recovered his health. Leon Trotsky is making public speeches at Moscow once more in efforts to recruit the red army. His favorite objects of attack are the church and the British navy. Concerning the former he said recently: "Religion is a mustard plaster. It postpones but does not cure trouble. Religion is poison, and especially during a revolutionary period. We must approach youths with propaganda of atheism, because only atheism shows the place humanity must occupy in this world."

Next Disciples Convention Goes to Colorado Springs

The next annual international convention of the Disciples of Christ will be held in Colorado Springs, Colorado, September 4 to 11, 1923. When the convention met at Winona Lake, last August 28 to September 3, the decision as to the time and place of the next convention was left with the Executive Committee of the convention and a special committee on time and place, with power to act. Hot Springs, Ark., Jacksonville, Fla., and Birmingham, Ala., as well as Colorado Springs pressed their invitations upon the convention. Rev. Graham Frank of Dallas, Tex., general secretary of the convention, reports that the invitation of Colorado Springs was accepted at a recent meeting of the responsible committees in St. Louis. Especial interest attaches to this next convention as several questions of importance that were discussed at the Winona Lake convention were referred to it for decision. The United Christian Missionary Society of St. Louis, the Board of Education of the Disciples of Christ, of Indianapolis, the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, of Indianapolis, and the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, of Baltimore, Md., hold their annual meetings as parts of the international convention and make their reports to it.

British Presbyterians to Have a New Hymn Book

The Presbyterian church throughout a large section of the British empire is to cooperate in the production of a new hymn book. The Kirk in Scotland and the United Free church have already appointed committees on which one finds the names of some of their greatest leaders. Dr. J. A. Hutton and Prof. Moffatt are among those representing the United Free church. The Presbyterian church in Ireland and in England will cooperate, as well as in New Zealand and South Africa, which will insure the new book a wide circulation.

Theological Students Increase in Scotland

During the war and afterwards there was a great dearth of theological candidates in Scotland. The tide has turned, however, and the committee of the United Free church reports that in the entrance class this fall there are fifty candidates for three colleges, many of whom are M. A. men with good standing in their studies. Among the students are a number of men who are sons of the manse, which also represents another swing in the pendulum. Following the war the wave of cynicism and skepticism that passed over the world made all recruiting hard, but sturdy Scotland is rapidly finding herself again in this new world.

Dr. Carroll Studies Religious Journalism

Dr. H. K. Carroll, who is known for his work in compiling religious statistics, has recently made a study of religious journals. In 1880 there were 268 papers with a circulation of 2,091,866. In 1900 the number of papers had increased to 410 and the circulation to 4,805,433. In 1920 the number of papers had decreased again to 354 while the circulation increased to 7,000,928. This seems to indicate that the present tendency in religious journalism is in the direction of fewer and better papers. A part of the increase of circulation is attributed to the tendency of ministers these days to subscribe for journals outside their own communions in order that they might have a knowledge of the wider activities of the kingdom of God. Dr. Carroll rates the Presbyterians and Methodists high in the support of their denominational press.

Theological School in Harvard University

The formation of the Theological school in Harvard University by the fusion of Andover and the Harvard Divinity school has helped to put Harvard back on the theological map. A noteworthy faculty is headed by Dean Williard L. Sperry, who is also professor of sacred rhetoric. Prof. Fenn is Bussey professor of theology. Prof. George F. Moore and Prof. Edward C. Moore, and Professors Arnold, Evans, Ropes, Lake and Jewett, are eminent men in their fields. The attendance the first year is gratifying, with forty-one men majoring in the institution, and forty other men of the Methodist and Episcopal schools near by taking part time work. The law suit pending against the infant foundation is treated lightly by the authorities who claim they were well advised legally before the merger was formed.

Meadville Theological School Will Be Moved

For a long time there were persistent rumors that Meadville Theological school would be moved from Meadville, Pa. and it was suggested that it would come to Chicago, where a Meadville house had been established. The trustees have however chosen to locate it adjacent to Cornell University at Ithaca, N. Y. This school has splendid endowments, but in recent years has had hardly any students. Many of the Unitarian ministers are drawn from the evangelical denominations rather than from the Unitarian seminaries.

Methodist Community Church On Long Island

The Congregationalists have long since provided hospitality for community churches that wished some kind of denominational attachment without giving up their independence. Such churches may become associate members of the Association and ministers of other communions serving such churches may become members of the Congregational association. The Methodists are organizing various community churches with a loose attachment to the Methodist denomination. At Jackson Heights, Long Island, is such a church which serves a community with a thousand families, mostly Protestant. The corner stone was recently laid for a building which will cost $150,000. Members of twenty different denominations are working side by side in this organization in happy comradeship.

Methodist Minister Gets to Conference without Carfare

Lack of carfare to travel five hundred miles to conference did not daunt Rev. L. A. Powell, a Methodist minister, who is engaged in missionary work in central Wisconsin, for he went five hundred miles to Decatur, Ill., to attend the conference by hailing automobilists and asking for rides. He was seldom refused when the driver heard his story. It is this quality in a Methodist preacher which has made him in the past such a power in the religious life of the nation.

Ministers of the Nation Remember Prison Sunday

Prison reform has been long promoted, but all too slow progress has been made. The war has revived some well-nigh forgotten attitudes with reference to punishment, and many of the prisons of the nation are still in a barbarous condition. Oct. 21 was designated as Prison Sunday,

CHILD TRAINING

¶The problems parents face in the training of their children are specific. The American Home Series of pamphlets deal with definite problems, which are discussed by experts. The Series is invaluable as an adjunct in child training, as it recognizes sound principles of civil, moral and religious education, and makes practical application of them.

The following eight pamphlets of the series, having a close relationship to each other, are grouped together:

THE FIRST YEAR IN A BABY'S LIFE—William Byron Forbush.

THUMB SUCKING—Harriet Hickox Heller.

THE EDUCATION OF THE BABY UNTIL IT IS ONE YEAR OLD—William Byron Forbush.

FIRST STEPS TOWARD CHARACTER—Frederick W. Langford.

THE SECOND AND THIRD YEARS—The Literary and Educational Staffs of the American Institute of Child Life.

THE EDUCATION OF THE CHILD DURING SECOND AND THIRD YEARS—The Literary and Educational Staffs of the American Institute of Child Life.

and on that day the ministers preached on crime prevention. The Central Howard Association of Chicago, which aids individual prisoners, provided literature for that Sunday.

Ministers Differ on Sunday Races

Sunday automobile races in Kansas City on a recent Sunday brought an avalanche of protest from evangelical ministers, some of whom condemned racing in general while others were concerned about the violation of the Lord's Day. Ralph C. McAfee, executive secretary of the Kansas City Council of Churches, declared that the speedway had been dedicated "with the life-blood of Roscoe Sarles, and in a manner that is nothing short of an affront to God and the good citizenship of America." The Unitarian minister on the other hand declared himself in favor of Sunday sports, including the races, and asserted that a Sunday automobile race is better than a Sunday poker game.

Community Church in Minnesota is a Success

No one is charged with the promotion of Community churches, but they continue to spring up in widely separated sections of the country. Two years ago at Grand Rapids, Minn., the county seat of Itasca county the Methodists and Presbyterians united for religious worship. A little later they were joined by some Baptists, and Rev. John R. Parkes, a Presbyterian minister, was called as pastor of the new church. Now this community of 3,500 souls has only one church in place of the usual order, involving nine or ten little competing churches. During the past year a $40,000 house of worship has been erected. The church has taken in 160 new members in two years, has a Sunday school of over 300, and a seven-day program in support of a social ministry as well as a ministry of preaching and prayer meetings.

Generous Retirement Fund for Secretaries

The Y. M. C. A. has perfected provisions for the care of aged secretaries which are more generous than those of any religious denomination. A secretary is retired at sixty, and on retirement he gets half salary. The new order cuts off a number of secretaries who are still strong in their work, but they have accepted the situation philosophically, insisting that the Y. M. C. A. should always be a young man's organization. Mr. H. A. Cozzens who is retired from the general secretaryship of the city association of Newark, N. J., will devote himself henceforth to the promotion of the ministerial relief fund of the Presbyterian church.

Congregationalists Get Out Service Book

The growth of liturgy among the free churches has been often remarked of late. The commission on worship of the National Council of Congregational Churches has recently gotten out a manual which is called "The Book of Church Services," and is similar to the Book of Common Prayer of the Episcopalians and Common Worship of the Presbyterians. While the new manual is published by a Congregational commission there is nothing in the book to indicate that it is a denominational publication, a fact which prepares the way for a somewhat larger use of the book than the merely denominational.

German Conference Merged with American

The Methodists have a considerable work among the German immigrant peoples of this country, which is bearing fruit for the Northern German conference, which recently made application to be received into the Minnesota conference, thus breaking down a language distinction. German sermons will continue in many of the churches for a time, but there is recognition that foreign language churches in this country cannot last more than a generation or two. This group of Germans is wiser in its attitude than are some of the Lutheran groups which resist Americanization.

Church Federation Adopted in Europe

The federation of religious denominations as practiced in America is an idea which has been adopted in many European countries. Germany has a Federal Council, recently created, which not long since received a message from the American churches. Probably the French have gone farther in Protestant cooperation than any other country, for the French Protestant Federation has brought about a union in foreign mission work, and in the conduct of the theological schools. Although there is no federation in Belgium, the existing Protestant denominations cooperate, recognizing the new Methodist organization which has been created since the war.

Seek Funds for World Conference

Plans for the approaching World Conference on Faith and Order are embarrassed by the lack of funds to meet the ordinary promotional expenses. Sixteen thousand dollars a year will be needed for three years. An apportionment has been made in the hope that the cooperating bodies might officially underwrite the expense. Disciples, Methodists and Presbyterians are asked for one thousand dollars a year. Congregationalists are asked for $750 and the Baptists for $500. The Protestant Episcopal church of America assumes five thousand, the largest sum asked of any body. The church of England is asked for only five hundred.

Religious Dramatizations the Order of the Day

In many sections of the country there is a fresh interest in the dramatization of Bible scenes. Primary Sunday school groups and junior societies find it a method of engaging the attention of youngsters, and the lesson is acted out rather than taught by the oral method. Rev. W. A. Fite, pastor of Central Christian church of Kansas City, announces that he is preparing a dramatization of the book of Esther. He has interested a local Masonic society in helping him. Pageantry as a method of presenting missions and gospel themes is also being cultivated in many sections of the land.

Godless State Universities a Myth

Many can still remember the solemn speech about the godless state universities which was often made in Christian churches on educational day. The figures are to be had now as well as the observations of many of the greatest religious leaders of the land, so that every intelligent person now knows that the godless state university is a myth. From seventy to eighty per cent of the students are church members or church adherents. In a state where the Protestants are 37 per cent of the population, 75 per cent of the students come from this group. The following paragraph from the bulletin of the University of Vermont is typical of the attitude of state universities: "The university, although it has no official connection with any particular denominational body, endeavors to develop an earnest appreciation of ethical and social obligations, and encourage participation in religious activities. University services under the direction of some eminent clergyman are held occasionally on Sunday during the college year."

Bible is Now a Special Requirement at Harvard

The colleges have made great advances in recent years in their recognition of the Bible as a subject for special study, and now all Harvard graduates who specialize in language and literature will be required to know Shakespeare and the Bible in a special way. The Harvard Graduates Magazine reports the policy in this way: "We may not find it practicable to require that students who specialize in mathematics or chemistry shall study the Bible, either before or after they come to college, but to the undergraduate who professes an interest in literature this requirement may well be applied. President Elliott once defined an educated man as one who knows his own language well. Nobody who does not know the language of the English Bible or Shakespeare can rightfully claim to know the Saxon tongue."

Unified Religious Work at Ohio University

Although in some state universities each of the larger denominations is able to support a student pastor, in most of the churches this is not true. At Ohio State university four denominations now cooperate in the support of a student pastor who is also connected with the Y. M. C. A. organization, thereby eliminating denominational competition in religious work. There is also a committee on Student Relations and a Student Council.

Ohio Churches Will Hold Institutes on Church Methods

Ohio Christian Missionary society of the Disciples fellowship conceives its task as the development to greater efficiency of the churches now existing, rather than a continual process of intrusion into over-churched communities. The secretary, Rev. I. J. Cahill, has arranged for church workers' institutes to be held in five cities of Ohio during the month of November. In these institutes the development of the local church in

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity
Hymns of Social Service
Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

missionary interest, religious education, social vision and young people's work will be the primary interest. Some effective speakers have been secured for the institutes, among whom are Miss Cynthia Maus, Rev. Stephen J. Corey, and Prof. A. W. Taylor.

Union of Two Evangelical Denominations Achieved

The two Evangelical denominations were represented by their general conferences on Oct. 17 at Detroit and in the joy of their reunion they voted to expunge from the records all mention of the split thirty years ago. Four bishops of the Evangelical association, and one of the United Evangelical church were reelected. These are bishops S. O. Breyfogle, C. Heinfiller, L. H. Saeger, S. P. Spreng, and M. T. Maze. The sixth bishop to be chosen was I. F. Dunlap of Central Pennsylvania conference. Thomas Bowman is retired at the age of 84 from active service as a bishop. Thus ends a division which centered in ecclesiastical politics which has weakened the evangelical denomination greatly in recent years.

What is The Daily Altar?

IT IS A GUIDE and inspiration to private devotion and family worship. Presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these hurried and high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost. this beautiful book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

The authors of the book are Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison.

ESTIMATES OF THE BOOK

The Christian Advocate: This compact volume will be very helpful in the stimulation of family worship. a grace that has been a diminishing factor in the family life of Amerca for some time. It will be a great advantage to the religious life of the nation if this asset of faith and prayer can again become effective among us. And this book, with its excellently arranged selections for each day, will be of large assistance in that direction.

The Homiletic Review: If we are to meet, successfully, the great and growing number of problems in this eventful time, it is necessary that the quiet hour of meditation be observed as never before. For only a mind nicely poised, only a spirit daily enriched and nourished and guided by an unselfish purpose can adequately meet the situation. Every aid, therefore. to thoughtfulness and prayer should be welcomed, as we do this manual before us. It has been prepared "with the purpose of meeting in an entirely simple and practical manner some of the needs of individuals and households in the attainment of the sense of spiritual reality."

The Presbyterian Advance: For meeting the need of those who would enjoy the privilege of daily prayer, but scarcely know how to begin, the authors have prepared this excellent and beautiful book.

The Central Christian Advocate: Beautifully bound, this book with its tasty and neat appearance, prepares one for the equal taste and care in its contents. Of all books for devotional use, this one in appearance and contents cannot be too highly commended.

The Christian Standard: The binding and make-up of the book are beyond all praise.

The Christian Evangelist: This book is beautifully arranged, handsomely bound and typographically satisfying. It should be a real help toward restoring the family altar.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D.D.: "The Daily Altar" is a bit of fine work. It certainly provides something to grow up to. Unlike many books of devotion, it is free from pious platitudes and pays the highest respect to the intelligence of its readers. Its devotional spirit is pervasive.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor Emeritus The Christian Evangelist: The book is happily conceived, happily worked out and most beautifully bound.

Recent Books of Unusual Merit

The Nature of Scripture

By Prof. A. S. Peake

"So far as criticism is dominated by rationalism or seeks to dissolve those historical facts which are vital to the very existence of Christianity, so far I also disavow it. The only criticism for which I care is the criticism which has an open eye for the actual phenomena of Scripture and so great a reverence for truth as to accept the conclusions to which these phenomena direct us."—From author's preface. ($2.00.)

Progress in Religion to the Christian Era

By T. R. Glover

These lectures are unique in that they bring before us in one glorious sweep of historic vision the religious development of the Greek, the Roman and the Hebrew peoples as a preparation for Christ's coming. ($2.00.)

Religion and the Future Life

Edited by E. Hershey Sneath

The ten contributors are well-known scholars, among them Professor Breasted, of the University of Chicago; Professor Jastrow, of the University of Pennsylvania; Professor B. W. Bacon, of Yale, and Franz Boas, of Columbia University. The volume is the result of a remarkable seminar conducted by the editor at Yale for the purpose of studying the history of the belief in life after death in religion and philosophy. ($3.00.)

The Revelation of John

By Arthur S. Peake

Dr. Peake is generally acknowledged as one of the greatest theologians in Europe, and his latest book is a complete justification of that high distinction. A scholarly, spiritual and poetic treatment of the Apocalypse for Bible students and Christians everywhere. "Certainly one of the sanest and most instructive books on the subject," says London Quarterly Review. ($2.50.)

A Literary Guide to the Bible

By Laura H. Wild

The author, who is professor of biblical history and literature in Mount Holyoke College, holds that there is now needed such a book as this, which will help the Bible student so to realize the art and beauty of Biblical literature that he can read it along with other world masterpieces. Chapters on Folk Lore, Historical Narratives, Poetry, Drama, Biblical Oratory, etc. ($2.00.)

Creative Christianity

By Professor George Cross

This work, by Professor Cross, of Rochester Theological Seminary, is a contribution toward reshaping inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us, so that the coming generation, nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today, may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs. ($1.50.)

The Quest of Industrial Peace

By W. M. Clow

This book, by the author of "The Cross in Christian Experience," begins with an analysis of the causes of the present industrial unrest and describes the massing of the conflicting forces. It gives a sympathetic exposition of experiments attempted in correcting industrial troubles. It closes with a constructive message in which the Christian ideal of relationships in society is outlined and applied so as to find the only path to industrial peace. ($1.75.)

The Iron Man in Industry

By Arthur Pound

Here is a refreshing modern argument for such education of our industrial workers that they may be equipped profitably to enjoy the leisure with which the automatic machine—"the iron man"—now provides them. To his wide experience as laborer, manager and employer, Mr. Pound adds an imaginative quality which lends an unusual interest to his book. ($1.75.)

The Preacher and His Sermon

By J. Paterson Smyth

The author of "How We Got Our Bible," for many years a professor of pastoral theology, here presents the ripe fruitage of his wide experience and observation. This series of lectures was delivered before the students and junior clergy in the Divinity School of the University of Dublin. ($1.25.)

The Open Fire and Other Essays

By William V. Kelley

Of these fifteen essays, the two on Robert Browning alone are worth the price of the book. "In Dr. Kelley's mind," says The Christian Century, editorially, "we have a true wedlock of evangelical piety and the noblest spirit of the Renaissance. Here is a spirit rich with the fruits of years of patient reading over the whole field of human thought." ($2.00.)

The Son of Man Coming to His Kingdom

By Principal Alfred Gandier, of Knox College
Toronto

"Jesus did not live in a vacuum," says Dr. Gandier. "To understand his life and teachings we must know something of the religious, moral and intellectual atmosphere in which he lived and moved—and of this the Jewish Apocalypse formed no small part." A frank discussion of the meaning and value of the Apocalyptic hope. ($1.25.)

What's Best Worth Saying

By Richard Roberts

Ten addresses, delivered for the most part to college students. The titles are: "On Creeds," "Of Faith," "Of Evil," "Of the Cross," "Of Jesus," "Of God Above and God Within," "Of God as a Society," "Of Spiritual Freedom," "Of the Joy of Life," "Of Love Among the Ruins." ($1.25.)

Is Liberalism Losing?

The achievements of the past three years are superficially disappointing.

The nations of the world, after a war to end war, are still enmeshed in the toils of the old diplomacy and the pre-war militarism.

The Manchester Guardian

tells you what the liberal mind of England is thinking about the serious problems of today. Week by week it has an unbiased discussion of international politics, a complete presentation of important general news from every country, and a full book review that keeps the reader posted on the best in current literature.

Given an hour or two of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly will keep a man's knowledge of the world in repair and enable him to be an authority in that subject in which it tells most to be an authority—one's own times.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN, Ph.D.

By far the most popular theological book ever sold by The Christian Century Press.

Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, says:

> "I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking."

And Dr. Douglas C. McIntosh, professor of theology in Yale, says:

> "What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

The Wistfulness of the Crowd

IN the church publicity conferences held last week in Chicago Dr. William L. Stidger of Detroit made a profound remark about the great throng on the street. "You can safely count on their wistfulness," he said. "The preacher does not need to create this." This is what many a church leader is tempted to doubt. The mad throngs about the amusement palaces, and the scurrying multitudes upon the street seem satisfied with themselves. But they are not. Perhaps most of those who flock to the dance halls and movie palaces are trying to forget something. The remembrance of sins committed shame and confound those individuals who seek to lose themselves in the crowd. Bitter sorrow and disappointment fill the souls of vast numbers as they measure their actual accomplishments against the dreams of their youth. The thought of the swiftly approaching end of human life may be accepted complacently by some; but for most people it is a disquieting thought. The multitude that seeks consolation in the darkness of the spiritualistic seance bears testimony to the wistfulness of men of our generation. The throngs that give attention to very dry and abstract Christian Science lectures is a further revelation. The evangelical churches have spent too much time trying to create a market for their spiritual wares. The market is there, but the wares are often of pitiable quality. The wistful multitudes have fed upon the sawdust of ancient dogmas. This hungry throng goes out from a sermon on apostolic succession, the second coming or baptismal regeneration with empty hearts. Materialistic and formal conceptions in religion are rejected by the great mass of both scholars and plain folk today. The wistful crowd wants the gospel of Christ, not the speculations of scholastics. Many of these people are ignorant of the very names of books and personalities that abound in modern pulpit talk. But they want to know if there is some One who can lift the burden of their sin and sorrow and weakness.

Dr. Bundesen and the Preachers

DR. BUNDESEN, the health commissioner of Chicago, has made considerable commotion recently. He arrested one diseased man who tried to get married. He has put signs of contagious disease on houses of prostitution. The facts about the horrible conditions in Chicago have been published far and wide. There is an awakened civic conscience on the part of the decent citizenship. The commissioner is now going to ministers' meetings with his story and these bodies are going on record, at his invitation, in favor of the church refusing to perform marriage ceremonies where a health certificate is refused. The Episcopal clergy acted first, later the Chicago Church Federation. The intent behind these resolutions is admirable. Every minister knows of young married people whose marriage has been a curse because of conditions not apparent on the wedding day. But the women's clubs of the city are rightly skeptical about the advisability of asking the church to carry the burden of enforcing medical inspection. Will the minister accept a certificate from any physician who writes one out? Many physicians do not know how to make the examination that is necessary. Must the minister accept some medical certificates and reject others? Furthermore, what will prevent diseased people from seeking a justice of the peace in case the minister refuses to marry a couple where one or both are diseased? It is clearly the function of the state, which issues the license to marry and which presumably investigates other matters in connection with marriage, to enforce medical inspection. That the ministers should support such legislation unanimously goes without saying, and they probably will. But ministers nowadays are very easily persuaded to become responsible for the operation of bits of social technique for which they are not fitted. Their function lies in another field than that of enforcing restrictive laws, however beneficent these laws may be.

The Response to Dr. Jowett

TIME enough has now passed to draw some conclusions as to the effect of Dr. John Henry Jowett's challenge of the church to undertake some definite reinforcement of the political influences that are working for international peace. It will be recalled that Dr. Jowett's original impulse came from Mr. Lloyd George who, while he was yet prime minister, invited him with other churchmen to breakfast where he confessed before his guests that diplomacy had reached its limit, and declared that if war was to be outlawed the forces of religion must be mobilized on behalf of peace. Shortly thereafter Dr. Jowett attended a peace conference of Christian leaders from many nations at Copenhagen. Upon his return to London the distinguished preacher issued a manifesto to which the British and American press gave the most generous and ample publicity. In words of fire this best known and perhaps most favorably esteemed English-speaking preacher of our day called upon the churches to assume their responsibility in this business which he made clear was of the very essence of the Christian enterprise in the world. One could hardly have imagined a more influential quarter from which a call of this character could arise. When Dr. Jowett's words were first read they quickened and thrilled the heart with hope that at last the inert and indifferent church would be aroused to action against the arch-enemy of every thing that rightly may be called Christian. Yet the actual results obtained by Dr. Jowett's prophetic challenge are so meager as to be unqualifiedly depressing if they did not at the same time afford such vivid instruction. The episode is full of suggestion. It shows us how impotent Christianity is through its denominational divisions when it comes to functioning on a grand scale in its public capacity as an instrument of the kingdom of God. As Dr. William Adams Brown points out in his book, "The Church in America," the church as such has no mechanism, no technique, for this kind of business. Its conscience cannot be quickened by such an appeal as Dr. Jowett's because that conscience is divided and dissipated in many sectarian bodies and has no common habitation to which a great public responsibility may be carried. But more serious than this is the disclosure of the appalling fact that the churches do not even think of their Christianity as the sort of thing that could operate to abolish war. They have so long taken orders from the state in times of national emergency, so long conceived their religion in individualistic terms only, so long habituated their vision to denominational horizons and their activities to denominational channels of local and missionary service, that a great call like Dr. Jowett's not only finds them helpless but leaves them cold.

The Public Emergence of Dr. Jowett

HOWEVER unfruitful in immediate and concrete results Dr. Jowett's challenge may be, the episode has very real significance in that it seems to bring into the arena a new and mighty champion of public religion. Not even Dr. Jowett's very dear friend, the late Professor Peter Forsyth, could have uttered more vital words on the kingdom of God—the favorite theme of his late years—than those which made up the "manifesto." Dr. Jowett's fame as a preacher has been built upon his marvelous ability at interpreting the esoteric side of Christianity, that side of it which had to do with the inner life in terms of the classic lore of Christian piety contained in our New Testament. Only the initiated could follow his preaching. On Fifth Avenue in New York it was the saints who made up Dr. Jowett's congregations. The sinner, or the man of the street, or the so-called "intellectual" from whose intellectual equipment the biblical literature had been left out, would hardly follow his sermons with understanding. Rarely was the social note heard in his preaching while Dr. Jowett was on this side of the water. Returning to England, however, at the close of the war, public moral issues have found an increasing place in his message, and since he has resigned at Westminster chapel and enriched his ministry by the wider use of his pen the need that religion shall exercise its public as well as its personal function has apparently grown more clear and more urgent to his mind. This evolution of a great preacher is a heartening chapter in the slow but sure movement of Christian faith from the closets and conventicles and temples into the teeming and burly life of the social order.

Armistice Sunday: An Opportunity

NEXT Sunday, the day after armistice day, affords an occasion and an atmosphere of expectation which every aware church and minister will improve to the utmost. The peace movement can never be made to move until it finds its inspiration in Christian faith. And while the observance of special days synchronizing with national celebrations is by no means sufficient to vitalize the church's conscience with respect to its peace obligation, the use of such days is not to be disregarded. The land should resound with the echoing words of prophesy uttered next Sunday. The materials of war are known by us all still to exist all over the world, in spite of our great war to end war, and these materials are even more inflammable in their possibilities than in 1914. In the light of the efforts that have been put forth to establish a "naval day" it is clear that even in America the lust of war is unabated, notwithstanding the Washington conference of a year ago.

The church will truly honor the nation's soldier dead, and its soldiers living, by dedicating itself to the great emprise of ending war. Our ex-soldiers themselves will respond to this note. They do not glorify war. They oathe and hate it. And they will honor the church that rejects war as a way of settling international differences. Here are two stanzas written for The Christian Century by E. D. Schonberger, which seem to us to be poetry of a high order:

The Great Armistice

The joy that leaped into thy waiting sight
From that wee bit of swaddling prophecy
When thou didst lift it on thy eager hands,
Is but a gleam to that transcendent light
That bursts my heart and loosens all the bands
Which bind me to the earth. I, too, have seen,
O ancient Simeon, and sing with thee:
"Nunc Dimittis!"

Long ages have I carried on my breast:
Not only these last years of misery,
But all the years since Jesus heard thy song—
Dark, bloody years, by bloody kings oppressed.
They seemed to crush me with their load of wrong.
Today, they say, all strife is at an end!
I, too, have prayed, and now I sing with thee:
"Nunc Dimittis!"

Bad Fundamentalist Strategy

HARDLY could the heretic hunter find a less likely victim upon whom to vent his intolerance than Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick. Yet the Philadelphia presbytery has overtured the general assembly to take cognizance of the teaching that proceeds from the pulpit of First Presbyterian church, New York City, the pulpit on Fifth Avenue where Dr. Fosdick each Sunday draws congregations larger than the famous old edifice can accommodate. It is a round-about way to proceed, as these heresy actions usually arise within the local presbytery and are aimed directly at the head of the alleged false teacher himself. In this case, however, the New York presbytery has long since grown weary of heresy hunting, and, to make the case still more awkward Dr. Fosdick is not personally a member of any presbytery whatever; he is not even a Presbyterian. The story of this Baptist prophet who was called to lead the combined congregations of Old First, Madison Square and University churches, with the saintly Dr. George Alexander as his colleague in parish activities, is well known. It has proved a providential and enormously fruitful arrangement. Minister and congregation and presbytery are in happy accord. Now comes the heresy alarum. We think it is bad strategy for the fundamentalists to pick on Fosdick. They should confine their attacks to college professors, whose academic utterances are more eosily abstracted from the less widely known moral and spiritual influence of their teaching. Such men make ideal heresy victims. But Harry Emerson Fosdick—he of "The Meaning of Prayer," "The Meaning of Service," "The Meaning of Faith," and now of "Christianity and Progress," the man who has done more than any other contemporary Christian leader to rebuild the foundations of piety and spiritual assurance in the lives of educated youths,—this will surely prove to be what the politicians call a roorback! If among the thousands who read this paragraph there is a single doubter of the Christian soundness of Harry Fosdick we suggest that he turn to that marvelously lucid and vital book, "Christianity and Progress," and read the chapter on "The Perils of Progress." If he has any shadow of doubt left it will prove that he is so incorrigibly fundamentalistic that he does not know a fundamental when he sees one.

Fighting the Prohibition Law

FROM the first it has been apparent that the constitutional amendment which made the liquor business an outlaw in the land was to be resisted with all the power of an intrenched institution, and all the subtilty of expert manipulation. This was not unexpected. An enterprise so long tolerated, enriched by enormous profits, and backed by a considerable portion of any community does not surrender without a struggle. No great reform has ever achieved immediate success. There is always a period when the reactionary forces capitalize whatever sentiment of opposition the new conditions have aroused, and the claim is made that the law can not be enforced, and must be repealed.

This is the stage of the prohibition movement through which the nation is passing. Confronted by the consummation of a generation of heroic effort to rid the land of its worst menace, and with a law upon the statute books which has already wrought incalculable improvement in the moral and economic conditions of the United States, the defenders of the old regime are promoting an almost limitless propaganda in behalf of some modification of the amendment. They face not only the gradual adjustment of the nation to the better conditions, but the awakening of Europe to the possibilities of similar action, and the spread of the temperance movement around the world.

The arguments employed by the advocates of repeal are numerous and adroit. They point to the fact that the law is being evaded by many devices, and insist that this evasion amounts well-nigh to nullification. This is, of course, a foolish and futile claim. The conditions are bad, beyond question. A traffic so long operative is not abolished in a moment by even the most energetic measures. Desperate efforts have been made without cessation to make the law inoperative. Corrupt officials have connived with furtive dealers and criminal bootleggers in supplying the stimulated demand for alcoholic drinks. Ostentatious use of liquor by men who are less interested in intoxicants than in the adventure of doing the illicit thing has seemed to many the proof of the failure of the movement for prohibition. And persistent propaganda in leading journals and by public speakers has attempted to discourage public opinion as to the effectiveness or even the practicability of the enterprise.

The present is a moment of great strategic value in the progress of the movement for an ultimately sober nation. It is a time when all the forces of morality and sobriety should stand unswervingly for the full achievement of the reform which has made such rapid and convincing progress during the past decade. The prohibitory amendment will not be repealed. It is unthinkable that the nation should consent to throw away the advantages gained by this notable step in the interest of moral solvency and economic competence. The enormous gains made in the reduction of waste, of crime, of the numbers of people who have to be supported at public expense as defectives or delinquents resulting from the use of liquor, and in other items of civic and social life are too convincing to permit an intelligent people ever to go back to the dark days of a licensed and permitted traffic in intoxicants.

But there is grave danger that under the spell of specious pleas for personal liberty and a little larger freedom of behavior the entire structure of protection so carefully built up may be endangered. It is very significant that the men who are most of all interested in the return of the saloon are making the plausible plea that they approve the law in its main features, but that it is too drastic to meet the wishes of the nation as a whole. It ought to be modified, they say, to permit the manufacture and use of beer and light wines. The saloon is gone, they affirm, and they do not wish its return; but they ask for permission to supply the demand for what they claim is a lighter and less noxious form of stimulant. This is the most specious and misleading of the arguments made in behalf of the outlawed business.

With rare exceptions the groups that want wine and beer are really working for the rehabilitation of the liquor traffic in its most sinister forms. The cry that they approve the abolition of the saloon is too transparent to deceive any thoughtful person. It is perfectly well understood that any success in the effort to permit the traffic in wine and beer is to be followed up by an opening in the wall that protects the nation against its deadliest enemy. The slightest weakening of the law in its full sweep of abolition of the evil is a fatal concession to those who would destroy it completely.

There are groups of people who honestly wish the privilege of using the lighter beverages, as they are called. At first glance it might seem permissible to allow this measure of indulgence without modifying the barrier against the stronger liquors. But there are two reasons why this is not to be considered unless the nation is prepared to forfeit all the advantage that has been gained thus far. The first is that the men who are leading the campaign for beer and light wines do not really care for this measure of modification of the law except as a means toward its complete nullification. It is the traffic in whiskey and gin that they want to see restored. The people who rail at prohibition as a puritanic and senseless restriction upon the pleasures of life are not in the least interested in the beer proposition. They are the patrons of the cocktail and the highball, of brandy and champagne. If they utter their real sentiments it is to demand the complete overthrow of restriction, and the return to the days of the saloon.

The second reason is the fact, plain beyond all misreading, that the use of beer and wines has proved as injurious to the nations that make their use a habit as the harder intoxicants. It has been the specious plea of beer and wine drinkers that the habit is harmless and even stimulating. The increasing volume of medical opinion today in Europe as well as in this country is that the continuous use of alcoholic drinks even of the milder type works the evil of slow saturation of body and brain with the toxic substances to the degree that is of equally deleterious results with those produced by actual intoxication. Medical and educational authorities in England, France and Germany are increasingly aware of the dangers of this form of national poisoning, and are wondering if America must not show Europe the way of escape. Some of our own experts go the length of saying that if any modification of the prohibition law is to be contemplated, it would better be in favor of straight liquor rather than of beer.

It is a naive and diverting claim that the saloon is gone forever, but that we should permit the traffic in malt and vinous beverages. It would be interesting to know where the business would be carried on if not in something that would have all the sinister features of the outlawed saloon. With the light drinks now dispensed so strong as to evade the law and produce intoxication where not given careful oversight, how would the licensed traffic in actual intoxicants be restricted within bounds that would be any improvement on the old saloon? It is useless to make such claims. The thing cannot be done. To keep the measure of relief we have gained the business must be kept an outlaw in all of its phases. It is impossible to avoid the evils of the saloon and still keep the institution. The business of supplying the means of paralyzing and degrading a nation's life is a crime, and can no more be made legitimate than murder or any other offense against society. It is only by treating the saloon as an outlaw, as it is now declared to be, and all who promote the traffic in intoxicants as criminals, that the moral and economic progress now achieved can be maintained.

There is really no question of modifying the law that can find standing in public discussion today. The nation has pronounced its verdict after years of conflict with the business, and after full consideration of the issues involved. Like every other reform this law must be given time to prove its workable character. There will always be evasions, as there are of other necessary laws. But the attempt to vote back the saloon is not an effort at legislation but looks to the nullification of the basic law of the land. It will not be done. But to prevent it demands the ceaseless watchfulness of all true-hearted and loyal citizens. One of the greatest curses of civilization has been put under ban in this land with incalculable benefits to all save the men formerly engaged in the business. And thousands of those are grateful that the old phase of American life has passed forever. It is no time for weak and complacent lamentation over the "good old times." That type of sentiment should be left to the kept press of the liquor lobby that still keeps up its hopes and its efforts in the face of facts.

The fight is won if the friends of decency do not allow conditions to slip. It is a marvelous thing to be able, in spite of all evasion and furtive trafficking, to rear children in an atmosphere from which the menace of the open saloon has vanished. The situation is difficult enough yet. It is no time for easy assurance. But the great steps have been taken, and all that remains is a firm and unflinching confidence in the cause, and a ceaseless effort, by every means, political, commercial, social and educational, to keep to the faith won with such heroism and sacrifice.

Shaker Fundamentalism Shaking

AMONG the numerous sects and cults and religious fads which have served as the precursors and prototypes of our present-day fundamentalism, none is more worthy of admiration than that of the Shakers. It would do these gentle-spirited and industrious visionaries a grave injustice to attribute to them all of the doctrinal banalities which fundamentalism has of late affected, but the Shakers were and are millenarians. They have accepted and acted upon their dogma with unflinching devotion, following its implications with astonishing consistency.

The end of the world was for them imminent. How foolish this marrying and giving in marriage? Why indulge in the vanities and subject ourselves to the temptations of social mingling? Their doctrine of celibacy brought them into great disfavor at first, and subjected them to bitter persecution. But in spite of this grotesque doctrine their gentleness and thrifty, unselfish industry long ago won them high esteem in the regions where their colonies were established.

The press is now recording their break-up. Of course. Under the strict practice of celibacy society speedily disappears. When recruits from adult life fail to join them, their colonies are bound to die out. Modern millenarians of more belligerent but less consistent type lack the same courage of their convictions, and they decline to take so firm a stand for their faith as the Shakers have taken. They marry and are given in marriage; they buy and sell and get gain with unremitting zeal, though the end of all such vanity is so imminent as to find, for some, a fixed place in the calendar, not far hence.

The Shakers have occupied the time while they wait for the cataclysm which is utterly to destroy ungodly unbelievers and establish the believing in all felicity. They have lived frugally, and with unfailing and universal industry. They have held all the product of their labor in a common store. Their system forbids and forestalls selfish, private gain. Such industry and frugality have had their proper and invariable reward: their colonies have greatly prospered in material affairs. Their aggregate property valuations probably run into the millions. Now that their numbers are so rapidly reducing by death and only slightly increasing by recruits, some of the colonies are being sold out and the remnants of the faithful are concentrating at the parent colony, where, before many years have passed, the few feeble survivors will make their last stand.

Such fatal and tragic consistency has won a certain kind of respect. On the other hand, the inconsistency of the more worldly-wise type of millenarians among our fundamentalists has sometimes assumed the ridiculous. One of the foremost of the laymen zealous to achieve the cataclysmic climax of mundane affairs is fabulously wealthy, his fortune having been derived from the exploitation of one of our greatest natural resources. He has repeatedly offered large gifts to missions with strings tied to them: he stipulates that the missionaries supported by these funds shall accept and teach the premillennial doctrines. In the lurid light cast by the world war, he, with others of this faith, was enabled to re-read the ancient prophecies with such new exactitude that a definite date was set upon his calendar for the end of the world. The story passes about among mission board administrators that he offered a specially large contribution on his usual terms, expressing at the same time his firm conviction that on such and such an early date the end would come. A mission board secretary, whose professional thrift was probably reinforced by a sense of humor, signified his readiness to accept the funds, provided the restrictions upon its use should be removed in the event that the world should run on beyond the date fixed. Our "benefactor of great wealth" appears to have lacked either a sense of humor or the courage of his conviction, for the addition to his terms was indignantly repudiated.

The shiftiness with which highly vocal premillennialists acquire large holdings of the present world's sordid gains has often been the subject of remark. One of the most ardent recently, after establishing his standing among the "brethren" through the ardor of his preaching the doctrines of the cult, followed up his advantage by exploiting them in the interests of a land development scheme which made all the customary appeal to the "minister of small savings" whose declining years required looking after. None strikes a bargain in worldly affairs with more keenness and regard for his end of it than does many a devout herald of the imminent collapse of this evil world.

The Millerites of the middle of the last century were pathetically consistent in their millennialism. They divested themselves of their property, even, in many cases, disposing of their ordinary clothing, and on the day appointed for the final cataclysm donned their ascension robes of very unsubstantial character, and mounted the hill from which their ascent was to be effected. When the event failed to transpire some returned to their former habitations destitute and compelled to begin the prosaic mundane life all over again from nothing in the way of temporal and material store. There was little amusing for them in their disillusionment, nor will others who recognize their pathetic sincerity be moved to laughter over their predicament. They professed a tragically deluded faith, but they showed the courage of a complete sincerity.

After their fashion the more modern Shakers have commended themselves for their gentleness and industry, though their regimen has been supported by fidelity to a great delusion. Their colonies have accumulated wealth of this world in considerable amounts. But they have sincerely and consistently kept and used this store, not to pander to selfish ambitions nor to empower arbitrary wills to dominate and domineer. Doubtless they have not altogether escaped the snares of their growing wealth. It will be surprising if scandals do not grow out of their system as their colonies dwindle, and their property comes into the possession of smaller and smaller groups. But the simplicity and sincerity of their faith has saved them thus far, as sincerity and singleness of motive must save any, even when faith cherishes a delusion.

What may be said for our current, boisterous millenialism is another matter. How sincere is the zeal which preaches millennial doctrines and at the same time grasps material stores of this evil world with a tenacity which takes full advantage of a doomed society's property-mad laws, and which dedicates the arbitrary power, which these stores insure, to a bitter and uncompromising propaganda—well, history will doubtless not deal so tenderly with these as it has with the simpler-minded millenarians whose pathetic sincerity we have noted. Wealthy fundamentalists and their militant ecclesiastical spokesmen assure us that "the fight has only begun." Presumably it will last as long as these carnal weapons endure to wage the warfare of the spirit.

The Stone Baby

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I Walked the streets of a City where I go now and again, and I beheld the changes of recent years. For the Fashionable Shopping Center hath moved up town, and the old Main Street, with its Business Palaces of Thirty Years Ago, now appeareth Tattered and Run Down. And I passed where workmen from Italy and Macedonia dug up the Pavement, and they hung their garments upon a Stone Post which they had removed, and which stood aslant and awry beside the Curb. And I turned and walked back, and I beheld it as it were a Cubit Square at the base and with an iron ring above for the hitching of horses, and on each of the four sides this Inscription:

RYDER
PHOTOGRAPHER

And I pushed certain of the Coats aside, and behold the top of the post was the Graven Image of a Laughing Child.

And I paused and meditated. For I remembered when that Hitching Post was New, and a Work of Art; and the Carriages of all who dwelt on Euclid Avenue were tethered there while the folk went in and Ryder Made Photographs of them. And I remembered how his Gallery was the Art Center of the town; and there assembled the Artists' Club. And I remembered how no Great Man came to town and got away without sitting to Ryder. Yea, and Some Who Were Not So Great sat there; for if his Old Negatives could be found there would be one of a man who might resemble me, who then had not one Grey Hair.

And I thought with sorrow how the Horses and Carriages are gone from Euclid Avenue, and Ryder himself is gone; and the Italians pile their Greasy Garments that smell of Garlic upon his post, and scratch their matches on the Chubby Cheek of the Laughing Child. And I said:

Alas poor Ryder. I knew him, Horatio, and all the rest.

But I reflected that Ryder in his day had a Fairly Good Time, and the World was Reasonably Good to him, and he esteemed his work a Fine Art and had joy in it. And he played with Sunshine, and made people look better than the Law of Nature allowed, and gave them Photographs of themselves to live up to. And I considered how there must be a Thousand Family Albums in which are Portraits that he made, and faces that are dear to many. And I ceased to be sorry for Ryder. And I smiled at the Laughing Child that was hooded by the Greasy Coats, and the Child still was laughing when I came away.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

At a Crowded Shrine

WHEN pale religion leans upon a crutch—
The crutch of ignorance; when bigotry
And superstition hold within their clutch
The high-born love and white-winged charity,
What shall we say who from the martyr fires
Of Calvary first found our hearts aflame?
Where now the courage of our noble sires
Who died to save the honor of a Name?
Is this religion—words that whine and drone,
Prayers that pall and alms of self-conceit?
Can Christ's shed blood for empty hearts atone?
Can pride at any altar be found meet?
What miracle of God can work for men
Who kneel in prayer that they may sin again!

The Search

I SOUGHT His love in sun and stars,
And where the wild seas roll,
But found it not; as mute I stood,
Fear overwhelmed my soul;
But when I gave to one in need,
I found the Lord of love indeed.

I sought His love in lore of books,
In charts of science' skill;
They left me orphaned as before—
His love eluded still;
Then in despair I breathed a prayer:
The Lord of love was standing there!

The Presbyterian Church Facing the Future

By Cleland B. McAfee

TWO and a quarter millions of the Christians in America are associated with various branches of the Presbyterian church. It now exists in ten branches, six of which are numerically negligible in the total. A seventh has only 65,000 members, a remainder from the recent union which absorbed most of the Cumberland members. This leaves actually only three branches with which the future must deal with great seriousness; namely, the United Presbyterian church, strongest in Pennsylvania, with about 1,000 congregations and 160,000 members, the Presbyterian church in the United States, commonly known as the southern church and strongest in that section, with 3,400 congregations and 365,000 members, and the Presbyterian church in the United States of America, distributed fairly well over the entire country, with about 10,000 congregations and 1,700,000 members. The four branches of the Reformed churches are so closely related to the Presbyterian family that any complete listing would include their 3,000 congregations and 550,000 members.

There are, of course, working relations among all these branches and there are persistent movements toward their "union and reunion," as Dr. William Henry Roberts liked to phrase it. These movements are apt to originate with the largest branch and are continually countered by proposals for federation or other forms of fellowship from other branches, notably the southern church. A favorite figure of speech among those in all branches who hesitate about union is that such things must not be forced and that when the sun of righteousness shines on the churches they will flow together as two icebergs will melt into one stream. Unfortunately, many of the brethren are sitting on the icebergs with their umbrellas up to protect them from any too warm rays that may be in the air. On the border line between north and south there seems a somewhat strong desire on the part of laymen for union between the two larger branches, though many ministers share it. The sentiment in the northern church is favorable to union with any of the other branches with no further debate, especially with the southern church.

HISTORICAL CLEAVAGE

The cleavage between the two is largely historical, but it is also partly doctrinal, the southern branch being more conservative than the northern, though the difference is often exaggerated at this point. It is also partly administrative, the northern branch tending to stronger government in benevolences and less rigorous limitation on the participation of women in administrative affairs. The nominal original difference—the complete separation of church and state, whereby the church is precluded from action on civil affairs—has gone glimmering. Civil and moral and religious issues are now seen to be so hopelessly interwoven, and the concern of Christianity for the total life of man is so much more clearly seen, that the actions of the assemblies of the two branches show no marked difference. The loyalty of the south in the recent war was reflected in church actions supporting civil authority in that assembly. The responsibility of religion for sound democracy is passing beyond dispute and every vital church is sure to feel the pressure of that fact.

The fact is that there are no vital reasons for the continued division in the Presbyterian body. If, all around, it were conceived as an agency of the gospel of Christ pure and simple, the divisions would be corrected. None of the reasons against union will stand the test of a square look at the need of the world and the increased potency of the united church. The analysis attempted in this article is based primarily on the largest of the branches, the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., which is the branch most in mind when "the Presbyterian church" is spoken of.

I.

The Presbyterian church is a credal church, subscribing to the most elaborate doctrinal statements now in use among American churches. The Westminster confession of faith dates from the seventeenth century but has been frequently revised in the American church, though always against the protest of some adherents. It is a full document of thirty-five chapters, broken into 179 sections, but is frankly held as subordinate to the Bible and is accepted only as continuing the biblical system. The government of the church being republican rather than democratic, only its officers are asked to accept any such elaborate confession of faith and it would be everywhere resented as a test of church membership. Even so, the document involves so many items, and is so frequently phrased as no one would today phrase it, that in 1902 an excellent doctrinal statement of sixteen brief articles was adopted by the general assembly and ordered to be published with the authority of the church, not as a new standard, since it was never officially adopted by the presbyterians, but as a convenient statement of the contents of the Reformed faith. Many pastors have advised newly elected elders and young candidates for the ministry that they have the right to interpret the confession of faith in accordance with these sixteen articles, and it has smoothed the way for a good many troubled feet.

For the mind of the church is divided in the matter of the present Westminster confession. On every test, the church shows itself both evangelical and conservative, but wholly unprepared for belligerency. The fighting troops are not welcomed when they turn their weapons on their brethren. All sorts of things were going to happen at the recent general assembly because of the "rationalism" of the foreign missionaries or the foreign board, and the aggressive New Era Movement was to receive its come-uppance, and one confident brother announced before the meeting that Dr. Stone's committee with its proposal of a radical reorganization of the benevolent agencies of the church was to be presented with a fine brick house—a brick at a time. But nothing of the kind happened. The assembly simply refused to fight its own forces. Early in the proceedings the leaders of the belligerent forces discovered that there were no such forces to lead. No sensible observer supposed the theological position of the church had seriously changed, but it was perfectly evident that the church is chiefly concerned with its work and wants full cooperation everywhere.

DOCTRINAL REVISION

Yet it is quite certain that the church must soon consider its doctrinal statement anew. The present position is not defensible. Many of the ministers and other officers give the subject no concern, wanting to let well-enough alone. One session voted that sleeping dogs should be let lie, when it was suggested that a course of sermons on the confession be preached. Some are supremely content with the confession, even objecting to the addition a few years ago of two chapters—one on the Holy Spirit and one on The Love of God and Missions—on the ground that the chapters gave those two subjects too great prominence in the statement of the Christian faith! Of course, others see red when they discuss the confession; they do not like the whole tone of it.

Dr. Parkhurst said during one discussion of revision that he would tear his Genevan gown to shreds before he would preach certain parts of it. Others do not bother about their gowns but they do not preach the confession. Still others, and they should be a growing class, do not feel that the present attitude of the church is quite candid and open. Young men are asked to subscribe to the confession solemnly at the most honest hour in their lives and at the same time are assured that at certain points it either does not mean what it seems to mean or else that it does not matter at that point what it means. That the church holds the main body of doctrine contained in the confession of faith is probably assured, but that it could face it in detail or in all its parts as it now stands is by no means equally assured.

It is sometimes objected that discussion of the confession will prevent union with other churches of the Reformed faith. But if the Presbyterian church holds the confession in a qualified way or if its terms of subscription are not wide enough, it would seem the part of integrity to settle that before proposing union on the basis of the confession. The compromise measure proposed by some who dread the experience of revision is to re-phrase the terms of subscription, modifying the vow of all ordained officers which now reads: "Do you sincerely receive and adopt the Confession of Faith of this Church, as containing the system of doctrine taught in the holy scriptures?"

TOO CONSERVATIVE!

Interestingly enough, it is exactly this credal position of the Presbyterian church which has prevented its serious disturbance by the present doctrinal and "fundamentalist" dispute. The confession is really too conservative for the divisive conservatives! Every effort to run a line of cleavage through the church breaks down at this point. Take the matter of the return of our Lord, for example. Any prominence given to this is extra-confessional, since it is only touched upon there, and is never so much as hinted to be a "fundamental." Moreover, any pre-millenial accent is foreign to the confession, for the return is mentioned only in connection with the final judgment. Not a hint appears of any personal reign of Christ after his return. Indeed, it is the opinion of some leaders of the church that on a literal and strict interpretation of the confession of faith, premillenialism would be a heresy in the Presbyterian church. Of course it is not such a heresy, for the confession is not to be so interpreted. But it would be impossible to make it a test of orthodoxy or evangelical faith. Princeton Seminary is generally thought of as inclining to conservative orthodoxy and it has always been pronouncedly against pre-millenial teaching in its systematic theology. When, therefore, effort is made to run the line between the "conservatives" and the "liberals," it has to wander a good deal and there is next to no compact group of divisives.

There is a labored effort to magnify the difference between "evangelicals" and "rationalists" in the church but it goes feebly. A "rationalist" proves to be anybody who differs from you on the point which you are immediately discussing. Most of the aggressive leaders of the church have been labelled so, until it is no longer a distinction to belong to the "rationalistic group." The truth is, that in the bad sense there are none and in the good sense there are very few others.

BRYAN ISSUE NOT SERIOUS

This has been shown in the refusal to grow excited over Mr. Bryan's anti-evolution campaign. The Presbyterian church thoroughly honors Mr. Bryan as a loyal elder and member, and it recognizes as all sensible men do what follies have been talked and taught in the name of evolution and how many colleges and university instructors have been reckless of their influence on the character and opinions of young people, but it does not recognize any authority either of scholarly investigation nor biblical learning back of the current attack. It will do good in the long run, but its immediate effect is to discredit religious teaching. There are doubtless some who would welcome closer restrictions on the faculties of colleges and seminaries but their number is small. The issue is not a serious one in the Presbyterian church.

At the same time, it seems fairly clear that the church would not be willing to surrender its general credal attitude, that is, its tendency to magnify the doctrinal or credal elements in Christianity. This position is held with frank recognition of the fact that Christianity is a life and a service rather than a system of doctrines. There must, therefore, be some way wherein the faith can be worded which will not exclude those who reveal the same life under other statements. It has happened in several instances that foreign mission churches have established themselves on so much wider foundation than is offered by the Westminster confession that the home church might well take their lesson to heart. But no objection has been raised to the passing of such churches into the new grouping.

II.

Questions of administration have been increasing in recent years but they seem on the way to adjustment. Agencies for benevolent and other ministries have been organized as the need arose and they have naturally overlapped and have sometimes proved unwilling to undertake new phrases of service. As usual, some counselled making no change, lest good brethren be reflected upon and work be somewhat lessened or disturbed. Others counselled gradual change, but had no program to suggest. It has been decided to make the change at once, bringing the whole benevolent work of the church under four rubrics: foreign missions, national missions, Christian education, and ministerial relief, which really amounts to a board of personal philanthropy of all sorts. The distinction between foreign and national missions will be purely geographical. The task of a clearer accent on the social obligation of religion to democracy is to be committed to a reorganized Board of National Missions. This has been the hesitant voice of recent years, the Home Mission Board having been subdued by a demand which issued from some prominent sections of the church a few years ago and resulted in the release of Charles Stelzle and others who were putting the church to the fore in social ministry. The way is open for a fuller program and it is hoped that the power of the purse may no longer be a hindrance to its accomplishment.

There is a type of mind that is jealous of leadership and fearful of aggression. The pride of the Presbyterian church in the parity of its ministry aggravates this jealousy and fear. Who are these men who draw large New York salaries and tour around the world or hold conventions and try to tell the hard-working pastor how to do it? Are they not just like ourselves? Are they better than we? What is all this talk of "leaders"? The result has been that leadership in the church has been more difficult than in many other churches and the church has gravely suffered for lack of authority in anybody's hands to act at the critical time. Churches have been advised to withhold their gifts from the foreign board until that board satisfied them that it was doing exactly what those churches approved. Individuals have heard of some dereliction or mistaken or disapproved declaration and have declined to give further aid to one or another agency until they were personally satisfied about it. Of course, this has not been universal. Most churches and most individuals know better how to play the game and to do the necessary team work of the kingdom of God. But it has forced all leaders into caution which has often been limitation. However, it fits rather better into the inherently conservative Presbyterian temperament to go cautiously than to run too great risks. When the chairman of the reorganization committee of the boards was asked whether the new plan would cost more or less than the old one, he replied, "The Lord only knows." Offence has been taken at this, as though it were not enough for the Lord to know; the average Presbyterian wants to know on his own account! Probably it seems to him that this double knowledge adds security to the general situation.

III

The Presbyterian church is facing the problem of future leadership in its ministry and lay work. The need for men has been so great in recent years that two sources of supply have been tapped, both of which are capable of letting in a doubtful current. One source is the ministry of other churches. Many of these churches have quite as high a standard as the Presbyterian church, but it is not always their best trained men who enter the Presbyterian ministry, and it is becoming a grave question whether this form of church union does not furnish a poorer leadership than the times require. The other source is that of earnest men past the time of training, of whom Presbyteries can make exceptions, ordaining them without full preparation. Some of these men are sent to theological seminaries for such training as they may receive. Some are ordained after a course in one of the numerous Bible Institutes.

The development of these institutes deserves the attention of all churches. In several instances they have fallen into the narrowest grooves of self-righteous opinion. The head of one of them made a sermon of Dr. Harry E. Fosdick the theme of a closing address, representing Dr. Fosdick as one of the disguises which the arch-enemy of souls takes in these degenerate days of waiting for the Lord's return. Now, Dr. Fosdick as a disguised demon is simply not a success. But what is apt to be the spirit of young people whose chief instructor thinks in such terms of his Christian brethren? How far do the churches want to go in finding their leadership in groups prepared under such guidance? The newest development is the addition of departments for that training of pastors or of men for the ministry. Not one of these institutions is prepared to educate men according to the full requirement of the Presbyterian church, yet their strong assumption of superiority in devotion to revealed truth and their ready condemnation of theological education in general wins the ear of many who are taking constant counsel of their fears instead of their faith.

MINISTRY OF INSTITUTES

The ministry of the institutes in training lay workers or in adding to the wealth of Christian knowledge among multitudes of laymen should be welcomed and would be welcomed if it were not so often made a divisive force turned loose in the church. Half-informed young people sit in solemn judgment on questions whose terms they have never even guessed and condemn or approve according to standards which have been furnished them ready-made by their instructors. The subject is of special concern to the Presbyterian church, since by an interesting and welcome coincidence the leadership of the three principal institutes of the country is of the Presbyterian type: Dr. Wilbert W. White, head of the Biblical Seminary in New York, an enlargement and expansion of the former Bible Teachers' Training School, is a member of New York presbytery; Dr. Reuben A. Torrey, head of the Los Angeles Bible Institute, is a member of Los Angeles presbytery; while the president of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, largest of all, is a Presbyterian elder, Mr. Henry P. Crowell, though his responsibility does not extend to the actual teaching of the institute.

It may properly be expected of such men that they will send out students loyal to the church as a present fact rather than self-established critics of all its institutions and programs. And, while this is doubtless their desire, their failure in so many cases helps to increase the question throughout the Presbyterian church as to the fitness of the institutes as theological seminaries. The remedy for the evil of a lowered standard in the ministry lies in the presbyteries, of course, and calls for a stiffening of practice and the securing of younger men capable of the full preparatory work, while there remains still the possibility of the use of the really extraordinary cases.

LEADERSHIP OF WOMEN

The leadership of women in the Presbyterian church has heretofore been practical rather than official. There has never been a serious proposal to ordain women to the ministry and a formal overture to ordain them to the ruling eldership was defeated recently by a large vote. The reasons most alleged were the danger of over-feminizing the church and the lack of any interest in the movement among the women themselves. The changed interpretation of the New Testament made the more familiar Scriptural or Pauline objection less weighty than heretofore. Immediately after the rejection of the elder overture, another providing for the ordination of women as deacons was adopted by a sound majority, so that women may now become ordained officers of the church and the principle is established. It will be a matter of only a few years before the whole question of ordaining women to any and all offices will be raised again, much of the decision turning on the desire of the women themselves. Meanwhile, the organized Boards of Home and Foreign Missions of the women are absorbed in the new boards and a proportion of women will be elected as members of these boards as well as of the Board of Christian Education. Three of the four benevolent boards of the church will therefore include women in regular membership.

IV.

The three main problems of the Presbyterian church—its creed, its administration, and its leadership—are not yet solved but there seems nothing insoluble about them and there appears to be an excellent spirit available for the solution. Difficulties of personnel, of established practice, of traditional interpretation, and of confused relationships are found here as in all churches. It is inherently conservative in its rank and file and not so much the worse for that. The errors of crass progressiveness are about as dangerous as those of ignorant conservatism. The Presbyterian task is to avoid both adjectives and to become sanely progressive and wisely conservative. There are minds to which the combination is impossible, but the Presbyterian church is apt to be found trying to make it.

Next week Dr. Orvis F. Jordan will write on "The Presbyterians—An Outside View." Dr. Jordan is a Disciples minister, pastor of the Community Church, Park Ridge, Ill., and a member of the editorial staff of The Christian Century.

The Minister in the Sick Room

By Lloyd C. Douglas

This is the third article in a series by Dr. Douglas on "The Minister's Every-day Job," a rich and vital interpretation of parish technology by a minister whose labors and successes mark him as a man of the rarest professional instincts.

ALMOST any physical ailment involves a mental condition in which the patient is disposed to overrate his own importance to himself and his friends. He demands attention. He has very little to think about besides himself, and he is extremely sensitive to any real or fancied indifference to his case as manifested on the part of his friends. He expects a call from his minister. He not only welcomes it, cordially; but if it is not forthcoming promptly, he is disappointed. Consequently, the longer you postpone your visit to him, the harder it will be to do him a service when you arrive there.

The young preacher is informed, early in his residence in the new pastorate, that "Grandma" Brown would be delighted to see him. As a charter member of the congregation, "Grandma" has received much attention from the ministers. She is eighty, rheumatic, and lonely. She has been a long time ill, and has become adjusted to life as a permanent "shut-in." This, then, will be one of the earliest calls the new minister makes. He will be so cordially welcomed, and his recollection of his visit there will be so pleasant, that, next week, he decides to repeat the experience—both for "Grandma's" sake and his own. Again he has such a good time that he resolves to be a frequent caller. For a month, he sees "Grandma" punctually, every Monday afternoon. She remarks, appreciatively, about his "weekly" engagement with her. Soon parish duties multiply. The new minister lets two whole weeks slip by without seeing "Grandma." She has confidently expected him; and he has failed her. The time comes when a month passes in which she sees nothing of him. She wonders whether he has found her less interesting than he thought, at first. Or, has she said something, inadvertently, to wound him? Moral: Be careful about setting a regular task of periodical calling upon chronic invalids. Don't begin it unless you are prepared to see the enterprise through, faithfully, to the end—and that may be a long contract.

While we happen to be talking about the aged invalid, it should be observed that nature compounds her own subtle anaesthesia to numb the normal dread of death. You, at twenty-seven, contemplate death with such distaste that you imagine everybody must feel the same way about it. You fancy your best contribution can be made at the point of attempting to distract attention from the thought of this mysterious warder of the exit-gates of life. You should get over that feeling. Aged people do not wish to hear so much about the busy, bustling events of active life. They do not greatly care what happened at the last church supper. It is of little concern to them that there is a new concrete walk in front of the parsonage. The fact that you exceeded your apportionment to missions, or failed of it, is of minor importance. The elderly Deacon Stone, when you inquire how he does today, may inform you that he is not long for this world. Believing that he should be wooed from this dismal state of mind, you are apt to think that your best service to the deacon is in beguiling his attention from his gloomy mood. You fairly smother him with a running commentary on current events, political movements, parish news, etc., under the impression that you are doing him a great service. Quite to the contrary, if he wants to talk about death, go to it with him, and talk as helpfully as you know how on this subject. He will, of course, know a great deal more about it than you do. He is nearer to it; more immediately concerned with it; and quite outranks you in experience. Therefore, the best talking you can do on the matter is by prodding him to tell you his own deductions. But, however you may pursue this conversation, be sure that you pursue it. If Deacon Stone has remarked that he is getting ready to die, that means that he doesn't want to hear about your trip to California; but he wants you to hear about his projected trip to Glory. He is just as much interested in that journey of his as you are in the tour you hope to make to Europe in 1925.

In his early experience in the ministry, the young preacher has an instinctive dread of calling, as a comparative stranger, in a home where somebody is very ill. This feeling, on his part, is entirely commendable. For him to consider the situation in any other state of mind than that would mean that he has more brass than any minister requires. But, whatever may be his reluctance to make such a call, he can assure himself, before he goes, that the members of the household will not regard him an intruder. And he must not think of himself as an intruder. He has business there.

CONSIDERATION FOR THE PATIENT

Assuming that he is permitted to see the patient, he should remember that he is there primarily to see the patient. Two or three members of the family will accompany him into the room. They are "up and coming," physically: easier to talk to than the patient. He finds his line of least resistance proposing that he converse with them, across the bed, concerning the patient. But he is not there to conduct a clinic. His attention should be almost entirely restricted to the invalid. How long he should stay, and what he should say, will be governed by circumstances. But a few considerations may be laid down as good enough for all cases.

In the first place, the minister must never prescribe. He is not the doctor. He must not assume to know anything about the treatment or care of this or any other malady. When the physician's name is mentioned, if he can, with good conscience, confirm the wisdom of their choice, he may deepen the patient's confidence in his doctor by expressing his own confidence in the medical man. If the case is very grave, the caller need not feel required to offer an unjustifiable hope by reciting what he believes to be similar cases which eventuated happily. It is to the preacher's interest to stand well in the opinion of the physicians of his town; and if he gets the reputation of "a prescriber," or is known to talk freely of therapeutic matters in the sick-room, the doctors will consider him a poacher on their professional preserves.

PERSONAL SYMPATHY

The minister's first business is to express his own personal sympathy. In these days of professional nurses, the patient does not get as much sympathy as he had when the members of the family took turns at the bed-side. The nurse is not there to sympathize, but to carry out the doctor's orders. She is, quite too often, icily matter-of-fact in her attitude toward the patient. The members of the family understand that the nurse knows her business. They take their cues from her as to the best attitude to assume toward the object of their solicitude. The professional air of the nurse is sometimes unwittingly imitated by the household. I have seen cases where a curious constraint seemed to have laid hold upon a home where the members of the family, shy and diffident in the presence of the professional nurse, had apparently left off all the little words and gestures and tokens of endearment and sympathy which are so precious at such times.

You will quickly sense this condition, if it exists. Your friendly admonition to the patient that he must "mind the doctor" and "obey the nurse," is to no purpose. The invalid has heard little else but that manner of talk until he is pretty well fed up on it. But if you can bestow some honest-to-goodness affection, your name will become immortal. Incidentally, it will be good for the family to see that the patient can undergo such treatment without a relapse. Let them understand, by your own attitude toward the professional nurse, that her presence does not deter you from saying the things that are welling up in their own hearts and repressed for fear she might think them foolishly sentimental. Instead of saluting the nurse, as you enter the door of the sick-room, with the doctor's conventional remark, "How's your patient this morning?" —you do far better to dispose of her with a gracious greeting, and approach the patient, at once, as if he had a just right to be hailed with the second personal pronoun. He gets a good deal of treatment in the third person. When the doctor inquires about him of the nurse, the patient is always third person. When the nurse replies, he is still third person. He has become a chattel. He is flat on his back and can't resist the implication that he is a lay figure. The doctor thinks of him as "a typical pneumonia." To the nurse, he is a "case." The family, as has been observed, humors the mood of these professionals upon whose skill so much depends, and themselves fall into the habit of talking about the patient as they would of any other natural object. You will remedy this situation by making the patient the center of interest.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to remark that the caller should not shake hands with sick people. Of course, the patient will want to do so. Long habit demands that he exert whatever energy he possesses to extend his right hand. But you will have anticipated that by offering him your left hand. He will not feel required to shake your left hand. If you offer your right, he will try to shake it. This may cause him discomfort. If you shake his hand, you probably increase his pain. If you take it, but fail to shake it, your greeting lacks something. Give him your left hand. He will not know why—but that makes no difference. He will be better satisfied.

PRAYER IN THE SICK ROOM

An affectionate hand that is laid upon his arm or his forehead, or that smoothes his pillow, is going to mean much more than any philosophy of comfort and serenity. Whether the minister is to pray with the patient or not, depends. If the prayer is addressed to God, it will be just as effective if offered, later, in the pastor's study. If, however, it is jointly addressed to God and the patient, both facts must be kept in mind. I have known cases where the patient was already sufficiently nervous about the outcome of his disease without having any more gravity lent to it by the implication that divine assistance must be invoked. But if a prayer can be offered without unduly exciting the patient's alarm for himself, the minister can make a definite contribution here. It is so much better to say, "Shall we pray together, you and I, for courage and strength?" than to suggest, "Would you like to have me say a prayer for you?" If prayer is to be offered, convince the patient that he is helping to present it. The best principles of mental suggestion must be employed in the phrasing of this prayer. To begin by informing God that "our brother is in deep affliction" is bad psychology. God knows a great deal more about the brother than the petitioner; and the patient is already quite obsessed by the thought of his "deep affliction." Keep clear of suggesting ideas which inhibit his freedom of movement in attempting to get away from his aches and pains long enough to beg for larger strength. Keep close to the hope-and-promise phraseology. Try to formulate your prayer so that when you are done, if you haven't helped him any, he is at least no worse off, mentally, than he was before.

It may come to pass that you will be in the midst of a highly emotional, half-hysterical household, and some frantic member will beseech you to offer prayer. There will be a general scurry to find everybody in the house and line them up for this service. You will find yourself, within a few minutes, with a very serious matter on your hands. If you begin your prayer under such conditions almost anything you are likely to say will produce an emotional storm. Beware of letting the situation get out of your control in this manner. After the family has assembled you will do well to make them all a little talk calculated to calm their excitement and encourage them in efforts to restrain their emotions. You can remind them that the fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much; but that God must always be approached in faith. Prayer, to be effective, must proceed from hearts that sincerely believe in God's willingness and ability to send aid. "We must all help the patient, then, by presenting our calm courage and sturdy faith and firm belief that this prayer will carry weight." But don't get down on your knees and begin to pray while a general emotion panic is on, or immanent. If you do, you will wish afterwards that you hadn't done it.

OPEN CONVERSATION

Almost invariably some member of the family follows the minister downstairs and converses with him in low tones. The patient hears this half-inaudible conversation and decides that his pastor is now learning the worst, which had been previously concealed from him, as they are attempting, futilely, to conceal it from the invalid. Whatever the conversation may be at such a moment, the preacher's contribution to it should be distinctly audible and unalarming. The patient may be disposed to forgive the doctor, and the nurse, and the family, for deceiving him; but he likes to believe that the man of God is prohibited by his office from participating in this well-meant intrigue.

The length of the call is governed by conditions. If you are in a home where death is momentarily expected, you had better stay. The doctor does not linger long. There is nothing that he can do. The nurse is obviously helpless; and signifies by her manner that her job is over. It will not be a good time for you to remember another pressing engagement, much as you may wish to escape the experience of witnessing this heart-breaking scene. If you are required to stay on until two o'clock in the morning, it is to be doubted if you can contrive any better use for your time. I look back upon a few such experiences, though they were terribly trying, as among the most useful hours of my ministry.

An accident has occurred to some member of your congregation. You know that the family will be dreadfully upset. You are timid about rushing there to offer sympathy. You would prefer to wait until tomorrow morning, when things have calmed down a bit. But they need you a great deal worse tonight than they may tomorrow. Go at once! The more tragic it is the quicker you are to be there! The more harrowing the situation is the longer you are to stay! The more anxious you are to escape the experience the more imperative it is that you shall remain on the job!

Hospitals have regular calling hours, usually from two to four in the afternoon. The staff will like the preacher better and welcome him more cordially at the time designated for callers. He may think that his profession gives him the right to ignore this regulation. In emergency cases this is true. But the physician makes his hospital calls in the forenoon, and the nurses are occupied with post-operative dressings, linen changes, etc., and they do not like to be disturbed. Neither do they welcome visits at the meal times of their patients. Observe the rules. Get acquainted with the nurses. They have a trying task and deserve recognition. If you are calling on a patient in an open ward, do not forget to extend a gracious word and a smile to the person in the adjoining bed. Your patient may be encouraged to tell you something about his neighbors in the ward. If convalescent, he may introduce you to them. It is rather cold-blooded to confine your whole attention to the patient you went to see when in the next bed, not more than six feet away, there may lie a man very seriously in need of a friendly word.

There is nothing the convalescent appreciates more than the loan of a book. So soon as he begins to come back to life, he exhibits considerable interest in the affairs of the world outside. Books of travel and adventure, essays dealing with nature's big out-of-doors, and stories of people who contrived to be supreme over obstacles and misfortunes, find a ready market with the convalescent. Flowers are greatly appreciated by the sick. The expense may be reduced to a minimum by having an arrangement with a certain florist to provide you with a small potted plant at a nominal sum. Your cards are at the florist's. You have only to telephone him the address, and he knows what to do. You get your bill on the first of the month. It is money well spent. Most of the stronger churches have similar contracts with the florist. Little courtesies of this kind abundantly repay all the energy and expense involved. He is a wise minister who makes full use of the opportunity entrusted him to render valuable service in homes where there is illness. At no other time are they so ready to receive him and give serious heed to the message he carries. Likewise it may be said that while he may be pardoned many other failures, any suspicion of indifference on his part, at such times, will not easily be forgiven or forgotten.

Dialogues of the Soul

By Arthur B. Rhinow

In the Temple

MYSELF—This is the pro-temple. See the art.

I—Exquisite! What pictures and statues!

MYSELF—By the greatest masters.

I—I feel like worshipping here. The beauty of it all! Let me stay.

MYSELF—We dare not stay with art. Come!

. . . . . .

I—This is narrower. And there are not so many here.

MYSELF—This is the holy place. Is not the music grand?

I—Wonderful. And the voice. And the book.

MYSELF—And the candles.

I—Let me stay and pray.

MYSELF—Pray.

I—I cannot pray as I would.

MYSELF—No?

I—No. The music is so beautiful.

MYSELF—Come, then. Let us go on.

I—Deeper still?

MYSELF—Into the holy of holies.

I—That must be very beautiful.

MYSELF—Come and see.

. . . . . .

I—Why this—this—there is nothing here.

MYSELF—Speak softly.

I—No art, no music, no light. Nothing.

MYSELF—Nothing?

I—Nothing. I am afraid.

MYSELF—Of what?

I—There is nothing here. O God; my God.

MYSELF—Nothing?

I—Nothing but God; just God.

Brothers

MYSELF—Why do you stop praying?

I—The man kneeling next to me is my enemy. I just noticed him.

MYSELF—Do you hate him?

I—I cannot pray while he is near. I cannot pray with him.

MYSELF—Is he praying?

I—As I was praying.

MYSELF—Can you not pray with that in him that is praying?

I—He is my enemy.

MYSELF—Is it the enemy in him that is praying?

I—No; but—

MYSELF—That in us that really prays is God's child.

I—And my brother?

MYSELF—And your brother. You unite on the Father.

I—And—

MYSELF—And man is his very self when he prays.

The World is Mine

I—Wait. Let me turn this wheel. Now look through the telescope.

MYSELF—Ah, a new cluster of stars.

I—And on each new star the light of stars as yet unseen.

MYSELF—The infinite finite.

I—I feel how small I am.

MYSELF—I feel how rich I am.

I—How rich?

MYSELF—The universe belongs to me.

I—Why?

MYSELF—Because I love it all.

I—And—

MYSELF—And all I love is mine.

Property and Creative Joy

By Vida D. Scudder

GENERALLY speaking, the happy people are the creative ones. Art is rarely the record of a present sorrow; for when pain inspires poem or picture, sheer delight in expression transforms that pain into a curious sort of pleasure. It is the anxious, burdened, grief-stricken life that stays silent. This is a burdened, anxious time. Our skies are leaden. If creative life is to be renewed, joy must be recaptured. How?

Perhaps history can help us. Let us look back, let us look at the thirteenth century. That was also a time anxious and burdened. But out of it sprang a new life in Europe. Rebirth of delight in the visible world led to a charming art; science awoke; poetry quickened the pulse. And as we consider, we find these things again and again related in origin to that strange people, the sons of Francis Bernardone. Giotto at Assisi is painting the marriage of the saint to his haggard lady with a mastery which promises a mighty development; the lauds of Jacopone da Todi and his comrades ring like silver bells through mediaeval air; the Franciscan schools at Oxford stand for a new departure in medicine, in natural science. Wherever vital types of human self-expression are found, the Franciscans are at work; no wonder that the disciples of Francis describe their master by a word unpopular to the middle ages—the word "Innovator."

What was the relation of this creative joy in life, this release of productive energy, to the principles of Francis? Obviously paradoxical; for no people ever abandoned the usual incentives and the usual sources of satisfaction, so completely as the Franciscans. The friar went much further than his predecessor the monk, in renouncing claims on the universe. The monk knew security in a fixed abode; the early friar, to use the sweet phrase often on his lips, was ever "viggiatore e epellegrino." The monk enjoyed the privileges without the responsibility of possessions; these privileges were unknown to the Franciscan. We do not realize what disreputable vagabonds the friars seemed to their contemporaries. It was natural that the church, aware of something precious in the movement, yet perturbed and alarmed by it, bent her clever energies to patronizing and subduing it simultaneously. She succeeded pretty well; by the fifteenth century, the friars had almost lost their distinctive character—and they had ceased to be particularly happy or productive people.

RESONANCE OF JOY

But through the earlier years, whenever they are true to their founder, there is a sweet resonance to their joyousness which echoes from a land of life very far off. How carefree they are! They dance, they twirl in ecstacy upon the high road; they laugh so absurdly during the holy office that the crucifix itself rebukes them! From the day when Francis on his couch of pain chants triumphantly the Canticle of the Sun, their singing never ceases; lauds like little winged angels hover around them as they trudge along—while in winter their bare feet fleck the snow with blood. Many of these lauds have come down to us, the songs of spirits released, set to the lovely rhythms of nature. At times, they sound the abyss of spiritual melancholy; they are tense with the pathos of an idealism defying the powers that be; they can be scathingly, realistically, satiric. And yet the impression they leave is that of a new intensity of joy, which has mysteriously renewed life in a weary world.

Is it possible that the abandonment of claims has something to do with this happiness? The brothers think so:

> Poverty, High Wisdom deep and sure,
> Unsubdued by earth and earthly lure,
> Scorns created things, detached and pure,
> Scorning, yet possessing utterly.
> Poverty has nothing in her hand,
> Nothing craves, in sea or sky or land:
> Hath the Universe at her command!
> Dwelling in the heart of Liberty."

The acquisitive, the proprietary instincts had died within them, or rather had been slain in deadly conflict. It was no easy fight; Franciscan annals are the intense record, often amusing, sometimes heart-rending, of its phases. But the promises were fulfilled to the true sons of Francis. Meek, they inherited the earth; seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, all other things were added unto them. The asceticism which no religious movement at that time could escape, tainted the movement, but neither Francis nor his first companions were essentially ascetic. They were rather lovers; and we do not need the story of their rich achievement, to tell us that the world returned their love, and that they moved in the light of a new dawning.

THE POSSESSIVE INSTINCT

It would be comforting if we might learn something from them for twentieth century use. For the possessive instinct, which has been considered the bulwark of civilization, begins to have a hard time to maintain itself. Pressure against it springs not only from the insatiate greed of the dispossessed; it is reinforced again and again by the puzzled compunction of those in possession. Communism may for the moment be discredited, but the believers in it have not abandoned their faith. A quieter process of equalization, socialization, goes on everywhere; the principle of private ownership can no longer be assumed, it must be defended. The sign is ominous. Must we feel that civilization is headed for chaos? If the defenders of private ownership are worsted, have we to anticipate an impoverished, helpless, drifting and dismal world? Or can we get a hint from the Franciscans, and the sudden fruitfulness of Europe under their touch, that life may conceivably be all the richer, all the more joyous, if the dependence on private ownership be discarded?

The question will seem preposterous to most people. The property instinct is so tenacious that we can not avoid regarding it almost as a natural force. Moreover, it is evident that if private persons in any number divested themselves of their possessions today, and turned into Franciscan mendicants they would be a terrible nuisance to the community, and probably a very unhappy folk. Holy vagabondage is too irresponsible to suit the modern conscience. Francis himself worked with his hands, as he tells us in his Will, and he wanted his brothers to work; but the sense of this duty soon faded out among them, for it was not related in any ordered way to the life around. We however can not ignore it. To value active usefulness within the existing social organization is not to bow before Ruskin's Goddess of Getting On. The Franciscans were after all a spiritual aristocracy; their mode of life depended on a conventional society around them, the conventions of which they refused to share. If you are going to live on mendicancy, there must be rich men to give you alms.

All this is so self-evident that one would not trouble to say it, except that if one didn't other people would hurry to supply the lack. But it is not the end of the story. The lessons of the past are not literal, they are suggestive. Again and again discoveries, personal in their first expression, prove to have a wider implication. They must be socialized, they must be translated into terms of the whole, before they can come to their own, and help the world to welfare and to peace. So it may be with the Franciscan joy, with the new bursting of life into both flower and fruit which resulted from the renunciation of possessions.

A DISQUIETING QUESTION

Let us again recall our modern situation. The question concerning the tenure of private property everywhere torments society. The most ardent defenders of property, like Mr. G. K. Chesterton, demand that the great centres of it be broken up; successful—and knighted—novelists like Galsworthy, present as their most solid achievement a saga of Victorian life with the attack on property, whether in wives or shares, as its basic theme. A great nation stubbornly refuses to deny its communist principles, however it may accept temporary checks and modifications. The future is doubtful; but it is not doubtful that plain and private folk are called to put their best thought all over again on their attitude in the matter. The question no longer concerns the few who may be called by a special religious compulsion to renounce a possessive attitude; it involves a possible new method of general social organization to which we might all be forced to conform.

Now those who urge on the prosperous world any modification in the stubborn tradition of respect for private property, usually do so in the name either of pitying compunction or of reluctant justice. It grows increasingly difficult to draw dividends serenely while more than half of humanity subsists on wages and those often skimped. And it ought to grow difficult. The finer sense of justice, fostered one hopes by democracy, has long been working against the inequalities of our social divisions; and simple compunction has something to do with the strength of modern socialistic tendencies. These are fine feelings; the Franciscans knew them. They liked to point out that property was a sin, which began with the fig-leaves; and Francis anticipated Proudhon in saying more than once that if he owned more than the poorest man living, he was a thief. They felt the full force of the impulses which seek to discredit honor for private property, from the side of justice, from the side of pity; the "liberta francescana" was a result, not a motive, of their choice. But it is doubtful whether such impulses will ever reconcile people to any considerable extent with levelling movements; compunction and the instinct for sacrifice never yet affected change on a large scale. They belong to the remnant. What most men naturally and rightly aim at is a liberal life, a glorious life; and somehow beyond sacrifice they must see a vision of joy and fulfilment and wealth and freedom for every single person, if they are to give up with a good grace the perquisites which they have most valued.

JOY OF CREATIVE ACTIVITY

Surely then it is worth noting that from the point of view of history, there is something to be said in favor of being poor. The evidence goes to show that there is a joy into which our favored and propertied consciousness has never entered, a freedom which it has never enjoyed. Possibly we might come to share that joy and freedom if life were so organized that we always said "our," never "mine." What if the propertied were the real dispossessed? What if we were to find our heritage restored as our possessions diminished? We live in a paradoxical world. What if release of creative power were waiting on a social reorganization which should remove from private life the indubitable burden and anxiety of possessions, and permeate civilization with that heavenly pleasure which marks our feeling for the glories of nature, or for great communal achievements?

Conceivably it depends on ourselves to make this so. To those who know themselves children of God, dependent on his free bounty, there has always been an element of sadness, in private ownership. How wonderful it would be if that sadness could be removed! The duty to dress and keep the earth would remain; in so far as they ignored this, Franciscans denied part of their human heritage. But the acquisitive taint would be absent. All dreamers have longed for a social order in which men should labor normally, not for profit but for the maintenance of the corporate existence, and should receive what they needed from the free bounty of Nature and of God. This ideal seems a dream indeed; but the friars achieved it; achieved it naively, spasmodically, individualistically, imperfectly; but were so happy, so productive, in consequence that they give us a hint we should not disregard.

ONLY ONE HINT

It is only one small hint, one tiny facet, in a many facetted problem. Yet it may help us a little in aligning our sympathies. Most of us may not be called either to help or hinder the modern movement to restrict private ownership; but if we know how to regard it, we may be a little less lost and bewildered. Suppose the movement gathers force, as it quite possibly may, during the next twenty-five years; what a fine thing it would be if we could replace opposition, or reluctant acceptance in the name of justice or pity, by a glad resolve to welcome change in the direction of throwing wealth into more communal forms, as a possible stimulus to production and a liberation for us all!

The past can never be repeated. Its function is to give us symbols which lure us to think on and on into the waiting future. Its experience is often feeble and frustrate, but it holds suggestions which can be translated into principles of social action. We need to alter our emphasis from tradition to purpose, says Robinson in "Mind in the Making." True; but sometimes a tradition may serve to crystallize a purpose. The fire which burned in Francis strikes sparks all down the ages. Some pure spirits are catching that fire today. But even if they follow in his path, they will be of uncertain value to their generation. We do not crave a spiritual aristocracy, whose very exaltations are dependent on the valley life of the mass; we cry with Paracelsus, "Make no more giants, God; but elevate the race at once." Yet the Franciscan ideal has its lesson for us still; for as we see how marvellously it released joy and creative power in the past, we lose all fear of a socialized world. Confidence, comfort, replace our timorous alarms. We can even throw faith and influence on the side of equalizing forces, assured that neither flat monotony nor chaotic collapse need follow the lessening of the incentive of private gain and the loss of security in personal possessions. If there is magic in ownership, it is an evil magic; the true magic is in fellowship; he who loses his property, as his life, shall save it; and those of us who are ready to renounce the privileges and perquisites of the "proprium" in case the call should come to do so, may help the race to recapture the most creative mood that human experience has known.

But in order to translate the possibly coming change from a curse into a blessing, we need the love for God and man which Francis knew.

Facts Are Not Enough

"ALL the public needs is the facts." With this confident statement the average man of studious habits retires either to dig out a few more facts or to search out for his own knowledge a larger store of the facts already discovered.

What would happen if we used all the facts we already possess? We know enough about both the white plague and the black to stop both these horrible scourges within a generation if we would only use what we know. There are enough facts regarding slums and city tenements and poverty in our common possession to make them a shame to civilization, but we go on increasing them and knowledge of their evils tends to make us callous rather than to incite us to any sweeping reforms. We let in the air and sunlight a little better than we once did and we have enlarged our charity budgets, but little progress has been made in preventing their existence. The unearned increment goes on making congested living conditions, and the principle of a living wage as a basic income is denied those who toil. War has brought home to us fact piled on fact like pyramids about the horrors and insanity of war but there is little valid sign of any turning away from the things that make for war.

Our statute books are so filled with legislation that a lawyer's office becomes almost as imposing as a public library. Soon our national and state legislatures will be grinding out more laws. The lawyers will know them, the public officials will swear to enforce them, the average citizen will read nonchalantly of their passing, but they will not effect any marked betterment in those maladjustments in society that keep frictions burning between class and class, permit a few to live in parasitic luxury and masses in toilsome penury, and leave the world to drift into war again. There is a great lack of technique in the application of things we do know, but a greater lack in emotional passion to get them done.

The Dynamics of Conviction

Facts are like well-moulded brick-bats when there are no moving convictions back of them. They are hard, irresistible things upon which superstitions may be broken and old, even useful, traditions battered down. The sceptic can throw them inconoclastically and destruction may lie in their wake, or they may exist like some hard though delicate artistry in the museums of scholarly minds and the recesses of research laboratories. They may lie embalmed in the nomenclature of science and even be the means of commerce in the hands of specialists. But facts are only of real worth to humanity in the measure that they become the common possessions of the masses of men through assimilation into their habits. And even the most useful truths must be burned into the habits of mankind through passionate fires of conviction.

Suppose the Christians of any city should suddenly make up their collective mind that the citizens of their town should become the beneficiaries of all that was known in the way of health and all that civic action could secure in the way of healthful living. There are enough facts already known to cleanse every urban community of tuberculosis, venereal disease, typhoid and every sort of contagion within a generation. Safeguarding the water supply, sewage disposal and garbage collection, providing sunlight and air for every room, prohibition of strap-hanging and smoke consumption, tempering street racket, prevention of dust, and compulsory segregation of every germ carrier, etc., are measures the effectiveness of which is well known. Through an enlightened but firm and conscientious use of them the common maladies of all of us could be as effectively abated in the generation to come as the common maladies of children have been in the generation of which we are a part.

In a certain town typhoid once laid low more than fifty persons and caused three deaths before the best skill of physician, nurse, and hospital could stop it. And this was a university town, with a college medical faculty, a state-supported hospital, a charity society, a health board, a visiting nurse, a sanitary inspector, as well as a score of physicians. There were a dozen churches, several women's clubs, three public libraries, and a citizenship well above the average in intelligence. With all these agencies nothing more than the conventional program was carried out. The sanitary inspector was a broken-down politician, the charity society confined itself to relief, the churches preached spiritual comfort, the women's clubs talked about Browning and suffrage, the medical faculty lived in class room and laboratory and cared only for the funds. The result was that the milk was not inspected until after typhoid had laid its trail of suffering and death. There was no lack of knowledge but there was a deadly absence of passion for applying it. This little paradise of cultured homes was so lacking in social consciousness that only a catastrophe could awaken it.

Propaganda for Righteousness

Facts without advocates for their application for the good of mankind are about as virile as corn sown on the top of uncultivated ground, which might succeed in perpetuating itself in a sickly way but could do little more. For every scientist there should be a host of preachers and advocates, since the most beneficent of discoveries will become prolific of good only in the measure it is propagated. The Burbanks become benefactors through extension agents, who take to the field and propagate his discoveries. They make the minds of farmers and fruit growers the soil for the sowing of ideas and methods and go with the farmers into the fields to turn the treasures of the experimental station into harvests for the family storehouse. A fact in agronomy is of little worth in the mind of the agronomist; it may as well be inscribed on a clay tablet in a temple in Nippur as to be stored away in a library or a government archive; it becomes of worth only in the measure it is propagated as a working theory on the farms of the nation. And what is true of hygiene, medical discovery and agricultural experimentation is true of social welfare. To know what will do good and not to do it is tantamount to ignorance plus moral lethargy. There is no lack of knowledge but there is a blighting lack of passion for human weal.

The word propaganda has fallen under the ban. War making requires it as it requires bullets and explosives. Nations can no more fight without hate and lying than without killing. So we lied about the enemy, and now the allies lie about one another, and class lies about class. We do not call it lying, of course; we still think of it as propaganda for our cause. We may do it mildly by stating our side and leaving our readers ignorant of the other side, or we may do it vehemently by the use of extravagant terms in our own defense and vituperative terms about our opponents, but however we do it we try for a verdict upon a biased statement of the case. We seek, not the truth, but a partisan verdict. So the normative use of the word "propaganda" falls under the ban, surrendered to an overt use of its method.

Now if we react against the spirit of the advocate we are driven away from progress back to stagnation. There is no truth for truth's sake. More hope could be derived from a colony of peasants who were illiterate but active and creative, than from the campus of an intellectual aristocracy which was interested in truth only for truth's sake, and, smitten with ennui, was bored with knowledge, and had become antisocial through the lack of a vicarious human interest. Every social research department and fact-finding agency requires a host of human advocates, for the new-found fact is but one while humanity is legion.

Apostles and Advocates of the Commonweal

The maladjustments in society that bring woe to some and make social parasites and luxury-mongers of others are not the result of mere ignorance. Knowledge has far outrun the will to do. Phossy-jaw maimed a host before science put its knowledge into regulative form. Pasteur was dead and immortalized before our university town was smitten into an interest in milk inspection. The twelve-hour day has long been stigmatized as inhuman, but 300,000 wage earners are still working it in the United States. Four times as many babes perish in infancy when the father's wage income is poor as when it is good, but we still deny that a living wage should be made basic. Poverty is a fetid seedbed for diseases that become contagious in the whole city, its morals arise to afflict the children of the well-to-do, and it is a drag on civilization, but one who advocates its abolition is looked upon as a chimerist and dreamer though there are facts enough in hand to challenge the inventive genius and administrative capacity of the nation which leads all others in such endowments. Poverty could be abolished in a single generation in America if we set ourselves, with a passionate conviction as Christians, to see it done.

There are already enough facts in our possession to right 90 per cent of our social wrongs, but what we need first is a passion for humanity. If our institutions for higher education would give as much attention to invigorating the social instincts as they do to cultivating and panoplying those of self-attainment; if our churches put as much passion into social salvation as they do into personal evangelism and spiritual culture; if our religious press stimulated work for human welfare as they do that for denominational enterprises; if all our publicists and preachers turned advocates of social well-being, we could, in a single generation, turn man's inhumanity to man into man's passion for the commonweal. The world's crying need is not for apostles of culture and aestheticism but cultured apostles of the commonweal. There are ten thousand facts lying fallow in the books; until they are made dynamic by advocates of humanity they might as well never have been discovered.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jesus, Friend of Sinners*

WE have studied Jesus as healer and as teacher, we now consider him as the "friend of sinners." It is much to be a friend, it is more to be a friend of "bad" people. Jesus taught that the test comes in being friendly to those who have nothing to offer us. To be good and pleasant to your own set gives you no credit. You then receive as good as you give. But to be gracious to those who have nothing to give you in return—that is genuine goodness. "The Gentleman with the Duster" contrasts certain living Englishmen with Gladstone, to the everlasting advantage of the latter. He shows how materialistic and selfish, how frivolous and egotistic these living Britishers are. He tells how Gladstone and his wife were interested in the saving of fallen women. Vividly he paints the picture of Gladstone's secretary coming to him to warn him that enemies would use against him the fact that he worked among these despised creatures. The great premier made it clear to his secretary that nothing could turn him from his charitable work. He was the friend of sinners. St. Francis was a friend to the outcast and despised. The lower they were, the more the "Little brother to the birds" loved and served them. With his own hands he cared for the sick and the more repulsive the sickness, the more he gloried in serving. At this very hour, over in Allahabad, India, my good friend, Sam Higginbottom, is ministering, in love to his large colony of lepers, even as Father Damien went out to Madagascar to aid the lepers there. Graham Taylor left his home on the avenue to go down among the poorer workingmen, so as to live among them and share their lot. Jane Addams was gently reared. Traveling in Glasgow she saw some of the miserable sections of that city. "I wonder," she said to her guide, "if, in America, we have such slums?" "No doubt worse," was the reply. Returning to Chicago she found the "worse" spots and there she found her life work. She shared the daily life of the people near South Halsted at Polk. One of the poorest sections of Greater Pittsburgh is the notorious "Woods Run" district. At this very hour Howard Wilson, formerly one of the elders of my church, and his cultured wife are sharing the lot of the poor and bad people of that community as head residents of Woods Run Settlement House. This is in imitation of the Master. At this point we must squarely face one question: "Can you be a Christian and not touch directly some poor, some evil life?" I say, "directly" because the many organizations of modern life make it easy to do all our charitable work at second hand or indirectly. I have worked a good bit upon the boards of various charitable organizations and this is the one criticism I lodge against them: they handle "cases," not "human beings"; they use card-files, paid workers and all the machinery of such work. We cannot get our work done without such machinery, but I want somebody whom I can help personally. Therefore we have our own "Benevolent Fund" and our own poor and needy friends whom we can go to call upon and whom we can directly help. We pay the rent, we buy clothing, we send groceries, we pay the hospital bills, we take the doctor around—it is all personal, direct, Christ-like. I question whether any of us can remain Christian unless we have one or more objects of our personal love and care. I know a pastor who had in his congregation a very poor, crippled girl. One morning, after service, he stopped, at the church door, the wealthiest woman in his parish. He told her about this girl and asked her to take her out for a drive. "I will send my car around tomorrow," she replied loftily. "Oh no, I want you to go yourself. I want this girl to know you." And so it turned out that the rich lady went in person and became a fast friend of the little girl, gaining as much from the cheerful cripple as she gave. It is this for which I plead, this first-hand contact not only with the poor, but with the bad.

British Table Talk

London, October 16, 1922.

OUR greatest maker of encyclopedias, Dr. Hastings, has suddenly died. There was once an aged don in Oxford who went every morning into the cathedral to say his prayers; he was very deaf and spoke very loudly so that anyone near could hear his petitions: the first one was a thanksgiving for "all compilers of dictionaries and books of reference." It is a worthy thanksgiving, and for us in our generation it is a simple act of gratitude to remember the diligent and gifted compiler and scholar who gives us the Encyclopedia of the Bible and other monumental works, crowned by the wonderful Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. How he managed to do all that he did with the charge of a parish in Scotland and the editorship of a monthly journal, no one can tell. Scotsmen are not to be judged by the standards of work applied to other men. Dr. Hastings was a generous and catholic-minded reader. His notes were never harsh, never unfair. He left the impression on all who read him that he did his work in the spirit of humble service as a Christian should. He was human, too. Once he wrote to all his contributors to ask for their portraits, so that he might see what his team looked like and take a more personal interest in them.

The Church Congress

The chief thing which has escaped from the church congress to the man in the street is the belief that the Dean of St. Paul's does not believe in conversion. His guarded words will not be read as a whole, and he will probably have to endure one more black mark. There is good reason to doubt the value of abridged reports of religious addresses often made by reporters, who have an ear for the striking phrase and for that only. I believe the dean gravely undervalued the evidence for sudden conversions or the place for them in the history of the soul But on the other hand he might very well have helped some true Christians who distrust their own experience and their own calling because they have never had this sudden change. They are waiting perhaps for something to happen which has already happened. When they should be doing God's work they are loitering because they want a call, and the call has already come. . . . Lord Astor made a bold speech in which he revealed most simply and fearlessly a faith in Christ, which had evidently captured his being. It is a good thing when men, not ecclesiastical and not in the ranks of religious leaders, confess in their way their own personal faith. . . . Mr. Garfield Williams of the Church Missionary society spoke chivalrous words of Ghandi and made a bold plea against the tyranny of tradition. Altogether the congress upon the "eternal gospel" left an impression of reality, which is not always left by conferences.

Toward a Christian Order of Life

There is to be a conference of Christians of all names in 1924 to consider practical applications of the Christian faith to all the range of human society, international, national, and social. A great many scholars and thinkers are already at work, hammering away at this vast subject, and if long and careful preparations will insure a great conference, this will be one of as far-reaching significance as the Edinburgh Missionary conference of 1910. A meeting is to be held on the 26th in London to enlist sympathy for this noble purpose. Dr. Temple, the Bishop of Manchester, is to preside. The speakers' names are significant: Mr. John Drinkwater, "The Artist and the New World"; Dr. A. E. Garvie and Father Bede Jarrett, "The Part of the Church"; Miss Margaret Bondfield, "The Part of Labor"; Mr. Sydney W. Pascall, "The Part of Business"; Rev. C. E. Raven, "The Probable Issue"; and the Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, "The Cost." This list reveals a striking catholicity. Of churches, the Roman, Anglican, and Free are represented, and there are those whose labels are not known to me. Labor is there, and commerce. Quite rightly the poet has his place to plead for the artist in the new world. The secretaries of the movement are Miss Lucy Gardner and Rev. C. E. Raven. The time 1924 seems far off, but I imagine to the secretaries, knowing how much ground there is to cover, it must seem to be drawing near at an alarming rate.

Political Alarums

All the talk now is of the election. The Tadpoles and Tapers are busy everywhere. Party leaders are conferring in secret and in semi-secret, with the solemn pretence—do they always keep it up?—that the country has no other choice but between one or other of the traditional order of statesmen. The premier at Manchester made a speech, all the more subtle and powerful because it was full of mysterious signals, which could be understood only by those who knew the code. On the near east situation I cannot find that his apology satisfied the critics, friendly or otherwise. The difficulty the man, who has no inner knowledge, finds is to discover the facts on which decisions are made. When he is called to give a decision upon a war, it has always by that time become inevitable. The real difficulties most men have were not answered by the premier. They concern the dealings with Greece and Angora long before the issue was one of the defense of Constantinople from the victorious Turks. Meanwhile most men feel that even in political warfare the attack upon Lord Gladstone was unfair, but, there again, we do not know very certainly to what it was a reply, and it is well to remember that the premier has had many bitter attacks to endure. When he came to handle the home situation, he showed himself the master hand once more. There is not a move in the game which he does not understand. He is certainly not finished as a political power, and at the moment there seems a likelihood that in spite of the strong conservative feeling against him he may carry with him his conservative members of the cabinet. Anyhow, his enemies are discovering that the old fighter is still expert with his weapons.

Mr. Lloyd George on Heredity

It is amusing to set side by side the premier's reference to Mr. Austen Chamberlain, son of Joseph Chamberlain, and Lord Gladstone, son of William Ewart Gladstone. "My task in explaining the action of the government has been rendered very much easier by the speech which Mr. Chamberlain, made with hereditary point and force, delivered yesterday." . . . "But Lord Gladstone excommunicates us. What service has he rendered Liberalism? I know of no service except one. He is the best living embodiment of the Liberal doctrine that quality is not hereditary." In the one case there is "hereditary" point; in the other the proof that "quality is not hereditary."

Canon Barnes on the Religion of Urban Dwellers

"If the great Victorians, who fifty years ago established universal elementary education in this country, could see its effects on religious thought they would be horrified. The whole community can now read and write. In the popular press every sensational pseudo-religious crudity finds expression. It is hardly necessary to clothe some fantastic belief in a bastard scientific or metaphysical jargon for it to gain acceptance. The work of the best thinkers is largely ignored: it is submerged beneath the torrent let loose by ignorant enthusiasm. The contempt of the wise no longer restrains superstitious folly: crude thought appears respectable when sufficiently widespread. The evil is not confined to the workers: probably there is more religious barbarism among women who live easy and superficially cultured lives than elsewhere in the community. Urban dwellers of all classes seem especially attracted by degenerate religious cults. Their lives are artificial, their thought often quick and shallow, perhaps because the purifying influences of Nature which steadied their ancestors no longer restrain them. In the country the past holds us. Nature is always telling us of her power, reminding us of the simplicity of beauty. The naturalness of birth and death, toil and pain, cannot be forgotten. We know that we cannot escape from evil and suffering by pretending that they are non-existent. The village churchyard is a perpetual reminder of the brevity of human life. There is, in such surroundings, a danger of simple paganism; but the complex absurdities and shallow enthusiasm which too often take the place of spiritual understanding in town-dwellers find no foothold."

This searching analysis by Canon Barnes of the dangers to the religious life of urban dwellers raises the whole question—how far the churches have really faced the new situation created by the growth of vast cities?

Our Religious Poetry

We sometimes forget how rich in religious poetry our language is, and it is not to remote days only that we must turn for this inspiration. The other day I had occasion to look up a reference in the poetry of Mary E. Coleridge, who inherited and adorned a great name. I could not put the book down. I had not read it for years, but the beauty of it came back as fresh as ever. I have copied out four lines:

"Sunshine let it be or frost,
Storm or calm, as Thou shalt choose,
Though Thine every gift were lost,
Thee Thyself we could not lose."

This is worthy of your own Father Tabb, and what higher praise could be given? EDWARD SHILLITO

CORRESPONDENCE

The Methodist Waste Basket

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: How interesting life is becoming! Dr. Brightman having rebuked what he interprets as my purpose to read a writ of excommunication proceeds to put me into my waste-basket. For there, he says, "are to be found all historical and mystical experiences and reason itself." If, therefore, I am reasonable I belong in my own waste-basket. If I am not reasonable I belong—perhaps in the asylum. I agree!

I am greatly surprised that a philosopher should find in my letter what Dr. Brightman seems to find there. Surely anyone who will read that letter and will give words their ordinary value will absolve me from any desire to excommunicate anybody. I should be the first to protest if anyone should start a "heresy hunt" after Dr. Tittle or even after Dr. Brightman. The only sentence in my letter that could at all bear the meaning Dr. Brightman has put upon it is the one which he quotes, ending, "but we venture to say they are not Methodists." That sentence may have but two interpretations: "none of them are Methodists" or "they are not inclusive of the Methodist body." The latter represents my meaning. I did not mean to say that no man holding Dr. Tittle's view is a Methodist but that such men do not compose exclusively nor even mainly the Methodist church. If Dr. Brightman will read my letter again he will find there a spirit of real appreciation for men like Dr. Tittle and, in the closing paragraph, the statement that I wrote only because I felt that in his article Dr. Tittle had failed to do "entire" justice to Methodism. That is quite another thing from saying that he did not in any measure represent the Methodist viewpoint.

Again, I did not nor do I deny "that either experience, rationalism or mysticism give us any grounds for faith." What I said was that I deplored "both rationalism and mysticism as arbiters of thought." Surely anybody acquainted with the history of philosophy will agree with that. Since Bacon dragged the philosophers out of their attics and told them that they must reckon with the world of experience, pure rationalism has had little standing as the maker and ruler of philosophical systems. And the research of the psychologist has made it pretty clear that we cannot quote the "inner voices" of mysticism in final corroboration of our opinions about ultimate reality. It was for this reason that instead of dumping experience into the waste-basket, as Dr. Brightman says I did, I insisted on "experience as the corrective of social and religious judgments."

What I plead for is a recognition of the personal history of Jesus. Dr. Brightman urges that the innocent bystander may say: "We hear the voice of Mohammed and we believe him; the voice of Buddha and believe him; the voices of Nietzsche and Mary Baker Eddy and believe them." To the innocent bystander and to the wise philosopher alike we would answer that the Jesus of history is quite a different person from these rival voices and that it is just this vast difference between them and him whom Lanier describes as "sovereign seer of time," "poet's Poet," "wisdom's Tongue," "man's best Man," "love's best Love," this "perfect life in perfect labor writ," that furnishes presumptive evidence in favor of Jesus' superior authority. I recognize, as Mr. Hobart says in his letter, that Jesus' history is not finished. The gospels are a record of what he "began to do and teach." But surely it must be recognized too that it was that historical beginning which gave the early church its deathless inspiration and which today is a trumpet call that strongly stirs the hearts of men all along Christendom's far-flung battle line. I agree that if nothing beneficial had happened in men's lives through the centuries as the result of their discipleship of Jesus, that fact would be a disturbing factor in our thinking. But I am also sure that it is because of what happened in his life in the first century that men in the beginning made an essay at discipleship and that it is the memory of what He was and of what He did that steadies us in the difficult days when cynics and the "weary weight of the unintelligible world" challenge the validity of the Christian ideal and the Christian program.

Congregationalists Concerned with Episcopal Action

The action of the recent Episcopal convention in providing for the possibility of the ordination of ministers who would serve outside the Episcopal church has moved Rev. Newman Smyth to call together the Congregational committee on church unity. He states in his call: "The action of the Episcopal convention is of such importance that it requires the immediate and careful consideration of our Congregational commission on unity. A meeting for that purpose we are now calling. Until we shall have the full text of the Episcopal discussion and action, and our own commission shall determine the next step for us to take, I must refrain from any comment on that. An appeal to the Christian people of all churches over all the ecclesiastics may be necessary to bring about the final achievement of church unity. Surely the Christian church cannot remain fiddling while our modern civilization is burning."

Sixty Miles from Railroad

Rev. C. L. Campbell, Presbyterian missionary among the Navajo Indians in New Mexico, lives sixty miles from a railroad for he has taken up his abode among Indians who have only recently received the gospel. His labors have been crowned with success, and two new buildings were recently dedicated to religious work. These are St. Paul's church at Shiprock and the Refuge Hospital and Mission House at Redrock. The church building has a seating capacity of 400 and the hospital has 30 beds and a comfortable house for the physician who will live there.

Methodists Unanimous for Union

The eleventh general conference of the Canadian Methodist church is probably the last that ever will be held. The conference voted unanimously to enter the Congregationalists. The plan for union has been pending for the past twenty years but its consummation was delayed by the war. Much valuable time has been consumed in winning a minority of the Presbyterian church. Meanwhile in the great northwest whole sections have taken the law into their own hands and have organized union churches independently which will be at once merged into the national church of evangelicals when this church is formed. Thus Canada alone of the English-speaking countries will not have a Methodist church, though the John Wesley tradition in religion will naturally be cherished.

Retirement of Higher Critic Produces Sensation

When Bishop Stunz retired Rev. J. D. M. Buckner on an old age pension, he did not realize that this matter would become the subject of newspaper discussion throughout the country. Mr. Buckner has ceased to believe that God killed some children because they called Elisha "bald-pate." He holds that God always does good and never evil, and that he therefore never gave any instructions to kill the Amalekites. He has preached in Aurora, Neb., for the past eleven years, and his Methodist church petitioned the conference to send him back. The newspaper reports of a sermon in which critical theories of the Bible were set forth were in the hands of the bishop when he arrived at conference, and Mr. Buckner was asked to retire gracefully, which he refused to do. He has now issued a booklet containing his religious views and the story of his forced retirement. He is 67 years of age and has a fine

Chicago Church Federation

FOREMOST among the city church federations of the country, the Chicago organization in its annual meeting presented a report of activities that was highly gratifying. The annual meeting was held at the Morrison hotel Oct. 31. Two new denominations were added to the list of the Federation fellowship during the past year, the Methodist Protestant church and the Reformed church in the United States. This makes a total of sixteen cooperating denominations. The number of denominations has been decreased by one through the union of the Evangelical association and the United Evangelical church.

During the past year the Daily Vacation Bible school asked to be received into the federation as a commission. This was gladly acceded to, and the past year has been the best in the history of this good enterprise. More than two hundred schools were organized and supported by 250 churches. The chairman of this work the past year was Rev. George J. Searles.

Among the new enterprises of the year has been the arrangement to assist in the support of Rev. John A. St. Clair at the Speedway hospital where a number of ex-service men are still under treatment. He went there first representing the United Lutheran church, but is now the representative of organized Protestantism in the city.

The evangelistic work of the churches has reached new levels of efficiency. A grand total of 37,320 additions to the membership of the churches was reported. Open air evangelism has been promoted, some of the most eminent churchmen of the city participating in this kind of work.

The federation has no more important work than the support of religious activity in public institutions. Miss Jennie Beardsley served at the State Training School for Girls at Geneva, and conducted a Sunday school for these girls. She also makes personal visits on girls that have recently come to the school and carries on religious conversations with these girls in a very helpful way. Miss Helma Sutherland carries on a similar work among the boys at the St. Charles school. She also visits the women prisoners at Joliet where twenty-two are serving life terms for murder. The work of Rev. William J. Maplesden at the Cook County Tuberculosis Sanitarium is to make personal visitations and to carry on religious services on Sundays and Fridays. The wheel chair patients come to these meetings. Edgar C. Swartout is representative of the Federation at the Glenwood manual training school and Christopher J. Malfe at the House of Correction.

The monthly ministers' meetings the past year have reached an unusual standard, some of the most eminent churchmen in America coming to these meetings to speak. The various denominations have voted again this year to give up one meeting a month to join in these union meetings.

One of the vices of the Federation in the past was the passing of resolutions on hear-say evidence or newspaper talk. There was a brief but spirited debate at the annual meeting over a resolution which contained several thousand words of "whereases" in the form of newspaper clippings on the matter of gambling at the racetrack. Former president, Judge Bradley, entered an emphatic protest against the consideration of such resolutions which were too long to be even read in the meeting and the whole subject of racetrack gambling was sent back to committee. The Federation is losing some of that pathetic faith in resolutions which is so often found among church people, and sees the increasing importance of publicity methods.

The National Publicity conference which was in session during the entire day of the meeting of the Church Federation was a church federation enterprise. A permanent commission studies publicity continually and is considering a plan for whole page ads in city papers with neighborhood list of churches in place of the denominational lists which have prevailed.

The following list of officers was elected for the coming year: President, Rev. Howard Agnew Johnston; vice-president, Dr. Fred D. Stone; second vice-president, R. C. Gibson; recording secretary, R. Clarence Brown; treasurer, Harry Brinkman. Special mention was made of the reappointment of Mr. Walter R. Mee, executive secretary. The committee recommended to the finance committee an increase of salary for Mr. Mee lest he be tempted away from the federation offices by an offer of larger salary elsewhere.

library, though not a university trained man. He asserts that when he asked the bishop whether that ecclesiastic believed in the bear story of the old testament that person did not answer. Among other interesting statements made by Mr. Buckner is one that the Methodist church now teaches officially in the conference study books the very views which he has been condemned for teaching in his church.

Sadhu Sundar Singh Returns Home

After another visit to England, Sadhu Sundar Singh has returned to his native land. He addressed an audience of 15,000 in Copenhagen on one occasion. He was baptized at the age of sixteen and since then has been pursuing the career of a holy man, after the custom of his country, renouncing the world and its desires, though continuing to preach Christ. While in Tibet on a preaching journey, he was thrown into an old well full of bones of dead men, and the lid was fastened down. After three days in this horrible dungeon he was rescued by an unknown friend. His career marks him as one of the most unusual characters in all Christendom.

Bishop of Guatamala Is Expelled from Country

Bishop Alvarez has been expelled from Guatamala. He fell into difficulties with the government officials in that country, and has been compelled to take up residence in an adjacent state. The hierarchy in Washington recently sent him a telegram of sympathy. His banishment is ascribed to masonic influence by his Roman Catholic friends.

Twenty Denominations Unite in One Church

At Jackson Heights, Long Island, 300 members of twenty different denominations have come together to form a community church. The congregation will be affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal denomination. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, who spoke at a recent cornerstone laying, said: “This symbolizes the unification of the Protestant faith. Your enterprise here has also wider promise because you have chosen to affiliate with one of the great denominations which does work throughout the world. You will not suffer from the lack or the loss of this greater conception as some union churches have done in fearing connection of interest to all denominations. I would rather that you would make this wider connection with any of the great denominations other than my own than to fail to have this benefit of the general principles and doctrine and theology of the church as a whole.” The bishop warned against the suspicions which sometimes creep into these cooperative movements. The building enterprise means an investment of about $175,000.

American Bible Society Loses a Member of Board

By the death on October 17 of the Rev. Dr. Reese P. Alsop, a prominent clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal church in New York, canon of the Cathedral of the Incarnation and rector emeritus of St. Ann's church in Brooklyn, the American Bible Society has lost the chairman of its versions committee. Dr. Alsop has been for years very faithful in attendance upon the meetings of this committee which takes into consideration all the questions arising in connection with the translation of the Bible into new languages in different parts of the world and the revision of such transactions where changes in the language make this necessary or desirable. The committee on versions consists of eminent scholars, heads of theological seminaries, professors and men who have spent their years in studies cognate to these questions.

Eminent Clergyman Now a Bishop

With much ecclesiastical pomp Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery was made bishop coadjutor of Massachusetts on October 31. The procession which had in it some church of England officials as well as American bishops from east and west, moved from the chapel of Phillips Brooks' old church along Copley square to the cathedral. Bishop Slattery was born in Maine, educated at Harvard and the Episcopal Theological School and early was made dean of the Cathedral at Fairbault, Minn. Bishop Slattery is widely known as a scholar and writer on religious topics. As Bishop Lawrence will virtually retire from active service in the diocese for some special projects, the new bishop comes at once into large responsibility.

Conservative Disciples Meet in St. Louis

The conservative wing of the Disciples was commanded by its favorite newspaper to stay away from the convention at Winona Lake this year, and without doubt many followed this mandate. The

Conference on Church Publicity

THE National Conference on Church Publicity promoted by the Chicago Church Federation and participated in by men from various parts of the nation was in every way a success. Several hundred religious leaders, both clerical and lay, were gathered last week for an all-day session of addresses which were packed with information and inspiration. In the morning a professional advertising man made the preachers realize that they had never yet studied their subject scientifically. He had blue prints of advertising campaigns for various projects, and this connection gave the field, the tools, and the psychology of the advertising campaign their proper place.

In the morning program nothing was more diverting than the story told by Rev. William L. Stidger on how he had captured the good-will of Detroit over night. On the evening of the day he arrived in town to take charge of a small Methodist church that was head over heels in debt, the papers told of a little girl hurt in an auto accident and whose legs had been amputated. Upon visiting the home he found that it had no church affiliations and the next morning members of the congregation of St. Mark's Methodist church were asked to leave in his hands as they greeted the new pastor, some money for the education of the little girl. The newspapers were after the story at once, and completed a campaign for ten thousand dollars for the unfortunate child. This was cited to show how a minister can be unwittingly made by church publicity. Ever afterwards Detroit knew about St. Mark's church.

Dr. Christian F. Reisner of New York is father to the church publicity movement in America, but he is generous to all his fellow workers in the same field, and professional church advertisers like Rev J. Brabner Smith, Mr. Herbert H. Smith of the Presbyterian board of Philadelphia, and others were present and gave addresses. On the suggestion of Dr. Reisner, a telegram was sent from the conference asking D. W. Griffith to go on with his expressed purpose of producing a film on the life of Christ.

Editors of several city newspapers upon the program suggested methods of increasing the space the newspaper might legitimately give to the church. The human interest story in religion is the thing they want, and newspaper headlines of recent religious stories in the secular press were read to illustrate the idea. The preachers were charged with a pathetic belief in the news value of sermons, meetings and conventions, whereas the general public is not at all interested in this phase of church publicity. Mr. Henry J. Smith read his paper in the form of a dialogue which roused the meeting at the close of the afternoon session from the weariness into which it had fallen after hours of talk into alert attention.

At the dinner at the City Club, the religious editors of the city and some of its most eminent pastors spoke. Rev. W. H. Carwardine, religious editor of the Chicago Examiner, remarked on the growing liberality of the press, and said that an incident of some years ago, when a city editor rejected, with much profanity, a story of his whose heroine was a negress, would be impossible at the present time. The newspaper of today must give every section of the community its proper share of attention. He denied that the Roman Catholic church controls the press, as is often charged, and insisted that if there were any injustice, it was that the Roman church was discriminated against.

The ministers who advocate church publicity were urged by the president, Dr. Christian F. Reisner, to go to the annual meeting of the Associated Ad Clubs at Atlantic City next June. At that time this organization, as in years past, will provide without charge the place of meeting and much of the expense for those who wish to see the church brought into the focus of public attention through the skilful and directed use of the various agencies of advertising.

third week in October a meeting was held in St. Louis which is variously estimated from a few hundred on up to several thousand, the latter figure being the attendance to hear Bryan's lecture. The latter incident was diverting, for the Christian Standard has in recent years objected violently to the presence of "unimmersed sectarians" on the national programs, but was willing to bring in William Jennings Bryan, an unimmersed Presbyterian. The Congress managers had promised that the meeting should not be used to attack the national organizations of the church. This pledge was broken under the subterfuge of a second Congress organized out of the members of the first. However, the attacks on the United Christian Missionary Society divided the company into two hostile groups and made concerted action impossible. The supposed theme of the Congress was the improvement of methods in the work of the local church, an entirely praiseworthy object, if it had been adhered to in the conduct of the meetings.

Methodists Lay Cornerstone for Skyscraper

The Methodists in the Chicago area gathered in large numbers on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 5, to witness the laying of the cornerstone of the new structure that will house First Methodist church. It is a skyscraper with more than twenty floors besides the great church spire that will tower above the structure. The church will have quarters on the ground floor. Rev. John Thompson, pastor of the church, presided at the cornerstone laying.

Prompt Action in Relief Measures

The efficiency of modern philanthropic operations almost passes belief. When the story of the disaster at Smyrna was flashed to the civilized world, the Near East Relief released a shipload of supplies from Constantinople that was intended for the orphans of Armenia, but large additional supplies were needed. A ship loaded with food stuffs was at the moment passing Gilbraltar, but there was no fund with which to purchase its supplies. R. J. Cuddihy of the Literary Digest borrowed money at the bank in the name of that journal, wirelessed an order for the food, and the ship arrived at Constantinople on Oct. 2. One may well doubt whether philanthropy ever acted with more speed in the history of the world. Funds are now being collected in America to pay for this shipload of supplies and others that must be sent for hundreds of thousands are on the verge of a miserable death owing to the hatred of the Turk.

Norfolk Churches Hold Special Meetings

The churches of Norfolk, Va., have just completed a series of special meetings which were addressed by Mr. Whitney Wilson, American correspondent of the London Times who is best known in the Christian world as author of "The Christ We Forget." He delivered two addresses a day, one a series on the life of Christ, and the other a series on "The Bible and Public Questions." The committee in charge was appointed by the Norfolk Federation of Churches.

Pastor of Well-Known Community Church Dies

Members of the university community at Madison, Wis., who attend Westminster church, a community church in a residential section, were greatly shocked on Sunday morning, Oct. 8, to learn that their minister, Dr. Thomas Knox, was dead. Dr. Knox was born in Belfast, and educated at New York University and Union Seminary. He has served a number of churches, among them Oakwood Union church of Chicago, the Presbyterian churches in Aurora and Charleston, Ill., Cincinnati and Lima, O. He is remembered by his former parishioners as a man of liberal mind, gracious spirit, and of great helpfulness to the people who waited on his ministry.

Centennial of Yale Divinity School

Yale Divinity School recently observed the one hundredth anniversary of its founding. Alumni of many classes were present at the exercises and the Yale alumni in attendance at the American Board meetings in Evanston last week sent a telegram of greeting. In addition to the Lyman Beecher lectures on preaching by Dean Charles R. Brown, the Nathaniel W. Taylor lectures by President Arthur C. McGiffert of Union Theological Seminary, the alumni lecture by Prof. Benjamin W. Bacon and the historical address by Prof. Henry B. Wright, there were addresses by distinguished guests and representatives of other universities. The alumni were shown hospitality at the school during these exercises.

Bohemian Bishop Visits America

Bishop Gorazd Pavlik, a dignitary of the new Bohemian church that has arisen out of the Roman Catholic church, is now in this country. He visited the Episcopal convention in Portland where he was received with honors. His spirit is broad, and he is trying to establish relations with the orthodox church and with Protestantism. His communion needs more priests to take care of the people who have come over, and the question of church buildings is still awaiting settlement when the government separates church and state. The people leaving the Roman communion insist that their historic buildings shall belong to the people who have always used them.

Methodists Establish Community Church

The Methodist Episcopal church has established a church of the "denominational community" type at Garden Homes, a suburb of Chicago, in spite of the denunciation of community churches in the church press in this section. Seventeen denominations are affiliated in a single church and recently dedicated a building which was consecrated by Dr. P. H. Swift and Dr. John Thompson. Rev. J. P. Stafford, director of the social service department at Swift's, will preach for the infant church.

Lutherans Give Out Statistics

The United Lutheran church during its recent convention in Buffalo gave out statistics with regard to Lutheran strength in America. They have 15,857 congregations, 10,162 ministers, 3,770,663 baptized members, and 2,515,662 confirmed members. They are the third Protestant denomination in size, being exceeded only by Baptists and Methodists. The net increase in membership the past year was 50,000. The Sunday school enrolment is low for such a strong denomination, there being only 973,411 enrolled pupils. The decrease in enrolment was 45,665. The denomination spent $10,349,899 during the past year, of which $10,349,899 is credited to benevolence. It owns propery valued at

Japan After Seven Years

A LETTER from Miyazaki, Japan, under date of Oct. 8, from Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, Secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Goodwill, records his warm reception on arriving in his old home. In company with Mr. Frederick Moore, Foreign Counselor to the Japanese Ministry of Affairs, he has had conferences with many of the most prominent figures in Japan, including Prince Tokugawa, the Premier, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Viscount Shibusawa, and Dr. Soyeda, discussing with them present tendencies in Japanese life and in American-Japanese relations. With the leading Japanese Christians Dr. Gulick has also had many conferences. Of especial interest is his account, reported to him by the most responsible observers, "of the bewildering effects on the Japanese delegates to the Washington conference of Secretary Hughes' 'bolt from the blue', and especially of the opening prayer—which two episodes convinced them that they were in the presence of Christian America. This last was told in a private meeting by one of the younger men who said he came home a Christian because of what he saw and heard."

Japan, according to Dr. Gulick, is carrying out both the letter and the spirit of the Washington agreements. When Dr. Gulick spoke of the fact that he was to spend several months in China he was asked to give frankly, on his return, his impressions of Chinese-Japanese relations. "Several (of the Japanese leaders) said with much emphasis that they well knew that matters are not all right; that they are trying to correct mistakes; and that they especially desire to have suggestions that would help them." Dr. Gulick is to spend most of his time abroad in China and Korea, studying the situation from their standpoint.

$193,027,449 against which there is a very small indebtedness, probably the least to be found in any denomination in the country, $9,940,851.

Would Start Action Against Fosdick

Just prior to the Northern Baptist convention in June, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick of New York preached a sermon in First Presbyterian church of New York on "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" which was published in The Christian Century. In this sermon Dr. Fosdick indicates that many religions have postulated a miraculous birth for their founders. These implications with regard to the Virgin Birth, have resulted in an attack against Dr. Fosdick in the Philadelphia presbytery by Dr. Clarence Edward McCartney of Arch Street Presbyterian church of Philadelphia. He cannot summon Dr. Fosdick for heresy since the latter is a Baptist in good standing in his denomination, though preaching for a Presbyterian church. But Dr. McCartney threatens to have General Assembly inquire into the preaching that is being given on "Shall Unbelief Win? a Reply to Dr. Fosdick." The Philadelphia presbytery went into executive session to consider the charges of Dr. McCartney, and the debate waged for three hours.

Methodists Will Observe Good Literature Sunday

October 29 was observed in many Methodist churches as Good Literature Sunday. In that day Christian papers and Christian books were commended to the congregations. Rev. H. E. Luccock of New York was in charge of the campaign this year. In many Methodist churches the announcement was not limited to the journals of the denomination. The official circular was journalese in its style and Methodists were exhorted in this fashion: "Exercise the mind as well as the jaw. The Advocate costs less per

Hymns of the Centuries

is the FIRST dignified hymnal to be published with the words printed within the music staff.

The publishers of a competing book which closely resembles "Hymns of the Centuries" in form and content, claim that theirs is "The hymnal that is revolutionizing congregational singing in hundreds of churches"!

If this be true, "Hymns of the Centuries," published six years before the other, started the revolution!

Hundreds of churches are using "Hymns of the Centuries" with ever increasing satisfaction. Pastors report that their congregational singing has improved wonderfully.

"Hymns of the Centuries" is still the favorite. It retains the old and well loved hymns set to the right tunes, while it gives ample space to hymns of Social Service, Brotherhood, the Kingdom of God and the Spiritual Life.

"Hymns of the Centuries" does not sacrifice the dearly loved hymns and tunes for those untried selections that have not proved themselves worthy of a place in a modern, usable and thoroughly satisfactory hymnal.

Since the triennial convention of the Young Men's Christian Association is to be held this year at Atlantic City, Nov. 12-18, there will be a special reason for keeping the anniversary in mind.

Goes on With Libel Suit

The work of relieving famine victims in Russia has been much hindered by propagandists in America who have sought to raise political bogeys. Captain Paxton Hibben, secretary of the Russian Red Cross in America and executive secretary of the American Committee for Relief of Russian Children, sued the Boston Transcript for libel because of an article published October 4 on "The Reds in America," and the sheriff has recently attached the property of the paper for the amount named in the suit. Captain Paxton recently returned from Russia where he made arrangements for the importation of hand-craft articles that will be sold in the United States for the benefit of his fund. He declares that his organization has nothing to do with the

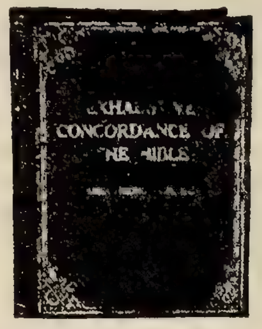
STRONG'S
A COMPLETE CONCORDANCE
AN UNFAILING HELPER
IT CAN NEVER BE DISPLACED



Bishop Francis J. McConnell: "I use it constantly. It is as invaluable to me as the dictionary."
Bishop Thomas Nicholson: "I regard it as one of the most complete and satisfactory works of its kind ever produced. It is not at all outgrown."
Professor Robert W. Rogers: "It is not only incomparably the best Concordance to the English Bible, it is so far superior to every other that there is not even a second to it. It is first, and the rest are nowhere."
Professor D. A. Hayes: "The best Concordance is next in value to the Bible itself as a key to Bible Knowledge. It ranks before the Dictionaries and all other helps. Strong's Concordance is the best."
Professor Lindsay B. Longacre: "I have used it since its first issue and find it quite indispensable. No preacher, teacher, or student, it seems to me, could be quite content with any other."

Modernist Episcopalians Organize

At a recent meeting in New York a Modern Churchmen's Union was organized, officers elected, an editorial board appointed. A program of action was adopted. The members of the new organization pay dues of two dollars a year. The following is the program adopted: "Believing that Christ is the way, the truth and the life, it is our purpose:

"1. To affirm the continuous activities of the Divine Spirit in all spheres of life and thought.

"2. To maintain the right to interpret the historic expressions of our faith in accordance with the results of modern science and of biblical and historical scholarship.

"3. To advance co-operation and fellowship between the Protestant Episcopal church and other Protestant churches.

"4. To emphasize the importance of the preaching ministry as a means for the wider extension of the kingdom of God.

"5. To further the application of Christian principles in every sphere of industrial, social and international relations.

"6. To encourage greater freedom and elasticity in the worship of the church in order to adapt it to the needs and thoughts of the times.

"7 To emphasize afresh the nature of the Christian life as personal fellowship with God."

Disciples' Society Faces New Projects

The United Christian Missionary Society announces a forty per cent increase in October offerings this year as compared with the same period last year. Hurtful economics had been inaugurated, but the society is now talking of advance steps to be taken in the near future. Among these is a projected national sanatorium for the care of tubercular patients. This will be located in the vicinity of El Paso, Tex. Among the interesting gifts of the past month was one from a lumber firm in Lexing-

"WHITE GIFTS FOR THE KING"

OFFERS YOU

The Unexcelled Christmas Service

What the Users Report

A Service That All Enjoy

"The large audience sat in such rapt attention as I have seldom seen. The outcome brought me more joy than any service with which I have ever had to do. Oldest members said they never saw its like in the history of the church; outsiders and even church workers said they were wonderfully impressed. We secured what we went after, a reverent, sacred and worshipful observance of Christmas. Nor is this all. The individual pledges of 'service' and 'selves' seen only by the pastor, have been kept throughout the year by many. The Sunday School did not miss its noisy, rollicking, unchurchly Christmas. The demand is universal for a 'White Gifts for the King' service this year."

That Draws Numbers

"We had a wonderful 'White Gifts for the King' service. Our church had about 1200 packed in, and they told me about 500 were turned away after the doors were closed."

That Teaches the Joy of Giving

"Above all, five boys and young men dedicated themselves to Christ, four by confession of faith."

"* * * And when it was found we had given over $1,000—we who had been wont to give casually and lightly—the 'great joy' of Christmas shone in every face, and the peace of Christ sank into our hearts. * * * We had learned the gladness of giving, in the best Christmas we ever had."

Your School and Church

May reap the same rich blessings that these and many, many others have. It will make your Christmas the crowning day of all special days in the year. "White Gifts for the King" is the most popular Christmas service on the market today, and is gaining new followers year after year. To get the biggest and best results you must get the biggest and best program.

WHAT TO ORDER

"Complete White Gifts for the King"

This is a new book containing all the material obtainable referring to "White Gifts for the King." It is a compilation of Mrs. Curtiss' book, new this year, of all the services published to date and pictures of the suggestion blank and envelope. Every church should have this for reference year after year, that its Christmas committee may prepare its program with full intelligence of the plan. This is what you should buy first. You must have it all to get the necessary vision and information.

Price per copy, $1.00.

Or Outfit No. 45

For those who have the "White Gifts for the King" services previous to this year, we offer Outfit No. 45, which consists of Mrs. Curtiss' New book, of the 1923 service, "The Adoration Pageant," and sample of Suggestion Blanks and Envelopes.

Price, 45 cents.

Next Disciples' Convention Goes to Colorado Springs

The International Convention of the Disciples of Christ is slated for Colorado Springs next year. A number of invitations were extended ,and some considerable spirit in the claims of rival cities. Among the cities named are Hot Springs, Jacksonville and Birmingham. The last convention placed in the hands of the executive committee the power of fixing the date and place of the convention and announcement is now made of their decision. The date chosen is September 4-11. At this convention the United Christian Missionary Society, the Board of Education, the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare and the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity make reports.

Methodists Make Way for Congregationalists

In Twinsburg, O., there have been two churches where there should be only one. The Methodists of the town some time ago offered to unite with the Congregational church provided the latter became a "community" church. The change in form of organization was made, and Twinsburg now has a single church with a membership of 265 and a Sunday school enrolment of 220. Rev. C. H. Moe is pastor of the new organization.

TWENTY FIVE THOUSAND

Over twenty-five thousand claims have been paid by the Ministers Casualty Union since its organization, twenty-two years ago. Thousands of appreciative letters have told us of the relief brought by these payments in times of anxiety and financial stress.

This winter we will be paying from three to five hundred claims a month to ministers, their widows and other beneficiaries. YOU may be among those who will need the service which the Union renders. The cost of membership is nominal. The need of disability insurance is obvious and urgent. Be prepared.

ON REQUEST, WE WILL GLADLY SEND INFORMATION TO ANY ACTIVE CLERGYMAN. PLEASE STATE POSITION HELD.

The Twinsburg Congregational church employed a pastor a hundred years ago at a salary of $150 per year. The present pastor has a salary of $2,000 and parsonage. The centennial of the founding of the first church in Twinsburg is being celebrated this year.

Half a Billion Given for Religion

The growing liberality of the Christian churches of America is a significant fact in our national life. The Federal Council of Churches in its statistical department has secured the figures for the giving last year, and announces the amount as $488,424,084. Some churches report only their missionary offerings, so the figure is too small. The Methodist bodies lead with offerings of $130,730,479; the Roman Catholic is second with $75,368,294, and the Baptists are third with $60,798,534. It is a long way for the churches to go to realize their stewardship aims, but the results are much larger than many citizens would have supposed.

Cincinnati Churches Work Together

The evangelical forces in Cincinnati are planning a number of activities together. November 6 was observed as law observance Sunday. The Federation of Churches is seeking through the church organizations to create a new respect for law. November is also church attendance month, and many neighborhoods will put on a special canvas in behalf of larger church attendance. The churches will also combine in behalf of an evangelistic effort in the weeks preceding Easter.

Church Leaders Aid In Balkan Problems

Rev. R. V. Markham, an American board missionary in the Balkans, reports that the religious leaders of the orthodox national churches in the Balkans are beginning to see their responsibility in assisting in keeping the peace. Rev. P. Touleshkoff, secretary of the Bulgarian brotherhood of priests, has sent a letter to the editor of Vestnik, the organ of the organized Serbian priests in Belgrade. The letter is in fine Christian humility and sets for the clergy of the various nations the great task of preaching brotherhood. The historic hatred of Bulgarians and Serbians has been one of the most pronounced facts in the study of the Balkan country.

Wants Methodists to Consolidate

Fewer churches and better ones is the policy announced by Rev. John S. Rutledge, executive secretary of the Cleveland Methodist Union. Several consolidations of Methodist churches have been affected in recent years, but there are still 28 which Mr. Rutledge declares is eight too many. The Lakewood church in a Cleveland suburb has 3,000 members, which is the largest Methodist church in the country. Only four of the Cleveland churches of the Methodist persuasion have over a thousand members. Thirteen have less than five hundred. "If the consolidations are effected," Mr.

CARD METHOD OF RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION
FOR HOME AND SUNDAY SCHOOL
"THE LIFE OF CHRIST"
Prepared by George P. Atwater, D. D.

Sets of cards—forty cards to the set—four simple questions and answers on each card—teaching fundamental facts in the life of Christ. By this method parents easily make home religious instruction effective and enjoyable through a game played like "authors." Solves problems for the inexperienced Sunday School teacher. Children share in the teaching. An ever-ready substitute teacher. Instantly captures attention and sustains interest. Every Christian home should have these sets.

Lloyd C. Douglas writes: "We are delighted with the card system of teaching 'The Life of Christ.' Our squirmy seventh-graders are no longer a pest and a problem. Their teacher is getting some joy out of life on Sunday mornings. I should hesitate to advise our Board of Deacons to enter a contest with these little chaps in an examination on the historical and geographical facts in the Life Supreme."

The New York Churchman says: "It is that happy combination—education and recreation. Children learn from it many valuable lessons, and also derive a great deal of pleasure."

"THE LIFE OF CHRIST—Series I, "Historical and Geographical Background"—forty cards to the set—Fifty Cents. Series II, "Early Years"—forty cards to the set—Fifty Cents. Two sets enough for a whole class for six months. Cards printed on best quality index bristol, and are a permanent possession. Each set in attractive box, with teacher's manual, charts, and maps. Other sets in preparation to complete subject. Sample cards sent on application.

Rutledge said, "the influence of the united churches will be stronger, and more people will be reached than under present conditions. Larger churches mean attractive buildings with social, recreational and educational equipment, adequately manned by a staff of workers and substantially financed. Within the boundaries of a thickly settled city, there should be strong, well equipped churches within the reach of everybody."

American Secretary of State Sees Protestant Work in Brazil

While in Brazil, Secretary Hughes attended the American Union church in Rio de Janiero. Dr. Webster E. Browning preached on "The Spiritual Significance of Pan-Americanism." The preacher insisted that diplomatic and trade relations do not weld nations together as firmly as do cultural and spiritual relations. In the afternoon the American Secretary of State attended a reception given to the well-known journalist, José Carlos Rodriguez. This journalist was once the proprietor of the largest paper in the city, but is now giving his time entirely to an evangelical introduction to the Bible, as he believes that a wider understanding of the scriptures would do more to solve Brazil's problems than anything else.

American Churchmen Visit Graves in France

The major part of the gallant lads that went to their death in the world war under the Stars and Stripes still lie buried in France. There has come a wave of critical gossip with regard to the care of these graves so the Federal Council appointed a committee of eminent churchmen to visit the graves and make report. This commission consisted of Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, Rev. Chauncey M. Goodrich and Dr. Charles S. Macfarland. They visited all the principal burying grounds in France where American graves may be found, and observed that much work had been done to beautify these places. The commission recommends an appropriation from Congress for the permanent care of the graves.

THE MISSIONARY SIGNIFICANCE OF THE LAST TEN YEARS
In Moslem Lands
In India
In Africa
will be especially valuable to the thoughtful readers of "The Christian Century" for understanding present-day international problems and tendencies, and indispensable to those interested in the world-wide activities of the Christian Church. These carefully-compiled, well-edited articles will appear quarterly in 1923 in
The International Review of Missions
which, representing the Protestant missionary forces of the entire world, has exceptional facilities for studying and estimating movements and events, both international and inter-racial, which bear on the msisionary enterprise. It is because of these facilities that the authoritative artcles are sought by ministers, laymen, educators and missionary administrators for careful study.
The Missionary Survey of the Year 1922
whch will occupy a large part of the January, 1923, number, will present the present missionary situation with a completeness and accuracy not found elsewhere.
Specific Problems and Spiritual Movements in Mission Field are discussed with a thoroughness arising from the special facilities of the "Review" which enable it to keep in close touch with missionary problems in the entire world. A few articles which will appear early in 1923 are "Polygamy and the Christian Church in West Africa" (Bishop Melville Jones), "The Christian Church and Public Health" (Dr. Arthur Lankester and others), "The Kilafat Movement in India" (W. Paton), "Relative Racial Capacity" (Dr. J. D. Fleming). Among contributors to the "Review" are such outstanding missionary authorities and students as Robert E Speer, Charles R. Watson, Samuel M. Zwemer, Canon Gairdner, and James H. Franklin. To an unusual degree the "Review" reflects the viewpoint of native leaders of the Christian Church on the mission field, affording an insight into the missionary movement not otherwise obtainable.
Meaty Book Reviews
All important books on missions appearing in English, French, German and in Dutch are carefully reviewed in detail. These reviews appear over the signature of some of the most careful students of missions, giving the reader the gist of current missionary literature in these four languages.
The "Review" is published in the months of January, April, July and October.

FLASHES OF DESPAIR!

FROM RUSSIA:

"No rain. Complete crop failure in some sections; best areas yield far below normal. We are again facing a famine, the severity of which will increase with each month of the coming winter. Decreases in our district this year: Population, 23%; horses, 72%; cows, 59%."

FROM POLAND:

"The magnitude of the devastation in Poland is unsuspected by the rest of the world. There are 400 miles of battle front which have gone back to wilderness. Destitute refugees are returning to find that their villages have vanished. Many face the horror of another winter in overcrowded dugouts."

FROM AUSTRIA:

"With conditions due to depreciation of krone growing hourly worse, and distress in Vienna rapidly increasing, the call for relief during the coming winter will be far beyond the resources of any relief mission."

Such extracts typify the latest despatches received from Quaker workers in Russia, Poland and Austria.

The American Friends Service Committee, with five years of experience in the administration of war and post-war relief, has units in all three fields aiding these sister nations in their hour of need. The extent to which aid can be rendered is limited only by the amount of funds received. The overhead expenses of the Committee are met by the Society of Friends; its workers are already on the field.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Election Returns Indecisive But Not Discouraging

HIGH spots of the recent election from the point of view of the liquor issue were the defeat in Ohio by 187,000 majority of a measure initiated by the wets the intent of which was to nullify the eighteenth amendment, and the carrying in California by 29,000 majority of a measure which brings that state into harmonious cooperation with the Volstead law. Probably no local results were watched with more eagerness than those in Illinois and Chicago. The city is the wet stronghold of the country. Anton Cermak, wet democrat, was elected president of the county board of commissioners by a substantial majority against a clean-cut dry republican, but this lapse is considerably offset by the election of a dry majority on the board itself thus leaving Mr. Cermak in the position of a minority leader. Illinois seemed to go for wine and beer on a direct referendum vote by a majority of nearly two to one, with Chicago voting three to one. But this vote is purely advisory in its effect and represents only a frction of the dry sentiment, the Anti-Saloon League having advised its followers not to vote at all, on the ground that the proposal was in violation of federal law and the national constitution. The complexion of congress has not at this writing been determined nor that of state legislatures. Remarkable results were secured by the League in getting a larger dry registration and poll them in previous bye-elections, but the guilty fact remains that had 90 per cent of the Christian citizenship been as active as 40 per cent were there would have been a sweeping victory everywhere for law enforcement. Experiencd prohibitionists, however, are not surprised that the liquor issue was not abruptly settled by the simple adoption of the eighteenth amendment. As in every county and state where within the past generation prohibition was adopted there followed at once a period of confusion and scandal through lax enforcement of the newly adopted law, so it is expected that before the nation settles down to sobriety and self-control a period of struggle must intervene. Of the outcome of that struggle there can be no doubt.

What Conservative Denominations Shy At

TWO leading denominations have in recent national meetings failed to come into the Federal Council of Churches cordially and fully. Each maintains an attitude of timid correspondence with the organization through which Protestantism is able to accomplish much work in common. The United Lutheran church will henceforth help pay Federal Council bills, but qualifies its cooperation because of an alleged difference in faith from the other denominations. This denomination endorses the work of the Federal Council in most particulars, but leaves out the work of the commission on the church and social service. The Churchman, representing the Protestant Episcopal communion, draws the inference from the debates at the recent general convention in Portland that the real trouble in the Episcopalian camp is with this very same commission. Conservative members of the Episcopal church charged on the floor that the commission on the church and social service had taken sides in the industrial issue. If these two denominations are out in the cold for this reason, they are rather lonely these days. The Roman Catholic church has not hesitated to speak right out on industrial questions in more radical spirit, perhaps, than that of the Federal Council commission. Jewish religious leadership is giving many tokens of a strong stand for industrial progress. The Lutherans and Episcopalians seem to stand before the American public as the two religious organizations where stand-patism and capitalism in the industrial struggle dominate religious opinion. That situation is, of course, intolerable to such Episcopalians as Bishop Williams and many others who could be named. The Lutherans in America are far less progressive with regard to interchurch cooperation and their relationship to the social movement than are the Lutherans of Europe. This must surely be a temporary condition which will change as the denomination develops in the free air of American life.

"Thou Shalt Not Kill"

THE appalling number of murders, and the equally amazing number of acquittals, must fill every thoughtful mind with a feeling akin to dismay. It is well nigh impossible in this country to convict a woman of murder, even when she confesses to it. Recently, in New Jersey, a young woman was tried for the murder of her husband and another woman whom she suspected of illicit relations. There was no dispute as to the facts, and the charge of the presiding judge was a plain setting forth of the law. The jury blandly announced that the defendant was "not guilty" of any crime at all and set her free in the midst of deafening applause. Sentimentalism swept everything before it. The young woman was pretty, she had a little baby in her arms, and an aged mother at hand—so the law was ignored and murder was justified. It reminds one of the Russian story in which a jury set a murderer free on the ground that it was too bad to make him unhappy on such a fine day. When the law is thus glibly set aside, it is not to be wondered at that mobs collect to beat up some member of the community who has incurred displeasure. Nor is it strange that lawlessness runs rife everywhere to an accompaniment of melodramatic sentimentalism in which moral laws are blurred and the most sickening crimes are consecrated. Still stands the ancient law, announced amid the flashing lightnings of moral insight and command: "Thou shalt not kill!"

The Tragedy of Provincialism

OF a certain well-known statesman it was said: "The air currents of the world never ventilated his mind"; and that is not a bad description of the average American. Provincialism is our curse; our lives are bounded by the sporting page, the picture show, the price of butter, and the neighborhood gossip. The world-shaking struggles of races, the roar of cataclysmic revolutions reach us only as the murmur of far-distant thunder. Europe appeals to us to help hold the world together, and we are bored, suspecting sinister designs or selfish motives. Cynical scorn of others is united with complacent over-valuation of our own habits, opinions, possessions, country, and religion. Provincialism is always "anti," compounded in equal parts of ignorance and antagonism. It is forever glorifying itself by depreciating everything that belongs to others, mistaking difference for inferiority. It makes a high wall, shutting the world out, shutting itself in. On the day the coalition cabinet resigned a city paper told the fact in one stick of type with a small caption, and recited a local scandal in sickening detail under huge headlines. No wonder nationalism is narrow, religion sectarian, and our attitude toward other nations a supercilious aloofness. These things are inevitable until the barriers of ignorance and prejudice are broken down, our outlook broadened, our knowledge enriched, and our sympathy enlarged. They expect the impossible who hope for any kind of world cooperation until we have some degree of a world-mindedness. Lord Robert Cecil was right when he uttered that shining sentence: "We must first obtain recognition of the fact that the good of humanity as a whole does actually exist."

What To Do On Sunday

PURITANS had a long list of things not to do on Sunday. Has it occurred to anybody to make a good list of things that would be proper to do on Sunday? This needs to be done for the child if he is not to be utterly disgusted with the church and the religious life. The American Institute of Child Life is circulating a booklet called "A Year of Good Sundays." No doubt many things in the list would also be in the index of things forbidden by our grandparents, but that need not trouble anyone very much. The institute suggests Bible games played like "authors." "Dressing up" on Sunday is looked upon as a legitimate pleasure for a child, and various costumes may be used. Letter writing to distant relatives and family with conversation about these relatives is a pleasant mode of passing some time. The children are sometimes set at the task of writing stories, an occupation at which some rather young children will labor for a good while. At the close of the booklet is an extended bibliography of books that would be helpful to parents in keeping their children usefully busy not only on Sunday, but on any other day of the week when they found time hanging heavy on their hands. Recently a minister took a vote of his congregation on a considerable list of sermon topics which covered varied fields of doctrine, devotion and practical service. The problem of the Christian use of Sunday received more votes than any other single sermon on the list. People are in bad conscience with regard to the use of a day which has been given to the race as a day devoted to the higher life. The young people who spend it on mad escapades, the householder who devotes it all to gardening, and the business man who sees in it only an enlarged opportunity for golf, miss many things. What the institute has done for child life, someone should do for adults. How can a healthy-minded adult makes the most of Sunday?

Dean Inge's "Outspoken Essays"

A SECOND series of "Outspoken Essays," by the Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, is an outstanding volume among the autumn books; and to say that it is of equal value with the first series is the highest praise. It contains his Hibbert Lectures on the State, his Romanes

Lecture on the Idea of Progress, which made so much stir at the time of its delivery; a striking study of The Dilemma of Civilization, raising the question whether the over-mechanization of life has not impaired the intrinsic qualities of the race; a glorification of the Victorian Era as over against the pigmy men of our time; and much else of like challenging import. But the gem of the volume is the first essay, entitled "Confessio Fidei," in which we overhear a great thinker examining the fundamental confidences of his life. The rift between the old faith and the new knowledge, the assumption that "science gives us facts without values, and religion values without facts," the dean regards as the fatal discord in our modern world. As a Christian Platonist, and disciple of Plotinus, the dean has his own way of bridging the gap between facts and values. His way may not satisfy all of his readers, but that he does see the crux of the whole question of religious faith in our day is plain. It is a volume to make one think hard and fast, notable in the range of the problems with which it deals, no less than in its concise, keen-cutting style.

The American Sin of Waste

STEINMETZ, the physicist and consulting engineer of the General Electric Company, would solve our coal problem by harnessing the waterfalls. He insists that we are robbing posterity of its heritage by burning coal to get power which could be produced much more cheaply by electricity. He is only one of many prophets that are warning America of the sin of our wasteful habits. Were the wealth of the country equally distributed, each family would get $2,500 per year. But one-third of our families get less than one thousand dollars a year while a few get over a million dollars a year. Much of the large incomes go into ostentation which is "illth" rather than wealth. Economists figure that eleven billions a year goes into wanton extragavance which has no proper place in any life program. The waste in the form of idleness is a very serious matter. We sometimes have as many as five million men lying around idle waiting for jobs. The economic loss on this item alone is staggering. In no department of the national life are we more wasteful than in the processes of distribution. Whole fruit farms are bought up in Michigan every year, and their product allowed to rot in the field in order to keep prices up. Car-loads of watermelons dumped into the lake and cans of milk poured into the sewer tell the story of the reckless defiance of human welfare that the national distributing agencies practice right along. When the church pleads for decent hours, living wages and other human rights for workers, it is told to read old-fashioned books on political economy which teach supply and demand as the regulative force in our industrial life. Modern life has learned how to supersede this law through waste. In a world where millions are hungry and where the masses still lack the ordinary decencies of life we are bound to admit that our troubles arise from conservatism, failure to apply science to industry and from greed and selfishness. When the idealism of professional life, say of the teacher, enters business, we shall have enough and to spare for every family in the whole wide world.

The Larger Faith

IN the controversy which is raging in certain sections of the church over matters which are affirmed by some to be essentials of Christianity, it is continually charged that those who hold the more liberal opinions devitalize the gospel by substituting generalizations for definite realities, and rationalizing away the fundamental values of the faith. It is probable that to people of particular schools of thought and forms of experience this charge seems abundantly justified. With many who take a hand in these arguments it is impossible to exchange views with fruitful results, because their outlook and method of thinking do not permit them to hold any of the matters of Christian belief in any other than a fixed and dogmatic fashion. To them questions of this kind are no longer open to discussion. Their opinions are final and unchangeable.

But to those who permit themselves to consider with candor and open-mindedness the problems involved in the gradual attainment of new and ampler ground in the essentials of Christianity, there comes the satisfying discovery that the later interpretations of the gospel involve no loss of values, but rather an enlargement of horizon, and a deepening of conviction when the teachings of the scriptures are interpreted and reinforced by the amazingly varied and marvelous facts of modern scientific and historical study. What seemed at first to be lost in the conflict of ideas is found to be strengthened and amplified in the light of the new sciences. Nothing is ever lost that can abide the test of facts. Indeed it is usually true that on more careful inquiry, the older and apparently endangered elements of the faith, put in jeopardy by the wider ranging of investigation, come back to their own with new and more vital meaning.

There are three stages of knowledge in the field of biblical truth, as in most of the other areas of human interest. The first is the stage of literal acceptance of the statements of the Bible as if they were to be taken at their actual face value as scientific and historical data. That is the childlike and unquestioning faith which attempts to honor the scriptures without raising any of the questions regarding their purpose and method which modern investigation of their nature compels. To such an attitude of mind any doubt as to the validity of any statement of the Bible is disloyal to the Book and its supreme message. That is the stage of naive faith with which most Christians begin their acquaintance with the source of our religious life. Most of those who represent the older generation have had to begin here, for it was the mood of a generation ago.

The second stage is that in which one comes up square against the weakness of this view to meet the tests of investigation. It does not require much study of the Bible to discover that it nowhere claims infallibility in matters of scientific knowledge or of historical information. While it is an invaluable source of treasured remembrance of an ancient and vividly important period of human experience, its purpose is manifestly not to disclose unknown facts about the structure of the world, or the processes of human history. Its themes are vastly more important. It employs the information of the men who wrote it in the effort to make clear their message of religion and morality. But it is too often the case that people confronted in their study of the scriptures with the evident marks of human and not always accurate information regarding the phenomena of nature and the events of past history, judge these documents by that standard, and reject them as untrustworthy in all their statements. This negative attitude toward the Bible is the sceptic's refuge. It is the easy conclusion of those who have met their first difficulties, and have not the patience to work through to firm ground. It is the second stage of biblical culture.

Those, however, who are willing to pay the price of a thoroughgoing inquiry into the character and value of the Bible, come to understand that neither of the earlier phases of their education is competent or satisfactory. In the light of fuller study of the great truths which historic Christianity has affirmed, there is secured a new and firmer grasp upon the essentials of the faith, and one discovers that nothing has been lost that is of genuine value, but all things have become more adequate and convincing by the process of disciplined investigation. This is the third and satisfying state of religious education. This is the intellectual new birth, without which no man sees the richness and breadth of the kingdom of God.

This principle may be applied to almost any of the phases of Christian doctrine now under heated discussion in those quarters where modern conceptions of the Bible are as yet viewed with suspicion. Regarding the miracles, the character of the Bible as a revelation of the will of God, the person of Jesus, the relation of Christianity to the ethnic faiths, and other matters of equal moment, it is evident that the same progress is taking place, from the first stage of unquestioning affirmation, through the second zone of surprised and distressed reaction against the calm assurances of orthodox belief, to the third attitude of faith through struggle that has cleared the mind of its darker doubts, and found a standing place of ascertained reality. This is the experience through which the men and women, especially the young men and women, of the present generation are passing. It is inevitable that they should go this way, if they are at all touched by the spirit of inquiry which is the dominant force in our age. The next generation will not have to pass this way. It will have its own problems, which will doubtless be as difficult and as testing. But the struggle to adjust itself to the new science, as voiced in the methods of evolution, and the new faith in the Bible, the result of the critical researches of the last twenty years, will be so far a thing of the past that to the student of religion and education in the future these bitter controversies of our day will appear as futile and unwarranted as the mediæval protests against the Copernican science, and the revolutionary disclosures made by historical students of that earlier age.

An example of the ampler faith to which the present generation is finding its way is the changed attitude of thoughtful Christians to the entire subject of miracles, which in former times were proclaimed the most conspicuous proofs of the divine character of the biblical revelation, and the most outstanding credentials of the ministry of Jesus. The virgin birth of Jesus is an outstanding example of such an event, affirmed as it is by two of the gospels, and imbedded in some of the oldest of the creeds. The changing attitude of this generation toward this narrative does not rest on the impossibility of such an occurrence, for science has disclosed such a multitude of marvels in recent years that no man is free to deny the possibility of even the most unusual phenomena. Nor is it based upon the discovery that the claim of virgin birth is made in behalf of very many of the heroes of the past, kings, warriors and prophets. It is rather the fact that the first witnesses of the life of Jesus appear to have given only secondary regard to the story, as it appears in only two of the four gospels, and is nowhere referred to in the writings of the apostle Paul. Moreover the value of the life and ministry of our Lord are in no manner enhanced by the belief in this item of early Christian tradition. The reality of the divine-human life of Jesus is in no way validated by an occurrence of this order, even if on other grounds it were held to be within the realm of probability. It is not an article of Christian faith upon which any insistence can be placed in the demand for the acceptance of the leadership and program of Jesus.

Confronted by considerations of this nature, which are as cogent in relation to the other miracles as they are in reference to the virgin birth, many people are slipping into the second stage of mere negation in regard to all the unusual features of the life of the Master. If the miracles are not to be held as a solemn and obligatory part of the Christian belief, what is left? Do not all the facts of the gospel records stand or fall together? Is one at liberty to select those that satisfy his intellectual powers, and refuse credit to the rest? The answer is of course that one has no choice in the matter. The frank facing of the facts of the universe in the manner which modern science has made unescapable makes it impossible to accord to the miraculous accounts of the past the credit which once they enjoyed. This is no more true of those of Greek and Roman origin than those of Old and New Testament record. If one most choose between the acceptance of the body of biblical miracles and the abandonment of the traditional faith, it appears to a large number of people that the result is wholly negative, and that in the interest of intellectual honesty they can no longer be Christians. This is the second stage of their religious culture. The tragedy is that so many of them stop here, and make no further effort to find the way out. Furthermore there are many among the watchmen on the walls of Zion who are quite content to regard such conclusions as the proofs of total apostacy from evangelical ground, and such persons as no longer entitled to the fellowship of the churches.

But this is not the end of the inquiry. A more careful study of the origins of our religion discloses the fact that the Christian gospel does not rest upon the miraculous element in the Bible. The whole category of miracles could be eliminated from our acceptance of Old and New Testament fact and truth and the foundations of belief would still be unimpaired. It is not upon the supernatural, as such, that Christianity rests, but upon the deep foundations of the divine love, the redemptive ministry of Jesus, the waiting need of human life for the divine fellowship, and the program of the Master which has been so fully disclosed in the holy scriptures. There can be no controversy over the question of miracles, or any other of the moot items of belief when once the distinction is made between the essential and the less essential things of the gospel. Men have the right to hold with fidelity and conviction any view they please regarding these matters of debate. The only places where the vital structure of Christian faith is involved is in the acceptance of the leadership of Jesus as humanity's interpreter of God, and the effort to realize among men the program and ideals which he announced. Here one finds room enough for debate, but on an altogether different level from that of traditional controversy.

It must be the effort of all seekers after truth to win through for themselves and those they lead from the grounds of literal and dogmatic belief in an infallible record, past the zone of denial and dissent, to the firm standing place of faith in the larger truth which the scientific and historical studies of the age are so luminously disclosing. The difficulty with multitudes of people in our time is the fact that they have found it difficult or impossible to abide in the first stage of unquestioning faith in the literal, and have drifted into the second stage of scepticism, without the will or the courage to make their way out to the firmer ground ahead. It is not too much to affirm with emphasis that all that is needed to attain that ground of conviction and serenity is the will to persevere in the quest of the larger truth which lies at the heart of the message of Jesus. In the light of his supreme personality the minor problems of miracle, revelation, and the second coming find their solution. These are the lesser and passing phases of a theme that centers in a timeless and sublime purpose, the purpose that finds its declaration and its proof in the life and the achievements of our Lord.

The Rights of the Children

WE live in an age of powerful young men. The inventive and the creative and the untried have come to their own. Arrogant youth smiles contemptuously at experience and age has been brushed aside with ruthless and unhesitating firmness. Young men have turned their minds into machines for the grinding out of all the products of a hard and spiritually sterile efficiency and young women have plunged into the whirling momentum of a glittering life in which speed is mistaken for enjoyment. We have carried the human organism pretty close to the limit of its powers and we have quite forgotten our responsibility for the handing on to the future of bodies and minds capable of productive work and noble joy. We are having a wonderful time but we are destroying the seeds as well as using up the harvest.

One of these days we will begin to see what we are doing and then we will enter upon a new era. We will think of the future as well as the present. We will think of that which must not be lost as well as of that which must be won. And then we will enter upon the age when the rights of the children will be recognized in quite a new fashion. The age of powerful young men will be followed by the age of potential children. Already it is possible to think of some of the principles which will be recognized when this period arrives.

One of the fundamental rights of children is just the right to be born. Every home where a man and woman of sound body and economic competence dwell together faces the demand which the future of the race makes upon it. The incredibly heavy burdens of tomorrow require men and women with all the trailing strength of a noble physical heredity and a life set forth along ample lines of strength and power. And wherever there is a home which could have given such children to the world and has refused to do it there is the gravest and most tragic failure to meet a responsibility whose evasion depletes the life of the world. On the other hand a very definite principle emerges when we consider the right of children not to be born. The unsound physically and mentally have no right to poison the stream of the life of the race. And when a family of three represents the line beyond which economic safety has been passed it also represents the line of moral demand. Christian men and women must measure their responsibility in the terms of their economic capacity. The child who would confront malnutrition and depleting and disintegrating limitation has a right to ask that it shall not be brought out of the mystery of life's beginning into this world where every struggler has the right to a sound body and a genuine economic opportunity.

Then children have the right to the comradeship and oversight of parents during the days of their childhood You cannot hire mothers after giving birth to children. And there is no substitute for the intimate strength of a father's touch upon the life of a child. The amazing ease with which some men and women in this restless age free themselves from all profound consideration for the intimate requirements of their children is only equalled by the astounding brutality with which a few following the deceptive lights of some mad infatuation forget their children entirely. There are a good many fatherless children in American cities who have fathers living in some other town tasting the hot pleasure of the moment and never seeing the pitiful little faces of the children for whose lonely and difficult lives they are responsible. The children have rights in connection with their parents which can only be evaded and ignored at the price of a depleted and corrupted society.

The children have the right to a growth which shall bring to fruition every aspect of their varied and fascinating powers. The body is to have clean air and wholesome food and upbuilding exercise and delightful play. The mind is to have rousing and quickening experiences which shall make the mental life itself the most delightful and stimulating game. The moral sense is to be developed in the warm idealisms of childhood. The sense of beauty is to be guided until it is happy and sane and discerning. The power of self control is to be built up through all those noble disciplines which make even children stronger than their own desires and glad in the exercise of wise restraint. The capacity for comradeship is to be encouraged and guided until a new race of comrades comes to dwell upon the earth. The sense of the beautiful nearness of the strong and friendly God is to be made a part of the daily experience of childhood.

All this will require time and skill—and devotion, and it will be the most rewarding sort of activity in all the world. When children come to the full enjoyment of their rights even efficiency will have a touch of bright unselfishness, for we must forget ourselves in thinking of the future as we give them the heritage which is to make possible a more nobly habitable world.

Patience

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I SOUGHT to clothe myself in White Raiment, and I essayed to put on a Clean Shirt.

Now the manner of the coming of Laundry from the place where they wash and starch and ossify it is this, that the Shirts are fastened, each with many Pins, so that however industrious a man shall be, there yet is good hope that one Pin shall remain in and stick him; and the Button Holes are Cemented together so that nothing much more mild than Dynamite can open them. And as I wrought with one of the Button Holes, laying down a Barrage and seeking to carry it by storm, the Collar Button slipped from my finders, and rolled I knew not whither.

And I sought for it in every corner of the room, and I moved most of the articles of furniture, and I found it not.

And when I found it not, I improvised a few remarks which I thought suitable unto the Occasion.

And Keturah spake unto me, saying, My lord, thou hast some virtues and a few graces, but Patience is not among them.

And I said, Patience is the virtue of donkeys.

And Keturah said, It is also the virtue of wives whose husbands fret and storm when they lose their Collar Buttons.

And I said, Patience is a much over-rated quality. This world did never get very far along until some man arrived with the virtue of Impatience.

And Keturah said, I do not see anything arriving as a result of thy present Impatience; but if thou wilt make less virtuous thine own Impatience thou mayest look exactly in the middle of the floor, and there shalt thou behold thy Collar Button, all this time in plain sight.

Now I might have been impatient with her for not telling me sooner, but I am too good a sport for that. And I said,

Keturah, every impatient man should have a patient wife.

And she said, It is worse than that; she must be patient.

But, said I, it were a mistake if we were both patient. For there is no reason why one family should seek to monopolize the patience of the world.

And she said, It would be safe for thee to add a little to thine investment in Patience.

And I said, Keturah, thou are mistaken. The walls of Jericho had been standing until this day if Joshua had been a man of Patience. If George Washington had been a man of Patience, then had Warren Harding been a great-great-grandson of George III. The world doth never get far along until some man becometh impatient; then things begin to occur.

And she said, Where dost thou come into that list?

And I said, As soon as I knew thee, I was impatient till I got thee.

And she said, That being the case, I will forgive thee for thine Impatience. Almost thou persuadest me that Impatience is a virtue.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

To Mark Twain, on Re-reading Huckleberry Finn

IN days a-jangle with tumultuous cries,
The griefs of throneless kings and wan saints' prayers,
We climb once more the golden stairs
To boyhood land. Beneath unclouded skies
We tramp again beside the river's rim;
In rough-hewn huts we spend long days and nights;
While lone owls hoot and midnight shows weird sights,
Enraptured youth sees ghosts and ogres grim.
We heed no more the lure of shining gold,
Except the gold the gods pour forth at dawn.
Secure from pride, our lives flow on and on,
Like fancy-haunted streams that grow not old.
Proud king of boyhood, with your magic pen
You bring back Eden to a world of men.

November Days

NOVEMBER days, November days,
When specters haunt the woodland ways,
When fallen leaves of rusty gold
Bring prophecies of lifeless mold
And barren fields and wintry haze—

Where now are all those dawning Mays
Which thrilled our hearts to song and praise?
No longer are we blithe and bold,
November days!

For in your somber browns and grays
We find no fare for springlike lays;
Our visions perish in the cold,
And we, once young, are growing old,—
No matter how your firelogs blaze,
November days!

Christianizing Public Opinion

By Samuel McCrea Cavert

WHAT is the church to do for the millions of men who will never sit in our pews, whose children will never attend our Sunday schools, and to whom we cannot bring the Christian message in any of he ordinary ways? Approximately sixty per cent of our population are not members of any church, Protestant, Catholic or Jewish. Hardly more than twenty-five per cent of the people of an average community attend church or Sunday school on a given Sunday. Yet the people on he outside are not essentially different from those within. If we are to bring the gospel to bear on these great unreached groups at all, obviously we must do so by making use of other influences than those commonly thought of as our "teaching agencies." If they will not come to us to be consciously taught, somehow we must get the Christian deals into media that do reach them, those media which, ike the daily press, are unconsciously teaching all the people all the while—so that indirectly if not directly, they may be learning what Christianity means for our contemporary life.

Even in the case of those whom we are already reaching through our direct teaching, we need always to remember that there are other "educational" influences, vaguer but no less powerful, constantly at work upon them. All the social environment in which the individual lives is, for good or ill, having its potent effect in making him what he s to become. It so conditions all his living and so affects the development of character that in order fully to teach him the Christian way of life, we must find out how to guide these forces which determine our national attitudes, our economic assumptions, our social standards, all the controlling ideas of modern civilization. The church which should think only of the individual man and give no attention to the social environment would be like a physician who should try to bring a tubercular convalescent to sturdy health without choosing for him a climate conducive to that end.

THE MOST POWERFUL EDUCATOR

And this social structure—the accepted customs, the prevailing attitudes, the general standards of thought and conduct—is for the most part, the result of that complex thing that we call public opinion. This it is which largely determines the character of our community life and our social organization, and so is a mighty educational force, either supporting or blocking the efforts which the church is making in behalf of individuals. Simply to train a single individual to be Christian it is necessary to Christianize public opinion. There is no factor that counts for more in shaping his decisions. It is hardly too much to say that public opinion is the most powerful "educator" in our modern world.

The task of Christian education, then, is not simply one of more effective personal evangelism, so as to convert more individuals; and of better Sunday schools, so as to educate individuals more fully as to what it means to be a Christian. It cannot stop short of a definite undertaking to Christianize the public opinion which is responsible for the social structure in which the individual has his being, and which always makes it either easier or harder for the individual to be a Christian in the daily relationships of life. How often this public opinion is moulded by selfish forces for selfish ends we know all too well. The practical question for the church is, Are we to allow it to be an opposing influence or are we to capture it for Christianity and make it a great evangelistic force?

DEPENDENCE ON CIVILIZATION

Public opinion is not simply the sum of the opinions of individuals. To some extent at least it is an organic thing—a group attitude which would not exist except for the relationship of individuals to each other and their reactions upon each other in unconscious ways. For society itself is not made up of bare independent individuals, and nothing more. A social group is not merely the total of its separate members. When they become associated with one another in a common life, a plus element has entered in. By virtue of their interplay with one another they become other than they would ever be as unrelated units. There is consequently a social conscience and a social will which are more than a mathematical addition of individual consciences and wills. If any one questions this, let him recall how war-time propaganda developed a social atmosphere which swept hosts of individuals into making decisions which apart from the group-spirit they would never have made. Or let him think of a crowd to whom the suggestion of lynching a black man has been made. They do as a collective body what not one of them would ever do on his own independent initiative. What happens in an intense degree in war-time or in the action of the mob is, in considerable measure, happening all the time. Men in groups are not the same as the same men as separate individuals. Through their relationships with one another they develop types of activity and of thought which gradually become standards for the group and are transmitted from one generation to another.

The activities and attitudes of a people as a whole, then, are not simply the sum of the ways in which mere individuals act and think. In the first place, the life of everyone is conditioned by the kind of civilization into which he is born. In the second place, he is dependent, at every turn thereafter, on what his fellows have done and are doing now. The very language which he uses is a social institution that he himself did not create. Hosts of his presuppositions and habits and modes of action come to him as a part of his social heritage rather than as the result of any reasoning process of his own. What the individual himself achieves and what he receives from the social medium in which he moves are so interwoven that it is quite impossible to extricate the one from the other. Society, in a word, makes its members quite as much as they make society. While we are trying to educate the individual to the Christian way of living, existing social and economic arrangements which give the rewards to those who selfishly compete for private advantage are subtly and powerfully educating him in an unchristian attitude toward life. By text-book and by word of mouth to teach the fatherhood of God and the oneness of the human family, while unbrotherly inequalities of opportunity stare us in the face, will be to sow good seed on stony ground. To proclaim in Sunday school and pulpit the motive of service will not carry us far if the industrial world, in which men spend the greater part of their waking hours, is organized around the idea that the way to succeed is to grab as much as you can for yourself. No one can be wholly a Christian so long as he is bound up with an unchristian, or partly Christianized, social order.

The realization of this truth in earlier centuries drove the most devoted and ardent spirits into secluded monasteries in order that there, apart from opposing influences, a life of no compromise with an unchristian world might be led. The day of the monastery is gone, but the conditions against which it was a protest remain and must be dealt with by the church in some positive way. For Christian discipleship can never be merely a matter between an isolated individual soul and God. The individual exists and has meaning only in society. Discipleship therefore involves all the questions of human relationships in the world about us. It means something for one's home, one's business, one's share in industry, in civic and in political affairs. The minister who at a large ecclesiastical gathering protested that he wanted "the church to keep entirely away from political issues, away from industrial questions, away from international problems, and confine itself to teaching the kingdom of God" was proceeding on the wholly false assumption that the kingdom of God can consist of souls dwelling in a social vacuum.

BUSINESS AND CHRISTIAN IDEALS

Here, for example, is an employer who has so come to see the meaning of the gospel that he earnestly desires to organize all his business around what he sees to be the principles of Jesus. He does not want to treat labor as a "commodity," to be bought at the lowest possible figure, like coal or cotton. He has come to see labor as human personalities, meant for all the fulness of life which he enjoys. He does not want his industry to have as its organizing principle a ruthless competition in profit-taking. He wants it really to be an expression of brotherhood. But when he starts to put his principles into practice he finds that what he himself can do in shortening hours, in increasing wages, or preventing unemployment, is limited by the competitive system of which he is inevitably a part. Many things, of course, he can do independently, but other things he can do only if they are practiced generally throughout the industry as a whole; else he will too greatly imperil his own continuance in business and so stand in the very way of the service which a successful and socially-operated industry can render. He finds, in other words, that he cannot be a Christian in business, in the full sense, until business itself is organized on Christian standards.

Of every one of us it is true that we cannot be absolutely Christian in our living so long as we are members of a social order not yet built on a Christian basis. If I invest my modest savings in industrial stocks, my generous dividends may be meaning to those who actually produce them less than a decent wage. That is my part in their poverty, for which, perhaps, I thought they were themselves solely responsible. Or merely as a citizen there is often no option of the wholly Christian versus the unchristian course. When competitive armaments have culminated in war the only possibility is to choose the less unchristian alternative—either fight reluctantly for the less guilty side or withhold support from both alike, regardless of the balance of right and wrong. Even if one tries to choose the latter path, he cannot entirely do so, for simply to pay taxes or till the soil is to contribute to the nation's success in arms. From such situations there is, individually, no escape. The one way out is to arouse a social conscience and a public sentiment that will break through the inertia of inherited arrangements and set itself to rebuilding our social organization along better lines.

CASE WORK AND MASS WORK

The church, then, in addition to working for individuals, one by one, must find ways of Christianizing public opinion concerning many generally accepted customs and conventions of the people as a whole. While never abating for a moment its energy in laying the indispensable foundation of Christian hearts and wills in those whom it can directly reach in its own schools and congregations, it must, at the same time, be holding the Christian ideal before the social group as a whole. We must have not only what social workers call "case work"—that is, the dealing with instances of individual need—but also "mass work," the educating of the general public to the necessity of changing the conditions out of which wrong attitudes and wrong actions naturally spring.*

In a notable achievement in which the church played the most important part—the prohibition of the liquor traffic—we have an illuminating example of what, for lack of better terms, we may call "mass work" in contrast with "case work." The old method of working for temperance was to instruct the individual as to the evils of strong drink and induce him to sign a pledge. Yet at the same time when we were trying to make the man temperate we were leaving him unnecessarily exposed to the attack of a saloon on every corner. Then we undertook not only to teach the individual the value of abstinence but also to secure a social environment in which it would be reasonably normal for him to abstain. We found, to repeat a suggestive epigram, that there was need not only of keeping the man away from the liquor but of keeping the liquor away from the man.

The method of approach illustrated by the legal prohibition of the liquor traffic could be paralleled by many other illustrations. How was duelling abolished? Not by converting duellers one by one, but by a great awakening of the social conscience. Was slavery abolished simply by persuading slave owners to free their slaves? No, it was necessary to bring about a different form of economic organization. Turn now to existing phases of social evil—lynching, for example, participated in often by "Christian" people. Shall we get rid of it by converting individual lynchers? Must we not rather organize public opinion against it so strongly that lynching will no longer be tolerated by a community? Or child labor? Shall we eliminate it solely by winning employers one by one to fuller discipleship to Christ? Must we not also secure arrangements which will make the exploitation of children for private profit more difficult and in which the employer who does not want to make money at the expense of little children will not be forced into unequal competition with the ruthless and unscrupulous?

*For the fuller development of the comparison see F. E. Johnson's "The Social Gospel and Personal Religion.' Association Press, 1922.

We have referred to legislation as the means through which the aroused public mind may make itself effective. This is, no doubt, the most obvious way, but it is by no means the only one. Quite apart from the question of legal enactments there is also the possibility of crystallizing public opinion into ideas and ideals which gain such power as to become a part of the generally accepted social code. When a social atmosphere is created so that masses of men think the same thing at the same time—an educational result which the government achieved in a remarkable degree in war time—the inheritance of existing arrangements is often effectively modified.

OUTLAWING OF WAR

The necessity for the creation of public opinion for the outlawing of war will serve as an illustration of what we mean when we are speaking of this wider educational responsibility of the church. After the Sunday school has done all that the most exacting educator could expect of it in training its children in the Christian way of life, after the Christian college has performed its task of enlarging the social outlook of the Christian youth who comes to its halls, even after the agencies of missionary education have developed an international mind and a desire for world service, there is still left a tremendous task in Christian education if war is actually to be abolished. The facts concerning the staggering cost of armament, the inevitable consequences of suspicion, distrust and ill-will which "preparedness" produces, the subtle connection between war and the economic exploitation of backward people, the need for building up the international agencies and institutions that will serve as a substitute method of obtaining security and justice—all these and many other factors must be brought home to the masses of men. The general ideal of brotherhood taught in Sunday school and pulpit must be analyzed in its application to concrete and specific issues and actually brought to bear upon them. What, to take further illustrations, does brotherhood demand in our treatment of the Japanese in California when complex economic and social considerations are involved? Or in the present situation in Mexico? Or in our occupation of Haiti? Or in the relations of the white and Negro races in this country? To secure a Christian approach to such questions as these requires us to come to grips with the great organs by which contemporary public opinion is formed. For it is a question of having not only Christian motives but also clear discernment as to what those motives require in a given situation and practical wisdom as to how our good will and our intelligence may be made effective by stirring the social group, in its corporate capacity, to appropriate action.

The churches, in a word, must "go into the business of creating an effective public conscience regarding all relations of individuals, classes, nations and races. The cry of the world is for the Christian churches to go into this business at once. If the world is to be saved for Christianity, the churches must soon become more effectively organized for the guidance and control of public opinion. Only thus can a Christian environment be created for the nurture of Christian character."

Next week Mr. Cavert will write on "The Church and Public Opinion."

Ever Above

By Arthur B. Rhinow

MYSELF—Things are so crude down here.

I—Let us try to go higher up.

MYSELF—Yes; to where He stands.

I—His light is all about us.

MYSELF—But He is up there. . . .

I—Wait here. Ah, this is different. Savagery is below us now.

MYSELF—But He is above us.

I—Look at this pottery. Barbaric art.

MYSELF—I want to go higher; to where He is.

I—He does not seem to be very high. On then. . . .

MYSELF—Hear the clash of arms.

I—Look at His cross on their shoulders and breasts.

MYSELF—And He is up there.

I—They are praying.

MYSELF—He is praying with them.

I—Stay here. It is good.

MYSELF—Not while He is up there.

I—On then. . . .

MYSELF—How steep the path.

I—Look, look. A man-bird sailing in the air.

MYSELF—Wonderful.

I—And these temples.

MYSELF—Beautiful.

I—And the millions, the millions.

MYSELF—Where is He?

I—Above us.

MYSELF—He did not seem so far above when we were down below.

I—His light shone in the deep.

MYSELF—He seems ever to rise with us.

I—Ever above.

MYSELF—Ever above.

The Presbyterians: An Outside View

By Orvis F. Jordan

MY first impression of the Presbyterians was that they had a peculiar fondness for side whiskers. This doubtless arose from a careful study of the portraits of the great Christian editors which hung in a neighbor's house. In those days the Disciples editors wore chin whiskers, and the Congregationalists were smooth-faced. Of course a larger acquaintance with the denomination brought the conviction that I had made a generalization on insufficient data. It was also an early impression that Presbyterians lacked humor. The Sunday school superintendent of that faith who always spoke at the county convention seemed the very impersonation of austerity. I learned in later years sadly that a Presbyterian is often laughing when he looks the most dignified. One gets an impression of a whole denomination from contacts as casual as these. In giving such impressions of the Presbyterians, I am conscious of giving a view held by many outsiders besides myself, however.

Presbyterianism arose in Scotland and this is a racial fact that can never be blinked. Though there are some Scotch who are not Presbyterians, and many Presbyterians who are not Scotch, one must ever insist that the cradle of Presbyterianism has had much to do with the shaping of the growing child. It is a land of many moods as one must know when he thinks of John Knox, Thomas Carlyle, Bobby Burns, William Robertson Smith and Harry Lauder. The tribal life of long ago accustomed this vigorous people to divisions and feuds. It is no wonder, then, that the Presbyterians of other days were the most sadly divided of any denominational family. The story of Scottish denominationalism reduces the denominational principle to absurdity. The mind tires as it tries to find out what is meant by Burghers and anti-Burghers, Seceders, Auld Lichts, and all the rest. This same specter has pursued the Presbyterians in this country. Twice the larger denomination bearing that name has divided and reunited. The Cumberland Presbyterians went away and then a hundred years later came back home. The Southern Presbyterian church separated on the slavery issue. It still insists that slavery is a divine institution, though it is no longer sorry slavery was abolished. We have United Presbyterians, and some who are not united. There are Reformed Presbyterians and those not reformed.

FOR CHRISTIAN UNION

But Presbyterianism now lives in an age when rapid communication and travel has made the whole world shrink into a sort of neighborhood. In days when men never traveled ten miles from home, provincialism had a chance. In our time books and magazines and traveling lecturers enrich the current of a village's ideas. It is not strange, therefore, that the denomination which felt the most need for union of denominations should be so progressive in the matter of Christian Union. The most generous of all the proposals that have come from the various religious bodies is that of the Presbyterians, who have been willing to lose their denominational life that the prayer of Christ should be fulfilled.

They have also made greater strides in reuniting their own denominational family than has any other. In Scotland they wait only for empowering legislation to complete a union which will include three-fourths of the church people of that land in one organization. When that is achieved it will be the only English-speaking land where so large a proportion of Christians are in one Protestant church. In America the Presbyterian Alliance has brought fellowship and counsel to the various divisions of the Presbyterian ranks. American Presbyterians are conscious of no great diversity of creed. Some would sing the psalms of David while the more liberal favor gospel hymns, but there is no reason to doubt that as time goes on these Presbyterian groups will accomplish Presbyterian unity. Even in the south, the Presbyterians have of late been experiencing a change of heart.

PREEMINENTLY THEOLOGIANS

This growing urbanity doubtless proceeds in part out of a more scientific method in theology. Of all the Protestant denominations the Presbyterians seem to me to be preeminently the theologians. Their Westminster creed has influenced many communions besides their own. Particularly Baptists had to make but a few changes in it to find it an adequate expression of their views. Congregational orthodoxy was largely modeled on these lines in days gone by. The temper of the Scotch is rationalistic when it is not mystical, and the former mood predominates. They have always loved to argue about religion. It was in Scotland that the question of the new method of Bible study first became acute. Immortal is that scene in the "Bonnie Briar Bush," where the young minister kneels to pray with his former enemy, the ruling elder. He prays that he may be true to the faith of his fathers, while the old elder has the grace to pray that he may be led into all new truth.

William Robertson Smith began to study the Old Testament from the historical viewpoint. His religion of the Semites is still a monument to the painstaking scholarship of his race, and must be taken into account still by all students of theology. In this country the new biblical criticism was made popular by Dr. C. A. Briggs. The Briggs heresy trial really marks an epoch in the Presbyterian church in the United States. Briggs lost, but the cause of progress won. Since then there has been no fondness for heresy trials. Men with far more radical views are acceptable in the highest councils of the church. If once some of us thought of the Presbyterians as a creed-bound sect, we have been compelled to change our minds. A Presbyterian friend says of the venerable confession of faith: "It contains the doctrine of the holy scriptures, and many things else." He has found a way to defend his ordination vows without defending all that is in the creed of his church. It looks to an outsider that the day is coming when the old creed will not be required of ministers and elders of the church any more than it now is of the laity of the church outside the eldership. But one must always look upon it as a venerable document, perhaps the most consistent of all the creeds.

When one turns from the theology of the Presbyterian group to its sociology, one meets at once certain quite obvious facts. The Presbyterians are a substantial folk. The Scotch frugality has stood them in good stead. John Wanamaker is only one of a number of substantial business men that one can find in almost any city of the United States who would confess themselves to be the spiritual sons of John Calvin. Perhaps this very prosperity has been a little irritating in the past to members of other communions. When a Disciple or a Baptist layman left his church for social reasons he nearly always became a Presbyterian. Presbyterians were socially correct in nearly every community.

But just because of that some of us are a little inclined to form an unfavorable opinion of Presbyterians. We do not wonder that the per capita giving for missions in the United States should be greater in the Episcopal church this year than in any other. They have vast wealth, matching the Presbyterians in their affluence. But for the Methodists to outstrip the Presbyterians so far arouses inquiry. No Presbyterian would want to say that Methodists have more money. Most of us know that they do not have. Has the Scottish habit of conservatism in money matters kept the Presbyterians from achieving that outstanding leadership in missionary enterprises which might have been theirs? Why have not the laymen backed up the permanent missionary statesmanship of the denomination with equally significant giving?

PREDOMINANCE OF BUSINESS MEN

And the abundance of the successful business men in the denomination seems to some of us a deterrent in an outspoken deliverance on the social question. Dr. Josiah Strong was a Presbyterian, as is Dr. Charles Stelzle. Once we waited upon the leadership of Presbyterians in the solution of the urgent social questions of the day. But these voices are stilled by death, or otherwise. We go to the Baptist ranks for such a layman as George W. Coleman or to the Episcopalians for Roger W. Babson. Dr. Harry Ward, the Methodist, and Prof. Alva W. Taylor, the Disciple, are more fundamental in their views than most Presbyterians. Why is the voice of social prophecy so seldom heard in the Presbyterian denomination? When I think least favorably of the Presbyterian church it is in connection with the social reform. Episcopalians can be aristocratic and yet radical, Baptists can be proletarian and radical, but the Presbyterian church is now in a state of dangerous lukewarmness. The Episcopal church was a whole generation late on the temperance question. Being late with big reform movements is dangerous business for any church.

The Presbyterian colleges are a triumph of educational efficiency. One needs only to go to Wabash or Illinois college in the middle west to understand and appreciate the quality of Presbyterian educators. Next to the Congregationalists, perhaps neck and neck with them, they have forged ahead in the establishment of the splendid small colleges where sound scholarship is combined with moral influences of the very best. They have been wise enough to leave their educators free. Southern Baptists may appoint their "smelling" committees for their colleges, and northern Baptists harry their theological seminaries, but Presbyterian schools are free. If any one fears the results of a free laboratory, let him go to one of these great Presbyterian foundations. Men are not losing their faith because of evolution or the higher criticism. Perhaps the average student comes out of a Presbyterian college more conservative than out of the average Disciples school. That is because the new learning need not be cultivated esoterically in some attic club room. It is examined critically in the class room. Men are prone to doubt at the college age. The Presbyterian professor teaches callow youth to doubt its doubts. Union Seminary has led all the other seminaries in this country in constructive liberalism, but Union turns out helpful ministers, not destructive radicals. The Scotch bent for intellectual life has wrought itself into an educational system which is respected all over this broad land.

DEBT TO PRESBYTERIANISM

It is when one looks over his books in his religious library that one realizes his debt to Presbyterianism. On the homiletics shelf he finds Beecher and Hillis. Hutton, Vance and Watson have enriched the sermonic literature of two great peoples. Who has a modern work on systematic theology to compare with that of Dr. Brown? Moffat in new testament, Lindsay in church history, and Dr. Speer on missions are indispensable in every library. It is this hard-headed intellectualism that is the corrective for popular religious fallacies. It is perfectly safe to turn Dr. R. A. Torrey loose in general assembly with his fundamentalism. The Presbyterians will never become fundamentalists through and through, not because the dogmas of this ancient way of thinking are contrary to Westminster confession (which they are), but because Presbyterians have no temperament for that kind of thing. These are not men to stand gazing up into heaven for the miracle of a return of a physical Christ. A Presbyterian would rather seek his Lord in the giving of a cup of cold water. He would criticize all "isms" that came claiming allegiance with much frothy protestation, and find the hole in their armor if there is one.

There are few privileges which a Presbyterian enjoys that I covet more than his form of church government. Church polity may be a question of doubtful interest to the laity who appear equally happy under every system, but it is part of a preacher's life. Under episcopal oversight we know what injustices may grow up. A bishop in the Methodist church who does not like a minister may send him back to the tall timber, and there is no redress except in leaving the denomination. When one counts the eminent Methodists who now serve Congregational churches, one gets some impression of the resentment there is in the ministry against an episcopal system so highly centralized as the Methodist. What some of these preachers who leave the Methodist church never guess in advance is that under congregational polity even graver abuses may grow up. Church tyrants are not the product of prelacy alone.

ON CHURCH GOVERNMENT

Alexander Campbell still seems to me deserving of a great place in the story of American Christianity, but I question whether he ever made a worse mistake than in casting aside the church government of his fathers. It is true that his father was censured by both presbytery and synod of the seceder church for practicing open communion. No doubt majorities may be wrong under any system of church government, but at least Thomas Campbell had a hearing and a fair trial. He was not damned by some inner council of church bosses. He was pilloried by no irresponsible church newspaper bent on the destruction of all who dissent from its policy. If there has ever been an hour when some one almost persuaded me to become a Presbyterian, it was at the time when I had forgotten the Westminster confession and stood contemplating the orderly democracy of Presbyterianism. Here is a connectionalism which protects the weak church and the foolish church without robbing it of its local independence. The Presbyterians have the machinery for attempting to coerce men's minds, as they did in the case of Briggs and McGiffert, but they no longer have the spirit for this kind of thing. Probably in no church in America today does a preacher come nearer getting his deserts than in this communion.

The Puritanism of Presbyterians is held by many to be a debit account. No great communion in America today is so loyal to Puritan tradition as is the Presbyterian. Most of us want to protect the workman's day of rest and the Christian's day of worship, but few of us want to make Sunday a day of gloom. It is often the Presbyterian minister who wants to break up the amateur baseball game on a vacant lot on Sunday afternoon. I fear he does not always inquire what would happen to the boys if he did. Would they be better off playing "seven up" in barn lofts, or "shooting craps" in back alleys? In many communities the Presbyterian church is sensing its duty to consider the recreation question not only negatively, but also positively. But they have severe handicaps. In a large town in Indiana one may find a gymnasium which should serve numerous young people, but no matched game is ever played in it. Some of the older saints object to such a thing on church property.

PURITAN CONSCIENCE

The Puritan conscience was a splendid thing. The Presbyterians have it. If one were hunting for candidates for martyrdom one would find as many in this denomination as anywhere. They take their religion seriously. A Scotch mother gives her brightest son to the church with no thought of sacrifice. But the Methodists have proven that one may hold to strict standards of Christian conduct, and yet be happy. Here is Puritanism modified to meet modern needs. The success of Methodism in the past century attests the importance of a religion that fills the heart with joy.

After all the greatest test of a people is in their piety. When I read the biography of David Livingstone I get an insight into the soul of the typical Presbyterian. The sovereign God taught in the Calvinist system led this great man as by pillar of fire. It was the Presbyterian church that gave us the great devotional writer, George Matheson, and Alexander Whyte. Such a commentary of the holy scriptures as that of Alexander Maclaren leads the way to an understanding of the soul of the scriptures which is missed by the scientific student who has no religious insight. The Presbyterian church has no more typical product than Ian Maclaren, the great spiritual preacher of Liverpool. In his romances, his sermons and his parish ministry there is the steady urge of religious devotion. We usually think of Presbyterians as a solid people. This steadiness which requires no annual revival to revitalize dead churches is the result of a type of piety which would bless any communion in christendom. Among this people is a joy in the house of God, a loyalty to the ordained ministry, a devotion to spiritual tasks which earns for them in the Christian world the generous praise of their contemporaries.

If ever Christian unity leads on to church union, as I pray God it may, I think some spiritual Burbank would like to undertake the inbreeding of Presbyterianism into the future Christianity, for it has struck the balance between so many extremes. It is neither conservative nor radical. It is neither a mobocracy, nor a hierarchy. Between the Scylla and Charybdis of wild enthusiasm and cold formalism it steers its craft. It has positive contributions of the greatest value, without which all of the rest of us must remain spiritually poorer. I shall welcome the day when I shall wage the battles of the Lord in the same regiment with the spiritual sons of John Knox.

Like the Springtime

LIKE a black wing, did I spread out my hair
  Over thy knees.
Closing thine eyes, thou didst breathe in its perfume
  Saying to me the whilst;
"Art wont to sleep on moss-covered stones?
With twigs of willow dost bind thy tresses?
Is thy pillow of clover? Are thy locks so black
Because mayhap into them thou hast pressed the juice.
Dark and thick, of the woodsy blackberries?
What fresh, strange fragrance enfolds thee?
Thou smellest of brooklets, of the earth and the forests.
What perfume dost thou use?" And smiling I said:
  "Not any! Not any!" . . .
I love thee and I am young: 'Tis the smell of springtime.
This odor thou notest is that of firm flesh.
Of clear cleeks and new blood.
I love thee and I am young: hence it is I have
The same fragrance as the springtime.

Our Habit of Petulance

By George Lawrence Parker

ALL my bones ache, Horatio, after reading in our daily papers the story of this dreadful world we live in! And as a Christian and a preacher I ask myself, "If all of this is really true, why go on preaching the Gospel of Joy?" Yet the church must go on telling that gospel, for I am convinced that in it lies the only secret of human recovery. But, mark you, Horatio, what the church most needs to do now is to break up this crust of complaint and criticism that lies, like Hosea's half-baked dough, over the minds of men. For it is plain that the real message of joy which is the deepest note of the Christian church, cannot be sounded until the babble of complaint dies down. Yes, the world has got a simon-pure case of the whines, the whimpers, the pouts, the sulks and the grouch. If it were a deep and serious sense of tragedy, with the old Greek note of triumph in it all, I would not object; but our whining complaint has become a habit of littleness; we revel in growling; we like it; we nourish it in every daily paper, in every political speech, and even in the pulpit. If a preacher just lambastes something hard enough and condemns somebody loud enough he can draw the biggest congregation in town. You will see what I mean by all of this, Horatio, if you have ever tried to cheer-up a sulking child. While the child is in the fit of gloom it wants to stay there; and today the world is taking permanent pride in its spirit of complaining. Ashamed of having smashed its finger through disobedience and through handling weapons that it did not know how to use, it now seeks to cover up its shame by blaming everybody except itself!

My dear fellow, as long as we moodily prefer our glooms to daylight and our desert of complaint to the valley of happiness, the gloom and the desert are exactly what we shall have, for God himself cannot give us what we do not desire. And today most people are not happy for the simple reason that they do not want to be! Happiness makes moral demands on us that most of us do not wish to meet. Before I go further, Horatio, let me say that if I use the phrase, in the next few minutes, "since the war," I shall use it as a convenience. The war is not the cause of our new habit of universal whining; it gives us an excuse for it but is not the cause. Our complaint is more the parent of the war than its child.

A WORLD WITH FOUNDATIONS

Our spirit of complaint comes from immaturity, mental unripeness. Most of our pessimistic editorials and review articles and news items are written by young men; finding the tone popular they use it. As for our public in general, we seem to be in a world that has decided never to grow up; we do not need to grow old but we do need to grow up! We might well remind ourselves that while Jesus insisted on childlikeness he also insisted, at least by implication, on full mental maturity. He challenges us to see life as eternalized reality, as something that hath foundations, not as something that has just "been shot out of a pistol"—that phrase is Abbe Loisy's, I think. Most people are running around to the tune of popping pistols and finding excitement in finding out who fired them and when the next one will be fired. Like children we want our world to run as smoothly as a toy, and we refuse to understand that it never has and never will do so. Football can not be played without knocks and bumps; the knocks and bumps constitute the game; they are the game! And if we only had full mental maturity we should understand that the world must have its interruptions and strenuous periods, although as in football the actual breakages can be reduced by care and attention. There's the rub, care and attention! But in the main, Horatio, maturity simply means that we should realize, with God, that this world is not a completed machine, it is a process; it is something in the making. As President Hyde has put this inspiring idea into these thrilling words:

> Creation's Lord, we give thee thanks
>   That this thy world is incomplete;
> That battle calls our marshalled ranks,
>   That work awaits our hands and feet.
> That thou hast not yet finished man,
>   That we are in the making still,—
> As friends who share the Maker's plan,
>   As sons who know the Father's will.

Every expert is at home in his own field and looks on the difficulties there as part of his science; the doctor expects to battle with death, the shipmaster to fight the storm. They don't whine about it. But when we ask men to see life as a whole as a victory to be won by struggle they look at us in amazement. Is it not passing strange? And because they have found out that "all is not beer and skittles," they sink into the age-long habit of complaint. As for me, Horatio, I am weary of this complaint about the world. This is after all the best world I know of. I am willing to accept the universe, to adjust this world to my shoulder and carry it as a burden; willing to lie awake nights with it and study it as a puzzle and a problem—any of these things. But I am weary of kicking the poor thing around, doing it no good and bruising my own toe! I have been hearing men say for the last forty years that the world would soon be in limbo. My boyhood ears heard the same talk and I read the same editorials that we now read. On many of them the dates might be changed and they would serve for the present hour. And yet, Horatio, although the world has come near to the precipice of limbo (but note that it came there by no such causes as those writers predicted!) although it has nearly fallen over the brink, still it has not yet gone to limbo. God knows the tragedy has been great enough; but after all the world is still here, and if we would match the glorious dead who gave their lives to keep it here, we must be as eloquent in our refusal to complain as they are. Then we shall have spared our energies for a fruitful work of helpfulness.

Our spirit of whining complaint is undermining our power of thinking. We have no time or space left to think in, when the air is filled with yelps and snarls. Let our educators look well to the mental condition produced by universal whining! And as for the church, if God has anything at all to do with this world it is not a world to be forever yelped and snarled at. A large dose of the unbroken joyousness of Jesus is what the church needs to administer to a sick world; not "miles of smiles," nor a denial of pain and tragedy, but a calm assurance that cooperation is better than complaining. Today our petulance has become such a habit that it bids fair soon to become our character.

Come, come, Horatio, let's grow up! Of course our task is hard, but it neither began nor ended with us. Of course there are profiteers and strikes, and "revolts of mankind" as Mr. Lothrop Stoddard says, and crime waves and all the rest. But no wave ever stayed its course because people cried on the shore. That is not the way out. Never! Even if we be flippant we had better insist that Kant's "starry heavens and the moral law" still exist; that George Borrow's "wind on the heath" still blows; and that Jesus' "Come unto me and I will give you rest" still opens out its beautiful arms to men. No, the world is perplexing, I know; but I will not keep on throwing insults and stones of criticism at the house I live in! I insist that I like the world, even since the war. I am not surprised that our convalescence has been slow, I rather expected it would be; and the puny editors and the dear public who expect it to recover right off—well, they must be classed with impatient children; I cannot take them seriously.

TRADITION AND PROGRESS

The church, Horatio, must redefine its term "salvation." At present the word represents a sort of mirage that we keep following and which we half-way know to be a mirage. We define salvation in terms of a future unknown world of perfection. And then finding that the hereafter continues to remain the hereafter, we turn to our second use of the word "salvation" by restricting it to purely private uses; a personal security, let what will happen to the world at large. Neither of these uses of the word will serve us now. But it might help a bit if the church would speak about like this: "Dear folks, salvation is nothing more nor less than feeling at home in the universe that our Father has for a time put us in. Its keynotes are sociability and fellowship—fellowship with certain great companions called time, eternity, destiny, character, nature, science, society, thought, art, and daily sleeping and waking; comradeship with certain guardians like conscience, duty, obligation who are not spies but friends; friendliness also with joy. Salvation is having partnership with all that God has a part in; it is unfinished process, cosmic progress, if you please; it is that warm and filial feeling that Jesus had about life when he said, "Our Father." Nothing less than this is salvation; and salvation could not be more than this if it tried!

The next step for the church to take, Horatio, would be to rid the world of the false difference now supposed to exist between tradition and progress. You will find that Professor Gilbert Murray makes this beautifully clear in his book, "Tradition and Progress." Tradition and progress are not enemies but friends. There is no such thing as self-created progress; no parachute leap into aeons of advance. While we step forward with one foot the other is always on the ground; that is the real relation between tradition and progress. The young and impatient intellectuals may shout until they are hoarse; they need only to remember that in twenty years their own revolts will be traditions. The world's best revolutionists have always understood this. And on the other hand the contented traditionalists may weep their eyes red, it will not avail to stop the onrush of new belief and further discovery of God and his truth. The church could not find out, if she would, the real brotherhood between these two great forces of our modern world; and if she is to help she must declare the eternal realities of God all over again; but declare them in the clothing and speech of today. There is no other way. Tradition is preserved by progress, and should be told so. Progress is only assured by tradition and should be told so. The church has here its opportunity to talk with both parties!

Pardon me, Horatio, I must go back to my beginning, and so find my ending. I hate long sermons as much as you do! The upshot of my button-holing you is this: I enter before all courts a protest against the whisper-universal of complaint now poured into our ears like poison, poured by old cronies of tradition and by young offshoots of modern carelessness. I protest against both; they are both false Claudiuses murdering the rightful old Hamlet and depriving the young Hamlet of his rightful Kingdom. I have some faith in God, but I refuse to go about his world sighing and sobbing, even though at times I must weep when his darkness overtakes me. And I enter a bit of advice to the Christian church, Horatio: Its very next duty is to free mankind of its religious insecurity; it must inspire men with the eternality of God; only so can men work with courage. This courage was the secret of the unbroken calm of Jesus. It must be ours.

Goodbye, Horatio, let us compare notes again. And by-the-way, Horatio, don't think I too have joined the ranks of the complainers! I am not impatient of them. They are good fellows, mostly in need of a rest cure!

Memorial

WITHIN the lighted hall they weep,
And hearts are sad.
But with his soul a tryst I keep,
And I am glad.
Among the evening stars I roam,
For he is there,
The great, glad universe his home,
His life a prayer.

Within the lighted hall they sigh;
They think him dead!
Out with the stars no one can lie.
I lift my head
And let the rapture of the sky
Sweep over me.
Under the stars no one can die.
Life! Endless, free!

The Terrible Turk Comes Back

IF the demands of humanity ever justified the intervention of other nations in the affairs of peoples not under their flags it is the case of Turkey. One of the benign conditions of the peace treaty was the placing of non-Islamic minorities in the old Osmanlic realm under Turkish control. Now the Turk has come back into Europe with his characteristic habit of massacre. Once more, as for centuries in the past, he plays one European power against another and slips in between their broken bonds. The remissness of the Turk is due not to a lack of wit nor diplomatic strategy—he is a past master there—but to a code of morals which does not approximate even half way that of a quasi-Christian civilization.

As an individual the educated Turk is a gentlemanly fellow who is kindly disposed toward his friends and neighbors. In almost any Armenian town one hears beautiful stories of how Turkish neighbors took grave risks to save Armenian friends. Because the Turk is so much a gentleman many a traveler is persuaded that there must be some iniquity on the part of the Christians within his grasp that lends apology, if not justification, for his bloody record. You meet suave and kindly disposed Turks of culture in Constantinople and see unkempt Armenians; you speak with Turks who speak frankly and with engaging openness, and you trade with poor Armenians who dicker and cheat, hence you return with your sensibilities blunted by pleasant memories of the one and repugnant experiences of the other.

It is not the native savagery in the average Turk which accounts for the cruelty of deportations and massacre. It is the deliberate code of the ruler and military commander. Smyrna was not looted and burned by a mob but by the disciplined armies of the most modern of Turkish leaders. The village massacres are not initiated by the street mobs but by the orders of the rulers, both civil and military. The deportations of late years, unparalleled in savagery and cruelty since the days of Gengis Khan, were as much a part of a grand plan as were the machinations of the German general staff. It is a deliberate annihilation of minorities, both national and religious, and the procedure is carried on with a good conscience rather than in defiance of conscience.

A Barbaric Conscience

That conscience is primitive and barbaric, for the externals of western culture have not availed to overthrow the mores of the Arab tribe in which Islam was nurtured. The Moslem creed is hard and fast, fixed in an ossifying legalism. It is politico-religious and its prototype is found in the earlier codes found in the Old Testament and contemporaneous Syria and Scythia. When a nationalistic chauvinism is fixed in an atavistic religious code and fired with a primitive emotional passion, it is hardly ready to fraternize with a progressive world. The morals of the Turk are those of the nomad. He lives in cities rich in trade and commerce, but his heart still dwells in tents. He is thus the Machiavellian and narrow nationalist par excellence.

Kemal Pasha declares for a republic. The times are no longer ripe politically for new dynasties, and besides the Islamic tradition of the sultan as head of the faith is a superstition for which even many of his soldiers would die. His republic will no doubt turn out to be a monarchy with the sultan a political figurehead, treated by a mikado-like reverence. As titular pontiff of the faith he will be sacrosanct, and the politico-military rulers will form a sort of modernized shogunate around him. A good scholastic theory of state and church will manage to bend the enactments of even a constitutionalist government to the inviolable decrees of an unchangeable religious law. The declaration that only Turks are wanted gives little hope of a modern policy in relation to minor groups.

When the history of the present abortive peace making has been written nothing will reflect less glory on the banners of England and France than this return of the Turk. It has been the old game of bluff and imperial advantage. The English government encouraged the Greek in his grandiose imperial plans, for with this pawn ensconced along the eastern Mediterranean the dream of empire in the east would be realized more safely. The French government backed the Turk. Their guilt was the greater both because he is the Great Assassin and because they gave arms and military counsel as well as political encouragement. No doubt the wily Osmanli played a larger hand than Poincare designed but, like the proverbial hunter with the wild-cat, he could not let go when he wished.

The result is now written in blood and flame. Tens of thousands are dead by sword and starvation, and hundreds of thousands are on a pitiful trek toward the west. Their way is strewn with skeletons; behind them is all they possess, before them is winter. The lands toward which they crawl are in poverty, and the charity of the world will avail to do no more than pour a little oil on their wounds. The Turk comes back to the Maritsa. Behind his western lines 900,000 Christians lived. One-third of them are known to be in the tragical caravans creeping westward; if one-half of them are able to find any sort of peace and protection under the restored regime the world may give thanks. In the east what Armenians are left may well shiver in fear.

A Shifting Political Horoscope

Meanwhile the political horoscope is changed, and the shifting brings new problems. The Balkan states will be drawn together against the restored power of an ancient enemy. The understanding between France and the Little Entente may well be strained to breaking because France has played into the hand of the Turk. The good will between Italy and England has suffered violence and the breach between England and France is widened. The Fascisti step into power in Rome and bristle with threats toward Jugo-Slavia. Lloyd George fails in Britain and all semblance of political unity is dissolved by a campaign which may result in government by a bloc. Russia makes common cause with the Turk to win a place at the table where the problem of the Bosphorus will take a new twist. The passions of the Islamic world are aroused and find hope in successful conquest by the Osmanic power. Some of these changes would be beneficent if they had been wrought out in peace and reason, but a menace lies in the thing that forced them to issue.

Meanwhile what has a Christian world to say—I mean that world of rational good-will which has a right to assume the name Christian? It must be plain that once again the old diplomacy has scored a diabolical victory. The unwonted Greek imperialism, the Franco-Turkish secret treaty, the scheming Tory imperialism in Westminster, the gyrations of peace councils, the twisting of phrases, are all part of the story which has filled European history these many generations. Lloyd-George took his stand at Chanak for immediate worthy ends but the long story of England in the annals of the Bosphorus has given the world doubt of the singleness of his aim. America stands aloof offering a hand of charity—nothing more.

Suppose America had been at Geneva. Then there might have been a league with power to act on behalf of humanity. Robbed of our aloofness of purpose, diplomacy plays around the league. With no mediating power in the great council of the league no authority can arise, for none will yield to another. We who fought without thought of gain in territory or political advantage could sit among the nations without suspicion of seeking aggrandizement or of playing a mere game of craftiness. The league offers the first hope in the history of mankind for a conference of good-will that can speak with authority. Until the good-will of a Christian world becomes vocal through organized authority international anarchy will prevail. It is time the church of the Prince of Peace cast aside its fear of partizan entanglements and arose above all party interests to demand a federation of the world powers through which reason can permeate and judgment sit above the nations.

British Table Talk

London, Oct. 23, 1922.

AT the moment the politicians are firing generalities at each other. They have not yet condescended to details. They are, of course,—all of them—for the people, and all have no other ambition than to serve the noblest ends of their country. For something more than these protestations we have to wait. It is to be hoped that soon we shall know what the rivals propose in respect of foreign relations, unemployment, India, and all the other definite problems, which must face the new Parliament. It will not be enough, when the choice comes, to say, "I am for the people!" It will be necessary, for example, for the member to say whether or not he is in favor of certain definite proposals which are sure to be brought forward. All the candidates are in favor—before the polls—of the league of nations, but the real test will come when it is suggested that in the interest of international peace this nation must make sacrifices. Then it will be seen how far devotion to the league is "rather mere words," and there will be similar choices in all the range of our national affairs. Meanwhile the chief excitement today has been the announcement that Mr. McKenna is to speak at a meeting of the new Premier's. Mr. McKenna has been hitherto a leading liberal, and recently he has presided over one of our greatest banks. He is a big fish to have been caught, if indeed he is caught. But by the time these words are in print my readers will know about what we are fighting.

Is There a Christian Policy?

The Christian teacher or statesman is often asked whether he can lay down the policy which the disciples of Christ, because they are his disciples, must adopt. It is a peculiarly hard task to steer the course between general truths, which all accept, and particular applications. For this reason, the application depends to some extent upon the facts admitted by the chooser. If two men of the same faith and with the same principles have not the same data before them, they may easily differ in policy. Some things, however, can be known as the divine will, if the Christian faith is there. It is certain that "patriotism is not enough," that it must be sublimated into a nobler passion for the peace and ordered progress of all mankind. It is equally clear that a policy of revenge is always a policy not only of futility, but of deliberate disobedience to the mind of God. But when a would-be follower of Christ considers the spirit at work in parties, apart from their programs, he is compelled to admit that the motives which move men in each group are not widely different. That does not mean that he should stand out of parties but it means that he is wise not to expect any of them behind the scenes to live up to their platform ideals. But political parties are not the only societies of which this is true.

The Bishop and the Duke

The Bishop of Oxford has declared that the Duke of Marlborough is not qualified to attend the Diocesan conference. The duke, as all the world knows, was divorced and married again. With the justice of the bishop's act I am not concerned just now, though it is refreshing to find that a test case is made not of a man in humble rank, but of a duke. What is more serious is the comment occasioned by Dr. Burge's action. One London paper was highly indignant with him on the ground that he is a "state-paid official" and ought to obey his orders from the state. If that represents the interpretation put upon the Established Church and its ministers by the average man, then I can imagine that the cause of disestablishment will gain this week many recruits in the church itself. A state-paid official! Could anything be more insulting It is not true, of course. There are no bishops today who would regard themselves as officials of the nation; and no church today can tolerate the idea that the rules of its life can be made by the state. But the episode of the bishop and the duke raises the question, how soon the church will claim its own complete freedom and be set above the very suspicion of Erastianism.

Congregationalism and Its Young People

In common with all the other churches the Congregationalists have had for years to report a falling-off in the numbers in their Sunday schools. With admirable candor and courage they have faced the facts and sought, under the lead of the Young People's committee, with Mr. Hallack as secretary, to discover the way to arrest the decline. "During the seven years previous to the war Congregationalists lost 38,000 scholars, but gained 4,400 teachers. During the seven years from the outbreak of the war to 1921, there was a decrease of 71,000 scholars and 5,200 teachers. During the past year, however, Congregationalists gained 1,488 scholars and 754 teachers." The last sentence shows that thanks to the wisdom and true progressive spirit shown by the leaders and all the rank and file of teachers, there is a turn in the tide. The fact is that the past fourteen years have been in the schools a time of removal from old methods to new, and in the hour of removal a family is likely to suffer.

Dr. Barnes

In his address on "Some Spiritual Aspects of Adult Education," Canon Barnes has given much counsel of supreme value. His words concerning America and its place in the spiritual progress of humanity will be read with interest. "It is rather to America that we must look for cooperation if not for inspiration. The war has given to America a position of economic supremacy. The mass of the American people will consequently find it easier than in this country to maintain a decent standard of living. There will be the wealth and leisure which are necessary if a community is to make effective spiritual adventures. But the population there is very mixed. Though on the surface Americanization is rapid, a homogeneous race has not yet been evolved. Then, too, in social legislation the American people are half a century behind ourselves. Though there is much religious enthusiasm, there is also a wide-spread popular prejudice against clear and careful thought: the 'high-brow' is regarded with dislike. Yet it is on the whole true that in world-politics a fine type of idealism is manifest, in happy contrast to our own spiritual weariness. Already the religious influence of America on England is great and we cannot doubt that it will increase. But American Christianity is the product of a somewhat uncritical self-confidence, valuable because of its spiritual certainty, defective because it does not bridge the gulf between aspiration and knowledge." It is always a dangerous task for a member of one nation to diagnose the spiritual condition of another nation, but Canon Barnes is a peculiarly wise and just thinker, who is not disposed to keep his criticism for other people. Indeed he is remorselessly candid in his analysis of our English thought and life.

Dr. Wm. Adams Brown on Immortality

Every autumn in connection with Hackney college there is a lecture on immortality. Among the past lecturers have been Prof. Gilbert Murray, Sir Oliver Lodge, and other eminent scholars. This year Dr. William Adams Brown stated with great force the argument from the unexhausted powers within man. It is an argument familiar to readers of Browning and Tennyson, but it needs restating continually. "The capacity to create has no set limits. Much as it achieves, you are conscious of powers still unused. It is not because death robs us of what has already been done; it is because it prevents us from enjoying what we still might do. Grant that the man I am now is not worth preserving. The man I am becoming is conscious of stirrings of creative power which, if this life be all, can never be expected." The question of the significance which our spiritual values and experiences possess in the universe—this is a very living question today. Are we simply a product of a blind life-force which has blundered upon man? Or have we within our own spiritual experiences the earnest of an immortal destiny? It is a big question, but some of us have made up our minds upon it long ago.

A Confession of Faith

"The Incarnation and the Cross are the central doctrines of Christianity. The Christ in us bears witness to the Christ for us. The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God and joint-heirs with Christ. And the Holy Spirit, in bearing this witness, sets the stamp of divinity not only on the revelation, but on the historical revealer. In other words, the voice of God within us speaks in the tones of Jesus of Nazareth." These are not the words of a respected and irreproachable evangelical, they are from the last book by Dean Inge!

CORRESPONDENCE

Fears Ecclesiastical Dictatorship

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial, "Nearing the Danger Line," considers a situation which undoubtedly contains grave implications. With the development of the technique of commercial organization by our various philanthropic and religious enterprises, repeated campaigns, expansive programs frequently overlapping one another, minute subdivision of obviously necessary tasks and the resultant multiplication of promotional machinery have apparently followed as a matter of course. Careful consideration should be given the problem if only on the grounds of economy and efficiency. But with the suggested remedy I wish respectfully to take issue. There is already too conspicuous a tendency on the part of our churches, considered denominationally, to assume the right to pass judgment upon all enterprises operating in the broad field of social-religious interests. While it is undoubtedly true that the great majority of contributors to these general extra-denominational projects are themselves members of churches, it is quite possible that these individuals have aspirations and visions which lie outside of, if not beyond, the dreams of the denominational organization.

The most pertinent illustration is that of the Sunday school movement which, because it was thought of little value by the church leadership in an official capacity, was for more than a generation developed entirely by a laymen's organization dependent upon voluntary contributions. The fact that this movement is now officially one of the church's but emphasizes the point. Had that earlier group been unable to carry out its program without submitting it first to a general inter-denominational Board, which at that time must have been uninterested, if not uninformed, the chances are that no such progress could have been made as to convince at last the churches of the worth of its cause.

Your proposal of a "fully credentialed body of reference, review and audit," contains both a fallacy and a peril. The fallacy is in the assumption that church people should not be asked for contributions to causes not passed upon by their church. This suggests an ecclesiastical dictatorship which is certainly foreign to the genius of Protestantism. The peril is in placing programs of world consequence in jeopardy of abandonment should they fall victims to the strife which is sometimes manifest even between denominations.

When we find a group of men willing to throw themselves into a cause of Christ's, willing to face the difficulties which attend every campaign against wrong, injustice and sin, going forth to convince others of the worth of their cause, should we not bid them God-speed and not ask them to grow old pleading their case before the bar of the varied opinions of our church board.

Germany Has More Than Paid!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the last issue (Oct. 26) of your paper I read the article by President H. N. MacCracken, "What Germany Has Paid." What the writer says is all right as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough—not nearly far enough. Germany has not only paid a great deal, she has already paid more than enough. Like Israel of old, "she has received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

The writer, I say, does not go far enough. He should have raised the question, "have we, have the allies treated Germany fairly?" Was the treaty of Versailles what we had promised Germany, what she could expect on the basis of the armistice? Senator Borah answers this question in a recent letter to me as follows: "The President of the United States went to Europe with what you may call an American program announcing American principles. Every single policy or principle which he announced was rejected in the writing of the Versailles treaty. The Versailles treaty was based upon injustice, imperialism, and then they ask us to join a league of nations to nail it down. In other words, having divided Europe among the victors, and written a treaty to enforce it, which would destroy Europe, they ask us to become a party to the program to enforce the treaty."

It would be easy to marshal other testimony to substantiate the statement that the Versailles treaty is the most inhuman, diabolical document ever drafted by a group of nations that professed to be fighting for the cause of liberty and humanity. It is based on the cruel fiction that Germany was alone responsible for the war. Of this, said the Frenchman Henri Barbusse, author of "Le Feu," for twenty-three months a soldier in the trenches, speaking to laboring men two years ago: "We common soldiers have long abandoned the stupid lie that Germany was alone to blame for the war."

The treaty of Versailles is the cause of nearly all the suffering and starvation in Europe today, but it is French militarism and imperialism that seeks to enforce this treaty in letter and spirit. French hatred and French imperial ambitions are causing Europe's sores to fester; they are gnawing at the marrow of the central powers. Victor Hugo said of his countrymen: "The Frenchman is half monkey, half tiger." On the variety stage we laugh at the monkey, while continental Europe is in the clutches of the tiger.

Jesus, the Great Missionary *

WE have seen Jesus as doctor, as teacher, as a friend to bad people; today we are to see him as a missionary. We see him going into many towns "doing good." Sometimes he would talk, sometimes he would heal as in the narrative set aside for today. Harry Emerson Fosdick, whom I heard lecture for a week this summer, tells us that Jesus could not live in a town without knowing about and caring for the saddest and worst people there. Many of us do not care over much. We meet people on a "money," not a "love" basis. We have our choice and delightful social set; all our friends are respectable, capable, bright and if not exactly well-to-do, artistic enough to be received in the best circles. We are not worrying about the unhappy and unfortunate people who live outside our group and who can hardly imagine the kind of life we constantly enjoy. But Jesus sought out the most luckless, wretched and despised persons in the community and brought peace and joy to them. Coming into the country of the Gadarenes, he found the violently insane man, who kept the whole neighborhood in terror. He brought sanity to him. The narrative seems to indicate that this process of restoring mental balance required some time—"for he was commanding the unclean spirit to come out of the man." Can you not picture the strong, pure, balanced, perfect Master standing, with a look of love, before this poor, demented outcast? When the lunatic appeared he brought consternation, children fled, shrieking to their parents, herds of swine had dashed down the slope into the sea, frightened by his mad shouts and the frantic waving of his arms; men had turned pale at the sudden approach of this wild-eyed, powerfully-built madman. Now there stood before him a calm, fearless, poised man whose eyes held him. He became quiet, he relaxed, he responded to the kind look, he found sanity stealing back into his perverted mind. He was cured. And now he wished to travel with this wonderful person, but he was not permitted. The One who had cured him sent him back to his own town and people. The place to "make good" is in the old home circle and in the old home town. If you cannot succeed in Richmond, Indiana, or Ames, Iowa, it is not likely that you will do any good in Los Angeles or Seattle. The bad habits are in yourself, they must be conquered internally. They travel with you, they get off the train when you do, they step into the hotel room with you, they go with you when you go out to find the new position. A restless, unhappy disposition, a shiftless, unreliable nature, a vile mind, an unskilled hand, broken health, a weak will, a lying tongue—these all are constant companions. They must be conquered right where you are now. Going to China or Honolulu will not make the conquest any easier. What you need, young fellow, is not a change of location but a change of heart, and the only power under heaven to help you effect that change is to be found in the pure, strong, loving Son of God. All others may turn their backs upon you, but he still loves you.

Two things each one needs. (1) A clear-cut knowledge that Jesus has actually done something for us. (2) A definite witness before others, seeking to win them to our Master. What has Jesus done for you? What might you be, but for him? How are you testifying for him? We dare not lose our witness. If I were asked what one thing in all my ministry I hold dearest, I would, without hesitation, answer: "personal work." By that I mean the first-hand winning of people to my Master. I love to preach, I love to teach, I love to bring comfort into sick-rooms, I love to point the way to eternal life when all is dark, but high above all is the deep satisfaction of winning a boy or girl, a man or woman to become a genuine disciple of our blessed Lord. We can all do this. It only needs the passion. Go to your home, go to your neighbor, go to your store, go to your mill—win a man for Christ. Go telling what Christ has done for you and come rejoicing, bringing your brother to the Master.

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, a striking volume, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

Boards $2.50, plus 12 cents postage.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

The subscription price of The Christian Century is $4 a year (to ministers $3). No premium or discount of any sort is made on renewals. We wish our readers to be assured that the premium offers which they see from time to time in our pages or elsewhere apply to new subscriptions only, and never to renewals. These offers are what might be called "recruiting devices" to enlist the interest of those unacquainted with this journal of religion. As a general rule publishers hesitate to announce such recruiting offers in their own pages, lest their subscribers become confused and ask for the premiums on their own renewals. We desire to express to our readers a word of appreciation for their intelligent consideration in allowing us to make use of the pages of The Christian Century itself for soliciting new subscriptions without thereby creating misunderstanding as to the invariable rate of their own renewals.

One Hundred Dollars for a Pageant

It takes a pageant to make anything go nowadays in the churches so the Presbyterian Board of Education is offering a hundred dollars for the best pageant suitable for Vocation Day. This day will be observed next year on May 6. On that occasion the various churches of the denomination will call upon the young people to think on the investment of their lives in some great cause. A committee has been appointed which will judge the various offerings which are made in the competition

Topics for Week of Prayer

The Federal Council of Churches has issued its annual list of topics for the week of prayer in the churches early in January. Beginning on Monday, these are: "Thanksgiving and Confession," "The One Body of Which Christ is Head," "Nations and their Rulers," "Foreign Missions," "Families, Schools, Colleges, and the Young," "Home Missions." The Call to Prayer contains these words: How shall we face this call for light from a despairing world? Two things it demands of us. It demands a new perseverance in exploring the way of unity and capturing its spirit by a new loyalty to Christ. And it demands a new perservance in prayer, both as a means of personal union with God and as a task for the kingdom. For true prayer is both a means of grace and a task of service, and one depends on the other. Only as we go out with Christ, taking on us with him the burden of a world, marred through sin, can we find him for our own personal felfowship. Only as we revive our allegiance to him can we become his helpers to bring in his kingdom through the mighty ministry of intercession.

Congregationalist Indians Appreciative of Dr. Riggs

Many Sioux Indians of South Dakota are Congregationalists. This is due to fifty years of heroic service among them on the part of Rev. Thomas L. Riggs, D. D. He was born of missionary parents among the Indians, and knows no other work. The sessions of the Dakota Association were recently interrupted by Indians who demanded the right "to praise a hero." Three speeches were made in the Sioux language in which the Christian preacher was called their "sacred herald." A purse of a hundred dollars was presented to Dr. Riggs by the men, and a purse of forty dollars to Mrs. Riggs by the women. Mrs. Riggs is the daughter of an army captain who in days gone by had to lead battles against Indians.

Church Federations Throughout Country Active

The various city federations of churches throughout the country are now engaged in active campaigns. Rev. D. L. Darby, of Milliken University, has been called to Washington, D. C, to succeed Rev. Lucius Clark. Dr. Darby is well-known among Southern Presbyterians and served with the Y. M. C. A. during the war. The Federation at Passaic, N. J., has called Dr. Arthur C. Lincoln from the pastorate of King's Highway Congregational church to succeed Rev F. P. Quick. In Wichita the big Federation project is a series of evangelistic meetings which will be conducted by Gypsy Smith in March, 1924. Already the preparations for the campaign are active. The Boston Federation is unfortunate in that the accident which befell Dr. Doremus Scudder the past summer, when he was struck by an automobile which plunged across the sidewalk, forces him to spend six months in California recuperating. Summer evangelistic services were held out-doors by 64 ministers, 65 young people's societies, and 50 musicians during the past summer in St. Louis. Gradually the nation is realizing that Protestantism must be able to present a united front on important questions if it is to be effective.

Brave Fight for an Industrial School

Since the war America is becoming conscious of the educational problem in the backward states. Rev. J. M. Shofner states that Alabama has today 100,000 white children of school age who have never entered school. He himself has a life story of struggle for an education that is heroic. After having established a place for himself in the ministry of the Southern Methodist church, he founded a school at Brewton, Ala., for white girls. His theory is that female education is more important than the education of the men, since the women hold in their hands the educational ideals of the future. This school was independent for many years, but in 1912 it became the

President Tells Christian Leaders His Attitude

TWENTY Christian societies were represented at the meeting of the Allied Christian societies engaged in community work which was held in Washington recently, and one of the party, which numbered about 200, was given an audience by the President. Special inquiry was made of the President as to his attitude toward the eighteenth amendment. In response, President Harding said:

"No government is worthy of the name if it does not attempt to enforce its laws, but it is pretty difficult sometimes. I will tell you a rather interesting story about the eighteenth amendment, when it is developed more fully. I hope you will look upon your government with no less confidence as we turn to a peculiar method. With the law as it stands no vessel in the world with any intoxicant on board, sealed or unsealed, can touch at any of our insular ports.

"I am not pressed to tell you, because I know your position in the matter, I do not believe that is practical. It is the law; and at the present time must be enforced. I only give you that to show the difficulty in enforcing the law. Of course it must be enforced. I think we are better off for the eighteenth amendment. It has come to stay. I do not think we will ever depart from it."

In response to inquiries with regard to the international obligations of the United States, the President said:

"Your government is trying the best it knows how to perform its duty to the world. We are not in accord, perhaps, as to detail. It is so easy sometimes to say what ought to be done, but if you had to assume the full responsibility you might hesitate, or at least think twice before you did a thing. We are exercising our influence, I believe, in a way no less potent than if we were more pretentious about it. The American government is committed to the protection of religious and racial minorities, the relief of those who are refugees from destruction and desolation, and I hope our influence will not be wholly lacking in the establishment of as nearly righteous a peace as can be brought about.

"I am fully aware that some of you have thought your government is not active enough, but so long as I am at the head of the government it is never going to make a threat it can't carry out. It would be folly to brandish a club with a threatening hand if you didn't mean to carry it out."

property of the Alabama Conference, though it is still without any regular place in the scheme of church benevolence. The school plant now includes three dormitories, an administration building, a president's home, and two farm houses. There is an enrolment of 173 girls and a faculty of fourteen. The plant is valued at $60,000. Most of the work of the school is done by the girls themselves. Rising at six, one section of the school cooks the breakfast, while another milks the cows and still another cares for the poultry and makes the beds. The education is not only literary but industrial as well, for the various household and agricultural arts are competently taught. Recreation is also planned for. President Shofner believes that his work is guided day by day by his heavenly father, and he has made great sacrifices in his work.

Dr. J. M. Campbell Gives up Pastorate at Eighty

There has been no dead line for Dr. J. M. Campbell for he was called to the Home Mission church at Manhattan Beach, Calif., when he was well over seventy. He retired voluntarily the other day on his eightieth birthday. He wrote a poetical farewell to his flock on the day of his resignation which was received with much feeling. His poem closed with these words:

"As the evening shadows around me fall,
I wait for the gentle curfew call,
And the eternal rest held out to all
    In the little gray church on the hill,
    At Manhattan by the sea.

"From scenes most fair and friends most kind
As I go a Sabbatic rest to find,
I leave a bit of my heart behind
    In the little gray church on the hill,
    At Manhattan by the sea.

"And when on earth no more we meet,
No heavenly bliss will be complete
Unless some blood-washed souls I greet
    From the little gray church on the hill,
    At Manhattan by the sea."

University Disciples Lay Cornerstone

An event of particular significance to the Disciples of Christ in Chicago was the laying of the corner stone of a $200,000 church and Sunday school edifice for University church on Sunday afternoon, November 5. The building is to stand on a corner whose three opposite neighbors are the Bartlett Gymnasium, the Quadrangle Club and the Reynolds Club, with Mandel Hall and Hutchinson Commons. For twenty-one years Prof. E. S. Ames has been minister of this church, worshipping in a modest brick structure and carrying on a work of city-wide and denomination-wide influence. The new edifice will be the finest piece of architecture owned by the Disciples in the city, and one in complete harmony with the stately university buildings in its vicinity. Profs. W. D. MacClintock and Herbert L. Willett of the university and Dr. Charles W. Gilkey of Hyde Park Baptist church shared with Dr. Ames in the corner stone exercises which in spite of rain were most impressive. The building will be ready for occupancy in the spring. Meanwhile the congregation is worshipping in the old building which was moved temporarily to an unused portion of the lot.

Great Colored Y. M. C. A. Is Housed

Through the generosity of Julius Rosenwald, a Jew of Chicago, Y. M. C. A buildings for colored people are being erected in various parts of the country. He is giving one-tenth of the amount necessary to erect a great Association building for negroes in Pittsburgh. The constant migration of the negro to the north to engage in factory labor has prompted many cities to engage in erecting similar institutions. The Pittsburgh building will provide a gymnasium, swimming pool, shower baths, dormitories, restaurant, boy's department, social hall, and quarters for religious work. Ten thousand people participated in the cornerstone laying and the Masonic order conducted the ceremonies. Of $600,000 raised in colored associations

Lutherans Turn Down Federal Council

THE third biennial convention of the United Lutheran church which met in Buffalo last month was keenly disappointed that the illness of President F. H. Knubel prevented his being present, for his guiding hand is largely responsible for the success of the union of the several constituent denominations that make up the United Lutheran church. The congregationalism of Lutheran churches in America is very strong, and it has required great diplomacy to weld together in firm union various diverse racial groups. Dr. Ellis P. Burgess, of Pittsburgh, was made president pro tem.

It was characteristic of the piety of Lutherans that they opened their sessions with a communion service in Trinity church where the choir contributed to make the occasion one of great dignity. That there is a rapidly growing ritualism in their worship was evidenced by the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The denomination has a Common Service Book which is now widely used in the churches.

Perhaps most important among the various questions that were debated in the convention was that of relationship to the Federal Council of Churches. The denomination has up to the present time refused to enter the Federal Council as a member, though maintaining a representative at the meetings who brought back information to the officers of the church. It had been hoped by forward-looking leaders that a more cordial and cooperative attitude would be taken at this convention, but these hopes have been blasted. The conservative Lutheran seems never to have forgotten the refusal of Luther to give his hand to Zwingli on account of differences in the matter of the dogma of the Lord's Supper, and now, four hundred years later, he refuses to greet in cordial fellowship his Protestant brethren because these brethren do not believe all that is in the Augsburg confession.

However, the denomination will continue to have a "consultative" relationship to the Federal Council and in the following projects will give cooperation: "study of the question of Christian unity; common phases of educational work; problems of army and navy chaplains; general survey when such may seem to be urgently needed; conferences and exchange of departmental plans; declaration on matters of public concern, after these have been approved by various denominational organizations; relief for stricken countries; assembling and printing of church statistics; general publicity for cooperating churches; transportation arrangements." It will be observed that the Lutherans will have nothing to do with the work of the commission on the church and social service and one may well suspect that the secret of their aloofness is here. They are also cold on the matter of the international program of the Federation.

The attitude of the denomination may well be expressed in these words of the committee report: "We believe in upholding our denominational integrity until Christian unity can come on the basis of common faith. This also prevents the possibility for us of entering into many attempts at local federated effort, at churches, at restriction of parish boundaries." The attitude toward local federations of churches in the various cities will have limitations almost exactly like those that arise in connection with the Federal Council.

The storm center of the sessions appears to have been in connection with a discussion of the report of the committee on theological seminaries. All the seminaries of the constituent denominations that entered into the union wish to function. Many of these who have been under the control of state synods, insist upon the continuance of this control, while the educational committee holds to the view that no college or seminary shall be considered as denominational which does not comply with certain regulations of the committee, among which is the election of trustees by synods. This would denominationalize the colleges to an extent not known in any other large Protestant denomination in America.

The resolutions passed on the matter of international relationships were sweeping in many particulars. The following are some of them:

"Resolved, That nations, no less than individuals, are bound by the moral law, and are responsible to God the judge of all the earth, and that he will most surely punish and ultimately destroy them if they do not deal justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly before him.

Women of World W. C. T. U. in Philadelphia

The white ribbon brigade from all over the world began to arrive in Philadelphia on Nov. 11 to begin the sessions of the World W. C. T. U. Now that world prohibition is no longer a chimerical project but a serious proposal which arouses fear in every country among conservative politicians, the women have the biggest topic for consideration that has ever come before their meetings. Reports will be made of temperance progress in various parts of the world.

Illinois' Most Religious Village

Bowen, Ill., has a record that challenges comparison the world over in regard to church membership and Sunday school attendance. With a resident population of 715, there are 400 members in the three local churches. This does not take into account the 300 members who live in the community about the town, nor the 240 non-resident members on the rolls of these three local churches. The three Sunday schools report a total enrollment of 690 with 200 more being touched through the home department and the cradle roll. On one Sunday there have been as many as 504 in actual attendance at these three schools—a number greater than the total church population of the town, and this record was made not on a Rally day, but on several Sundays, without special effort. Each of the three churches has a pastor living in the community. The extraordinary success of these churches is attributed to the good fellowship that enables them to work together. It would

LUTHERANS AND FEDERAL COUNCIL

"That the only true and certain way of peace and prosperity for nations as well as for individuals is the way of repentance, and confession, and amendment of their ways, if they have sinned against God or towards each other.

"That the great Christian nations of the earth should use all the moral and political influence and economic pressure which they can command to stop the oppression, and persecution, and cruel treatment of Christians in the orient, especially the Armenians.

"That the maintenance of great standing armies and great navies, whether of the sea or of the air, not only imposes heavy and oppressive burdens on the people, and involves an appalling waste of the economic resources and the manpower of the nations, but also constitutes a constant menace to the peace of the world."

In the election of officers everything went quietly, and the former leaders were reelected. Dr. F. H. Knubel of New York is continued as president, Dr. M. G. G. Scherer as secretary, and Dr. E. C. Miller as treasurer.

The commission on adjudication is said to be a unique feature of this denomination. The Synod of Maryland brought in a complaint of an invasion of their prerogatives by the executive board of the national organization. Even differences between members and between a congregation and its members may be reviewed by this commission after a synod has failed to reach a satisfactory conclusion in the matter.

A brotherhood banquet of three hundred men was addressed by church leaders on denominational questions. Charles J. Driever of Chicago was elected to head the brotherhood movement the coming year. A. H. Homrighaus of Chicago will serve as secretary.

Dr. Macfarland on Europe

AFTER spending the entire summer in a study of conditions in Europe, particularly with reference to the international questions, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, has returned to America and has just given out an interview to the press which is full of information with regard to spiritual attitudes on the part of leading people across the water. He said:

"'How do the European peoples feel toward us?' is the question often asked as we return. Their feeling is one of disappointment that has not reached disillusionment, mingled with faith that still persists. They feel that we have left the field of battle without stopping to bury the dead or to help repair the devastation made by our own artillery. Recognition of our private, philanthropic help is not overlooked and still gives impulses to prayers of gratitude. No rancor is manifested, just disappointment, sometimes, however, almost to despair.

"Any highminded citizen of America who comes today into touch with the heart of Europe is solemnized and humbled by this unquenchable faith in America. Of course, one may say that it is partly due to the fact that all the gold of the world is locked up in America and that she commands the economic and commercial avenues of the world's life. I believe, however, that it is more than this. It is a strong faith in her political institutions, which they are able to see as distinct from the fallible personalities who happen to represent those political institutions. It is a moral and spiritual faith which has been deepened by our works and workers of philanthropy and good will. However you may interpret it, the fact remains that in Europe the politicians, the economists, the people are still maintaining their courage by keeping their gaze fixed across the ocean to our shores. They believe in the American people. One recalls the new life that came to the depleted forces of the allies in 1917 and 1918 when the word was passed along the line, 'America has come.' There would be a new Europe, almost over night, if the same message ran from heart to heart, 'America has come back again.'

"I do not intend that this article shall discuss the question of American participation in the league of nations. I will simply bear witness to the impression that it makes. It seems to me to illustrate my contention that the peoples of Europe, together with the others associated with them, are seriously trying to find the way to institutions which will embody a new world conscience.

"At the invitation of Hon. Paul Hymans, former president of the assembly, I attended the opening of the assembly at Geneva, September 4th. Semi-official religious services, attended generally by the delegates, were held the previous Sunday, the preacher at the Protestant service being the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Assembly was impressive, dignified and serious. The meeting of the league council, which followed, was illuminating. One felt, with emotion, that here at least in ideal, was the hope of the healing of the nations. One felt the contrast between this free democratic body and the old secret conferences for balance of power and its superiority over the present partial conferences, our own Washington conference not excepted.

"Personal conference with members of the league indicated a willingness to make any reasonable modifications which would open the way for the United States. Disappointment was privately expressed at the inability of the league

"Contrast for a moment the spirit of America in 1918 with the spirit of America as it is manifested commercially and politically today. The selfishness into which we have fallen is the worst of all the reactions of the war. Our tourists go to Europe for pleasure, capitalize the weakness of our European brethren, boast in one breath that they have saved enough by exchange in one single country to meet the expense of their pleasure tour, and then put long interviews in the newspapers complaining that they were overcharged by dishonest Europeans. Small commercial men, who profiteered without conscience in America during the war, are now disappointed in their efforts to exploit poor old Europe through the fluctuation of exchange and the consequent instability of European trade and commerce and then come to us spreading their hateful propaganda.

"Can we rise above all this? Can we rise above our partisan politics? Can America face something more than what our government calls her 'interest,' and visualize her duties and opportunities? Are nations responsible for things that they might prevent? Men everywhere are talking and writing and prophesying about 'the next war.' If there should be a next war, could the United States make use of Pilate's basin, as to her participation in it or measure of responsibility for it? Is the assertion of the Master just a few foolish words, or is it an eternal truth, that "he that saveth his life shall lose it; he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it?"

be very interesting to see what would happen could the three churches unite as one congregation and still retain all three pastors, each doing some special phase of the work, as a specialist—say, one as preacher and pastor, one as educational director, and one as community leader.

Bible Published Broadcast Through Bible Press

Millions of readers get a section of holy scripture every day now through syndicated matter sent out from Cincinnati. Some papers take a verse for each day to place at the head of the editorial columns. Others accept more extended portions. Just now the Sermon on the Mount is being syndicated. The cheapness of this method of circulating the holy scripture may be seen from a recent statement that one dollar will give a portion of scripture to four hundred thousand readers. In the United States there are twelve hundred publications that accept the syndicated verses, and papers in Canada, Alaska, Hawaii, Virgin Islands, Porto Rico and the Republic of Panama are also falling in line.

Chinese Now Have Home Missionary Society

The organization of the National Chinese Home Missionary Society is one of the signs of the times. China is restless with the occidental interpretation of Christianity which is given by the present workers, and seeks an opportunity to interpret the gospel for herself. A man and four women have been sent to the province of Yunnan. A woman doctor of Hackett Medical School was the first missionary to go. The society has a candidate department, and will send out only thoroughly prepared people. A prayer union is one of the features of the society, the members of which promise to pray for its work at least once a day.

Plans for Bible Reader in New York Checkmated

In New York the Protestants and Jews recently produced a school reader with passages from the Bible, nearly all of which were from the old testament except the beatitudes and the two major commandments. The Roman Catholics refused to participate in the making of the Bible reader and organized to defeat the program of Bible readings. A mass meeting was held in October at Rochester, N. Y., by prominent Catholic Societies to protest the use of the Bible in the schools. Dr. Frank P. Graves, commissioner of Education for the State of New York, has issued an order forbidding the use of the Bible in the schools.

Denominations Compare Methods

Even in the matter of propaganda, the denominations now see the wisdom of holding conferences on methods, and at Columbus, O., on Nov. 1 and 2 representatives of nineteen different denominations gathered. Dr. Robert E. Speer opened the conference with an address on "What should be the Purpose and Scope of the Denomination's Promotional Work?" The Methodists were able to report that they have just finished raising a special fund of a million dollars to cover the decrease in receipts on the Centenary fund.

Reformed Episcopal Church Takes High Ground on Union

The Council of the Synod of Chicago of the Reformed Episcopal church met in Trinity church, in Chicago, Oct. 18 and 19. The meeting was confronted with a number of problems, chief among them being the appointment of a successor to Bishop Fallows, deceased. Bishop William Brewing, of First Synod, Canada, presided. While this denomination is liturgical in its worship, it has many important theological differences from the parent body, the Protestant Episcopal church. The following statement of spiritual attitude is noteworthy: "There is still room for the Reformed Episcopal church. Though a comparatively small body, we have a large vision, and broad sympathies, and therefore an unique function to perform. A bridge may be very small in comparison to the

The Community Church

By ALBERT C. ZUMBRUNNEN

Church leaders everywhere who are interested in the increasing importance of the community church in religious work will find much information and many valuable suggestions in this new volume. It describes fully the rise, types, and activities of community churches, and suggests their relation to the problem of securing denominational unity. It is illustrated with photographs and plans of existing and projected churches of this type.

"The first fact-book in the field, giving one just the information needed about the 'how' of community churches."—HENRY F. COPE, General Secretary, The Religious Education Association.

Cloth $1.50, postpaid $1.60.

chasm it spans, or the communities it unites, but if you can keep it intact, and open, it is an agency for friendship, and fellowship and understanding, and, ultimately, union. The Reformed Episcopal church holds a peculiar relation to the two great divisions of Protestantism, the Episcopal and the non-Episcopal. Traditionally, historically and liturgically, our affinities are with the Episcopal churches; but doctrinally and spiritually our sympathies are with the Church Universal. It may not be in God's purpose to make us great as a denomination; but we shall be thankful if he uses us by our testimony to further a comprehensive union of Protestantism. We shall be glad to be removed when the chasm which we span has been drawn together, and obliterated."

Noteworthy Building Enterprises

On Nov. 5 several cornerstones were laid in Chicago by congregations who have launched significant building enterprises. The Evangelical church in Ravenswood has a $135,000 project under way. The most ambitious undertaking, however, is that of University Church of the Disciples where Dr. E. S. Ames is pastor. A cornerstone has just been laid for a $225,000 structure. At the exercises brief addresses were made by Dr. H. L. Willett, Prof. W. D. MacClintock, and Dr. Charles W. Gilkey, pastor of Hyde Park Baptist church. The money for the University building is already pledged in advance and it is expected that the congregation will be able to dedicate it free of encumbrance.

Labor Journal Secures Articles from Religious Leaders

The Locomotive Engineer's Journal of Cleveland, O., is announcing a series of articles on "What Has the Church Done for the Workingman?" Father John A. Ryan will speak in behalf of Roman Catholic activity; the Jews have a spokesman in Rabbi S. Wise of New York, Bishop Charles D. Williams, of Detroit, and Dean Charles R. Brown, of Yale, will present the case for the Protestant churches. In the announcement of the series of articles are the following words "Organized labor is keenly conscious today of the progressive leadership which the church is offering to the problem of industrial peace, and is coming to lean increasingly on its wise and friendly counsel in choosing the way of surest progress."

EVERYBODY WANTS PEACE

Until they want another war

(Just now it is fashionable to utter that proviso sotto voce.)

But suppose we want Peace more than Oil or Coal or Foreign Concessions or Spheres of Influence, what forces shall we trust to help us to get it?

THE WORLD TOMORROW

Presents in its November issue the most up-to-date and comprehensive estimate of the new forces working for Peace yet published in this country.

the lessons were built on assumptions which were not true among the Indians. The family is not Christian, and the community is not Christian. The new course provides selected Bible stories for Indian children from six to nine. The life of Jesus is studied by boys and girls from 10 to 13. The travels of St. Paul are then provided for the group 14 to 18. In the lessons the principle of grading has been followed and the materials are organized to meet the interest of the pupil.

Delegates Arrive at Atlantic City

Not for a long time has Atlantic City been such a masculine city as it was on Nov. 12, the day of the opening of the triennial convention of the Y. M. C. A. The men were talking about the problems that must be faced in this convention. Shall the movement be controlled by men over forty or men under thirty? Shall the local associations become completely democratic? Shall the former evangelical basis of membership be changed so as to include much larger areas of men in different parts of the world? To the consideration of these and a number of other questions of equal importance the men are to give themselves for a week.

Church Congress Meets in Sheffield

The church congress of the Church of England is now in its fifty-seventh year. The sessions were opened this year by a strong and unique pronouncement on the part of the Archbishop of York, who reviewed modern conditions as they affect religion. "Men want a true religion as never before," said the archbishop. "That is the hope. They do not find it in the church—that is the trouble. To put the matter bluntly, religion attracts, the church repels. Let us face the fact honestly. That it is a fact can anyone doubt who knows what is passing through the minds of the men and women, especially the younger men and women, who eagerly desire a spiritual religion and yet stand apart from the church? To these the church is not a witness to the truth of its gospel, but it is, in its divisions, its dullness, its unreality, an obstacle, a stone of stumbling, an offence. If, therefore, the church is to preach the eternal gospel to this generation not in word only, but in power, it must evangelize itself."

Episcopal Paper Objects to Apostles' Creed

One of the four demands in the famous Lambeth Quadrilateral is belief in the apostles' creed and the Nicene creed. The Churchman of New York, leading journal of the Protestant Episcopal church in this country, would not make such a demand. In a recent article the paper advocates the adoption of some alternate phrasing. It says: "It is a truism to say that many earnest Christians, firm believers in the doctrines of the incarnation and the trinity, do not believe all the articles in the Apostles' creed. They cannot accept them literally or figuratively or after the manner of a pallid scholasticism—trying to justify a meaning which does not fundamentally appeal to the reason and for which there seems to be no religious demand. What shall be done with such people as these? Are they to be asked to accept the formulary literally? Are they to be encouraged to strain the meaning of the several phases? Or are they to be rejected if unable to do either? Why not attempt to discover an alternative use? Why not take time and give thought to see if we may not discover a formulary that will at once gather up the heart of the creed, embody the cherished opinion of the past and be couched in a chastened religious phraseology? Put the problem to the test in some such way as this: What shall we do with an honest, earnest man who cannot subscribe to all the articles of the Apostles' creed, but who offers the following as his confession of faith: 'First, I believe in God, the Father, who hath made me, and all mankind. Secondly, in God the Son, who hath redeemed me, and all mankind. Thirdly, in God the Holy Ghost, who sanctifieth me, and all the people of God.' Assuming that a declaration of faith is necessary not only at time of baptism and confirmation but also in every public service (an assumption which may not be altogether sound), might we not conceive of the day when some such alternative use were permitted in morning and evening prayer and in the holy communion?"

Three Vital Volumes

The Christian Faith and the New Day

By Cleland Boyd McAfee, of McCormick Theological Seminary

The appeal here is not to technical theologians, but to working ministers and thoughtful laymen who, after all, build and use the theology that is living and who sometimes fear to see it change. The great days just past have given many a renewed assurance that Christianity is more vital and forceful than it has been for many a day. Its vitality may well claim the right to phrase itself anew—which means to reconstruct theology at any point where it may need reconstruction.

A Valid Christianity for Today

By Bishop Charles D. Williams

For many persons a valid Christianity is to be known by its roots. But the mind of today, Bishop Williams holds, is intensely practical and insists that a valid Christianity is to be known by its fruits. Can it meet the need of a universal religion felt by an expanding and unifying world? Can it moralize our industrial, political and commercial life and humanize our social life? Can it live with the expanding vision and increasing light of modern knowledge? Some of the chapter titles of this challenging book are: "Christianity and the World," "Men of Vision," "The Confidence of a Certain Faith," "The Gospel of Democracy," "The Uses of Life," "The Universal Christ," and "The Supreme Values."

($1.75, plus 12 cents postage.)

The New Social Order

By Harry F. Ward

This book, as the title indicates, is based upon the conviction that a new order of living is both necessary and inevitable, and upon the judgment that the beginnings of that new order are already with us. The signs are clear that we have arrived at one of those conjunctions of economic pressure and idealistic impulse, of material and spiritual reality, which occasion fundamental changes in the organization of life. Dr. Ward takes up those outstanding principles which have been employed in the social progress of the western world, considers how they are being changed to meet present needs and aspirations, and in the light of them examines the significant features of various programs for the new order.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN, Ph.D.

By far the most popular theological book ever sold by The Christian Century Press.

Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, says:

> "I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking."

And Dr. Douglas C. McIntosh, professor of theology in Yale, says:

> "What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

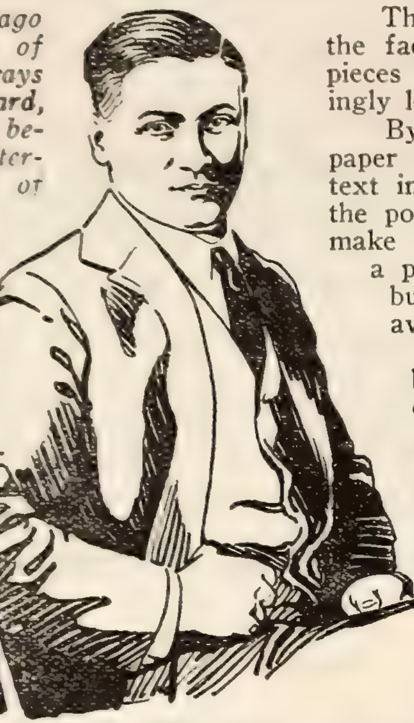
ONLY 10c EACH

The Chicago Daily News of Sept. 13, says that Girard, Kans., has become the literary capital of the U. S.



E. Haldeman-Julius, Editor Pocket Series

The amazing thing about our new process of printing is the fact that it makes possible the production of 300 masterpieces of literature—not extracts, but complete—at the surprisingly low price of 10c each.

By using compact, yet readable type, and good thin paper it has been possible to print the complete and original text in every case in a thin volume which easily slips into the pocket. Many readers have become so enthused that they make a practice of slipping four or five of these books into a pocket before starting the day's work. They do not bulge the pocket and are not noticeable, yet are always available.

This new process in publishing now makes it possible for men and women who are lovers of the best literature to become well read in time formerly wasted. Many people carry some of these books with them constantly.

Over 20,000,000 of these unique books have been sold during the past three years, indicating the popularity of the idea. The library was started with the thought of putting the best literature within reach of the masses.

We have spared ourselves no pains in the effort to produce books that meet every requirement. Excellent printing and binding make them very attractive in appearance.

"LITERATURE'S IMPRESARIO"

An editorial in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, of September 6, 1922, has the following to say about E. Haldeman-Julius, editor of the Pocket Series:

Haldeman-Julius is an invaluable citizen. He is doing a cultural work of the first magnitude. He is a great business man and one of the country's greatest educators. He is literature's impresario. He is the American Northcliffe, with the immeasurable distinction that while the Englishman was primarily a peddler of trivialities, Haldeman-Julius is a salesman of the verities. Of the Girard publishing house the Bard of Avon himself would say: "There's nothing ill can dwell in such a temple."

Recent Books of Unusual Merit

The Nature of Scripture
By Prof. A. S. Peake

"So far as criticism is dominated by rationalism or seeks to dissolve those historical facts which are vital to the very existence of Christianity, so far I also disavow it. The only criticism for which I care is the criticism which has an open eye for the actual phenomena of Scripture and so great a reverence for truth as to accept the conclusions to which these phenomena direct us."—From author's preface. ($2.00.)

Progress in Religion to the Christian Era
By T. R. Glover

These lectures are unique in that they bring before us in one glorious sweep of historic vision the religious development of the Greek, the Roman and the Hebrew peoples as a preparation for Christ's coming. ($2.00.)

Religion and the Future Life
Edited by E. Hershey Sneath

The ten contributors are well-known scholars, among them Professor Breasted, of the University of Chicago; Professor Jastrow, of the University of Pennsylvania; Professor B. W. Bacon, of Yale, and Franz Boas, of Columbia University. The volume is the result of a remarkable seminar conducted by the editor at Yale for the purpose of studying the history of the belief in life after death in religion and philosophy. ($3.00.)

The Revelation of John
By Arthur S. Peake

Dr. Peake is generally acknowledged as one of the greatest theologians in Europe, and his latest book is a complete justification of that high distinction. A scholarly, spiritual and poetic treatment of the Apocalypse for Bible students and Christians everywhere. "Certainly one of the sanest and most instructive books on the subject," says London Quarterly Review. ($2.50.)

A Literary Guide to the Bible
By Laura H. Wild

The author, who is professor of biblical history and literature in Mount Holyoke College, holds that there is now needed such a book as this, which will help the Bible student so to realize the art and beauty of Biblical literature that he can read it along with other world masterpieces. Chapters on Folk Lore, Historical Narratives, Poetry, Drama, Biblical Oratory, etc. ($2.00.)

Creative Christianity
By Professor George Cross

This work, by Professor Cross, of Rochester Theological Seminary, is a contribution toward reshaping inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us, so that the coming generation, nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today, may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs. ($1.50.)

The Quest of Industrial Peace
By W. M. Clow

This book, by the author of "The Cross in Christian Experience," begins with an analysis of the causes of the present industrial unrest and describes the massing of the conflicting forces. It gives a sympathetic exposition of experiments attempted in correcting industrial troubles. It closes with a constructive message in which the Christian ideal of relationships in society is outlined and applied so as to find the only path to industrial peace. ($1.75.)

The Iron Man in Industry
By Arthur Pound

Here is a refreshing modern argument for such education of our industrial workers that they may be equipped profitably to enjoy the leisure with which the automatic machine—"the iron man"—now provides them. To his wide experience as laborer, manager and employer, Mr. Pound adds an imaginative quality which lends an unusual interest to his book. ($1.75.)

The Preacher and His Sermon
By J. Paterson Smyth

The author of "How We Got Our Bible," for many years a professor of pastoral theology, here presents the ripe fruitage of his wide experience and observation. This series of lectures was delivered before the students and junior clergy in the Divinity School of the University of Dublin. ($1.25.)

The Open Fire and Other Essays
By William V. Kelley

Of these fifteen essays, the two on Robert Browning alone are worth the price of the book. "In Dr. Kelley's mind," says The Christian Century, editorially, "we have a true wedlock of evangelical piety and the noblest spirit of the Renaissance. Here is a spirit rich with the fruits of years of patient reading over the whole field of human thought." ($2.00.)

The Son of Man Coming to His Kingdom
By Principal Alfred Gandier, of Knox College
Toronto

"Jesus did not live in a vacuum," says Dr. Gandier. "To understand his life and teachings we must know something of the religious, moral and intellectual atmosphere in which he lived and moved—and of this the Jewish Apocalypse formed no small part." A frank discussion of the meaning and value of the Apocalyptic hope. ($1.25.)

What's Best Worth Saying
By Richard Roberts

Ten addresses, delivered for the most part to college students. The titles are: "On Creeds," "Of Faith," "Of Evil," "Of the Cross," "Of Jesus," "Of God Above and God Within," "Of God as a Society," "Of Spiritual Freedom," "Of the Joy of Life," "Of Love Among the Ruins." ($1.25.)

A Skulking Conservatism

REV. J. D. M. Buckner of the Nebraska conference of the Methodist church has dared to publish to the world the methods of a skulking conservatism that lurks in many churches. He openly espoused in recent years the more modern views of Christian faith and proclaimed them with a zeal that may not always have been tempered with prudence. However, his local church asked for his return after he had already enjoyed the longest pastorate of any Methodist minister in the state. Yet the conference, with only three dissenting votes, put him on the retired list. The whole procedure may have been legal, but it was thoroughly unethical. The conference feared a heresy case. The public press has a way of writing up such a case in a manner not helpful to a religious denomination. Mr. Buckner was not put on trial for his views; he was put on the retired list though still a useful minister and while a church still wanted him as its pastor. But he has not suffered in vain. The case has been bruited throughout the land, and the rank and file in the churches will henceforth understand just a little better what ministers have to endure these days if it is once whispered against them that they are not "sound." In recent years a number of young men have left the Disciples denomination though none of them was ever the victim of a heresy trial. They were tried in back rooms, and condemned by leading churchmen. There was no chance for rebuttal and it would be some time before a young man would find out that he was under sentence. When he appeared as a candidate in a new church, he found the way to promotion blocked. From unseen and malign sources gossip was scattered about. In many communities a man once labeled "higher critic" will face a determined minority which will leave no stone unturned in defeating him. In a conference with the members of the bishop's cabinet Mr. Buckner asked Bishop Stuntz if he believed the story of the children who called Elisha "baldpate". The bishop discreetly dodged the question as most bishops and secretaries would these days. But the good of the church demanded that a human sacrifice be offered on the altar of orthodoxy, and one was provided.

Words, Words

HIGH-SOUNDING phrases all too often take the place of religious achievement. It is so much easier to pass a resolution than to strike down an evil. Religious people have an almost fatal facility in phrasing things. But all too often conviction is lacking. Bishop Woodstock at a recent service for the consecration of a new bishop said: "Men who believe in Christianity must do something more personal and definite than merely to be orthodox. Because a man may be indefinite, he may be so orthodox that his Christianity is to some people a paradox." Jesus faced with indignation canting religionists and asked "Why call ye me Lord, Lord and do not the things that I say." Church conventions assemble, and prate about world problems and the need of more racial sympathy. But does anyone go home thinking this has anything to do with Negroes, Jews or Chinese in the home town? Great audiences thrill under an appeal for the working man, but does that prevent a business man from beating down wages if economic conditions permit? The church of today has no surer way to the conscience of the world than through the gateway of achievement. We want fewer affirmations, and more approximations to the things affirmed. The biggest sermon of all is in a deed. A ministry to a crippled child may arouse more religious feeling in a community than a whole series of revivalistic sermons. Character transparently true wins involuntary respect everywhere. The traducers of good men can never have more than temporary popularity. Goodness is its own defender, and the church has no greater apologetic than her saints in each community. Sacrifice and unselfishness are silent preachers that everywhere bring men to their knees. It has ever been true that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church. The boxer rebellion ushered in a new era in Chinese missions. Even the simpler sacrifices of quiet giving and quiet service are shouted from the housetops, no matter how humble the servant of the Lord may be in the performance of his duty. The curse of the church today is grandiloquent, high-sounding, empty words.

"Church Bells Call Voters to Polls"

SO ran a headline in a metropolitan paper, and it told a significant story of the indifference of our people to the fundamental duties of citizenship. The churches, of course, are alert because of the artful and sleepless efforts of the "wet" propagandists against the prohibition amendment. What is the meaning of this phenomenon of indifference and lack of public-mindedness? Does it argue a skepticism as to all political processes, or is it just stolid apathy to anything outside the immediate circle of personal interest and comfort? Even in the most exciting elections only a little more than half the people qualified to vote ever vote on any issue; in England about sixty-three per cent. How can we have "government of the people, for the people, by the people," if the people neglect the basic obligations of citizenship? While the church may not dabble in party politics, it surely has a political function in helping to create and keep alive a sense of public duty and responsibility. It is not enough to start a brief campaign, which is soon over and forgotten; we must keep at it continually, year in and year out, educating our people in public-mindedness and civic duty. There can be no harvest of a finer political conscience without long, hard, patient, and sagacious spadework on the part of all those who seek a more intelligent and better ordered public life.

Give Mr. Hughes the Mandate He Awaits!

BISHOP CANNON, face to face with atrocities in the near east which can never be described on a printed page, cabled to the American state department asking for American intervention in the near east. The reply of Secretary Hughes was in substance that he lacked a mandate from the people. It would seem that the fifty million dollars contributed by twenty million people would have indicated an interest that most statesmen could have trusted. But since the secretary of state wants some other sort of a mandate from the people the Christian leadership of the country should see that it is given him. Christian public opinion has here an opportunity to demand Armenian independence in accordance with the terms of the Sevres treaty. Telegrams sent to the President, the secretary of state and the congressmen in regard to this matter will make an impression. Meanwhile all Europe holds the vacillating and inconsistent policy of America responsible for present conditions. Mr. Lloyd George said in the house of commons in 1920: "It is well known that the Turkish treaty was postponed because it was hoped that America would come in, but if we had not consented to the request made us to put off the discussion of the treaty until America could see its way to come in, it would have been suggested that Great Britain was anxious to keep the United States out of any part in the Turkish settlement. I feel convinced it was the only course open to France, Italy and ourselves when a request of that kind was made. The delay has been entirely attributable to that." The rage of the Turk now burns as never before in history. It is hardly imaginable that the government of the United States will consent to consign what is left of the Armenians to such a fate as Turkish brutality has prepared, while at the same time urging the American people to continue their charity.

The Truth About the Bible

SCIENTIFIC and theological study of the Bible is to be expected in the atmosphere of the universities and divinity schools. But such study is not always available for ministers, Sunday school teachers and other Christian workers in the ordinary areas of church life. One is interested, therefore, to find such an institution as the American Institute of Sacred Literature supplying just such helps as busy people need, and yet preserving for them all the values of expert and scientific investigation of the Old and New Testaments. One of the latest of its courses of reading and study deals with the almost sensational subject, "The Truth About the Bible," and others of these monthly issues treat of such themes as how the books of the Bible came to be, how they were selected, biblical views of the physical universe, biblical standards of history, chronology and numbers, the growing ethics of the Bible, the coming of Christ and his kingdom, and other important subjects. A whole series of most illuminating pamphlets has been published by the Institute on such topics as, why one believes in God, in Jesus Christ, in immortality, in the church, etc. These are all prepared by men whose names are a guarantee of their scholarly soundness and their Christian point of view. This fine work has been going forward for more than thirty years since its inception by William R. Harper at Yale. For a long time it has been connected with the University of Chicago, and no part of the work of that institution has been more expert, more valuable or more far-reaching in its results.

The Ethics of the Allied Debts

THE address of Secretary Hoover delivered at Toledo, Ohio, on October 16, in which he discussed the allied debts and took issue with the opinions of some of the leading bankers of the world, has attracted wide comment. Professor E. R. A. Seligman, head of the department of political economy in Columbia University, in a featured article in the New York Times for Sunday, November 5, frankly criticizes Mr. Hoover's position. He considers first Secretary Hoover's argument based on the business character of the loans. Mr. Hoover said: "These loans were made at the urgent request of the borrowers and under their solemn assurances of repayment. They have no relation to other nations or other debts. The American taxpayer did not participate in reparations and acquired no territory or any other benefits under the treaty, as did our debtors. There is no doubt as to the moral or contractual obligation. The repudiation of these loans would undermine the whole fabric of international good faith. I do not believe any public official, either of the United States or any other country, could or should approve their cancellation." Admitting that there is no doubt as to the formal obligation, Professor Seligman nevertheless lays stress on the fact that "contrary to widespread opinion, the loans to the allies were to an overwhelming extent made during the war itself. The government advanced no money until we entered the war. Substantial amounts were advanced by the government after the signing of the armistice, but they were small compared to the whole amount and were made for expenses contracted during the war. He cites Secretary McAdoo's statement in his report submitted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919: "The service of these loans in assisting to hold the battlefronts of Europe until the might of our heroic army could be felt effectively, made possible, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the ending of the war in the fall of 1918. Without this aid to the allied governments the war unquestionably would have been prolonged, if not lost, with the resultant great additional cost in life and treasure." Professor Seligman argues that: "If we are to charge France and Italy for the wheat that kept their forces alive, for the uniforms that kept their soldiers warm while they held the battlefront, we might as well charge so much a man for the American army when it finally arrived."

America, the War's Chief Beneficiary

TO Mr. Hoover's argument that this country did not participate in reparations, Professor Seligman replies: "The fortunes made in this country were stupendous; wages rose precipitately, and while Europe was in the throes of convulsions we reached the dizzy heights of untold prosperity. Is it, then, fair to urge that we made nothing out of the war? On the contrary, this country has been the greatest beneficiary of the war. We received, indeed, no ships to ruin our shipping trade, as was the case in Great Britain; we received no colonies, which would have been burdens rather than assets; but we heaped up wealth, while all other countries lost it. . . . Had we been in the war from the beginning we also should now have been hovering on the brink of bankruptcy." He questions whether when the loans were made anyone in our government expected repayment. "The situation was so urgent and the crisis so profound that if the allies had asked for gifts or contributions instead of loans they would have been given the funds just as readily." Professor Seligman pronounced Mr. Hoover's argument concerning "invisible items" (money in the possession of immigrants or emigrants, sums spent by tourists, profits on shipping, bankers' commissions, insurance premiums, etc.) quite unsound, maintaining that economists universally recognize a distinction between "the balance of trade" and the "equilibrium of commerce." These various invisible items which Mr. Hoover enumerates are already accounted for with respect to the debtor nations and do not represent any additional capacity to pay. "It remains true, therefore, despite Mr. Hoover's statement, that the only way in which a foreign debt of any magnitude can be paid is through an exportable surplus. This means two things: First, that there is a surplus of social income; second, that this take the form of exports." Professor Seligman agrees entirely with Mr. Hoover that European nations must take hold energetically of their internal problems, must stop waste and encourage thrift; but he maintains that this consideration in no way affects their capacity to pay their debt. Finally, Professor Seligman says, "The debt cannot be paid, and if it could be paid it would harm us more than our debtors. As a matter not simply of equity, but of good business, let us study the matter further. We must not harbor the delusion that we can any longer be sufficient unto ourselves alone."

Completion of Fountain of Time

LAST week Mr. Lorado Taft's most ambitious work of art, "The Fountain of Time," was dedicated with impressive services at its site in Washington Park at the entrance to the Midway Plaisance in this city. For the past year the model of this statue in plaster has stood on ground a little further to the east. It was the wish of the sculptor, the trustees of the Ferguson Fund and the public to have the privilege of studying a little more fully the design before the final steps were taken to make it a permanent feature of the South Park system. Popular and official approval of the creation was inevitable, and it then became merely a question of determining the material which could most appropriately be used in giving it enduring form. Usually such monuments have been constructed of marble or bronze. These materials were felt to be both too expensive and not quite suitable for the purpose. A new kind of material composed of ground gravel from a particular locality was selected and the result is a hard, smooth substance with the pleasing color of old ivory. It is an experiment that is sure to be followed. The design of the fountain group is familiar to readers of The Christian Century. A circular basin forms the outline of the work. On the further side from the public driveway rises in a semi-circle a group of human figures illustrating the various phases of human life cast up by ocean waves. The inscrutable figure of Time stands opposite, regarding this great group of nearly a hundred human forms, from childhood to old age. The work is a great contribution, not only to Chicago's exterior decoration, but to the artistic life of America. It is the hope of Mr.

Taft that he may complete another group on a different subject for the eastern end of the Midway, and at intervals along the margin of the great plaisance there may be placed appropriate statues of notable people in the history of art and the nation.

The Nation's Declining Moral Credit

THE present administration came into power with the most impressive majority accorded to any government in the recent history of the United States. The leading issue of the campaign that resulted in such an expression of public opinion was the league of nations. Many causes conspired to make that theme unpopular. Some of them lay in the natural reaction from war interests of every sort. Some of them were inherent in the popular interpretation of the proposed covenant as inconsistent with American independence of action, and as unduly obligatory in case of certain eventualities. Some ot them were the result of natural revulsion from objectionable features in the peace treaty, with which the idea of the league was inseparably connected.

The administration began its career with the conviction that it had receeived a national mandate to follow literally the once appropriate and widely quoted advice of Washington, to avoid all entangling alliances. Of course these words were long ago obsolete, applied as they were to the conditions of his day, when the nation was an infant, whose possessions were jealously and covetously scanned by the powers of Europe with the hope of early seizure. A far different situation confronts America today, with its world leadership, undisputed in all fields save that of moral statesmanship and international friendship. It appears to have been the implicit confidence of the administration in the perpetual character of Washington's counsel, and the popular feeling as voiced in the election of two years ago that formed the basis of its policy of national isolation.

From time to time there have been official utterances that gave promise of a better mind. The President has at times referred to the necessity for some sort of association of nations to safeguard civilization in the difficult days through which we are passing, and which certainly lie ahead. But nothing has happened to confirm these hopes, and the state department has seemed to support by its policies the astonishing and almost unpardonable affront of George Harvey in his Manchester speech, repudiating any intention of the United States to enter into any manner of international agreement, either by express action or by implication. No wonder intelligent Americans wondered what manner of man had been chosen to represent this country at the British court. It looked as though the hands of the bitter-enders of the Lodge type were on the tiller of the ship of state.

But the soul of America has had time for reflection. The hot antagonisms of the last presidential campaign have passed away. People are neither alarmed nor allured by the mere name of the league of nations. But they are increasingly restive under a policy of inaction and aloofness when the world is verging on a collapse that may involve us all. The Christian conscience of the nation is stirred deeply by the tragedy which is taking place in Europe and hither-Asia. The catastrophe which befell Smyrna was an event of shocking character. But it was only a token of a situation which may at any moment develop other tragedies as sinister and portentous as that. It is not the bodies alone of the destitute people in the near east that are starving. It is the soul of the world that is going hungry for the help that this nation is alone competent to afford.

At the close of the war we left our international task half completed. If there was cause for our entering the struggle for democracy and a better world order, there were even weightier reasons for our remaining with our associates in that struggle until something like order and calmness returned. But this we have not done. The moral support which was due from us to the distracted peoples of the old world we have not given. And when increasing protests have been voiced against the policy of parochialism and aloofness by religious, educational and even business organizations, their demands have been met by the bland affirmation that everything was being done that is possible. Perhaps the most depressing declaration that a public official has made in recent months was the Boston statement of Secretary Hughes that all measures possible in the situation had been followed, and that there was no prospect that a different tactic would be adopted.

If this is the deliberate and confirmed opinion of the leaders of the administration, they are pathetically unaware of the rising tide of sentiment against the continuance of this program of isolation. There may still be a large body of opinion that contents itself with the slogans of two years ago. But is it not the aggressive and purposeful portion of the nation. There is a great and growing company that finds itself increasingly impatient with an administration that refuses to participate in any international conferences save those of its own devising, and contents itself with sending "observers" to sit in the galleries and take notes when questions of the utmost moment to the entire world are under discussion. The people of the United States have been called upon to assist the starving peoples of Europe and Asia, and they are responding with noble generosity. But what the old world needs is not money alone, but friendship, leadership and the assurance that America is not perched in complaceent seclusion above the troubles which distract humanity.

Comfort is found by some friends of the cause of international good will in certain guarded hints which have been dropped of late by members of the administration to the effect that the government might be able to take advantage of its opportunity to participate in the organization and procedure of the world court, which is in reality a department of the league of nations. The appointments of advisory members of various committees of the league is also a favorable sign, as indicative of a purpose to participate in its activities. If these steps are really tokens of a weakening of the policy of disdainful refusal even to recognize the league as existent, they are hopeful signs. But something much more courageous and effective is demanded in a time such as this. Americans with the spirit of sympathetic interest in the causes for which the world war was fought will not be content with any tepid show of tolerance toward the only plan of international cooperation that seems to offer present promise of results.

The recent elections were eloquent of dissatisfaction with the administration, and it is clear that this theme of internationalism was a part of the indictment. The narrow margin by which Henry Cabot Lodge was returned to the senate was significant among other things of popular indignation against his leadership of the committee on foreign relations.

It would seem clear that certain features of an effective program could be made a part of the policy of the state department without delay. They might well include the following items: First, the recognition of the responsibility which America has in the present stressful situation in the near east. It is the opinion of the secretary of state, as recently expressed, that we are deeply concerned about the protection of racial and religious minorities, and the great interests of humanity which are jeopardized. If this means anything it must involve the obligation to employ the full moral influence of the United States in securing the protection of the oppressed peoples of the levant, and the establishment of peace and justice. Nor does any one doubt that the employment of such moral force would secure in large measure, if not completely, the ends desired. It is such a step that the conscience of the American people, particularly those of the Protestant churches, is demanding that the government shall take without delay.

Second, the government of the United States ought at once to join in a conference with other interested nations regarding the moral issues at stake in the near east, in reference to which the soul of the nation is deeply stirred, and toward which the Christian people of America cannot and will not avoid their responsibility. The preservation of the suffering people of the near-orient, for whose relief we have given already in generous measure, and expect to continue our gifts, is not a mere matter of works of mercy and good will. It requires as well the thoughtful cooperation of the nations of the world, and in that cooperation America belongs as a leader and not a mere follower. Only by participation in such a conference, to be called soon and by our own government if necessary, can we make clear the just concern of this nation for all interests in the near east, including our own, and our unselfish desire for a righteous and peaceful adjustment of present conflicts.

Third, the long delayed promises of the President and other officials of the administration that something in the way of a closer association of nations may be anticipated as the result of American interest in world questions ought to begin to be realized. Is not the government becoming aware of the growing demand that some other attitude be taken by our land than that of unchanging disdain of the only efforts which have been made since the war to establish an instrument of international agreement? If the Washington administration cannot gain its own consent to retreat frankly from its arbitrary and determined attitude on the league of nations issue, and yet is apparently anxious to avail itself of the activities of that organization without open avowal, why should it not actually proceed to the initiation of some other method of international understanding? Why should not the President inaugurate his plan of an "association of nations" which will permit America to take its rightful place in the councils of the world? The present position of the United States is equivocal and increasingly intolerable. If continued for another period like the past two years, it will make impossible all chance for the President, and perhaps even for his party, to retain the confidence of the American people.

The present position of this nation, against the rising protest of a large proportion of its people, is that of the priest and the Levite in the parable of the man who fell among robbers. Individually and through the activities of relief organizations like the Near East Relief and the Red Cross we are playing the role of the Good Samaritan. But as a nation, presumably Christian in its purpose and program, we are giving an admirable illustration of the careless and indifferent spirit against which the caustic words of the Master were directed.

Educating a Minister!

SEVERAL years ago a young man fresh from college resorted to a widely known training school to gain his preparation for the ministry. After the opening session had progressed for some six weeks a written test was called for in one of the courses he was pursuing. Two or three days after handing in his paper he was called to the office of the president of the institution, where he found that officer in possession of the paper he had prepared in the test mentioned.

"Mr. Blank, may I ask whether this paper which I have in my hand is your work?"

On Mr. Blank's identifying it as his, the president proceeded, "Well, now, Mr. Blank, would you inform me where you got the answer you have given to this third question?"

Mr. Blank replied that he could scarcely say where it had come from, beyond the general observation that he had thought out the answer on his own account.

"Mr. Blank," said the president, "I must make it clear to you that the students in this institution are not expected to set forth what they may think about the subjects in which they are being instructed; they are, on the contrary, expected to learn and give the answers which are supplied by their instructors. The statements you have presented in this paper do not conform to that understanding, and it is proper that you should know that your treatment of the subject in hand is unacceptable."

"Mr. President," inquired the astonished young man, fresh from an academic institution where he had been encouraged to think, "do you mean what you say?"

"I assuredly do mean, Mr. Blank, precisely what I have said."

The young man quietly turned without further words, left the president's office, crossed the campus to his dormitory, bestowed his personal possessions in his trunk, and departed to another institution for his ministerial training.

He escaped. He is but one. Perhaps a few others, through the years, have also escaped. But they are very few compared with the hundreds who have remained, have conformed to the aims and methods of that institution, and have passed into the ministry of several different denominations. This particular institution boasts of its large band of alumni on foreign mission fields. It has sent so many into home mission fields that they hold the balance of influence and of votes in the ministerial councils of one and another of the denominations in certain regions. The enrollment of this institution continues high, while other theological seminaries are languishing or calling desperately for recruits. The same president is on the job. The same kind of instructors are dealing out the pabulum which their students are required to pass off for thought. And far and near, high and low, eager spirits are distressed by the irrepressible question: "What is the matter with the church?"

The Rich Book-Lover

A Parable of Safed the Sage

BELIEVING as I do in a wise and overruling providence, I have often meditated upon the fact that the men who love good books are so often the men who have no money wherewith to buy them.

Now, there was a Book Auction, and many of the books were Rare; and they fetched High Prices.

And there sat nigh unto me a man in Plain Apparel. And on all the finer and most expensive books did he bid, but he bought none of them.

And I grieved for him, because that he did bid again and again. And when the Sale adjourned for Noon he had bought not one Book.

And I spake unto him, saying, I am sorry for thee.

And he said, Grieve not for me; I am having the time of my life, and I have had good fortune.

And I said, Tell me what thou meanest.

And he said, I am a Book-lover. That is, I have the Taste, but I have not the Purse. Therefore, when an Auction like this occurreth, I look up all the Auction Prices of the Rare Books, and I bid on every one of them. And I run the prices up to nearly what they will bring, and then do I stand out from under. For if the Hammer should fall, and I should buy any of the books that I want, it would Ruin me.

And I asked, Dost thou get an Whole Lot of Fun out of this?

And he answered, Yea, verily. And I help the sales. For there may be many men who know not the value of a book till they see me bidding, and they start in where I stop; for I have knowledge of books and no money, and they have money, but no knowledge of books.

Also he said, This system doth give me the right to hold in mine hand these treasures, feel for a time that they are mine own.

And I said, Hast thou nothing else to do?

And he said, yea, verily, and it is an hard, grinding job, and thereby I earn my Bread. But when these events occur, I arrange for a day off, for every man must have some sport, and this is the way I get mine.

And he said, Wilt thou visit my Library?

And I went with him.

And he said, I picked up this book on the Five Cent Counter, and behold the like hath sold at Auction for Fifty Shekels, and this I got for a Farthing, and it is worth an Hundred Shekels.

And I said, Thou hast quite a Library.

And he said, It is a great Game. But here is the finest part of my Library.

And he took down a great bunch of Catalogues.

And he said, Herein I have marked the Books on which I have bid. Yes, and when I add up all the prices that I have bid, it maketh an Hundred Thousand Shekels. Is not this to be Rich?

And I said, I have never known a Book-lover who was so rich.

For he owned the joy of all that he had desired and lost. And if that is not being rich, what is?

Apocalypse

THERE'S enough of God
In the heart of a rose,
In the smile of a child,
In the dewy blossom of dawn,
To prove
That beauty is the soul of Him,
That love is His scepter,
And that all things created by Him
Face, not the night,
But an eternal morning.

Specters

THE splendor and the loveliness of earth
Must pass away: spring days were fleet;
Triumphant summer's glory yielded soon
Before autumnal shadows; and the boon
Of frosty morns and middays cool and sweet,
Which autumn brought, now passes, with the dearth
Of bleak November. Where the bluebird late
Announced the dawn of spring are molding leaves
And grass; our thoughts are drab and dark.
The snow shall come to lend its cheer, but stark
And desolate the trees: fair nature grieves
Before the threat of winter. At the gate
Of every heart a silent specter stands;
And every mortal sees, and seeing understands.

John Dewey and Missionary Education in China

By Guy W. Sarvis

[The article by Dr. John Dewey, of Columbia University, reflecting upon the educational character of the work done by the missionary colleges in China has been widely quoted. Dean Sarvis' reply is a constructive and independent statement, making such ample quotation and allusion to Dr. Dewey's article that it seems able to stand on its own feet without reprinting the original in connection. With the publication of the reply in The Christian Century there goes no implication of criticism of the New Republic for declining it.—THE EDITOR.]

IN the "New Republic" for March 1, 1922, there appeared an article written by Dr. John Dewey on "America and Chinese Education." A study of the article does not reveal clearly the purpose in Dr. Dewey's mind in writing it. He may, as a matter of general interest, have wished to say what he thought of what "Young China" thinks about missionary education. The general trend of the article, however, seems to indicate that he wished to oppose missionary education by using the weight of his name and influence against it. It is of course right and proper for Dr. Dewey to seek to injure that which is injurious, but it would seem that he should base his attack on facts rather than on assumption and assertion.

The article begins with a quotation from a "student," who says that the Chinese delegation at the Washington conference failed, and who explains that failure on the ground that two of the three leading members of the delegation were trained in mission schools. As a matter of fact, the assumption that the conference failed is very much open to question. Probably a majority of thoughtful foreigners and Chinese believe that China got everything that could reasonably be expected from the conference. The great problem now is for her so to put her house in order that she shall be able to utilize the advantages secured. Dr. Dewey, while he states expressly that the judgment of the "student" quoted may be valueless, proceeds by implication to support that judgment in its condemnation of missionary education. He does not mention the fact that at least ten members of the Chinese delegation at Washington received their training in mission schools and that four of them were sons of Christian pastors. Neither does he say that David Yui, the "people's" delegate, who criticised the delegation as a whole most bitterly, is the son of an Episcopal pastor, a graduate of St. John's University, and a national secretary in the Y. M. C. A. These men were not chosen by the missionaries or the churches. Why did the government and the "people" choose them? Why was C. T. Wang, the outstanding delegate at the Paris conference, sent there by his government in spite of his aggressive Christian character, his long connection with the Y. M. C. A., and his training in a mission school? The obvious reason is that there are very few other men available to do this kind of work. It would be interesting to have Dr. Dewey and his "student" select men trained in government universities who would have done better!

The judgment expressed by the student quoted by Dr. Dewey was that "American missionary education has failed to develop independent, energetic thought and character among even its most distinguished graduates. It has produced rather a subservient intellectual type, one which he characterized as slavish." The inference which the reader would naturally draw from the whole discussion is that the judgment of this student is, in Dr. Dewey's opinion, correct. One thing, Dr. Dewey says, can be positively affirmed, namely, "The view in question expresses a belief that is widely and increasingly held in China." The basis for this sweeping assertion is not stated. The facts would indicate that positive affirmations are not necessarily true. It is a well known fact that missionary colleges and universities are more crowded with students each year. It is also a fact that their charges per student for tuition and food and lodging exceed the average income of a Chinese family of five, while the government schools charge no tuition (or, in exceptional cases, very little) and almost always furnish food and lodging free to their students. The Chinese public may be wrong, but those of us who are engaged in missionary education discover no symptoms of its agreement with Dr. Dewey.

RECOGNIZE VALUE OF TRAINING

The kind of education offered by missionary institutions is recognized by parents who have children to send to school as the most valuable education that can be secured in China. They do not want their children to become Christians, and they have no love for the foreigners, but they do recognize the fact that the graduates of missionary institutions are able to enter into the intellectual and economic life of China at the present time in such a way as to secure more certain and generous rewards than government graduates can secure. This may be wrong and "slavish" and due to "lack of initiative," but it is nevertheless a fact that it is recognized by all who have given careful attention to educational statistics. The facts to support this assertion have been collected repeatedly. The writer is connected with one of the largest missionary universities in China, and in the same city is a government university which is generally conceded to be one of the two leading Chinese universities. Its president and two most important deans were trained in missionary colleges, and probably half of the returned student staff have received similar training. At least seven of their faculty, five of them returned students from America, are graduates of the neighboring missionary university. Furthermore, the demand for mission school graduates to become teachers in government high schools is so great and the salaries offered are so generous that it is becoming a very serious problem to supply mission high schools with the teachers. We are glad these men are in government schools and are mapping out new paths for education in China.

To us they seem conspicuous for the very qualities which Dr. Dewey's informant says they lack.

One statement in Dr. Dewey's article seems quite amazing when one considers the fact that he has spent several months among educational institutions in China. Again he does not quite take the responsibility for the statement himself, but says that "Young China" believes that missionary efforts (presumably educational) "do not represent what China most needs from the west, namely, scientific method and aggressive freedom and independence of inquiry, criticism, and action." If there is any place in China where scientific method is emphasized, it is in missionary educational institutions; and everyone who is in the least familiar with the situation knows that there is much greater freedom of discussion in mission institutions than in government institutions and that, for this very reason, missionary education has often aroused the antagonism of officials. If there is one aspect of education which, more than another, tends to develop independence of inquiry, it is laboratory science on the one hand and self-direction on the part of the students on the other. In both these respects missionary institutions are confessedly and naturally in advance. Their faculties realize that the development of initiative, independence, and originality is their chief educational function. The whole old Chinese system of education, the national traditions, the proverbs which the children use, the attitude cultivated in the home and in society—all these tend to discourage originality and initiative. We are quite aware that our efforts to produce these qualities are in many cases failures; but we do not find greater success elsewhere. So true is this that many observers raise the question whether or not this lack of initiative and independence may not be a racial or an oriental quality. The qualities in question are rare in any country and are perhaps especially so in the orient; but it is surprising that Dr. Dewey should imply sympathy with a judgment that missionary institutions are markedly deficient in this particular characteristic in which their distinctive excellence is recognized by Chinese and foreigners in China. We can explain it only on the basis of the fact that he himself spent very little time in these institutions, and, perhaps, gave undue credit to critics whose claim to originality can hardly be based on their own intimate and personal knowledge of the institutions they criticise.

YOUNG CHINA AND YOUNG AMERICA

Dr. Dewey says a great deal about "Young China," a different Young China from the one discussed by Mr. Bland—but one wonders which of the two is more truly representative of "China!" The writer has lived and taught economics and sociology with Young China for ten years, and has come to the conclusion that Young China and Young America are wonderfully alike. There is faith, enthusiasm, capacity, dreams; there is also inexperience, impatience, radicalism, lack of balance, and a desire to transform the world in a day. Dr. Dewey says, "They want western knowledge and western methods which they themselves can independently employ to develop and sustain a China which is itself and not a copy of something else." It is curious that we all feel that way, and yet that we all owe most of what we are to someone else! In the writer's various attempts to carry out cooperative enterprises with Young China he has found that the tendency to take over American and other foreign ideas and institutions whole and without criticism is much stronger among the Chinese than among the foreigners. No more conspicuous example of slavish imitation of things western can be found than in the "Model City" of China, Nantungchow. School buildings, banks, theaters, practically everything external, are crassly and glaringly western—and this in a city dominated by a Chinese of the old style, but one of the ablest and most progressive in the country, who has never studied in a foreign school of any sort and knows no foreign language! The process of adaptation is difficult and, in the nature of the case, must be carried on chiefly by Chinese. Foreigners can state principles, make investigations, suggest experiments, apply the experience of other countries, but the real work of adaptation must be done by Chinese or by Chinese and foreigners working together. In architecture, in education, in ideas, in social organization no group of persons can be found in China who are striving more earnestly to adapt and accommodate east and west to each other than the faculties of missionary colleges. The implication that they consciously and as a matter of policy import Americanisms has no basis in fact.

DISLIKE FOR IMITATION

It is said that Young China dislikes the spirit of imitation. It is quite true that many Chinese blindly and almost vindictively resent the use of certain foreign commodities, institutions, and methods of organization. Fortunately these persons are rarely consistent. They believe in the use of railroads, cotton mills, battle-ships, labor unions, education. Many of them are ardent followers of Dr. Dewey! With respect to some matters, their attitude is that of prejudice against the foreign because it is foreign—an attitude which is common enough in all countries. The curious fact is that Dr. Dewey should seem to approve of such an attitude. The scientific spirit is surely a spirit of imitation, if by imitation we mean the willingness to use the valuable and true no matter whence they come. It is only a spirit of chauvinism or provincialism which makes people unwilling to use the thing best suited to achieve the end in view just because it is foreign. One of the greatest obstacles to progress in China today is the fact that "Young China" and "Old China" are alike unwilling to study earnestly and adopt where practicable the features of western civilization which might be advantageously introduced into China; and particularly in government administration they are unwilling to hire experts and give them power until a better system of organization is worked out. It would seem to be better for China if she could learn something from the experience of other oriental nations in this particular.

Missionary schools are charged with producing "commercial, political and religious compradores." The compradores are the business men of China. Far from being the puppets of the foreigners, the latter are absolutely dependent upon them. Dr. Dewey says, with seeming approval, "There is nothing which one hears so often from the lips of representatives of Young China today as that education is the sole means of reconstructing China." If Dr. Dewey shares that opinion, and means by it what "Young China" means, it simply indicates how far away from reality he has been drawn. In a country where the average annual income per capita is not more than twenty-five dollars gold, business men are needed to pay the taxes to build the schools to hire the teachers to furnish the leisure—and so on with the House that Jack built! Compradores have apparently increased production and raised the standard of living immensely in certain groups. We are glad that mission schools are furnishing some men who in "practical" life are making that adaptation of western ideas and methods which China must have if she is to become a modern nation—and she must become modern unless she can contrive to cut herself off from world intercourse.

Finally Dr. Dewey says, "There are a few institutions in China where the Chinese members of the faculty are put on the same plane of salary, social dignity, and administrative importance as foreigners." He seems to think this equality is desirable, and yet one wonders just why he says it in this connection. The institutions referred to must be missionary institutions, for in government institutions there is no attempt to foster equality in any one of the particulars mentioned. In the Chinese university to which reference was made above, the salary of the president is, so I am informed, less than half the salary of the physical director—because the physical director is a foreigner! Foreigners are rarely if ever permitted to occupy responsible administrative positions in government institutions, which is probably as it should be. Throughout the orient it is a well known fact that in institutions controlled by the government the salaries and certain kinds of privileges of foreigners are very much greater than in the case of natives of the country. Dr. Dewey is quite right in saying that there are missionary institutions (and it is true of practically all) in which an earnest attempt is made to place all members of the faculties on an equality. Still, there are great difficulties. Division of administrative functions between members of different races, with different traditions, different ideals, different customs presents problems of the greatest magnitude. Imagine Columbia University or the National City Bank under the joint presidency of an American and an Englishman—not to speak of an American and a member of an oriental race! Apparently Dr. Dewey would leave the impression that attempts at equality are general elsewhere but rare in missionary institutions, whereas the fact is that they are common in missionary institutions and almost unknown elsewhere.

MOST IMPORTANT CONTRIBUTION

Many of us who are in missionary educational work in China are former students of Dr. Dewey or enthusiastic followers of his educational and philosophical doctrines. We believe that he desires to aid China in every possible way. We do not understand why, on the basis of assumption and hearsay, he has used the weight of his influence to damage institutions which, with all their imperfections, are making possible the most important contribution of America to China. We do not see how, even from his point of view, he expects to aid China by this method. We believe, with him, that there is in China a great need for disinterested educational work, which shall have for its purpose the bringing in of the best there is in the west in order that Chinese and foreigners together may adapt this best to the needs of the Chinese people. We earnestly hope that government institutions will grow and prosper and serve the country more effectively year by year. But with practically the whole population uneducated and without plan or provision for their education, and with the country densely populated and on a very low plane economically, we believe that for decades to come it is desirable from every point of view that America should continue increasingly to contribute to the educational life of China through missionary schools and colleges.

The Stone Mason

A MAN whose snowy hair clusters on head
Still held erect, a sturdy man whose tread
Is gentle on the grass, a man whose tones
Are strangely soft for one who works in stones,
He stood beside me in the fading day
And bent a shrewd, benevolent survey
On my defeated stretch of rough stone wall,
Tumbled by romping boys and dogs. "I'll haul
The rocks tomorrow, if it suits you so.
One dollar for a two-horse load. They'll go
To nigh thirteen. It's a fair price." "I'll sell."
"They come in handy. I can use them well
In the foundations of that bungalow
A-building over in these woods, you know."
"I'm glad," I answered, "that they'll still be near.
Stones dug from one's own land—" "Ay, home is dear,
And all that touches home," he slowly said.
"That's what I think when now and then a Red
Comes round, a-shooting off his mouth at me,
Some wild young fellow fresh from oversea
Without a stake in peace and order yet,
Without a home. The times are full of fret;
I read my paper evenings on the porch
Till it seems like a madman with a torch
Was out to set the world afire. Well! well!
I go and mend the clothesreel—wife would tell
That I've been long in getting to that chore—
And I feel cool and sensible once more.
A laboring man has uses for his fist
Better than shake it at a capitalist.
The homes—I see the homes as little cords
Holding the country steady. There were lords,
I've read, in Russia, that kept all the land.
They've paid for it; they've paid. But here we stand,
Millions of us Americans, each on
His bit of earth, waiting till winter's gone
To plant the garden, thinking seeds and loam.
—These rocks of yours, they'll not be far from home."

The Immanent God

By Arthur B. Patten

GOD as the father of the human spirit is more transcendent fact than God as the creator of all outward worlds. The immanent God whom we know immediately and intuitively is the transcendent God himself. So in the experience of the mystic, the immanent God and the transcendent God are never separated. God is both more immanent and more transcendent in human consciousness than he is in all nature besides. To be sure there may be higher intelligences in other worlds, who transcend our experience, but that can in no wise make our experience less valid. In all worlds alike the high and lofty One who inhabits eternity reaches the heights of his revelation in the contrite and courgeous heart, and in the adoring and achieving society.

The deist and the pantheist must pass in order to make way for the personalist, or the mystic. To the deist, God is a philosophical dogma, an infinite inference. To the pantheist. God is only a composite photograph, a summation, but not a somebody—at best a personnel, but not a personality. To the personalist, God is both the Over-soul and the Great Companion of the human spirit; so that the mystic experience is ever a possession, and always a pursuit. The deist loses God in the heights. The pantheist loses God in man. The personalist finds God in man, and man in God. To him God is neither an infinite inference nor a finite immanence, but a transcendent presence, at once the father of his spirit and the Lord of heaven and earth. Such was the luminous consciousness, and such was the living word of Christ.

DYNAMIC TRANSCENDENCE

For the soul of man God's transcendence is not dimensional, but dynamic, not planetary, but personal. The heavens declare the glory of God—but only to the communing spirit. We find God in nature because nature finds God in us. Heaven and earth can not contain him, but the heart of man can know him. So it is the most transcendent God himself who is immanent in the human soul. Even the supernatural is not a spatial, but a psychological fact; and then it is not a matter of extraneous magic, but of mastery in the experience of the mind. The supernatural is not supremely in "the fire-mist and the planet," but in "the face turned from the sod." To Elijah the earthquake and the whirlwind would have had no soul-stirring meaning, if it had not been for the still small voice. Consciousness is the real sanctuary of the supernatural; and conscience is its inner court.

Then without the sense of God's presence, the universe is but a bleak and empty house. The supreme experience is to find God as host, and so worship and love him in the spiritualized and hospitable temple of his world. The cattle feeding in the Yosemite valley know neither worship nor wonder. It is only the transcendent gift of adoration that makes the world marvelous to man. Man looks up unto the hills in wonder, because he can look above and beyond the hills in worship. So the cosmos is the Father's house of many mansions. To the human soul, God's "dwelling is the light of setting suns, and the round ocean, and the living air," only because his spirit is still more deeply interfused within "the heart of man." Not long since a woman friend said to the writer: "I was a Christian for two weeks once. It was when I was in the Yosemite. There my heart was continually crying out, "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him!' " But the real Yosemite was in her own soul. Deep was calling unto deep at the sound of the waterfalls, because there was a transcendent deep in the worshiping spirit of a good woman, that made wonder glorious. Through God to nature is a better formula than "Through nature to God." Human nature is the holy of holies in the temple of deity.

Some of us as children were made to recite: "One impulse from a vernal wood can teach us more of man, of moral duty and of good, than all the sages can." But is that true? Indeed there would be for us no illuminating impulse at all in any vernal wood on earth, if God did not first put the genius of both poetic and spiritual sagacity into the soul, even of the child. We know that color and music are of the human eye and ear, even as wonder and worship are of the human heart. But all the world is not a Yosemite, or a vernal wood, and all the universe is not a palace of delight. The significance of the house inheres above all in the host. As a lovely character gives distinction to a very ordinary home, so the consciousness of a perfectly good God makes glorious our imperfect world. There may be great worship even in a rude church; and so there may be great visions and many voices of the spirit in the crude temple of evolving nature. It matters comparatively little how dreadful or how beautiful be the outward place, provided only we are able to cry with awakening Jacob, "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." It matters little, although we stand amid the earthquake and the storm, provided only we listen with Elijah, until even Sinai becomes an amiable tabernacle, since there we hear "the deeper voice across the storm, and fall upon the great world's altar stairs that slope through darkness up to God." Nature is the sanctuary of the soul—it is not the sacrament. The sacrament is our creative communion with the world-will of God. Then as nature is not final, so also it is not finished. For us God's outward creation, like our inner experience, may be only in the early stages of evolution. Still it means wonders to us that God has built the Yosemites to balance the Saharas.

Paul visualizes all nature as expectantly "awaiting the revealing of the sons of God." The figure is that of a spectator on a street corner, eagerly looking and longing for the coming of some transporting pageantry. The transporting and transforming pageantry which Paul envisions is the sacramental host of God's adventuring children who are more than conquerors through him who loved them. At their transcendent touch, the groaning and travailing creation is to be renewed, until things work together for good.

The real greatness of God is not to be found in cosmic diameters, but in the dynamic of human consciousness. Stellar glory is but a faint suggestion of soul glory; and it is at best only our tutor to bring us to the court of spiritual truth where the divine and the human meet in ourselves. Man's thought is far vaster than the universe and its processes are immeasurably more swift and wonderful. Man's thought has all the range of memory, of history, of imagination, and of prophecy. It can compass in a single moment what it has taken millenniums to evolve. The thought of a single moment can measure its more-than-electric flight into two eternities. It can pass from the vision of primeval chaos before the morning stars sang together, to the vision of eternal life beyond the illimitable horizon of immortality.

But to the mystic this extensive capacity of the spirit of man is almost a negligible fact as compared with his intensive discernment of the heart and will of God in his world. It is indeed wonderful that man's imagination can span the millenniums; but it is vastly more wonderful that man's intuition can sound the height and depth, and can know the love of God which passeth knowledge. It is most wonderful of all that man's creative communion with the good will of God can transform the human soul in masterful goodness, and can fashion anew the human society in reverence, righteousness, and love.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION

If what has just been portrayed is the true mysticism, then how wretchedly has it been caricatured! A modern religious writer remarks, "To reach a (rational) faith, we cannot turn our backs on knowledge and science, and revert again to mysticism." But what we are seeking is not a reversion, but rather a conversion of both materialistic science and of medieval mysticism. Science should be reverent, and mysticism must be reasonable. Experiment and experience must meet together, and physics and psychology must kiss each other. Certainly the infinite and eternal energy from which all things proceed need have no quarrel with the infinite and eternal Presence in whom we all live and move and have our being. Science may not often stop to call the energy personal, but neither must it pause to call the presence impersonal. Many a scientist who will not make a declaration of formal faith, will yet rejoice in mystical worship.

The writer has for years enjoyed the friendship of such a man, now professor of genetics in a leading American university, and enjoying a world-wide reputation as an authority in his department of biology. He writes, relative to the sentiment of these articles, "Your thought fits beautifully into my own religious conceptions. I am thankful that you have such an opportunity to spread this gospel among men. But it makes me sad to see the resurgence of the old antagonism between science and religion, when they ought properly to be handmaidens." And yet there are those who would call this professor an agnostic. He might not disclaim the term, if it referred to his unwillingness to promote the church creeds in his classroom. But he would, I know, disclaim the title of agnostic as he sat in the sanctuary and worshipped with reverent but reasonable churchmen. In his classroom, the scientist is not obligated to be a teacher of even mystical religion. But he will no doubt increasingly acknowledge the part of real religion in his life, and in his confession, too, if we approach him devotionally and not dogmatically. A true mysticism, because of its experimental and adventuring spirit should indeed find a congenial running-mate in an inquisitive and advancing modern science. But a static mysticism can no more find fellowship anywhere today than can a dogmatic theology, or even a dogmatic science.

As we have seen, it is only a mere scrap of God's mastery that is mobilized on the material map of the world. His transcendent mastery mobilizes in the mind of man. We should have a puerile God indeed, if he were not versatile enough to visit and vitalize every human soul, as well as efficient enough to sustain the routine of outward nature. We may well turn to Martineau for a classical phrasing of this truth: "God is infinite, and the laws of nature do not exhaust his agency. There is a boundless residue of disengaged faculty beyond. Behind and amid all these punctualities of natural law, abides in infinite remainder the living and unpledged spirit of God. Here he has no formal rule, only the everlasting rule of holiness; and no pledge but the pledge of inextinguishable love. He can keep faith with the universe, and yet knock at the gate of every lonely heart."

Nature is only a minor fraction of the creative adventure of the Almighty. The physical world is but the fringe of his royal domain. The heart and glory of the land of promise is the personal experience. Psychology is the ultimate arena of the divine action and of the endless initiative of the infinite God. And then every man has not only a soul to save, but a larger and ever larger soul to find and win, albeit he must find it and win it in giving it away. Like immortal love, life can be forever dull, only as it is forever flowing free; it can be forever whole, only as it is forever shared.

TRANSPORTING WONDER

Even to the most exacting scientific mind there inevitably come at times moments of transporting wonder when thought passes logically into worship. It was said some years ago regarding the French positivist and savant Littré, by a fellow countryman who had just read a passage in one of his books, that "reaching the utmost limit of positive knowledge, and posting himself on the extremest promontory, he saw himself surrounded by the mystery of the unknown, as by an infinite ocean. He had neither bark nor sails nor compass wherewith to explore this boundless sea; still he stood there gazing into it; contemplating, meditating in the presence of its vastness; and finally abandoned himself to a movement of adoration and of confidence which renewed his mental vigor and filled his heart with peace." Littré had really found the God of nature because the nature of God had already found him. He had transcended mere outward nature through the mystic experience of his own spirit. The nature symbols had passed into substance, or rather the substance of the divine life in his own heart had filled the symbols with the saving grace of the divine presence. God was beyond because God was within.

We project God from his world in ourselves into his.

world without. We realize with Mrs. Stowe that we know the God of the morning and of the daylight, only because every one of us is so constituted in his heart that he must need cry with her,

> Fairer than morning, lovelier than the daylight,
> Dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with thee.

In the new creation God and man labor together; for God has left much work unfinished, so that he may take his human children into creative partnership. A purchaser in receiving a bouquet of American Beauty roses from the hand of a florist, exclaimed, "See what God wrought!" Whereupon the florist bade him tarry a moment, while he disappeared into the greenhouse, only to return forthwith, holding a plain, common rose in his hand, and repeating the purchaser's exclamation, "See what God wrought!" And then, passing to an inspired but logical climax, he lifted up the bouquet of American Beauties, and exclaimed again, "See what God and man wrought!"

The Church and Public Opinion

By Samuel McCrea Cavert

IF this wider educational mission of shaping the underlying assumptions and attitudes of society as a whole along Christian lines is to be fulfilled, the conscience of the community must be faced by the Christian ideal and be led to look at our great social issues in its light. Yet at the present time whole groups are touched by our teaching agencies only in a pitifully fragmentary way. There is, to take but a single illustration, the great movement of organized labor, coming rapidly to self-consciousness and destined to play a great part in whatever social changes may be made; yet, generally speaking, indifferent to, if not critical of, the church, assuming that it is one of the bulwarks of the status quo. How is this group to be reached? Only by influencing somehow the factors which are now moulding their thinking and determining their attitude on public questions.

What are these factors? First of all, as we have already intimated, the public press. Here is a powerful, almost incredibly powerful, agency in shaping the social outlook of the vast majority of men. Only one person out of four may go to church on Sunday, but all four are reading the newspaper almost every day. According to the World Almanac for 1921 the daily circulation of American newspapers in the large cities alone in 1914 (the latest year for which figures were compiled) was over 40,000,000. These included only dailies and only papers printed in English. Weekly and monthly periodicals had in 1914 a total circulation of 200,000,000 per issue. These printed pages are, for good or ill, a tremendous educational force. It is hardly too much to say that the sympathies and prejudices of most men are affected by the press more than by any other single factor. Every day it is teaching the whole nation!

Yet how far does the point of view of the Christian church find expression therein? On the day when the writer was outlining this chapter he scrutinized, as an experiment, the pages of one of the outstanding newspapers in America. Out of eighty-four columns, exclusive of advertising, slightly over one column had to do with the church or with religion. When another great daily some months ago published a complete list of its staff, occupying no less than four columns, it appeared that while there were men assigned to cover politics, sports, literature, drama, finance, military affairs, science, fashions, the courts, and almost every conceivable human interest, not a single man was assigned to religion and the churches. Either their work was not presented at all, or handled not by one especially trained in that line but by any casual reporter. The mighty agency of public opinion which we have in the press the church is reaching and using only in a fatally meager degree.

THE PRESS

The reasons are not far to seek. In part, it is the commendable reluctance of the church to use the methods of the "press agent" and the designing propagandist. But there are less creditable reasons. One reason is that such meager efforts as the churches have made to secure a hearing in the daily press have been too selfish—too centered around filling their pews or advertising conventional "services" and "activities," too little devoted to the task of interpreting to the outside public what Christianity really means as a way of life in the modern world. The chief reason, however, for our ill success with the press lies in the fact that the church has failed to realize how great a missionary opportunity is here presented and to devise the means by which it can avail itself of it. We have not thought of the press as a great agency of evangelism and religious education.

Another far-reaching influence in moulding the opinion of the rank and file whom the church is not teaching directly through pulpit, Sunday school or Christian association is the recreational life of the community. A single phase will suggest the immensity of the problem—the motion picture house. That practically the whole civilized world goes to the movies and that children and young people—those in the most formative period of life—attend with regularity is a fact of tremendous consequences. Careful investigations in several cities have shown that about nine-tenths of the boys and girls of school age go to the movies. Statistics of attendance at theaters in the United States, given out by the motion picture industry, indicate that in every ten-day period the attendance is as great as the total population. Here, then, is an agency which reaches vastly more people than the church and even in the case of those reached by the church generally has them for more hours per week and brings to their minds and hearts the more vivid appeal of the eye.

This means that here is an unutilized possibility of interpreting something of the meaning of Christianity and the work of the church to groups that we now are quite failing to touch at all. How seldom does the screen depict any of the great social and humanitarian achievements which Christianity has inspired! When has the noble life work of Grenfell among the fisher folk of Labrador been shown? Or the redemption of the New Hebrides by John G. Paton? Or the work of Hampton or Tuskegee institutes in helping a race up from slavery? Surely here are great themes, the human interest of which are apparent as soon as they are suggested. The setting and dramatic value of any one of these, and hosts of others, would satisfy Rex Beach himself. And their message could inspire multitudes, who hardly ever heard of missionary effort, with something of the Christian motive of service to mankind. Yet the film is not so used. In the earlier centuries the church was the foster mother of the drama, the mystery play being its direct creation. Why is there now no contact between the church and the widespread form of drama represented by the screen? Largely, no doubt, because of the short sighted policies of motion picture producers. But that is hardly the whole story. What have the agencies of the churches done to secure points of contacts with the producers of pictures, to present to them the possibilities of making great contributions to social welfare through this educational medium which reaches the mind of millions who do not darken the doors of the church?*

Under our present disjointed denominationalism it is no doubt gravely difficult to devise means of securing adequate contacts with powerful agencies like the press, or the motion-picture industry. First, because a single denomination usually does not have the resources to maintain an agency of interpretation sufficiently expert to command the attention of as highly organized concerns as the great newspaper offices; secondly, and more important, because the voice of many churches does not appear to be the voice of the church at all. At best it seems only the opinion of a certain party or special group within the church and so does not have the weight or significance to give it journalistic value or to impress the public with the fact that the Christian conception of life and duty is a mighty force in society. As things are now it is a "Presbyterian" missionary effort, or a "Methodist" conference, or a "Baptist" educational movement that is reported in the press, and as a result the fundamental character of Christianity as a way of life set over against much of the life of the world is not presented in any convincing way.

CHURCH AND CHURCHES

If the church is to succeed in using such educational agencies as these for the forming of public opinion along Christian lines, some way must be found of bringing the combined impact of the whole church to bear upon the public mind. Christians will have to find a common voice that will really be regarded as expressing the thought of the church. For practical purposes there is now no such thing as "the church," a single organization which can give united expression to the sentiment and judgment of the followers of Christ. There are rather churches, separated units most of the time going their way without much relation to each other, and as a result the solid place of moral leadership which the one church of Christ might have is weakened and dissipated. So the question of Christian education in this wider sense is simply inseparable from the question of Christian unity.

"UNHAPPY DIVISIONS"

The "unhappy divisions of Christendom" are not simply a sentimental concern; they touch, and touch vitally, the power of the church to hold the Christian ideal before the world. When it is a question of reaching great social agencies and movements outside the churches, there are many tasks which we cannot do at all unless we can do them together. In war-time this was conspicuously true. Then contacts of the church with the government itself, with governmental agencies and with great social organizations like the Red Cross were a necessity. Yet forces so united as these governmental and semi-governmental agencies would not, could not be expected, to deal separately with scores of denominations separately; nor could any single denomination, apart from the others, make a strong enough appeal to these agencies to claim their serious attention. Consequently the denominations found it necessary to function together, at least in certain tasks, through the cooperative agency known as the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, created by the Federal Council. But what was obviously true then is also true now in the case of contacts with great social forces like the daily press, the motion-picture industry, the labor movement or chambers of commerce. To reach them in any effective way with positive Christian influences it is imperative to find methods by which the church can come with the sum total of its strength. Any lack of unity weakens not only the church's efficiency but also its moral authority in presenting the Christian ideal to the world. Some means we must have of putting behind the Christian message the consolidated power which comes from singleness of aim and united expression of its common mind. The trouble today, it has been well said by Bishop McConnell, is that "each church is like a musician in possession of a distinctive instrument. The instrument may be excellent, and the musician may be playing it well, but the effect is not orchestral. At best it suggests just the tuning up." Only when united approach to the public is possible will the church challenge it with its gospel in the most arresting and compelling way.

But even if we secure a common voice, have we a common mind? To have an instrument of united expression would be of little consequence if we have nothing on which we agree sufficiently to be able to speak. To such general principles as brotherhood and love, all Christians, of course, give assent. But when we come against any of the great moral issues on which the world needs guidance from the church how much consensus of judgment do we have as to what brotherhood in this concrete case would require? Oftentimes the facts themselves, on which judgment must be based, are not known. Take our present industrial situation. We all want a more brotherly social life, but what do we know about the actual facts of our present world—about the extent and causes of unemployment, about the inadequacy of income of the rank and file of wage-earners, about the good and ill of labor unions, of economic competition and a host of other questions? A few know the facts and the issues at stake, which, if understood, by others, would lead to a oneness of mind we do not now possess. Obviously we must have not only some organ of collective utterance but also an organ of collective thinking. We need the most patient analysis and study of the great social issues that confront the church, done so thoroughly that it will, first of all, win the assent of the church as a whole, and, as a consequence, be able to command the attention and the solid respect of the outside world at large.

*A step in this direction has lately been taken by the Federal Council of the Churches which has appointed a committee for conference with the motion picture producers and distributors of America, as to the practicability of establishing a liaison-office which would seek to discover in the work of the church subjects that would be worthy film material and to call them to the attention of the producers. What will come of the experiment remains still to be seen.

SIGNIFICANT COMMITTEE WORK

It is in the light of this problem that the significance of a body like the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook, constituted by the Federal Council of the Churches and the General War-Time Commission, appears. For the distinctive thing about it was simply this, that its one purpose was collective thinking. The representatives of the various denominations that comprised it set for themselves no other task than to study—and to study together—some of the more difficult problems confronting the church. Their work showed clearly that "the final result of working things out together is more than the sum of what the same individuals could reach working alone." The report on "The Church and Industrial Reconstruction," produced by this committee, is perhaps the best illustration of the value of this kind of work. In spite of the fact that the subject itself was one on which there is probably a greater divergency of opinion in the church than on any other contemporary issue, it proved possible for many men of many minds to agree on the fundamental principles of a Christian industrial order, to analyze our existing industrial and economic life in the light of them, and to distinguish between the things on which equally earnest Christian men might reasonably differ and the common program to which those who agree in accepting the Christian principles could give assent. The kind of collective thinking which was thus, in some measure at least, applied to industrial problems needs to be directed continuously to this and other great social issues—our international and our inter-racial relations, for example—on which Christian public opinion must be formed. A distinguished British economist, commenting on this work of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook, went to the heart of the problem when he declared that a permanent "thinking department" of the churches is a necessity if it is to grip the public mind effectively. His words are worth quoting at length:

"One lays down even so admirable a document as this report with some uncertainty as to what its effect will be. And that feeling is partly the result, perhaps, of uncertainty as to the ways in which the Christian churches can, in fact, help to realize the kind of principles for which they stand. There are several ways in which a church acts upon the social mind of a community. It is a teaching body. It occupies a status of public influence and weight, and by conferences and manifestoes can help to mould public opinion. In both capacities it can contribute a stream of thought and inspiration, the effect of which may be slow, but can hardly help, in the long run, to be considerable. It would be more considerable if the churches were better equipped for their task. The situation is possibly not the same in America as in England. But in the latter country any observer must be impressed by the disability under which the church of England labors in coping with questions which concern, or ought to concern, the Christian conscience, through its mere lack of any permanent machinery for grappling with them. What it needs is a 'thinking department,' a staff of officers whose duty it is to collect and systematize information and to supply the leaders of the church with the knowledge needed if they are to speak with effect. At present it appoints committees when occasion arises. But improvised oppinions are rarely effective. If it is to speak with any authority on international or economic questions, it must create an organ to accumulate, sift and criticize the material necessary to the formation of a reasoned judgment."*

Certainly we shall never succeed in making the church a great power in the formation of public opinion until we have set ourselves more seriously to the task of thoroughly understanding contemporary social conditions and social forces. We rightly emphasize the indispensableness of good-will, but good-will alone is not enough. We must have the intelligence to make it effective in dealing with the concrete problems of actual life. The Christian gospel, the solvent of the world's ills, must be guided by scientific social knowledge. In the growing alliances of Christianity and social science is our hope of social salvation.

IMPORTANT BEGINNINGS

Significant beginnings have been made by the churches in recent years in studying concrete situations, in crystallizing their own point of view and in holding it before the wider public. The recent vigorous campaign among the churches for reduction of armament under the leadership of the Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Good-will, and the continuing efforts to mobilize the religious forces of the country to work with sustained vigor for building up other agencies than war for the settlement of international disputes, is a case in point. Beginning with the observance of a Sunday in June as "Disarmament Day" in the churches and an appeal for the calling of the international conference, the program included the preparation of material for pastors on the present armament situation in the light of Christian principles, the concentrating of the attention of the churches on the issue throughout the conference, with a persistent campaign of educational publicity in both the daily and the religious press as to the concern of the churches in the movement. Such work as this, aiming to arouse well-informed public opinion along Christian lines, is as directly a responsibility of Christian education as the maintenance of Sunday schools.

*R. H. Tawney, "The Church and Industry," New Republic, April 27, 1921.

The effect of the so-called "Social Ideals of the Churches," adopted by the Federal Council in 1908 and endorsed by most of the larger denominations, and of the investigation of the Steel strike of 1919 by the Interchurch World Movement are remarkable examples of the value of concerted efforts to understand modern industry and to hold the Christian ideal before it. While the report on the steel strike was for a time the target of severe attack and its conclusions were regarded as visionary and impracticable, later events have been a striking tribute both to its accuracy and to its power in shaping public opinion. In 1920 both its facts and its point of view were challenged. In 1922 the steel corporation had announced the abolition of the seven day week and the twenty-four shift (which the Interchurch report had called for) and the President of the United States was conferring with the heads of the steel industry about the importance, as a public policy, of getting rid of the twelve hour day—which the investigation had indicated as the worst evil.

VALUE OF UTTERANCES

The incalculable value of the utterances by the churches on social questions in establishing needed points of contact between the churches and the labor movement is illustrated by a resolution passed by the American Federation of Labor at its convention in 1921, expressing appreciation of the Federal Council of Churches, the National Catholic Welfare Council and the American Conference of Jewish Rabbis. It read in part:

"Resolved, That the officers and delegates of the American Federation of Labor in annual convention assembled in Denver, Colorado, June, 1921, do hereby express their highest esteem to the above mentioned religious organizations for their most splendid efforts to acquire full information as it relates to the industrial situation and its effect upon the wage-earners and their dependents; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the declarations of these organizations are hereby recognized as intelligent and most humane documents of inestimable value to the organized workers and the public in general."

More recently provision has begun to be made for continuous, rather than occasional, efforts by the churches really to understand social conditions and so to be able to hold forth the Christian ideal effectively. The Federal Council's Commission on the Church and Social Service has initiated a research department which, among other functions, is issuing a fortnightly information service to the religious press and to interested Christians, carefully presenting prepared information on social and industrial questions as they affect the church.

The steps that are being taken to deal definitely and constructively and unitedly with the task of creating Christian public opinion merit much fuller support and recognition than they have yet received. They have thus far been seriously hampered by lack of funds. The support of such a movement ought to be recognized for what it really is, a great and vital educational responsibility of the church. In some form or other it must be extended to every area of the church's life and work. To carry on the patient, thorough study of the relation of the church to the throbbing social issues of the day and to provide for the effective united utterance of the common mind thus reached—this is an inescapable part of the program of any church that would fashion the organization of society along Christian lines. It can be carried out only as the churches conceive their teaching as the responsibility not merely of specialized agencies like the Sunday school and the Christian college but of the whole church.

And in the last analysis the most powerful educational influence in the church for shaping a Christian public opinion is its own life. Not what the church says, not the instruction that it gives, but what it is and does finally determines its effect upon the individual and upon society. The word must become flesh and dwell among us if men are to behold its glory. The great educational mission of the church lies in its being, in its own corporate character, the kind of brotherhood which it proclaims as the social ideal. Its own life must bear witness to society of the power of Christianity to establish new relationships among men, based on love and transcending all barriers of nation, race and class.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE Lion had just come out of a bad night. The traces of pain were still upon his face. After a word of greeting I was about to leave him. But the decisive pressure of his hand upon my arm detained me. I stood looking down into his face with its fine lines and all the delicate tracery of brooding thought and all the subtle marks of spiritual victory upon it. Just then it seemed a long distance to the day when I had watched his greatest achievement in football. And yet the tragic experience which had cut his life in two had made him a greater man. I was beginning to realize that it had also made his life a more productive force in the world. A touch of something whimsical came into his eyes as he looked up at me.

"You are afraid I am not fit to live with this morning?" he queried.

"I know that you exercise shameful and completely tyrannical control over your nerves," I replied. "It is only that I am not sure you want to talk."

"Well, I do," said the Lion tersely, and I dropped into a chair.

"Have you ever thought in how many centuries Christianity produced the best writing which dropped from the pens of men?" he asked. And then without waiting for a reply he went on:

"Dante did the most luminous work of the fourteenth century. Nothing else equalled the Summa of Saint Thomas in the thirteenth. Abelard's writing is the expression of the most brilliant and understanding mind of the twelfth. Nothing else written in the period has the passion and the power of the Confessions of Augustine. There is a pungent vitality about the writing of Tertullian which is unmatched by any other writings of his age. If you drop down to the seventeenth century Bunyan's masterpiece holds its own even among the brilliant books which were appearing in his day. Take it by and large the Christian writers have more than held their own."

He paused and it was evident that he was leading up to something which was weighing upon his mind.

"But ever since the renaissance," he said, "Christian men of the pen have had a harder fight for their place in the world. The brilliant secular mind has more and more asserted itself. Shakespeare writes with respectful precision from without the secret places of the Christian life. Voltaire has pretty much everything else except the capacity to understand historic Christianity. To be sure the great nineteenth century men were only possible with Christianity in the background. It gave them soil. It gave them seeds. And it matured their harvests. Carlyle, Ruskin and Matthew Arnold were a product of Christianity, though each had his independent position and view. Tolstoi was a product of a noble fragment of Christianity. But the twentieth century is curiously lacking in Christian voices which bring the capacity for penetrating criticism and the power of creative inspiration. With the greatest opportunity for analysis and synthesis which the ages have offered Christianity is curiously silent."

"There are a good many able men who are writing from the Christian point of view," I ventured.

"Oh, there is no end of useful men. But I'm not seeing any really great men. The utterly fearless eye. The entirely candid mind. The deep and healing heart of worldwide sympathy. The power of creative thought. The capacity for expression gleaming with all the light which shines perpetually upon living words. I do not know where you will find all these combined in one man."

"Are you not asking a good deal?" I put in.

"I am asking no more than Christianity has done in many another century," flashed back the Lion. "It was tugging away at my mind when I could not sleep last night. The swords were going in my body and this sword was going in my mind. I thought of people as brilliantly sarddonic as Dean Inge, of people as keen and scholarly as Dr. Selbie. And I thought of Americans dripping with social passion and bright with delightful popular gifts. But I could not find my great man who is able to pass the white light of the eternal gospel through his mind and send it forth glowing with all the colors of the life of our own age. Will you find him for me?"

And with these words the Lion let me go for the day.

The Meaning of the Election

THIS is what the politicians call an "off year"; that is, it was not a presidential election. These "off year" elections, however, are often more significant morally than is a presidential election. Without the excitement engendered by the bigger sweep of things there is likely to be more candid, open-minded voting of the elector's convictions. In the average presidential election, party regularity is at a premium and rational consideration of the issues at a discount.

Two years ago there was a tidal wave of reaction. The ebb tides from war swept everything that had to do with its making and its settlement out of office. The same sort of thing happened in England where the Liberals were snowed under so deeply that Labor with only seventy members in the House of Commons, was the "opposition." The government was called coalition, but it was in reality conservative with Lloyd Georgian liberalism well concealed under coalition banners. Having the power to call one at will, the "little Welsh wizard" astutely called his election before the tides of reaction gathered force, and going to a country still under arms with a "hang the kaiser" slogan he won on an issue that he has never since touched. Clemenceau and Orlando were swept out and today both France and Italy are under reactionary governments.

If the sweep of two years ago was a "repudiation" of Wilson, then the logic is irresistible that the recent turn-over was a repudiation of Harding. The popular majority of seven millions in the presidential election is now turned back into an anti-administration majority when the present vote for progressive Republicans is added to that of the Democrats. This is no more than superficially true, however. The seven-millions majority was abnormal; it was a mass reaction begotten of war nerves, for the issue had been the most idealistic ever proposed to the nation and ideals fare illy after the bloody baptism of war.

A Progressive Victory

The fact that the election of two years ago was a mass reaction is proven by the way in which Republican candidates down to the bottom of the ticket were swept into office along with the presidential candidate. The country has been normally Republican ever since the civil war. In sixty years the Democrats have had only four successful presidential candidates and once their victory was a result of a division in the opposition. But the election two years ago was not a normal defeat—it was an avalanche. This year the division was again normative in respect to the labels on the tickets, the Republicans winning by average majorities on candidates for the House of Representatives.

This election indicates not only a reversal of the Harding sweep, but also a reversion within the Republican party toward Rooseveltian progressive-ism. The whole country, from the Mississippi to the Pacific coast went progressive. Where the Republican candidate for the senate was not progressive the Democratic progressive won. East of the Mississippi progressive-ism won in Indiana, Michigan and Tennessee, while in New York, West Virginia, Rhode Island, and Delaware the men elected ran on progressive programs and in each case defeated a conservative. In the "solid south" most of the candidates elected favor progressive Democracy.

The defeat of ex-Senator Beveridge was the most striking illustration of the determination of the middle west—the future arbiter of national political destiny—to turn progressive. Ten years ago he was the idol of Bull Moosers and a strong favorite with independent Democrats. He is a man of great ability and fine oratorical talents, and he has a genuinely progressive record as senator. In the primary he was nominated as a progressive, defeating one of the senators deepest in the confidences of the administration at Washington. He did not openly campaign as a progressive in the primary, but his record campaigned for him and he won handsomely on that record. He then became more concerned with polling the full, regular party vote than with progressive policies. He praised the present administration as the best on record, defended the new tariff, formed a comradeship with the reactionary Senator Watson whom he ten years ago called a "porch climber," fought labor after the best approved style of the Indianapolis Employers Association, one of the worst anti-union organizations in the country, and proclaimed himself an utter isolationist, saying he was for "America only and America alone." So, though he has long been "Indiana's favorite son," the Hoosiers have now elected his opponent as a better progressive, and returned Republicans for state offices.

Scratched Ballots

The striking characteristic of this election was the scratched ballot. In no election in American history has scratching been so general. Through all the territory that went so definitely progressive on senators the election was regular on local offices unless there was a vital issue at stake. Where there was a vital issue, independence and conviction were again shown. Kansas registered a decisive vote against Governor Allen's industrial court by electing a Democratic candidate for governor with that question the vital issue. Wet and dry candidates were elected according to prevailing sentiment without necessarily carrying the ticket with them. Ohio elected a Democratic governor and a Republican senator; Nebraska did the same. Massachusetts cut Senator Lodge's majority to a fraction of that for his running mate for governor and Michigan elected a Republican governor and a Democratic senator, while Minnesota left both party candidates for the senate at home and sent an Independent to Washington.

Labor and the farmers seem to have scored heaviest in the results of ballot scratching. In the northwest the "embattled" farmers won senatorial preference in every state from the Mississippi and the lakes to the Pacific coast. Fighting Bob La Follette returns with an unexampled majority and with a larger company of fighting compatriots than he has ever had on the senate floor. Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, and Washington returned radical men, while Nebraska, Wyoming and California elected progressives. Labor made the largest score in its history. Every candidate favored in their scratch ballot campaign for senator was elected in the middle and far western states with the exception of Utah where their vote is negligible. In Tennessee, Indiana, New York, Ohio, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Delaware, and Missouri the same was true. In Ohio, Kansas, and Nebraska their favorites were elected governor on tickets that lost other offices. They reaped richly from the intemperate and reactionary campaigns of the anti-union crusaders and from the defeat of the recent railroad strike.

The Wets adopted Anti-Saloon League tactics and effected a good deal of scratching, but the drys eagerly accept that sort of challenge and seem to have lost nothing through the reaction. New Jersey is the only state where the wet and dry sentiment had any marked bearing on the election and even here there were the tariff and labor issues. In Missouri wets and drys contested in the primaries but in the election the labor vote went to the successful candidate without respect to that issue though wet Republicans doubtless cast a large vote for Reed.

The Moral Outcome

From a moral standpoint this election was both significant and gratifying. Scratching shows independence, conviction and intelligence. Voting a straight ticket may not signify idiocy but any idiot can do it. It often implies surrender of independent judgment and a blurring of both patriotism and moral conviction. Party alignments become wrong as soon as new issues arise, unless voters change freely from one to the other. That the old party alignments are artificial is amply demonstrated by the fact that men as far apart as Reed in Missouri and Ralston in Indiana are carried on the Democratic ticket and Brookhart in Iowa and Lodge in Massachusetts on the Republican. Senator Borah said recently that all the signs were ripe for such a revolt as took place in the late fifties. The third party movement may arise with the swiftness of a summer storm. The ease with which the conservatives cross party lines to combine forces against such men as Brookhart and Frazier or liberals to support them argues convincingly that the alignments are logically those of progressive and conservative and not the traditional Democrat and Republican.

The most unmistakable moral triumph of the election was the repudiation of Newburyism in Michigan. It doubtless had an influence in every state where old line partisans supported Newberry, but his own state redeemed its reputation and spoke in unmistakable moral tones by electing Governor Ferris in a campaign conducted on that one issue. The unmistakable tone is cut clean and clear in the fact that no Democrat has been elected senator from that state in the past seventy years. Let us hope that this sealing the doom for Newberryism has put the fear of God into the bones of every senator that voted to sustain him.

The third moral victory was that of prohibition. In a clear-cut fight Ohio sustained it by a majority of nearly 200,000. California enacted a strict enforcement law by a decisive majority after predictions that wine growing interests would defeat it by two to one. The vote in Illinois was not a contest but a mere registering of wet sentiment, for the dry campaign centered on a "don't vote" slogan. Along the Atlantic coast no change was registered. New Jersey is no wetter than it has always been. These foreign possessions along the Atlantic will slowly be assimilated into American ways. The wets are bravely counting noses in the newly elected congress, but there will never be as many votes as noses. The Cleveland Plain Dealer says it is "whistling in the graveyard" and that some day these gentlemen will awaken to the fact that America is dry to stay dry.

On the whole those of us who think democracy rests upon independence of judgment and a social outlook plus a good conscience may find much gratulation in the election.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jesus Sending Out Missionaries

OUR conception of Jesus expands as we study him. I stood in an opening in a pine forest night before last, looking up at the stars. Coming from Pittsburgh, I was amazed at the nearness and the vast number of the glittering points. Everywhere were new stars, the dome of the sky was sown with new worlds. So it is with Jesus; when we get out of the worldly atmosphere and open our eyes we see, constantly, new heights and depths in our Master.

When Wesley said, "The world is my parish," he caught the note of Jesus. "The lost" in India mean so much to Christ or "the lost" in London. He came to seek and to save all the lost—everywhere and in all time.

One Sunday evening, this summer, I sat on the campus of Columbia University and heard a thrilling address by Sherwood Eddy. He simply told that cultured congregation that on a certain date (about twenty-five years ago) Jesus had definitely saved him and that he had lived a "saved" life ever since. It had a mission-hall sound and yet we all respected him for saying it. In fact, it was very refreshing, to hear those old words in that place. We knew that for Eddy being "saved" meant the complete dedication of life and fortune to missionary effort; we knew how he had spoken to students in India, China, Yale and Oxford; we recalled his war service. There he stood before us, looking so well-groomed, young and vital, bearing direct, personal testimony to that vast crowd of teachers (mostly) that his Master is a Saviour. What power in a consecrated, university-educated man! What influence radiates from a plain person who devotes his all to God! Consecration is the rare thing. We see so much half-heartedness among brilliant people; so much selfishness in great scholars; so much pride and egotism in big preachers; so much ostentation in rich and successful people; consecration of time, money, energy—think what it would mean.

When Mr. Frank L. Brown promised God that as soon as he had $40,000 he would give all of his time and mind to Sunday school work, the world was stirred. Mr. Brown was soon giving himself entirely to God. He rose to world-renown. When, a few years ago, Mr. R. A. Doan arranged his business so that he could give the major portion of his time, without salary, to missionary labors, he pricked the consciences of hundreds of visionless business men. A. A. Hyde makes "Mentholatum" (known in most homes). I met him seven years ago. At that time, they told me, his net personal income was one hundred thousand dollars, of which ninety thousand was given to the Lord, while he lived, simply, on ten thousand. I have used this story to stir up rich men. The elder Colgate gave first a tenth, then a fifth then a half, and, at last all of his income to God. On the way to a national convention, I met a father, mother and daughter. The daughter was going to that convention to stand up and dedicate her life to foreign missions. I shall never forget the impression of complete consecration which that family made upon me. The spirit which they possessed lingered with me, like a haunting melody. I have never been able to find that verse of scripture which says, "If you cannot go, send." My Bible says, "Go," and that means just this: "John Ray Ewers, God commands you to go and preach." I cannot send a substitute. The harvest is plenteous, the laborers are few. Pray the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers. Do you know whom he will call first—YOU. Pray—but be packing your trunk while you pray—for he will surely ask you to go. Do you mean to say that God will call everyone of us to be mssionaries? Yes, every one. All will not be sent to China—but more will; all will not be sent to Africa—but more will. Some will stay in America; many will stay in the old home town—but all must go, all must preach, all must teach—"GO." Christ would get rid of all this lukewarm, formal, half-hearted service. He would have consecrated people. How often has a common man, wholly consecrated, stirred the world. Moody said, "I am not much, but God can have all there is of me." Look what God did through Moody. Who is Robert Speer? Who is Sherwood Eddy? Who is Harry Emerson Fosdick? Who but plain men—consecrated! Dare you—dare you—lay yourself upon the altar? JOHN R. EWERS.

British Table Talk

London, Oct. 31, 1922.

BEFORE these words are in print, it will be known how we have voted in the election. No one who is three degrees removed from insanity will make any confident prophecy. At the present moment the political parties are still trying to get up steam—with some difficulty. The prime minister is honestly and outspokenly uncertain. He seems to ask for a blank cheque under the promise of giving tranquillity. The Liberals still suffer from the split of 1918, but there are signs that in some districts there will be a drawing-together of those who are traditionally "liberal." They may have said hard things of each other, but political memories are short and political invective is not taken very seriously. The Labor party has declared for a capital levy upon fortunes over 5,000 pounds. At the heart of this there is probably less of the anxiety to pay the national debt than of the desire to secure a hold upon the management of industry. They are, of course, the butt of many fierce attacks, and their capital levy is represented as a policy of confiscation, which is palpably unfair. It is not, however, unfair to say that their aim is to secure by the method of the levy the beginnings of a new system of management in industry. It is also fair to say that the business men, who resist the proposal, are not thinking of their financial interests—after all they pay a very stiff income tax—but they are opposed to any radical change in the management of their business. Looking at the whole situation it is very hard to find anything like clear-cut lines of separation between parties, and there are probably many who are thinking simply, "Which of the candidates in my district is the man to whom I can most safely give a blank cheque?"

The Ex-Premier

Mr. Lloyd George shows no sign of exhaustion; on the contrary, his bearing in the opening rounds has been that of a skillful boxer, nimbly darting here and there, and getting in many a shrewd blow. He was always a great man in opposition, and today he is as bonnie a fighter as ever before. The British Weekly, a journal steadfast in its loyalty to Mr. Lloyd George, has quoted of him the noble words of the ballad:

> "'Fight on, my men,' Sir Andrew says:
> 'A little I'm hurt, but not yet slain.
> I'll but lie down, and bleed awhile,
> And then I'll rise and fight again.'"

There is no question that he will rise and fight again, and the interval may not be long. Indeed is there any interval at all?

Sir William Hartley and George Cadbury

Two of our noblest merchants, in the old sense of that word, have died within a week. Both of them had passed the three score and ten, and one of them, George Cadbury, had long passed it. They were alike in the devotion of their wealth without stint to the kingdom of God. Sir William Hartley was a Primitive Methodist, George Cadbury a Quaker. Each lived his life among his own people. Each provided for his own work-people as well as for the wider ranges of the kingdom. Each had a concern for religious education, the one for the Primitive Methodist ministry, the other for the advancement of sacred learning among the Friends and others at Woodbroke. When 25,000 mourners assembled at Bournville to remember George Cadbury, they were not "mourners" in the conventional way, they met to bid farewell to a noble chief, who had passed his days among them in simplicity and in service. Birmingham has been rich in "public souls"; Dale, Vince, Dawson, the Chamberlains, and many others, and it is among these we rank Cadbury. Once he went to interview Newman, then in his mellow and gracious old age, and the Cardinal expressed the wish that there were more men like George Cadbury. Sir William Hartley made jams of an excellent quality; he was a pioneer in the profit-sharing method of conducting industry; but he was always and everywhere a man who witnessed for the Christian life and gave his wealth with both hands to every good cause among his own society, the Primitive Methodist. Of those who found him a loyal friend is Dr. Peake, the learned and powerful teacher, who also belongs to the Primitive Methodists. The fuller opportunities for training, now available for their ministers, the Primitive Methodists owe to Sir William Hartley, the most generous donor and to the devoted scholarship, at once fearless and passionately evangelical, of Dr. Peake.

Religion as Redemption

A writer in The Times has been calling the thoughts of its readers to the importance of religion as redemption.

"Students of religion, isolating it for the purpose of their analysis from living things, may easily misunderstand the true appeal of religion. They study it as an interpretation of the world; they hear what it has to say to the cry, Who will give us light? and they wonder why it is that this religion or that has persisted from age to age. The answers have varied from time to time, and often they are insufficient. Such students forget one fact; the human beings who listened to these offers were not concerned, first of all, with intellectual problems; they were demanding in the desperate accents of dying men, What must we do to be saved?

"Among Christian communities there is often serious thought upon the essentials of their faith. What are the conditions of survival? Which among them are the best adapted to stand the fiery tests of the present and future hour? Much will remain a matter of uncertainty; whether or not the church will take this or that ecclesiastical form, no one can tell. But if the story of the spiritual history of mankind is not now to be falsified there will be no place in the heart of humanity for any religion which is not one of redemption. Through all the years of this solemn process, whereby man is to return to God, there will be awakened in him the cry for deliverance. Within him will be the quest for perfection. He will have eternity in his heart, even while he is most occupied with passing things. He will seek to the end not for light only, but for peace, and all the energy and freedom of soul which peace can give.

"Other cries may come to sound in his memory as far off, and remote, but not this cry: Who shall deliver me? That is a timeless and universal cry. And no religion will be able to satisfy the heart of man which does not offer to him an answer to fill his mouth with laughter and his tongue with singing—Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory!"

The Paris Missionary Society
1822 to 1922

My colleague, the Rev. Robert Griffiths, is leaving for Paris this week to represent the London Missionary Society at the centenary of its sister-society in France, the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. I am glad that the links established by this society and our nation should be remembered. We indeed have every cause to be grateful to this little but gallant society which has planted the gospel in more than one area within the British rule. The spirit in which this society has done its Christian work within the British empire cannot be better expressed than in the words which Coillard used, "The geography of the kingdom of God is not that of the politics of men." In this time when the society is celebrating the beginning of a new century, it can be gratefully acknowledged how much this nation owes to its able and faithful servants who have served that higher kingdom under its rule.

The Near East

There is much concern in high quarters about the minorities in the near east. What will the policy of Kemal be when Constantinople is once more in his hands? Unfortunately the traditional policy of the Turks has been to regard the Christians within their rule as little more than a nuisance and source of entanglement with European powers. Unhappily, too, the Turkish minorities in "Christian" lands have had to suffer. That the massacre of minorities is not a way which can be tolerated as a solution of political difficulties should be made plain both to Turks and Greeks. But at present the predominant mood here is—let us keep as clear of near east and other commitments as possible. The one hope lies in the mission of Dr. Nansen, who under the league of nations, is planning, I believe, an exchange of minorities.

Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship

On Thursday last in the Queen's Hall the meeting arranged in connection with the 1924 Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship was a triumphant success. More impressive even than the speeches was the audience. The hall was crowded, and the neighboring church, All Souls' Langham Place, was the scene of an overflow meeting—and this at three o'clock in the afternoon! Some one told me that the most thrilling moment was when Father Bede Jarrett, a Roman Catholic speaker, used the word "churches." It marks an advance to have on one platform a poet and dramatist, John Drinkwater, a labor leader, Miss Margaret Bondfield, a Roman, a free churchman, Dr. Garvie, a bishop, Dr. Temple, and others, with other ranges of human thought and activity to represent. It seems to have been a fine send-off to a great voyage of adventure. The name for short of the society is "COPEC," a title taken from the initials.

CORRESPONDENCE

"A Few Untoward Features"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have been interested in noticing your point of view in regard to the Versailles treaty and the league of nations. To sum it up, you think that the United States would have been willing, and would be willing, to enter the league of nations if disassociated from the Versailles treaty which you condemn quite strongly. "The Independent," on the other hand, thinks that the United States would speedily have adopted the Versailles treaty if only it had not been associated with the league of nations, and all would have been well with us and the world. Permit me to say that in my opinion both positions are incorrect. The league of nations would have slight significance if it did not include the recognition and protection of the nations created by the Versailles treaty. The Versailles treaty with its faults, and like all human documents it has them, is nevertheless the basis of the present organization of Europe and the world, and far from being nefarious, contains manifold provisions for progress. Perhaps its enlightened labor provisions were the chief source of attack on it. They manifestly were in the United States senate.

Premier Lloyd George recently said that he insisted upon joining together the treaty and the covenant, just as President Wilson did in insisting that they stand or fall together—and thank God they both stand, despite America's ostrich attitude. Yet meanwhile we suffer from our indifference, and the world suffers with us. The rejection of the league and the treaty were part and parcel of the same spirit of selfish isolation which was and is our national disgrace. There is small comfort in trying to congratulate ourselves that we did not adopt the Versailles treaty because it has a few untoward features, and yet try to imagine that we would have entered heartily into any worth while world agreement whatsoever. The defeat of both was born of the same spirit, and we can come back to a right position not by glossing over our sin, but by recognizing it and atoning therefor. A reversal of American policy is exactly the thing we need, and as a Christian believer in the kingdom of God I feel sure it will come in time.

Motor Van Will Carry Episcopal Liturgy

The Episcopal church in Michigan has adopted the motor van as a means of carrying church rites to people in isolated communities. The van will contain an altar and seats for twelve people. At night it is transformed into sleeping quarters for the two pastors who will occupy it. Hand-bills will be sent on ahead, and people who wish any of the rites of the church may obtain them from the ministers. In the afternoon the pastors will visit scattered members of their flock, and in the evening a sermon will be preached. The books setting forth church doctrine will be carried along, and these will be sold to the people. Rev. J. G. Widdifield and Rev. C. L. Ramsay will be in charge of the novel project.

Bible Heroes Rank High in List

Three hundred girls at the National Kindergarten and Elementary College of Chicago, which is soon to remove to the vicinity of Northwestern University in Evanston, voted recently on their favorites among the heroes of the world's literature. Those receiving the highest rank are to be commended to the parents throughout the country for the story hour in the nursery. Jesus Christ was at the head of the list made up by these young women just out of their 'teens, which shows that modern young people have not forsaken the Christian ideal. The other heroes and heroines are: Lincoln, Washington, Jo in "Little Women," Sir Galahad, King Arthur, David, Daniel, Cinderella, Joseph, Joan of Arc, Mother Goose, and Moses.

Systematic Theologian Punctures Doctrinal Pretensions

Admittedly, the question of orders is one of the troublesome problems that stands in the way of the reunion of the church. Prof. George C. Foley, of the Philadelphia Divinity school, an institution of the Protestant Episcopal church, reviews in a recent article the growth of the modern notion of certain Episcopalians that ministers of reformed churches should be reordained. In 1610 the Scottish Kirk consented to accept episcopal government in a modified form. Three presbyters were ordained as bishops, at which time Archbishop Bancroft made no demand for the reordination of the Scottish Presbyters in order to establish intercommunion with England. This professor presents the argument that the church of England recognizes only two distinct orders in the ministry, deacons and presbyters. The bishop does not belong to a distinct order.

Men Go Hunting for Church Dinner

Of church dinners of various sorts there is a multitude of varieties, but something a little out of the ordinary is chronicled from Raymond, S. D. The men of the community all went hunting and the 300 ducks and prairie chickens secured were turned over to the church. At the dinner which followed, more than five hundred people were fed in the church basement. As a part of the campaign literature in bringing about this community movement the pastor circulated a pamphlet called "Johnny Get Your Gun."

Reorganization Is Now in Process

The actual work of consolidating various boards of the Presbyterians into the four new boards authorized by the General Assembly is now in process, for the committee on reorganization and consolidation of the boards and agencies of the Presbyterian church recently met in full session at Atlantic City. Every member but one of the committee was present. Each of the former boards of the church brought in a report on the steps necessary to complete the consolidation. It is now understood that all consolidation is over, and each one of the boards is trying to the best of its ability to find the best method of realizing the will of the General Assembly.

Cincinnati Pastor Closes Noteworthy Pastorate

The resignation of Rev. C. R. Stauffer at Norwood Christian church of Cincinnati brings to a close a noteworthy ten years pastorate. Church promotion in cities is difficult, but his church has risen from the rank of sixth in his suburb until now it is first in size. The value of church property has increased from $14,600 to $137,000. The membership has increased from 280 to 1,044. In the ten years more than 1,500 people have united with this church. Mr. Stauffer has accepted the pastorate of Ninth Street Christian church of Washington, D. C., from which Rev. George Miller had resigned to take up work in Omaha.

What is True in Religious Cults?

In our great cities religious and semi-religious cults outside the church are multiplying. "New Thought," "Divine Science," "Theosophy," are a few of the many movements which hold meetings and attract large followings. New York City is particularly full of these societies. Believing that the church is the custodian of the "unsearchable riches" for which people are seeking in these movements, Dr. Ralph W. Sockman of Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal church, New York City, has attempted to interpret these cults in the light of Christ's teaching. In a series of Sunday evening sermons some time ago he dealt with their relation to the Christian church. Many of their adherents attended and were so impressed by the constructiveness and breadth of the interpretation that they have continued in the congregation of the church. Guided by the success of this series, Dr. Sockman during October devoted his Sunday evenings to a course on "Religion and the New Psychology." In these sermons he discussed the elements of value for the Christian life and the points of danger to be found in the popular movements of psycho-analysis and autosuggestion. The public interest in these discussions was significant.

Small Town Works Out Program of Week-Day Instruction

The growth of the movement for mid-week instruction in religion is noted in many sections all over America and the chief problem has been to work out a practical program for the small town. West Salem, Ill., people think they have solved it. The churches have organized a board of management under the leadership of Rev. Edward H. Clifford, pastor of the local Disciples church. All of the grade school pupils except seventeen now take religious instruction one-half hour a day in the school building. The teaching is done by the five ministers, or by adult members of their families, and the Abingdon series of texts is used.

Sons of Albright Mobilize

The evangelical churches for the district of Missouri are putting on a practical program for their social service work. They propose that in each church there shall be some group studying various problems under the general title of "The Church and Human Welfare," and suggest that they begin with one meeting on the biblical foundation for human welfare work. They furnish outlined programs for this topic and also for studies of community betterment and rural welfare work. Under community betterment, they propose that individuals in the discussion group shall make a close first hand study of the theatres, dance halls, sanitation, diseases, hygiene, law enforcement, gangs and special groups that may run into vice, corrupt elections, illicit liquor traffic, disregard for law and order, and similar problems in the community formulating special reports for group discussion. Missouri is forming a fine state wide program for county welfare activities, which provides for an official committee on social welfare, for parole and probation officers, and for relief work of the poor, the dependent, and the delinquent. Each county may employ a county welfare superintendent to be maintained by taxation. The evangelical leaders of the state propose to inform their people on all phases of this special work for the county and the communities, both village and rural.

"Fighting Parsons' Club" Meets in Boston

The Fighting Parsons' club is an organization of Boston ministers who have served in various wars. At first it was composed only of civil war veterans but recently the membership has been opened to those who served in the Spanish-American war and in the world war. At a recent meeting, Colonel F. C. Bolles spoke on the "Organized Reserves."

Says Samson Played a Hallowe'en Prank

Dean Brown of Yale believes there is a place for humor in the work of the pulpit. In a recent Lyman Beecher lecture at Yale he asserted that Samson had played a Hallowe'en prank when he carried off the gates of a city. Various passages of scripture were quoted in which the element of humor was shown to be existent. Nevertheless, the speaker would not sanction an irreverent and unseemly humor. He said: "The Bible is no joke book, and clowns are not wanted in the pulpit, neither the man that makes puns on the Bible or cracks jokes about sacred things."

New Tuberculosis Sanitorium at Colorado Springs

The Methodist Episcopal church in 1910 took over the Beth-El Hospital of Colorado Springs and has been operating it ever since. Recently a big extension of physical ministry has been arranged for, and the chamber of commerce of the city has granted the board a site for a new hospital. The church will proceed immediately with the erection of a sanitorium which will have at first 250 beds, and ultimately 500 beds. There are now one million people in the United States sick with this disease. One tenth of all the people who die, have been ill with it. The economic loss from the disease in this generation is computed at twenty-five billion dollars. Other denominations are also expecting to enter this field, which has long been occupied by some fraternal orders. The Modern Woodmen of America have a large sanitorium at Colorado Springs as has the international organization of printers. The Disciples of Christ plan to erect an institution at El Paso, Texas.

Presbyterians Disturbed Over Dr. Fosdick

That the preaching of the most popular writer of devotional manuals in America should be condemned by the Philadelphia presbytery by a four to one vote shows the sense of values to be found in ministerial groups even in these modern times. The Philadelphia dominies have gone a considerable distance to hunt trouble for Dr. Fosdick, whose preaching is objected to. He is a Baptist who for the time is preaching in First Presbyterian church of New York. He cannot be summoned before general assembly to answer for heresy, but his church can. An overture from Philadelphia presbytery has been adopted which will introduce the matter in general assembly at Indianapolis next May. The chief prosecutor in the matter is Rev. Clarence E. Macartney. Dr. Fosdick is charged with not believing the virgin birth. He is widely known in evangelical circles through his books, "The Meaning of Prayer" and "The Meaning of Faith."

Secretary Burton Is Hopeful

Rev. Charles Emerson Burton, secretary of the national council of Congregational churches, is hopeful with regard to the outlook for religion in America. Even the current discontent seems to him the stirring of new life. He says: "Whatever doleful reports may be made regarding any particular phase of church life today, the aggregate of statistics is clearly in favor of hopefulness. The Congregational churches, for example, are not given to spasmodic campaigns, and it is therefore the more worthy of note that the last year, that is, 1921,

Face Reality on Temperance Issue

WHILE the recent election does not show the preponderance of wet sentiment that is claimed by wet metropolitan newspapers, nevertheless it is undeniable that temperance sentiment in the middle west is wobbly. The next congress is dry, but the people are impatient with non-enforcement. This gives opportunity for utterly mendacious editorials in the public press in sections where the liquor interests conspire to regain prestige. The circulation of reliable statistics with regard to the present status of temperance reform becomes therefore a public duty on the part of the Christian church. Enforcement is not at all complete, but it has gone much farther than most people think that it has. Rev. Clarence True Wilson has recently made a study of prohibition in Chicago, one of the wettest spots in the United States. These facts as published in the Methodist press are of meaning to the entire Christian community. He says:

"The last wet year was 1918. War prohibition went into effect at the midyear of 1919. In 1918 there were 10,124 admissions to the house of correction. In 1919 this number had fallen to the astonishing by-law figure of 5,723. In 1920, the first full dry year, the number declined further to 4,681. In 1921, however, the figures rose to 8,566, almost double the 1920 rate, but still far below at rate for the last wet year, and still further below the average for the period 1912-18, which was 13,924. Especially significant is the fact that in 1918 there were 57 per cent of recommitments and in 1921 only 35 per cent.

"Men whose wicked cause depends upon the deception of the people, have recently called attention in the public press to the increase in crime in 1921 over 1920, and have pointed to it as proof of the failure of prohibition. They take it for granted that the public will not remember that both 1920 and 1921 were dry years, and that a correct comparison would be with the last wet year. What brazen shamelessness incites these people to point to their own handiwork, to the direct results of their atrocious assault upon a law which has worked such benefits to the community!

"The total felony, misdemeanor, and quasi-criminal cases filed in the municipal court in 1918 totaled 129,817, and in 1920, the last year shown in the latest available report, was 109,899. In the morals court there was a total of 7,745 cases in 1918 and 4,844 in 1920. An evidence of the different conditions facing the criminal classes is to be found in the municipal court report on restitutions made by those on probation. In 1918 and 1919, 3,815 criminals were admitted to probation and only 2,880 in 1919-20. Nevertheless, the restitutions in the prohibition years amounted to $278,131.47, as compared with $40,611.61 in the wet years. In the juvenile court the chief probation officer, Mr. Moss, reports 3,036 delinquent boys and girls in 1918 and 2,415 in 1921. The alleged dependent boys and girls fell from 2,083 to 1,292.

"While the bank clearings in 1921 were practically the same as in 1918, the total savings deposits increased from $249,436,913 to $509,086,968, a striking evidence of greater thrift upon the part of those of moderate means. The Capital State Savings bank quadrupled its business; the Noel State bank nearly doubled its number of depositors; the Home Bank and Trust company multiplied its savings deposits nearly five times during the period, part of which was due to a consolidation, but aside from this it tripled its savings deposits.

"Chicago now has the lowest death rate in its history: 11.08 per thousand of population; the previous lowest death rate on record was in 1904: 13.85 per thousand, in a city of 3,000,000. This means a saving of 6,300 lives a year. Deaths from alcoholism in 1917 numbered 160 according to the coroner's report. In 1918, under war-time restrictions, the number fell to 45, and in 1919 to 37. The average for the last seven wet years was 114, and for the two entirely dry years, 41. Deaths from alcoholism, not limited to the coroner's statistics, total 187 in 1917; 99 in 1921. In 1918 there were 7,000 deaths from pneumonia; in 1921, 2,177, which substantiates the accepted medical opinion that alcohol is a major factor in pneumonia. Back as far as 1912, there has not been previous to prohibition, in any year, less than 3,800 deaths from pneumonia. Deaths from tuberculosis of the lungs fell from 3,276 to 1,957 between 1918 and 1921. The average for the years 1912-18 was well above 3,000. The total number of deaths in 1918 was 44,605; in 1921, 30,819.

"Dr. Carl Mayer of the Cook County hospital stated: 'We practically have not any alcoholic cases any more. Accident cases picked up by the police have markedly declined. We never see any more the typical hospital "bum." Tuberculosis patients take their treatment much more regularly and give more cooperation. We used to have fifty or sixty cases where now we have but one or two straggling in, and these are not usually alcoholics'."

shows returns way ahead of any other year in the history of the denomination. This applies to the total number of additions on confession of faith; to the amount of money contributed for the churches and benevolences; to the number of young people and children in Sunday schools, and to similar important items. Other denominations made like reports, and the summaries of all bodies, issued by the Federated Council of Churches, reach similar conclusions. My impression therefore is that the outlook for religion in America is very bright at the present moment."

New York Ministers Think Internationally

The Congregational ministers of New York and vicinity hold a monthly meeting during the church season on the second Monday of the month. The November meeting was held in Broadway Tabernacle, where Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, Dr. William Horace Day, and Rev. Archibald Black spoke in a symposium on "Great Britain and America: the Moral Leadership of the World."

Great Jesuit Priest Dies

In the past generation there have been few priests of the Roman Catholic church with more eloquence and pulpit power than Father Bernard Vaughan. The son of an English soldier, and the scion of an English family that from the earliest days remained in the Catholic fold while England turned Protestant, he has been trained to the most consistent loyalty. As a preacher against the sins of high society, he used to make all England tremble. He was an earnest foe of socialism, and often appeared on the public platform to set forth its alleged errors. As a Jesuit priest he was not eligible for promotion in his church. Though his brothers became bishops and he remained in the ranks of the parish priesthood, he came to have a spiritual power that was world-wide. He was an ardent foe of Protestantism, declaring that it was decaying through lack of spiritual power.

International Organization of Vacation Bible Schools

The Daily Vacation Bible School movement has so spread through the United States and Canada that there is now an international association of these schools, of which Russell Colgate is president and Walter M. Howlett, secretary. The organization met in New York at the Hotel Martinique, Nov. 17 and 18, to hear experts in various departments on features of the movement, such as music, handcraft, missions, and Bible study. Prof. George A. Coe spoke on "Principles of Training." There was an exhibit of handwork in charge of Miss Jenny B. Merrill.

Dr. Ainslie Criticizes Ku Klux Klan

The Ku Klux Klan leaders try in various cities to secure good-will by visiting churches and leaving contributions. They sometimes visit churches where they have been criticized as in the case of a recent visit to Douglas Park Christian church in Chicago. The mayor of Baltimore recently issued a permit for a public parade of the organization, and Dr. Peter Ainslie of the Christian Temple criticized this action on the following Sunday, saying: "Whatever men may think of Christianity and however improperly it has been presented by its adherents, one thing is certain, it does stand for one God as the loving Father of all mankind, one Saviour as revealed in Jesus Christ, and one brotherhood, irrespective of race or class. These are the things for which Christianity stands. Many of the adherents of Christianity have compromised all three of these stands. We have spent much of our time philosophizing on the first and the second, and left the third to take care of itself. The violation of the third is the heresy of modern times. There never has been in the history of the world such an outburst of hate against races and nations and classes as since the war. It is a war product, but it should be condemned and abandoned. No such actions can wear the livery of Christianity. It is a pure fraud. Our task of these days is to try to remove prejudice between races, nations and classes for the betterment of all mankind. Every soul that loves good is challenged to enter courageously the league of friendship for those of other races and nations and classes. Any other course is folly in these times of a wrecked world."

Over-Churching in Missouri

As fresh surveys are made in different parts of the middle west the serious nature of the church situation becomes ever more apparent. Rev. Earl Starke, of Clarksville, Mo., recently gathered statistics with regard to Pike county, Mo. There are 54 Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist and Disciple churches. The total membership reported is about 6,000 while the adult population served is 16,000. The church strength among the denominations is reported in the following order: Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists and Disciples. The Methodists have a long lead in their per capita giving and the Disciples lead in the number of young people in college. These surveys are being made in different parts of the state under the direction of Rev. Casper C. Garrigues, corresponding secretary of the Missouri Christian Missionary Society.

Mistakes in Church Building to be Avoided

Many church buildings look as much like a fire station as a church, and the scandal of Protestantism in America has been its wasteful and inartistic buildings, particularly in the church structures of the villages. The Home Missions Council hopes to remedy all this by providing guidance for all churches that will accept advice. A booklet has been issued on "The First Steps in Church Planning," in which the churches are urged to study the suggestions and to build accordingly.

Missionary Visits Former Field

One of the strongest propagandists of foreign missions among the Disciples is Dr. Royal J. Dye, who spent a term on the upper Congo years ago, and who has since been in constant demand for missionary institutes in this country.

New Light on Atlanta Prison Work

LESLIE LEE SANDERS of Indianapolis has a lively interest in the work of the "First Christian Church in Prison" organized by Dr. L. O. Bricker at the federal prison at Atlanta. He insists that much false information has been given the world about the inside of a prison and says: "A prison is built with but one purpose in view: to keep safely the men entrusted to the custody of the warden. Permission may be given, and usually is, for any number of outside agencies to reach the men, but the prison itself is not a reform institution and cannot be made such. If you understand the psychology of the convict mind, you will readily understand why. At present my good friend Chaplain J. A. Sewall of the Atlanta prison is handicapped by the fact that he is employed by the government, and is therefore looked upon by the inmates as a part of the official personnel. No official can ever gain the real confidence and the 'confidences' of the convict. There is where your outsider comes in. Atlanta could be improved, but as compared with prison conditions of other days or with other prisons in the United States, the federal institution at Atlanta is a paradise. Eugene Debs' newspaper articles about the prison are utterly false as a whole, and misrepresent life inside in an astounding way. Men can choose to love wrong and do wrong, and no study of prisons is worth a cent which does not start with that basic fact. Christian people let their sympathy run away with them. I laugh as I think of the credulity of some folks, and the ease with which hardened criminals play on the sympathy of the gullible outsiders. The majority of men in prison are accomplished and artistic liars; you cannot afford to believe them on oath. But if the convict who is also a criminal is hopeless, what of the convict who is not and never had been a criminal? The man who went wrong in a moment of mad desperation perhaps, but whose heart is sound at the core? Eugene Debs was one. There are some others. How much is one Jerry McCauley worth to God and the church? What is the value of one O. Henry to the world of literature? The love and compassion and sanity of God's Son are essential requirements for those who would do Christian work within prison walls."

Some friends have sent him back to Africa for a survey of the great changes that have come about since the days of his pioneer service, and a recent cablegram announces his safe arrival. With him went two new missionaries for the field. He will return in the spring to join once more in the educational propaganda of the American field.

Forum in Episcopal Church Fails

For two years past the Church of the Ascension, an Episcopal church of New York, has been holding a forum. Large groups came to the meetings with every sort of political complexion. Because of the radical talks from the floor at the end of each lecture, however, Bishop Burch forbade the forum feature, restricting the meetings to the address of the main speaker. Soon the attendance dwindled and now the announcement comes that the forum has been closed. This incident gives the critics of the church in New York further opportunity to insist that the church is in the control of the conservative elements of society.

Methodist Church Wants to Know Its Neighbors

First Methodist church of Grand Rapids, Mich., is seeking information about its religious neighbors and plans that on successive Sunday evenings preachers from other communions will expound their faith. The first in the series was Dean Charles E. Jackson of the Episcopal church, who asserted that the Episcopal church stood for unity, continuity with the past, the devotional life, and the equality of clergy and laity in church government.

Unitarian Movement for Promotion of Devotions

The Unitarian Laymen's league has helped to bring much new life to the Unitarian movement in this country, and by-products of the society appear continually. Among the new signs of deepened religious interest is the founding of an organization that will promote the devotional spirit in the churches. Rev. Hilary G. Richardson of Yonkers, N. Y., is secretary of the society, and a layman has agreed to finance the first output of literature. The program is thus stated: "Our plan is that as many as wish to do so shall once a week give five minutes to reflection or meditation upon the spiritual principles of our faith and hope. There will perhaps be many who will do much more, who will practice this recollection not weekly but daily, and who will allot to it more than five minutes each time. So much the better; but we fix the slender minimum of five minutes once a week. In order to make this period of spiritual thoughtfulness

Is Liberalism Losing?

The achievements of the past three years are superficially disappointing.
The nations of the world, after a war to end war, are still enmeshed in the toils of the old diplomacy and the pre-war militarism.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

tells you what the liberal mind of England is thinking about the serious problems of today.
Week by week it has an unbiased discussion of international politics, a complete presentation of important general news from every country, and a full book review that keeps the reader posted on the best in current literature.
Given an hour or two of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly will keep a man's knowledge of the world in repair and enable him to be an authority in that subject in which it tells most to be an authority—one's own times.

WHO IS YOUR GOD?

Jew, Catholic, Protestant or whoever you may be, if you approve of the Ten Commandments, your God is Jehovah. For the first Commandment—as the Hebrew text reproduced herewith shows—plainly reads: "I am Jehovah, Thy God."

Exodus XX. 2.

אנכי יהוה אלהיך . . . .

To approve of the principles of the Commandments and disapprove of Jehovah means not only the repudiation of Jehovah, but also of the rest of the Commandments, as well as one's own self. To grasp the significance of Jehovah only; and the general bearing of the first Commandment upon the rest of the Commandments, let any American citizen ask himself this: What would be the consequences if we should agree to maintain the same form of government as we are having now, but, instead of Americanism, call it Bolshevism?

WHAT IS YOUR IDEAL?

Free thinker, Socialist, Anarchist or whoever you may be, if common sense and common decency prompt you to approve of such fundamentals as "Honor thy father and thy mother," "Thou shalt not steal," etc., your prime ideal is Jehovah. For all the Commandments bear the stamp Jehovah as shown above. Whether Jehovah is God, Creator and Ruler of the universe, or the ideal embracing the principles of "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not bear false witness," etc., every individual is at liberty to determine for himself or herself. Like any other ideal, one cannot claim approval of its principles and disapproval of the ideal itself.

Americanism—The Religion

Since no one—who is opposed to such principles as "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not commit adultery," etc.—can claim to be worthy of being an American citizen, it is obvious that the principles of the Decalogue not only coincide with the principles of Americanism, but are wholly dependent upon each other; the principles of the former giving man the right to be called civilized, and the principles of the latter giving man the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Therefore, to eliminate both the religious and scientific fanaticisms and to safeguard the liberties as they were implanted in the constitution and Declaration of Independence, mankind should recognize that Jehovah is the God (or ideal), Americanism the religion.

more fruitful, we shall from time to time issue and distribute to such as shall have given their names to the secretary, small booklets of meditations. Catholic Musician Loses Faith

While the Catholic press continues to jubilate over the conversion of Chesterton to the Catholic faith, they publish an announcement that the most eminent Catholic musician of Italy has lost his mind. The Quarterly Review tells another story: "The Vatican-inspired press has been announcing that Don Lorenzo Perosi, the most distinguished church musician that Italian Catholicism has produced in our time, has gone mad. Whereas the truth is that this eminent man, after passing through a period of much mental and spiritual agony, intimated a desire to join the Waldensian church, a mad thing only from the papal point of view. With great wisdom and restraint the leaders of that church have shown no undue haste in receiving so notable a convert, but the fact remains that Perosi has lost faith in the Roman doctrines, and has set his face toward the light of the evangel, surely a very significant circumstance that cannot be explained away after the manner of Festus."

Teacher Keeps in Touch with Former Students

For many years a remarkable work, known as the Upper Room Bible classes, has been going forward under the direction of Prof. Thomas M. Iden of Ann Arbor, Mich. At first it was confined to a small group of students at Butler college, where the professor first taught. As the students went out from the college, their relations to their leader were

AN OPPORTUNITY TO HELP
TWO WORTHY ALABAMA SCHOOLS

DOWNING INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL
Brewton, Alabama.

This school, established in 1906, had that year an enrollment of 9; a faculty of 2; a property valuation of $4,000: and 1 building. Now the school has an enrollment of 185; a faculty of 16; 7 buildings, and a property valuation of $175,000.

This school was established to provide an education and Christian training to poor girls who, without this school, would grow up in ignorance. We need help. Work on a badly needed dormitory has been suspended for lack of funds. You can establish scholarships at this school, and lift poor girls from ignorance to light, and fit them for efficient service. Will you help?

COLEY-BLACKSHER VOCATIONAL SCHOOL BOR BOYS
Hadley, Alabama.

This school was established one year ago. We have been given 2,124 acres of land, but have only one dormitory and one small school room.

There are probably 1500 Indians in this community without church or school facilities; also a community of Negroes without adequate school opportunities. It is our purpose to try to provide an opportunity for all these. Our people have been generous, but here is an opportunity for others to help us with their money to build American citizens. Will you help? Address the president.

PAULINE TAYLOR HALL
Donation of Miss Cornelia A. Taylor, of Quaker Hill.

YOUR OPPORTUNITY

If you would immortalize yourself, here is your opportunity. You can provide money to help build, equip and maintain these two schools, which were established for those who without outside help must grow up in ignorance. We give a cordial invitation to our friends in the North and elsewhere to visit us at Brewton. We will entertain you free of charge. O, Friends, will you not hear and heed this Macedonian cry? Easiest Reading Bible

The Bible has never been published in any form in which the reading of it has been made so attractive to both old and young as in the "INTERNATIONAL"

CHRISTIAN WORKERS' BIBLE

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink, running from Genesis to Revelation, binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under the mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere reader are brought to light and tied together.

The Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority in Bible themes, has arranged on this plan Three Thousand Selected Texts.

PROMINENT PEOPLE'S OPINIONS

John Wanamaker: International Christian Workers' Bible is an advance on anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable.

Lyman Abbott: Valuable to Christian workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries.

continued by a series of annual letters. Later on, at the State Normal school at Emporia, Kans., this fine ministry was continued, and the Upper Room company continued to grow, embracing both the local class and the wider circle of its alumni. Still later, Prof. Iden became instructor in biblical literature in the Bible Chair organization at Ann Arbor, and from this center his unifying and inspiring messages have been sent out in printed form month by month to a membership scattered over the world, and numbering many hundreds. The eighth annual volume of the series has just been issued.

Rev. G. A. Gordon Gives Autobographical Lectures

The church committee of Old South Congregational church of Boston requested their minister, Rev. George A. Gordon, last spring to prepare a course of autobiographical lectures, which he has done. His first lecture this fall was on "Education and Religion: What?" and the others are: Nov. 17, "Stock: Education by Inheritance"; Nov. 24, "The Influence of Nature"; Dec. 8, "First Lessons in Metaphysics and Logic"; Dec. 15, "The Scottish Public School Sixty Years Ago"; Dec. 29, "Feudalism and Democracy"; Jan. 5, "Keeping the Sabbath"; Jan. 12, "Pre-Moral Religion: Athletics"; Jan. 19, "The Discipline of Immigration"; Jan. 26, "The Use of Spare Hours"; Feb. 2, "My First Parish"; Feb. 9, "College and Great Experiences"; March 30, Good Friday, "Education Under the Master of Religion."

Federal Council Aids Philanthropy Drives

The Red Cross drive, which is nationwide during November, is being ably supported by the Federal Council of Churches. More and more the great philanthropies turn to the church for moral support, if not for contributions. As soon as the Red Cross drive is over the nation will be aroused to its duty in the near east situation. In this good cause once more the Federal Council will render aid.

Detroit Churches Hold Armistice Service

A religious service was held at St. John's Episcopal church in Detroit on Armistice day which symbolized the union of all non-Roman Christians in paying tribute to the dead. Dr. G. G. Atkins, pastor of First Congregational church, and Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of Central Methodist church, were the speakers. Dr. S. D. Gordon began a two week's ministry with the cooperating churches of Detroit on Nov. 13. He announces some rather startling topics, among them being "The Biography of the Devil in Seven Chapters," and "There Is Someone at Your Side You Do Not Know."

Dr. Speer Wants Right Motives in Giving

The various denominations of Christians cooperating in the Federal Council of Churches brought together the leaders of their promotional agencies in Columbus, O., during the first week in November to consider the various methods to be used in such work. Bishop Nicholson spoke on the culmination of the recent campaign for a fund of two million dollars in the Methodist Episcopal church with which to meet the decrease in receipts from the centenary fund. Dr. Speer sounded a note of warning in these words: "The forward movements of promotional organizations must unite, not separate, the financial and the spiritual ideals. Financial support for the church is not simply a business proposition to be handled mechanically through schemes of budgets and apportionments; if it is to be permanently sustained at a high level, it has to rest back on a deep spiritual foundation. We must be on our guard constantly to see that the right motives are appealed to. To appeal for support for the church on the ground that religion helps business, or for missions on the ground that trade and security follow the work of the missionary, is subtly to undermine the real power of the Christian religion."

World Sunday School Association Issues Call

At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the World's Sunday School association, Mr. W. C. Pearce, associate general secretary, made a report of his world tour, in which he said that racial bitterness exists in many parts of the world, but he finds hope in the "spiritual league of nations" which binds the Sunday school world together. The organization supplies wall pictures to the missionaries and there is urgent need of a fresh supply of these, particularly those that would aid in the study of the life of Christ. Mr. Arthur M. Harris was elected chairman of the committee.

The Fundamentals of Christianity

By HENRY C. VEDDER

Professor of Church History, Crozer Theological Seminary.

The answer in detail that this book attempts to give to the question "What is Christianity?" is based upon three convictions: (1) that man's apprehension of the character of God has not stood still but has grown with his growth (2) that the highest forms of this progressive knowledge of God are found in the Old and New Testament literature and culminate in the words of Jesus as preserved in the Gospels (3) that the teaching of Jesus is, therefore, the standard by which all other teaching claiming to be Christian must be compared and, in case of conflict, rejected. It is the main object of this book to convince its readers that the parting of the ways has been reached with the Historical Christianity based on Paul as its authority which still has such wide vogue and that the future belongs to a Christianity that will determine its doctrines, program and methods on the authority of Jesus alone.

A Wonderful Story—Simply Told

THE OUTLINE OF SCIENCE

Edited by J. Arthur Thomson
English Scientist and Author

HERE is the supreme publishing achievement of the year. In one logical flowing story it tells you of the progress in all the fields of science since the world began. It reduces the whole subject to terms so simple that the layman can clearly understand. It covers this vast amount of material completely and authoritatively—yet so concisely that it can be contained in four volumes. It gives you a collection of nearly 1,000 accurate and graphic pictures illustrating the text clearly. Of fascinating interest and profound educational value to every man, woman and child.

This great work does for science what H. G. Wells' "Outline of History" does for history—and the Thomson books are much more attractive both as to contents and make-up than Wells'. These four volumes will give a better all-around view of modern science than a hundred volumes on the specific sciences. The remarkably fine illustrations in themselves almost tell the story.

COMPLETE IN FOUR VOLUMES.

Price, $4.50 per volume, plus 15 cents postage.

A Suggestion: Send $4.65 (including postage) for the first volume; after seeing this, you will at once order the entire set.

If you wish the four volumes mailed to you now, send $5.00 with your order and you may have sixty days to pay the balance.

TEN NEW BOOKS ON JESUS

The most significant fact with regard to the new religious books of the year 1922-23 is the great number of volumes treating of the personality, life and work of Jesus. The publishers have felt the pulse of the serious reading public and the publication of these books is a result of that fact. The world was never so perplexed intellectually and spiritually as today. And men are wistfully turning, as never before—and more hopefully than ever before—to the "Lord of Thought" and of the Heart. Nothing could so enrich the fruitage of this new year than for ten thousand ministers to delve deeply into these new revealings of "The Life of Lives."

THE FINALITY OF CHRIST

By W. E. Orchard

The fame of the pastor of King's Weigh House (Congregational) church, London, long ago reached America. This volume of his sermons will be welcomed by students of present-day tendencies in Christian thinking. The Christian World says: "We commend this book to everyone who loves great preaching and fearless independence. ($1.35).

RABBONI: A Study of Jesus Christ, the Teacher

By Canon Anthony C. Deane

"This is a gracious and wise book, showing how to go to school to the Master Teacher. I do not remember to have seen a better study of Jesus the Teacher, alike in atmosphere and suggestion." (Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, D.D.) ($2.00).

THE PROPOSAL OF JESUS

By John A. Hutton

Although published last year, this work bids fair to be a book in continuous demand. It is an unusual book, striking out a new line. What Christ's teaching involved for the wide world, in whatever phase of its life, Dr. Hutton describes in detail. Master of a word style, the author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous, but awe-inspiring, as his interpretation unfolds. Jesus is presented, not as the founder of a sect, but "to inaugurate a world-state-of-matters, having as its ultimate motive and principle God." This book, if followed, would bring light into this present social and industrial night in which men now find themselves. ($1.50).

JESUS AND LIFE

By Joseph McFadyen

The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, holds that it is a "matter of life or death to the world" that men be christianized in all their various relations. ($2.00).

TOWARD THE UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS

By V. G. Simkhovitch

"The teachings of Christ are an historical event. Let us try to understand them historically. Without an historical understanding we have before us not teachings but texts. There is hardly a text in the four gospels that is not apparently conflicting with other texts. Yet an insight is won when the teachings of Jesus are viewed and understood historically." Thus Dr. Simkhovitch, who is professor of economics at Columbia University, takes up his survey of the background of the teachings of Jesus. Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri, writes that this is the best book he has found covering this phase of Jesus' work. ($1.75).

JESUS CHRIST AND THE WORLD TODAY

By Grace Hutchins and Anna Rochester

"A remarkable piece of work," says Norman Thomas, editor of "The Nation," in commenting upon this new book. He adds: "I have never seen a series of studies dealing with modern social applications of the teachings of Jesus which seemed to me so frank, thoroughgoing and suggestive. If Christianity is to have any positive influence in the making of a new age, it will have to be the sort of Christianity which this book expounds so well." ($1.25).

CHRIST AND INTERNATIONAL LIFE

By Edith Picton-Turbervill (With Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil)

The author's theme is—as phrased and accepted by Lord Robert Cecil—that "our national policy, both internal and external, must be Christianized; that, in other words, Christian morality must in its essence be the guide of our national conduct." It is a thesis that has often been urged by divines and others; the author's eloquent pages vindicate it with much independence and from new angles. Miss Picton-Turbervill is known the world over for her work with the W. C. T. U. and the Y. W. C. A. ($1.50).

THE MEANING OF THE CROSS

By Edward Grubb

The author of this book is already well known for his other books, among them "The Religion of Experience." Dr. Grubb adapts the older doctrine of the atonement to modern thought—to scientific psychology, to Ritschl's insistence on a solution that is social; and comprising in the conception of Atonement the revelation of the character of God, our identification with His will, deliverence from sin rather than from punishment, and salvation by God's gift of love.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST

By William Temple, Bishop of Manchester

"Just what many people, both young students and older persons who are desirous of thinking clearly on religious topics, are looking for."—Manchester Guardian. ($1.25).

THE CREATIVE CHRIST

By Edward S. Drown

How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the state, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members? Dr. Drown, who is a well known professor of Cambridge, Mass., holds that the answer to all these questions will be arrived at through the acceptance in deed and truth of the teachings of the "Creative Christ." ($1.50).

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. A Household Treasure

With this set of books in your home you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes. Why be content with the commonplace when you can become familiar with Socrates and Caesar and Napoleon and Cromwell and Washington and Columbus and Lincoln? Get this History of the World and begin reading it. Read it for the joy it will give you; read it for the good it will do you; read it for the inspiration that will lead you toward better things.

Six Thousand Years of History

The Pyramids of Egypt had looked down—old and still—for hundreds of years on the activities of man at the time when the Children of Israel passed through Egypt across the Red Sea—and even before that distant period begins the story of mankind. Before the separation of races, before the Assyrians were, before the gods of China, before Jerusalem was thought of—far back—begins the story; finding for you the first glimmer of light on the blackness of unknown and uncounted ages. And so this story of man, from the far beginnings through the classic ages, down through the dark centuries when all Europe stopped for six hundred years in ignorance and despair—through the Middle Ages gay enough with chivalry—is brought down to the recent World War. The work covers every race, every nation, every time. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring has ever been written.

CAN IT BE DOUBLE

A Big but Hopeful Undertaking

FOR the past three years The Christian Century set out each year to double its subscription list. We did not quite reach the goal in either of the first two years, but did succeed in the third year. With our present enlarged subscription list we have not dared think or talk so glibly about doubling yet again in the season of 1922-23. Our faith has been hardly equal to so ambitious a project. But events are rebuking us. The months of September, October and November have made such a fine beginning — such a startlingly fine beginning — that the conviction of the possibility of doubling our subscription list yet once more has now something more than faith and hope to rest upon.

¶ As usual, we take our readers into our confidence in this endeavor, and for the very good reason that it has always been, is now, and ever must be the regular readers of The Christian Century upon whom we depend for every advance made in our circulation. We have no paid agents in the field. Nine-tenths of the new subscriptions we receive come through the voluntary activities of our readers. If we can have a bit of co-operation from every present subscriber we are now certain that the prodigious feat of doubling again can be performed. We believe we can count upon such cooperation. During the next few weeks we expect the subscription department to be taxed to its enlarged capacity in handling the flood of new subscriptions which our present readers will send into our office.

Prejudice Changed to Cooperation

SIR: When I first subscribed for The Christian Century, at the suggestion of my good friend, Rev. George Plews, I was very much prejudiced against it. I believed that it was the official mouthpiece of modernism and that its editors were trying to destroy the foundations of Christianity. After reading it regularly for the past two months, I have so completely changed my opinion regarding it that I have on three different occasions recommended it to my parishioners from the pulpit. Of course I disagree with some of the things you write—but that is just why I am so enthusiastic about the paper. If I agreed with every article published in The Christian Century, it would be of no real help to me.

The articles by Dr. Douglas now being published are alone worth the price of a year's subscription, They have already helped me in solving some of my pastoral problems. Believe me when I say that I consider The Christian Century the best religious journal that comes to my study. More power to you.

The Editors' Part

AND what can we expect our editors to do? The answer to that is something like Sir Christopher Wren's monument—"Look around you!" The pages of The Christian Century speak for themselves. Yet the editors promise for the year ahead the most attractive feast that has ever been spread in the whole range of religious journalism. The dominant note of the new year will be the inculcation and interpretation of the spiritual life. Subjects like these: "Piety and Culture," "Science and Mysticism," "Prayer and Law," will bulk large in the program. Dr. Newton and Dr. Hough—the latter recently having become a member of the editorial staff—will join with the editors in attempting a reinterpretation of the life of piety in an age whose ruling passions are science and social salvation.

¶ The social essence of the Christian task will continue to be interpreted by great articles of original and illuminating insight, such as, to name but a single example, the two articles by Samuel McCrea Cavert, which appeared in the past two issues. Persistently will The Christian Century work away at the business of interpreting the mind of Christ to all aspects of modern life.

¶ Persistently, too, will our editors keep before us the vital question: Is the church as we now have it a competent organ of religion as we now conceive it? This is no casual inquiry to be settled in a single article. It is a sort of symphonic motif that our readers feel recurring again and again in the unfolding of the editorial program.

¶ But how better can the editors tell their part in the all around cooperative effort to double the subscription list than merely to set down a few of the names of notable contributors of past and future. Call your friends' attention to this list of

Clemenceau and the American Mood

CLEMENCEAU'S speeches are falling as flat and futile upon American ears as did the impassioned plea of Premier Briand, delivered at the Washington conference a year ago. This is not because America's heart is hard, or its purposes self-centered. The heart of America would ordinarily be particularly susceptible to the appeal of such a dramatic situation as the aged "Tiger's" personal presence amongst us has produced. But M. Clemenceau will learn before he returns to France that this same American heart has been sadly disillusioned since the war. And he will learn that it was his own hand more than any other cause that broke the spell of romantic camaraderie under which the youth of America leaped to answer the mystic call of Lafayette with their resounding "We are here!" As the matter now stands the people of the United States are not now so sure that Germany is the sum of all villainies and that the patriotism of France is unmixed with imperialistic motives as they were in 1917. Having exorcised the militaristic demons from Prussia it comforts us not at all to see the same demon finding a habitation in the body of France. Of course France is menaced by Germany, and of course, on the basis of the kind of "peace" made at Versailles she will continue to live in fear of attack unless England and the United States can be put at her back in a triple entente. But to this neither the diplomacy nor the conscience of the United States will ever consent. An impossible treaty, dictated chiefly by M. Clemenceau himself, underlies his nation's perturbation. Even if the allies had "gone to Berlin" instead of accepting the terms of the armistice, as M. Clemenceau now seems to wish they had done, nothing would have been gained. The victory was as complete on November 11, 1918, as it could have been made by marching to the capital. The peace terms were dictated terms. They were not defined in conference between victor and vanquished. The treaty looked to the past and sought punishment, when it should have looked to the future and sought reconciliation. There is only one way by which France may reasonably hope to remove the menace of Germany, and that is to sit down with Germany mutually to consider the question: What is the just and reasonable basis upon which this ancient feud between our respective nations may be brought to an end? This is the course of reason. It is also the highest diplomacy. The fruits of such a settlement would need no navy nor army for their defense. They would endure in the power of their own inherent justice.

Wet Newspapers Herald Misleading Election News

FOR two days after the recent national election there was considerable depression among prohibition advocates, caused by the tidings that a great wet reaction had taken place. Ohio was reported wet on a referendum, as was California. The dry majority in congress was reported whittled down until it was certain that some change would be made in the direction of a "liberalization" of the Volstead law. In many papers which printed all this buncombe there has been no retraction. What is the secret? Wet propaganda. An analysis of the election returns shows that wets re-elected to the house 79 members, and the drys re-elected 224. Wet new members to the house are 54 and the dry new members are 72. The drys also gained three votes in the senate. There will be 133 wet congressmen and 296 dry in the new lower house. This hardly looks like a change in the law in favor of the wets. The states of Ohio and California went dry on a state referendum. Illinois and New Jersey, formerly wet states, showed a wet preference on a referendum vote, though in Illinois the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance organizations urged the temperance people not to vote on the referendum. It is said that nowhere in the length and breadth of the land was a dry Democrat defeated. This is held to be the test in a year when the Democrats had the best of things. Some remarkable gains were made for the dry cause in Chicago where a large part of the county ticket went dry, and many dry congressmen and legislators were elected. The next Illinois legislature is dry by a safe majority, and the Anti-Saloon League is demanding a dry speaker for the house. There may be reaction in a few localities, but the gains in others are far more pronounced. The American people are impatient with non-enforcement of the laws and the party or the politician who hopes to ride into power on a wet wave is doomed to a rude awakening.

The Next Step in the Prohibition Movement

WITHOUT weakening their morale for a moment it would seem that the obviously next step for prohibition advocates to take is to secure a congressional investigation of the conditions surrounding the enforcement of the Volstead law. Propaganda mills have been turning out all manner of stories as to non-enforcement. Many of these are false, many are true, but all are bent toward the end of making the law ridiculous in public estimation. The propaganda has not stopped with the wet disappointments in the election. But with congress as dry as ever, with no lapses in any pivotal state or district in the nation, the temperance strategy for the next year should be deliberately to get an authentic official inquiry into and analysis of the facts connected with the enforcement of the law. What a congressional commission's report would finally consist of, sophisticated prohibitionists have no doubt. It would show that vast sums are being spent to break down the law, and it should show the sources of these funds. It would show that large numbers of agents of the enforcement department of the federal government are implicated, either by graft or by wet predilection, in what has become a nation-wide conspiracy to nullify the eighteenth amendment. It would show that the drinking practices of many rich and respectable citizens, often church people, are such as to create resentment in the minds of those less privileged and to weaken popular respect for law. It would disclose the underground technique of bootlegging—wholesale and retail. It would consider the whole problem of the Canadian border, and the three mile limit. These are only a few of the aspects of the situation with which such a congressional inquiry would deal. Nothing but good could come from an official report on conditions which, allowing for enormous exaggerations, everybody knows are scandalous. Before the nation settles down to a complacent acceptance of local option as applied to the eighteenth amendment, as it has settled down to a complacent acceptance of local option as applied to the fifteenth amendment, congress ought to be made to give the country a comprehensive report of conditions so that the nation may act with intelligence and purpose.

When the Church Fell Down

THE humilation of a church sensitive to its social responsibility would be complete in the state of Colorado if there were in that state any such a church. The election of William E. Sweet as governor against the opposition of almost a united Christian pulpit in the city of Denver and throughout the state, will bring a sense of disillusionment to many churchmen who have been imagining of late that the church was reaching a point where it was willing to set aside considerations of bourgeois respectability in favor of a policy of facing social realities. If any Christian man in the state of Colorado had grounds on which to expect the fighting support of Christian leadership in his campaign it was Mr. Sweet. A prominent and devout churchman himself; an active and generous leader in the local Y. M. C. A.; a former chairman of the international committee of the "Y" and the president of its great national convention held three years ago in Detroit; a lover of all the recognized causes of institutional Christianity and a generous supporter of them, he nevertheless won his election in the teeth of vehement opposition from the Christian pulpit. Mr. Sweet made a campaign dealing with the actual economic issues that had arisen in the state—the expulsion of William Z. Foster from Colorado, the right of free speech, a living wage as the minimum wage for labor, the proposal of a system of cooperative marketing, the proposal of a plan of state storage for farmers, the excessive and illegal activities of the rangers and the state constabulary—with these all he dealt in the spirit and according to the principles of Christian justice. Declaring that he had "no reason under the sun to want to be elected governor except to help to bring to the common people some of the better things of life," he was called by the pulpit, as well as by republican organs, a bolshevist, a socialist and an anarchist. His election is a fact full of promise for the people of Colorado, but a moral embarrassment to the church that failed to see the Christian significance of his candidacy.

Some Novels from Across the Sea

WITHOUT doubt, intellectual internationalism has been advanced by the world war. Americans take more interest in the doings of their neighbors across the sea. Book stores are displaying not only the American novels but also translations of the writings of other peoples. One is almost tempted to admit that a better grade of fiction is being produced in Europe than in America. One finds on the fiction tables the translation of Bojer's "The Great Hunger." This great hunger is the hunger for God that arises in the soul of a Norwegian engineer who achieves a great success in his profession, but whose heart is never satisfied. "Hunger" by Hamsun is written by a Swede who was once a Chicago street car conductor. It carries the wholesome message that a boy may achieve any success if he sets his heart upon it. The French writer, Pierre Benoit, has given the world a very realistic picture of life in Utah in the early days of the Mormon invasion. "Salt Lake" has thrills in it a plenty, and a surprise finish. Benoit tries to answer the question, Why did not the women leave the polygamous households? Leila Kaye-Smith of England is a relatively new star in the fiction group but her "Green Apple Harvest" of last year tells the story of rural England with such realism that one can almost smell the turf. The study of morbid religious experience is worthy a permanent place on the shelves of the religious man. "This Freedom" may be melodramatic and quite below the level of "If Winter Comes," but this new book of Hutchinson presents a passionate protest against social movements and attitudes which threaten to destroy the very foundations of the home life of the people. The excessive eroticism of American fiction at this time makes one turn with relief to conceptions of human life which are not hastily rewritten versions of Freud. From our Sinclair Lewis and Henry Kitchell Webster we turn gratefully to a fiction literature which at least tries to see life whole and not through the cynic's eye.

State Federation Performs Essential Work

IT is increasingly evident that the efficiency of the churches of a given territory is greatly increased by some kind of organization that enables them to act with unity in matters which pertain to their common interest. It is this fact which is causing the churches in many cities to form federations, or councils of churches. They discover that there are certain tasks which can only be done with success when done together. The same thing is true in the larger areas like states. Several of them have now learned the art of cooperation in church matters under the direction of state federations. This plan is greatly helping in the economies of administration, and the avoidance both of overlapping and overlooking. The Ohio Church Federation is an instance of this new type of church efficiency. Under its auspices and through the leadership of its secretary, Rev. B. F. Lamb of Columbus, a survey has been made of church conditions in the different counties, and the denominational agencies have been led to more careful inspection of the neglect of some districts and the overchurching of others. Particularly is this true in the case of rural churches. It is clear that the adjustment of the vexing problem of the rural church is coming nearer to solution under the direction of state federations of churches than in any other manner. It is also evident hat Christian sentiment can be organized in behalf of important causes more effectively through cooperative effort han in any other way. The vote on the prohibition issue n Ohio as contrasted with some other states is an instance n point. The church is the mightiest force for good in ny community, large or small. And in order to exert its ull measure of power it must learn the art of cooperation mong the denominations that are capable of working ogether. The council of churches or church federations eems to be the best present instrument for the attainment of the common ends which Protestantism seeks. The increase in the number of state federations,, as well as those of cities and towns, is significant and encouraging.

Fight on Child Labor Still on

RHODE ISLAND this very year defeated a bill providing for an eight hour day for factory children. The reactionary attitude on child labor legislation is not confined to the south. At the present time eight and one half per cent of the children under fifteen in the United States are engaged in gainful occupations. It is still legal in many states for children to act as street venders at the tender age of ten years. North Carolina permits boys of twelve years of age to work 11 hours a day during the vacation period in factories. New Hampshire permits children under sixteen to work 10¼ hours a day, and in Michigan children under fifteen can work 10 hours a day. In Minnesota and Michigan a child of any age can work in a quarry and are allowed in coal mines at 14. Nevertheless the conditions in the past twenty years have made vast improvement. Two bills have gone through congress to limit child labor in the United States, only to be declared unconstitutional. Now a bill has been introduced by Senator Medill McCormick which seeks to amend the constitution of the United States in such a way as to permit child labor legislation. This does not represent the last word in the great reform for even with good national laws there will still be special problems that must be dealt with by the state legislatures. Against the new legislation the whole breed of labor exploiters will fight. Those men for whom dollars are more important than human life will leave no stone unturned to defeat legislation which would affect their profits. The churches have professed a belief in a "social creed" but have never done very much about it. There is a wide-spread difference of opinion on unionism. Is not the cause of the children in industry the most likely and most obvious place for the church earnestly to undertake to better conditions?

Conferences on Christian Unity

IN various parts of the country church leaders are meeting to study the problem of closer fellowship and common work among the churches. The long history of efforts to unify the church of God is of interest, both as showing the causes of division and the need and practicability of closer union. Jesus prayed that his people might be one, and the implication of his prayer is that the world will never take him seriously as long as his friends exhibit the spectacle of division. Paul hoped for the time when the church might come in the unity of the faith and knowledge of Jesus to maturity of stature, by which he meant that we shall never grow up until we learn the art of unity. All conferences among Christian people looking to this end are therefore greatly worth while. During the past week such a gathering was held in Lincoln, Nebraska, under the joint auspices of the city Federation of Churches and the Ministerial Association. The Christian leaders of the entire region were invited, and the attendance was representative and encouraging. The sessions were held during two days. A year ago Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore conducted a similar conference there, and this one was carried on in the same spirit of inquiry and good will. The speakers from outside were Bishop Kephart, President Wells of Grand Island College, and Dr. Herbert L. Willett of Chicago. Statements were made by denominational representatives regarding the contributions of their respective bodies to Christian unity, and there was full and informing discussion of the various themes presented. Rev. F. W. Ainslie of the Tabernacle Baptist church was the efficient organizer of the meeting. A continuation committee was chosen to provide for future conferences of like character, and to consider the wisdom of still more definite steps in the direction of cooperative work. Such conferences are of incalculable value as disclosures of the actual measure of unity prevailing among the Protestant churches, and the possibilities of more effective cooperation both in local and state areas.

The Buckner Incident

REFERENCE was made last week to the case of Rev. J. D. M. Buckner who was placed, against his protest, on the retired list by the Nebraska Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at its September meeting. A great deal of publicity has been given the matter, far more than it merits. The Christian Century is not interested in adding to this volume of comment on the case because of the importance of the episode, but believes that certain phases of the discussion have significance far beyond the immediate events that have occupied so much space in the public prints.

The facts hardly need rehearsal here. In brief they include the ministerial career of Mr. Buckner for forty years in the Methodist Church, and for the past eleven years in the parish at Aurora, Nebraska. During this period he has regarded himself as a pronounced liberal in matters relating to biblical criticism and theological discussion, and has spoken fearlessly and frequently on such subjects in his own pulpit and through the press. Fundamentally he probably does not differ greatly from a large proportion of the Methodist ministry who have had the advantages of seminary training. But he has made himself the target of unfavorable comment by the pointed and somewhat crude manner in which he has exploited his opinions.

This became a cause of irritation in the administrative work of the Methodist Church in the Nebraska Conference. The bishop and his colleagues did not wish a heresy trial, which was manifestly desired by Mr. Buckner. They voted therefore, on a very questionable interpretation of the discipline, to retire him from the active ministry, in spite of the facts that he protested such action, that he was still mentally and physically competent to carry on his work, and that a request had been made by his church that he be returned to them. Thereupon Mr. Buckner and his friends have taken the case to the press, where it has had various types of interpretation during the past fortnight.

The entire incident is regrettable. The issues are not clear, and little of value can emerge from any prolonged discussion. Authorities in the Methodist church are divided over the propriety of the action taken by the bishop and the conference. It is affirmed by one group that the rule invoked as basis for the retirement decision does not apply in cases of this nature. It would appear that the recommendation which was adopted was the easiest way to dispose of a troublesome situation, and that less care was taken to comply both with the justice and the technique of the case than was proper. The matter is subject to review in the church courts and in the General Conference, and if an appeal is made there are competent authorities in the Methodist church to dispose of the matter entirely upon its merits.

But the phase of the incident which has value for more general consideration relates to the right of a minister to preach his convictions unhampered by eccleciastical supervision. The "liberty of prophesying" has been much discussed and largely vindicated in recent years. If the case of Mr. Buckner were a little clearer, and it could be shown without doubt that he was the innocent and unfortunate victim of official persecution, there would be every justification for the most thoroughgoing and unequivocal defense of his liberty. It is too late in the Christian era for any small and partisan espionage upon the ministry and utterances of men who are constructive in their spirit and modern in their point of view. The ridiculous figures presented by men who set themselves to be orthodox watchmen on the walls of Zion need no condemnation beyond that accorded them by an intelligent and open minded public. The day of the successful heretic detector is past. The spirit of the age as well as the growing desire of the church for a liberal and leaderlike ministry can be trusted to demand for every true prophet of righteousness the full freedom of his holy mission.

The efforts to expel from pulpits, mission fields and colleges, men of high character and sound learning because they fail to meet the narrow tests of doctrinal censors are increasingly futile. Even the reactionary state of mind that has been the natural aftermath of the war, in business, politics and religion has not served the purpose fondly anticipated by fundamentalists, literalists, millenarians and other keepers of ancient tradition in the church. One after another the religious bodies of America are serving notice on these disturbers of the peace that their vocation is fruitless. The dead hand of the past is incompetent to direct the activities of the Church of God in a time of such urgent and vital interest as the present. Christian people are looking eagerly for ministers, missionaries and teachers who have paid the price of educational and social discipline, and are able to see somewhat the direction in which God is moving, and are anxious to get things out of the way. The policy of a skulking conservatism that sacrifices the welfare of the kingdom of God to the pettiness of partisan picketing is increasingly odious and ineffective. The men who are charged with authority in most of the leading denominations are aware of this fact, and are less and less inclined to arouse the resentment of that growing class of Christian people in all the churches who are not afraid of all the facts, and who honor the men who in a constructive and fearless spirit interpret to their generation the truths of the Scriptures and the ideals of the Christ.

But there is another side to the shield which must not be forgotten. The prophet of righteousness needs not only knowledge and courage but sympathy, discretion, tact and some acquaintance with the usual methods of successful teaching. Whatever may be the facts as they shall ultimately come to light in the more careful and detailed examinations that the Methodist church may give to the Buckner case, it does not appear from the presentation of this incident that this particular minister is a very suitable example of the religious liberal fighting against a persecuting ecclesiasticism for the right to be heard. His conduct in the entire procedure hardly merits the approval of those who know the long struggle of liberal opinions in the church to gain a hearing, and have themselves had a part in the process. To all appearances Mr. Buckner shares the ordinary views of modern students of the Bible and of Christian history. There is nothing exciting about his teachings. It is quite a commonplace of Christian thinking that the Old Testament does not disclose an ideal or final state of society or form of ethics. But in the presentation of this thesis this pastor, kindly in spirit and devoted to his parish and his denomination, had the unhappy faculty of pursuing an extremely unpedagogical and irritating method. Whatever may have been the tone of his customary deliverances, those which he has chosen to broadcast as samples of his message are precisely the sort to cause trouble in any community outside the limits of a group of specialists, where they would have been regarded as casual and unnecessary. There is a world of vital and inspiring truth in the Scriptures for the interpretation of which an ordinary ministry is far too short. In the light of that body of truth, both in the Old and the New Testament, the stories of tribal cruelty, low moral ideals and false conceptions of God have their explanations and corrections. But to select a series of these illustrations of the partial and imperfect manners of primitive Hebrew life and exploit them as the teachings of the Bible which must be held up to reprobation in an effort to justify the morality of the gospel is to exhibit a singular ineptness and lack of discretion in the handling of a living message.

These are just the mistakes which a man of sounder scholarship and less love of publicity would have avoided. The entire episode is unfortunate. Mr. Buckner's position is not one that the friends of liberal thinking in the church can champion with conviction and enthusiasm. Some of our contemporaries have appeared to believe it was, and have proceeded to make it an issue. We believe this to be difficult. The instance is not one to justify much emotion on either side. Mr. Buckner has not measurably advanced the cause of religious liberty by his utterances nor by the campaign of publicity based upon them. Another citizen of Nebraska has been doing far more effective work in the interest of modern interpretation of the Bible by his widely advertised attacks upon the doctrine of evolution and present-day biblical scholarship. The half-informed conservative like Mr. Bryan does more to justify the modern views of the Bible and Christianity than any number of such unskillful liberals as Mr. Buckner.

The true spirit of scholarship of the liberal type is not captious, irritating nor self-exploiting. It is humble, sympathetic, constructive, and conscious that new truth can only be taught to average people by strong emphasis upon the great positive features of the gospel, and affirmative but not provocative interpretation of the cruder, obsolete and non-essential elements of the biblical narratives.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

To the Master Poet

THEY do you wrong who paint you, wondrous Man,
A pale ascetic worn with argument
Of God and man, of life, of death, of sin;
A pilgrim here, with thoughts on other spheres.
They do you wrong: for you had eyes and ears
For this our lovely earth, its trees and flowers,
Its fields of corn, its choirs of happy birds;
You thrilled at dawn, rejoiced when spring began.
Thus were you poet. Too, you had your dreams:
That John and Peter, James and Magdalene—
Dark Judas too—should learn to know your God.
You had the faith to hail the Kingdom's gleams
In earth's embattled realm; and still your hope
Is undismayed, though men in darkness grope.

Prayer

I DO not wish to see my sins more plain,
But this: to know Thy life, without a stain.

I would not see the vileness of my heart,
But this would know: how pure and true Thou art.

I would forget my paltry life, so small,
And know Thy greatness, Thou, my All in All.

O teach me not how deep my spirit's night,
But flood me with Thy beams, Thou perfect Light!

Lyric

WHEN gardens die and sunshine fails
  And winds of winter blow,
'Tis time to kindle joyous fires
  And trust their friendly glow
To lead us out, by Sea 'o Dreams,
  Beyond the Sunset Bar—
Then back again, to Port o' Home,
  Where love and laughter are.

The Future of Denominationalism

By Thomas Nicholson

WHAT are popularly known as the denominations have arisen through various causes. Sometimes the reasons have been doctrinal differences; sometimes they have been differences of judgment or ot conviction on great moral issues; sometimes they have arisen through sharp differences of judgment on policies of administration and methods of church government; and in a few cases the deep underlying causes might be summed up in the facts of a clash of dominating personalities.

I.

We may pass by the two major divisions of Protestant and Catholic as arising from well known causes. The movement which resulted in the formation of the Congregational bodies has a long history. From the beginning of the protest against Romanism the ideas of the identity of "bishop" and "presbyter," and the independent right ot each congregation to choose its own pastor and to exercise discipline found decided adherence. There was an urgent demand for a return to the order and practice of the apostolic churches, and a demand for greater simplicity and purer democracy over against the tendencies which finally culminated in the papacy. Gradually the ideals developed until modern Congregationalism came to be ardently devoted to a system of church government which embraced the two fundamental principles, viz:—that every local congregation of believers, united for worship, sacraments, and discipline, is a complete church in itself, and should not be subject in government to any ecclesiastical authority outside of itself; and that all such local churches are in communion with one another and bound to fulfill all the duties involved in such fellowship. How intensely men divide on such subjects is seen in the ungracious, bitter and sarcastic remark of a member of another denomination in the early days of the controversy that "This is not a church. It is a town meeting opened with prayer and closed with the benediction."

The Disciples of Christ were a body of Baptists who formed a distinct ecclesiastical organization in 1827. As far back as 1808, Thomas Campbell migrated from Ireland and became a conscientious advocate of religious reform. He stoutly contended for a restoration of the Christian church to what he considered apostolic practice and precept. Thomas Campbell and his son, Alexander, formed a small association of "disciples" for the special study of the scriptures, with the pledge that, rejecting all creeds and confessions of faith, they would strictly conform their practice to the teachings of the divine word. This was practically the same kind of movement as that by which the Methodist societies were formed by men chiefly within the Anglican church, most of the leaders being "priests" or members of that group. The history of the development of both organizations is most illuminating and instructive.

The great division in the Methodist bodies grew out of the anti-slavery agitation. The Methodist Protestant church opposed the life tenure and the theory of the episcopacy, which the Methodist Episcopal church imbedded in its constitution. While retaining the fundamental doctrine and most of the usages of the larger body they substituted for the bishop a president, elected by the ballot of the body, to rule over each annual conference. This Methodist Protestant church again divided into two bodies over the slavery question. So we might continue with the history of the many denominations into which Protestant Christianity now divides itself. Many men of minds have wrought and freedom of speech and freedom of opinion have produced many curious results.

GREAT DIVISION

There is, in my opinion, no human probability that, if all the denominations were next year to come together in one they would or could remain one for any considerable length of time. Religious freedom is of the essence of Protestantism. Men do not see alike on any set of questions. We are constantly changing and re-forming our political parties, our national organizations and even our plans of city government, as illustrated in the recent adoption of numerous cities of the commission plan of city control. That conflict of ideas and ideals and that trying out of plan after plan seems to be the method of progress in a democratic land of free speech and free thought. It was and it always will be hard to keep a Phillips Brooks and a Cardinal Newman in the same group. Their point of view on the same question was radically different. There is, to my mind, no indication that it was the divine plan that it should be so. Again and again the attempt has been made to hark "back to Christ," or "back to the church of the apostles"; but back to whose Christ? The Christ and his program have always been and must always be interpreted. Just now there is quite a decided difference between the pre-millenialist's Christ and Shailer Mathews' interpretation of Christ. And what of the apostles? Did the Holy Spirit unify them? Read Galatians 2:9-16:

> "When James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision."
> . . . . . .
>
> "But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed."
>
> "For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision."
> "And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation."

COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM

Here is rather radical difference of opinion on both doctrine and policy. The whole church is familiar with the story of the council at Jerusalem as narrated in Acts 15. Can we forget by how narrow a margin the spirit-enlightened apostles escaped failure to set free Christianity for its world wide and its missionary career?

Again read Acts 16:36-40, where Paul and Barnabas differ so sharply that they separate, take different helpers, go on widely separated journeys and achieve widely differing results. The idea that if we had a more spiritual church, a more completely spirit-filled church, we should have a unified church in all ecclesiastical and governmental matters rests on a misapprehension of the method of the work and influence of the Holy Spirit. It will not stand the test of close examination, even in its relation to the workings of the spirit in the early church. In the present dispensation at least, we reach approximate truth through the free conflict of ideas and ideals. We are called, "to prove all things" and to learn "to hold fast that which is good." The history of attempts at ecclesiastical uniformity have not been particularly reassuring in their results. As long as men think sincerely and independently under present conditions and environments we shall have different groupings and different alignments.

II.

What of the practical affectiveness of one mammoth ecclesiastical organization? It would be most unwieldy. One of the greatest defects of the modern Christian church at the present moment is the inability to mobilize its forces. Not long since the pastors of the various Protestant churches in a city of considerable size united for a church canvass of the city. The leader of the group reported that the house to house visitation revealed the fact that there were in that city as many people who had once been members of the churches and had allowed their membership to lapse or go by default, as were enrolled in the active membership of the churches.

Rather careful investigation developed the fact that this indifference was not due to lack of belief in the doctrines of the churches, nor to sympathy with the aims and objects thereof, nor to any open antagonism but rather to the fact that they had been given nothing to do, that no special content had been put into church membership for them and that they had grown tired of simply "going to church" on Sunday morning to be "preached to" for an hour. It was the failure of the church properly to mobilize and use its forces in a large organization. That is probably the outstanding practical weakness of the average church and the average pastor. The larger we make the organization the greater the difficulty. If the more than 25 millions of Protestant Christian communicants in the United States were thrown into one big organization it would be most unwieldy. It would be almost impossible to find men of sufficient calibre to direct its activities or to mobilize its forces. At least we shall have to go a long ways in the development of our methods before such a thing would be possible.

Movements like the Inter-church World Movement show how almost impossible it is to get forces so large and so divergent to work together, even under the influence of the spiritual forces of religion. On the other hand we have a fine illustration of the efficient mobilization of a smaller group in a church like the "United Presbyterian." They have only about 150 thousand members but their record for active work, for large per capita giving for missionary and benevolent enterprises is quite remarkable. Not long since they brought together in the city of Pittsburgh nearly 4,000 of their 150,000 members in a single rally, and a most remarkable group and meeting it was.

ONE GREAT BODY UNDESIRABLE

There would be grave danger in the control of one large, unwieldy body. Experience shows that instead of being free from political methods, religious bodies frequently seem to be peculiarly susceptible to political methods. There are reasons for this which we need not here discuss. The history of the Christian church is illuminating on this point and we need not go outside of the original group of disciples to get some pointers on the subject. To my mind it would be an unspeakable calamity to have the Christian church thrown into one great body which might be manipulated at some time by a few master minds just as certain of our states have been politically manipulated by one or two dominating personalities, or as some of the great corporations have been "managed" in the recent past.

III.

Another great obstacle to one big ecclesiastical organization is to be found on the mission field. Of course we are well aware that at the present time in the foreign fields we have divided territory, spheres of influence, and from three to a half dozen denominations uniting in the support and direction of union colleges. So far as the division of territory is concerned we are in the heartiest sympathy. There is no particular reason why a field occupied by a Presbyterian type of Christianity in China should be invaded by a Methodist type. So far as the union colleges are concerned they are an interesting experiment but they are still an experiment. There will undoubtedly be the development of different types of Christianity in different fields. It is almost unthinkable that China should develop just the same type of Christianity as India, or Africa. There is a Chinese mind and there is an Indian mind. Already questions which are here suggested are engaging the anxious thought of the boards of managers of missionary organizations, and each of the denominations is making a distinct contribution to the study and the solution.

IV.

What is to be the goal?

All earnest Christians must seek to know the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. There is no question in our mind that from this earnest search will come a practical unity on the major fundamentals of Christian teaching. Great progress has been made in this direction. There is now little difference in the gospel message preached from a Methodist, a Presbyterian or a Congregational pulpit. This is in large measure due to the newer methods of Bible study. When theories of verbal inspiration were tenaciously held, and when men believed that the Book of Judges, and the imprecatory Psalms were of the same religious value as The Sermon on the Mount and the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, and when the old "Proof-text Method" was in vogue, you could get almost any sort of result. But the historical method of study, the more rational modern types of biblical interpretation are eliminating some of the ridiculous results of these antiquated methods. We may reasonably look for a certain unity in diversity and for a substantial agreement on the great fundamentals of the program of Jesus Christ. How shall we get it into the minds of the people? The practical problem is the big one.

As we see it, it is not necessary in order to live that we shall fuse all into one, any more than it was necessary in the late war to fuse all nationalities into one. Sherwood Eddy has this remarkable experience narrated in one of his recent lectures:

> As we journeyed across Belgium and France, from Ypres over the Messines and Vimy ridges, through Arras, from Chateau Thierry, Rheims, and the Argonne to Verdun and other parts of the war zone, we passed in turn Americans, Australians, Canadians, South Africans, American Indians, Negroes, Moroccans, Senegalese, Malagasy, Basutos, Chinese, Japanese, Indian Sikhs, Gurkhas, Mahrattas, Portuguese, Belgians, French and British. More than twenty African tribes were represented in France and E. Africa. More than a score of peoples in the islands of the Pacific were drawn upon and the principal countries of Europe were devastated. It was indeed everybody's war.

UNIFICATION OF PURPOSE

What we had and what won the war was the unification of all these divergent elements into one great purpose. Suppose they had waited until all were nationally, socially, governmentally unified! Of course something of that sort was the dream of Alexander, of Napoleon and of the Kaiser and his general staff, but it was a dream and a bad dream at that. Wherever such a thing has been attempted it has sooner or later broken down. What we need is a mobilization of all the great sections of Christ's army, through all the great nations on all the great continents under the unified influence of Christian ideals for the accomplishment of a great purpose, and the purpose is to make the righteousness, the brotherhood, the democracy, the spirit of service, the spirit of love, of sympathy and of helpfulness which are fundamental in the program of Jesus Christ, regent through all the earth.

There must be division of responsibility. There must be elimination of duplicating effort. There must be a response to that first great requirement of Jesus, viz: Sincerity in the search for truth. Nations and organizations must learn to live together in mutual aspiration and mutual helpfulness, as individual men and individual families have learned to live together, in peace, in harmony and in mutual good fellowship. We are not disposed to think that the best interests of society or of democracy would be promoted by throwing all the families in a given city block or in a city ward together in one big family with the elimination of the safeguards of family lines

These various groups and divisions should unite for great moral and national purposes just as these groups around the world united in the defense of themselves against the doctrines of force and of autocracy. In our judgment there is immense advantage in being compelled to unite large groups around a single ideal and for a definite purpose. We have slowly formed such a combination against the liquor traffic and the results have been amazing. We are slowly forming a similar united Christian judgment against the social evil and some of these days organized vice will go the way of the saloon. The impact of a united Protestantism against any given evil is very much greater after the effort to unify the divergent forces against that particular evil. It helps in the mobilization of the various units, and it brings to bear on the problem a great variety of organizations, of temperaments and of methods. The progress of the Protestant churches against the liquor evil under this method has been very much greater than the progress of the Roman Catholic church, with all its unified administration, in its efforts against the same evil.

OPEN-MINDED THINKING

We need to develop the spirit of open-minded thinking and appreciation which probably has never been exemplified in any man more thoroughly than it was in John Wesley. Given the central force of a religious life manifesting itself in devout and beneficent activity and he asked no more. As early as 1742 he wrote:

> The distinguishing marks of a Methodist are not his opinions of any sort, his assenting to this or that scheme of religion, his embracing any particular set of notions, his espousing the judgment of one man or another. All are quite wide of the point. Is thy heart right as my heart is with thine? I ask no further question. If it be, give me thy hand, dost thou love and serve God? It is enough. I give thee the right hand of fellowship.

So far as the present generation is concerned and so far as we can see, at least in the generations immediately following it, we shall have the denominations, for we shall insist on freedom of thought, freedom of opinion, freedom of groupings, freedom of action. These will inevitably result because of the need for the efficiency of discipline, for the efficiency of government, and for the expression of group judgments in something like the present system of denominations; but through it all we must insist on the sincere search for truth and the devotion to the great central, moral, and religious purposes of the gospel. Wherever human thought and human knowledge are sufficiently perfect, we shall then be able to get a fairly unified action of the various groups for specific purposes at specific times. When the united force of the organization is thrown against a great evil, that evil must yield, and we shall have a community of nations instead of an autocracy, an intelligent voluntary unification of independent thinking groups rather than the compulsion of ecclesiastical authority. In our judgment the maintenance of the denominations with their unification for such great and specific objects in some such organization as the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America is the most rational ideal toward which we should work at this time.

An article on Denominationalism, by Joseph Ernest McAfee, representing a different point of view from that of Bishop Nicholson, will appear in a forthcoming issue.

"Earth to Earth"

By Lloyd C. Douglas

OF all the things we ministers do badly, the funeral is the worst. At the point where we should render our highest service, there are we at our weakest. No where else than in the house of bereavement is more expected of us; no where else are we so obviously at a loss to find adequate methods of meeting our opportunities. In her capacity of counsellor to the souls of men, the church admonishes them, in fair weather, that death has lost its sting, and the grave its victory; but when death has actually made an invasion that summons a household to surround an ugly, yellow gash in the cemetery's green sward, the church leads them there with a shy and awkward diffidence, and mocks their grief with the sonorous recitation of cold formalities.

In his brilliant essay on "Death," Maurice Maeterlinck remarks that a man "returning to us from another century would recognize nothing with which he had had to do except the figure of death." This he would find "almost untouched; rough-drawn as it was by our fathers, thousands of years ago. Our intelligence, grown so bold and active, has not worked upon this figure; has added no single touch to it." I do not find myself in complete agreement with this statement. In the course of my own lifetime have I witnessed a marked change in the attitude of most people in regard to losses sustained by the death of their loved ones. Whatever may be presumed to account for the fact that the majority of our people today face their bereavement with more apparent control than so recently as a quarter century ago, it is a fact. I can distinctly remember when a violent emotional storm, at a funeral, was not the exception but the rule. Only rarely does one witness such painful scenes, at this hour. Doubtless the method of conducting the last rites for the departed may account for this present state of affairs, just as the old process might explain that which preceded. But if the modern procedure at funerals has anything to do with the change indicated above, it is to be doubted if the improvement is to be credited to our profession. The undertakers are entitled to the praise.

OLD TIME FUNERAL

When, as a lad, I used to drive our "old Florrie" for my father on his trips into little nearby towns and in the country to conduct funeral services, there was stamped upon my plastic boy-mind certain harrowing sights and sounds which haunt me yet. From the "brief service at the house," where the barnyard and roadsides would be crowded with all manner of vehicles, on through the hour-and-a-quarter preaching service at the tiny church—concluding with the "viewing of the remains"—to the heart-breaking event in the little graveyard, hard by, where everybody stayed until the last lump of raw dirt had been patted into place by the deft shovels of the neighbors, the whole transaction was customarily attended by such demonstrations of the utter breakdown of all emotional discipline that I dread to recall it even now when almost all the other pictures of the same date, in my mental gallery, have faded into an indistinguishable blur.

The choir was always on duty and in full blast. Not always was the choir to be depended upon for one hundred per cent attendance and zealous service on the first day of the week; but none of them had oxen to prove, real estate to appraise, or honeymoons to telescope, when there was a funeral, though that event should but mark the hasty departure of a week-old infant. And at no time did they sing so lustily, or so many verses. Not infrequently there would be a solo; and while I do not presume to pose as a musical critic, my recollection is that the solos were pretty awful.

I recall that my father often deplored the necessity laid upon him to deliver the intimate biographical sketch which was, at that time, exacted of the minister, but he complied with the demand; and, having essayed to do the thing, he did it well—as was his wont. It goes without saying that these affectionate little word-portraits of the deceased did not have the effect of calming the emotions of people already hysterical over the abandoned screech of the choir, and the public display they were forced to make of their grief.

FROM THE CHURCH

When I entered the ministry, twenty years ago, practically all funerals were held "from the church." Why "from" the church I don't believe anybody ever told me. If any of my seniors knows the answer, I shall gladly pay the freight on it. There was music, too; and a sermon. There was also the long, dreadful tramp, tramp, tramp, of the reviewers, who are marshalled down the aisles to take their last (and, in many instances, their first) look at the face now statuesque in the ubiquitous dignity of death. The mourners occupied the front row of pews, and a large "Morris" chair was usually brought up for the occupancy of the next of kin. The final leave-taking of the family was always a public function; and to say that the whole business, first to last, was distressing in the extreme, is not to say anything at all about it. One's heart simply ached for this pitiful little group, huddled together about the casket, weeping desperately over their precious clay, before the curious eyes of half the town.

I am not trying to convey the impression that the community was exceptionally morbid or unsympathetic, for that would be far from the truth. They were just as sorry as could be. Most of them had, at some time, been through it; and the rest of them would go through it, in due course. The situation was responsible to a prevailing custom which nobody had the courage to defy. The funeral had to be held "from the church." The casket had to be opened. Everybody had to go down the aisle and look. Not to look was a discourtesy to the family. And the bereaved had to go through the terrible experience of making a public exhibition of their sorrow. It was all in the books of destiny for the inhabitants of the place at that time. Occasionally some one broke the rules, and held the service at the home. More rarely, it was announced that the funeral would be private. Once in a blue moon, the casket was left closed, and nobody was asked to gaze upon the still face of the departed; but it was an unpopular thing to do, and invited whispered conjectures.

When I was a little boy the big pile of dirt beside the grave was held back by an ingenious device made of fence-rails. During the committal service, great shovelfuls of clods went spattering and bouncing upon the pine rough-box lid—one for "earth to earth," and for "ashes to ashes," and one for "dust to dust." I used to think that this was the very worst thing they did in the whole horrible enterprise. Then came the benediction, preceded by the announcement that all were invited back to the family residence for "refreshments." Perhaps some of you youngsters in the profession think this is an unnecessary strain upon your credulity. You can take it from me that the matter I have just mentioned was the rule, in those days, not more than one hundred miles from the place where The Christian Century is published. And their hospitality was questionable who failed to request that this announcement be made at the grave of their departed. Moreover, the neighborhood took the invitation seriously and went back to the house, in large numbers, where the kindly wives of nearby homes had been cooking for the past twenty-four hours to be fortified against the siege of sympathizers. It was all well meant, but terrible. Custom had enslaved them. They could not do otherwise.

After the benediction, the shovellers renewed their work with a vim. Often I saw the shovellers in action, at other times, in the normal pursuits of husbandry; but they were never quite so efficient. The thing to do, it seemed, was to get it all over with as rapidly as possible, once they had set themselves to it; and I dare say almost anybody would feel the same way about it. So, they shovelled the dirt all in, and moulded it and pounded it into the conventional size and shape, while every one waited until the task was complete, and the little pine stick—coffin-shaped—had been thrust into the clay at the head of the grave. To have turned away before the whole of this grisly work was done would have been most unfeeling.

AT THE GRAVE

At the first funeral I conducted, we had the shovelfuls of dirt thrown in during the committal service. Then we all went away and the sexton finished his job later. That was a decided improvement. Presently came a custom which was gaining favor all over the country—tossing flowers into the grave, instead of dirt, at the time of the committal service. This was still better. It was not long until somebody had invented a contraption that lowered the casket by tension. Previously, the pallbearers had done it with long straps. (They used to take the lines off the hearse-horses for that purpose, when I was a lad.) This new device was a bit more refined. In its early stage, the machine did not always perform well, albeit the idea back of it was excellent. I have seen them refuse to operate, requiring the undertaker to summon his help and revert to the old way. And once I saw one let go—but there seems no reason why I should say any more about that.

A few years ago, undertakers began to practice the custom of lowering the casket only to the level of the ground. That was much better. The big pile of yellow dirt was covered with canvass and flowers, or carted away. Still better. What I am trying to say, in this deplorably dismal essay, is that we are gradually backing away from the grave and making that incident in the event of mortality slightly less terrible than it used to be. But whatever credit may be assigned because of the improvement, the undertakers deserve it all. We preachers have offered no contribution to the apparent desire of the public to obscure, so far as is humanly possible, the "dirt concept." The undertakers have covered up the clay with flowers and have contrived to order the details of the service so that the bereaved are shielded from the ruder shocks and cruelest sights pertaining thereunto. But we preachers—most of us—still gloomily recite, as of yore, "Man that is born of woman is of few days—full of trouble—cometh forth as a flower—cut down—fleeth also as a shadow—continueth not—etc. Earth to earth; ashes to ashes, dust to dust." Still pounding away on the "dirt concept!" Still mouthing that meaningless old sentence, "Though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God"—a remark we take back, however, when we call attention to Paul's statement "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God"—so there is no actual harm done—but O, how futile!

MORTALITY AND IMMORTALITY

Before I have done with the ghastly part of this article, let me predict that the undertakers will continue to draw the public, gently, back farther and farther from the grave, until that fearsome thing will no longer figure, at all, in the last rites. Not long ago, I conducted a funeral service in the late afternoon, attended only by the invited friends of the family. After the service, everybody went home. The family took leave of their dead in private. At nine o'clock that evening the undertaker, a half dozen men friends of the family, and the minister, took the casket out of the house and to the family vault in the cemetery. None of the immediate relatives was downstairs when we left. It would not surprise me if we should all come to that—or something like it—before long. And whatever we ministers can do to emphasize the fact of triumphant spiritual life, to the minifying of the fact of mortality as connoted by graves, caskets, dirt and worms, will be a service of no mean significance. Up to this time, our contribution to this end has been of negligible importance. At the house we read, "O grave, where is thy victory?"—and then we go to the cemetery and treat the issue in such a manner that it is none too sure the grave has not, indeed, come out ahead.

But let us get down to cases. John Smith is dead and gone. Yesterday, John was alive; very ill, to be sure; his life despaired of—but he was alive. There were plenty of things that Mrs. Smith could do for him: cold water to drink, hot water bottles to be put at his feet, his pillow to be smoothed, his forehead to be stroked. Now John is gone. But here is where the dilemma becomes acute—for John is not gone! Had some kindly angel made off with him, completely, the problem would be simple enough. Then everybody could concentrate upon the beautiful hope of immortality. As the matter stands, there are now two Johns—one John who has gone out into the shadows, somewhere; to heaven, perhaps; and the other John, who, for the moment, is decidedly more important, if for no better reason than that he is still here, visible, tangible, albeit inert—the John upon whom all thought is focussed. Certain persons of statistical inclinations and frugal dispositions are disposed to condemn the sometimes excessive sums which many bereaved people spend for caskets and the various trappings of mortality; and there is, of course, a curious inconsistency in buying a five-hundred-dollar satin-lined casket to accommodate the dead body of a man who, in the course of his three score and ten, had spent more than twenty-three years sleeping on corn-husk mattresses, the most expensive of which had cost $17.50. But, seeing there is nothing much else to do now for John, except to make some sacrifice supposedly for the comfort of his unappreciative clay, the relatives may be pardoned for signing an endless string of promissory notes to achieve this end.

FUNERAL RITUAL

The Catholics, whose psychology is always so much better than ours—whatever one cares to think of their religious beliefs—have solved this question to a nicety. When Mrs. Smith moans that there is nothing she can do now for John, Father Donavan immediately corrects her by stating that she can pray for the repose of John's soul. Moreover, there is a great deal that Father Donavan can do, himself, for John—the other John that has gone away—by saying masses in his behalf. Nor does the John who is still here for a little while yet, go without proper consideration; for are there not candles to be kept glimmering about him, and does not Father Donavan toil most industriously with his censor-swinging and his holy-water-sprinkling over the remains? But most of the attention goes to the John who has passed beyond. There is nothing vague or suppositious about the present estate of that other John. Father Donavan does not lisp sweet nothings about the instinctive hope of some manner of happiness—Over There—Somewhere—Wherever. Not a bit of it! Father Donavan knows exactly where John is. Was he, in life, a man of excellent character, or no end a rake, the departed John has taken his place in the waiting line in the crowded foyer of paradise, to be passed along in consideration of credits, previously deposited to his account, by himself, plus the drafts on the general sinking fund amassed by the superogatory devotion of those who had been a lot more pious than was necessary, said drafts underwritten by the surviving relatives of the deceased, and paid for in the coin of the realm. (Perhaps this is a rather cold-blooded way of saying these things, but I possess no Latin vocabulary to speak of, and must clothe my ideas in the rough overalls of the language wherein I was born.)

Unfortunately, you and I have nothing to suggest to our bereaved that may occupy their hands and minds. We have no holy water, no holy incense, no holy candles, no holy motions; and whatever ritual we fall back upon is strangely unavailing and lacks the first principles of consolation. As I write these words I have before me the funeral ritual in most common use. I wonder how much real good we think we are doing when we read, "When thou with rebukes dost chasten man for sin, thou makest his beauty to consume away, like as it were a moth fretting a garment." Is this consonant with modern theology? And, suppose it was proved to be so, does it help any? "Every man is therefore vanity." Well, what of it? Does this ease the pain in the slightest degree? "Thou turnest man to destruction." Personally, I don't believe it. But, assuming it to be true, what's the good of saying it to a little group of people who are all bundled up for their drive to the graveyard where they expect to bury the remains of their Harry, or Grace, or mother, or daddy? "For we consume away in thy displeasure, and are afraid at thy wrathful indignation." A fine piece of consolation—that! If this sentence represents our idea of God, then all the rest of the talking we do about him, on Sundays, is a grisly joke! "For when thou art angry, all our days are gone." And then, on top of this, we inquire, courageously, "O death, where is thy sting?"—though we had been doing our utmost to point it out and give it full chance to get in its painful work.

When a death is reported to the minister, he should go to the house at his earliest opportunity. The family will want to see him. Even if they telephone him everything he requires in the way of information, he must go to the house, any way. It may be that the deceased is a member of another church than his, and the funeral is to be conducted by another minister. But if there are members of the household who are of his constituency, he should be as attentive as if he had been asked to perform this service If the Reverend Mr. Leightly, who has only been in town three months, learns that his predecessor, the Reverend Mr. Formerly (of whom he has heard a very, very great deal) has been called back to read the service for his old friend, the late Deacon Loyal, it will be entirely proper for Mr. Leightly to tell Mrs. Leightly exactly how he feels about the discourtesy the Loyal family has done him, and the questionable professional ethics of Mr. Formerly in consenting to return; but Leightly will be doing himself a bad turn if he permits anybody else to learn his sentiments on that subject. Many a glorious scrap has been staged, and many hard feelings engendered by such incidents.

MINISTERIAL "RIGHTS"

The preacher who is so jealous of his "ministerial rights" that he wants to enforce them in an hour of grief when people aren't thinking clearly, or pausing to reflect much upon how anybody else feels except themselves, ought to be in some line of business less exacting of a Christian character. It is to be remembered that in the hour of heavy loss, people are apt to think first of the minister they have known longest and best. It is perhaps natural that they should want to see him. The Reverend Mr. Formerly married pa and ma, and baptized Kittie, and confirmed her, and Kittie is making the arrangements. Let the Reverend Mr. Leightly go promptly to the house, offer to run errands, and deport himself like a sympathetic neighbor. He must also attend the funeral service. If, at the last minute, they ask him to assist in the service, when he knows they do not really want him, but are doing it for appearances sake, he must do whatever they request. This is no time to be puffy and sullen and up-stage! The preacher who hasn't enough magnitude of mind to go through an experience like this without showing himself a pee-wee, has no business in this profession.

Assuming a case where you are to have charge of the funeral, and have been with the family, and know the wishes of the household, you should try to follow their orders, even if these requests involve some curious procedure which you might never have thought of yourself. You will be asked to read scraps of verse written for the occasion by Aunt Emma. The poem may be much longer than deep; no two lines may be of the same school of poetic architecture; the sentiment, if any, may be more strange than the garment in which it is arrayed. But if the family insists, the poem must be read. Tinker it up, and read it. Maybe the late Mr. Smithers was a proud and successful horse-breeder, and the family desires an account read of his enterprise in that field. If so, they should be able to get exactly what they want. The Blank family will want Mrs. Hadavoice to sing three solos, without accompaniment. It must be unto them even as they desire. I am inclined to believe that the preacher's Christian virtues are not more heavily taxed, nor do they shine more lustrously, than on the occasions of his acceding to requests which, he knows, should never have been made. On Sundays he has it all to say whether he will tolerate poor solos, or the rendition of sentimental drool, or the introduction of anything into the service that might detract from its dignity or beauty. At the funeral service he must conform.

FUNERAL AT HOUSE

The funeral is held at the house. The proper place for it is in the church—a church so built that the family may have privacy from the crowd by being seated in a little room where they may see and hear, unobserved. The ideal service should be a triumphant expression of faith. A trained choir should be on duty, opening the service with a stirring rendition of Gounod's "Unfold Ye Portals." That is the way it ought to be done. We might contrive to do some good if we had people educated up to the idea. But we will have to wait for that. The funeral is held at the house. The minister is sent for, and arrives five minutes before the service. He is stationed in the hall, just inside the front door, and is almost stepped on, if not quite, by seventy-two people, as they are shown to seats in the dining room, or elsewhere below stairs. The family is upstairs. Unless he takes matters into his own hands, his first glimpse of them will occur when they are being helped out of their motor cars in the cemetery. So, this is a good time to slip upstairs and have a quiet word with these sorry people. Perhaps there will be time for a little prayer. This is a really great moment, and may be the only thing that will come to pass that day possessed of the possibilities of consolation or comfort. If left to his own devices (how seldom he is!), the minister may properly read some hope-and-comfort scripture, offer a brief prayer, talk ten minutes about immortality, and pronounce the benediction. He will gather his inspiration, as he speaks, from a long row of stair steps, the impassive faces of the pallbearers, and the floral-laden casket. This makes it doubly important that he shall have had a glimpse of the people, upstairs, so that he may visualize them in his mind's eye, while delivering his remarks.

A PERILOUS CUSTOM

It is no longer considered necessary for the minister to walk, bare-headed, on a cold winter day, from the door of the house to the door of the hearse, or from the hearse to the grave. Pneumonia is a very high price to pay for the small conventional tribute of regard involved in such exposure. When the minister has the good sense to leave his hat on, under such circumstances, the pallbearers follow his example. The undertaker is always anxious to get everybody from the grave at the earliest possible moment and into the carriages, and headed back toward home. This is entirely proper. The minister can easily manage, however, to find it possible to walk back to the carriage with the widow or the husband, or the mother or the son, and at least show his affectionate sympathy and interest. For him to turn directly from the grave, after the benediction, and go his own way to his car, seems a bit cold and perfunctory.

Not much time should elapse after the funeral until the minister calls on the family. On this occasion he may propose some helpful counsel on the subject of their obligations to one another; the importance of reconstructing the life of the house, promptly, to meet changed conditions; the dangers of brooding in seclusion; and the almost inevitable disappointment of all who travel "the way to Endor." Not infrequently some well-meaning neighbor who once tinkered with an ouija board or attended a seance, has already stirred their curiosity concerning spiritualism. Or, if she hasn't done so yet, she will; so the preacher may safely act on the assumption that if the idea has not been proposed, it may be. One cannot advise too strongly against any adventures in this field.

The experienced pastor contrives to find time to keep very close to these heart-broken people for a while. Every time he is in their part of town, for a few weeks, he should drop in, if only for a moment. Not only does this help them, but it helps him. Sometimes when I see the magnificent way in which bereaved people rise to meet their blow and the way they "carry on" with faith and courage after they have had the dearest thing in life taken from them, it makes me proud to feel that I am a member of their same human race. And it does no harm to tell them so.

Constantine Versus Jesus

By D. Elton Trueblood

WHEN Constantine took the cross as his banner he made Christianity the established order. It had been the religion of a despised sect, a hated minority, but at one sweep he made it the established faith. Thenceforth, those who took the name of Christ could worship openly instead of in the catacombs as was their custom. Christianity had been in disgrace; the men who upheld it were considered dangerous radicals whose doctrines were opposed to those of the men in power. But suddenly Constantine dealt it what was almost a death blow—he made it respectable. It has been respectable since that time and today the most powerful nations are nominally Christian.

The faith of Constantine is, by all odds, the dominant religion. It has come to lodge in palatial buildings and great cathedrals. What, before his time, was a religion of despised poor people is now endowed by multi-millionaires. The cross, once a sign of disgrace is now worn proudly as a piece of jewelry. It takes no courage to join the church and become religious, for it involves no danger and means no adventure. It is as simple as taking out an insurance policy and, in the minds of many, a very similar undertaking.

The religion of Constantine inevitably becomes the rallying point for the staunch upholders of the status quo. The church has become the bulwark of those who are opposed to all change. In a time of crisis it refuses to take the unpopular side. Like a well-trained politician the church lives with its ear to the ground and follows rather than leads. A close analysis of historic movements proves this. Prior to the civil war, when the slavery question was being fiercely debated, the churches of the North were largely anti-slavery, while those of the South were of the opposite persuasion. They chimed in with the prevailing sentiment of each locality. There were some inspiring exceptions, but for the most part, the churches refused to take the unpopular view. By such weak conservatism they have often been the enemy of progress.

CHURCHES ARE PARROT-LIKE

The situation in the last war was similar. In every country the churches lined up with national policies and echoed, parrot-like, the opinions of the propagandists. By thus putting their stamp of approval on narrow nationalism they attempted to maintain their position of easy respectability. Here, too, there were some refreshing exceptions, but by far the greater number chose to follow rather than to lead. It is possible that if it had not been for the idealism in all countries which arose from the fact that the cross was made the virtual banner, the war could not have been fought. Such a capitalization of Christianity was most useful to Constantine but to his modern successors it was indispensable.

No one doubts that the industrial situation, in all its ramifications, is the greatest single problem before us now but how few of the churches have dared to take any except the most conventional attitude toward it. Not all of us have forgotten yet about the great steel strike. Yet some evidently have forgotten for, in June, Northwestern University conferred an honorary degree upon Elbert H. Gary, head of the United States Steel Corporation. By so doing that great denominational university cannot avoid the public's interpretation of its act as its stamp of approval of the methods Mr. Gary represents. It has identified itself with a type of industrial policy that even many conservatives consider backward. In the speech Judge Gary made at Northwestern, he laid down some beautiful principles but, if reports contain any truth, they are denied by the actual practice of his powerful corporation. The incident is only one in many but it comes as a great shock. It proves again that large sections of the church are willing to consider anti-Christian practices in high places for the sake of basking in the sunshine of respectability.

JESUS REVOLUTIONARY

But whatever be the religion of the churches, the religion of Jesus of Nazareth was positively revolutionary. We see him pictured so often in a meek and lifeless fashion that we are apt to forget what he really was like. No negative terms can ever fully describe him. How poor the adjective "sinless" sounds when we come to think of him as he was. In his public life he was a young man of about thirty, teeming with enthusiasm. He had a view of God and man so big that it could not find its outlet in smug respectability. He never held his ear to the ground to catch public opinion. He staked everything—comfort, pleasure, reputation, and even his life on this larger view. He encountered the hatred of the guardians of vested interests. If he were in America today, the least we would do would be to deport him to Russia. Contrast, if you will, the adventurous life he lived, meeting danger at every turn, with that of the average twentieth century American who takes his name. We forget that Christianity, at its best, has never been in line with the established order.

The teaching of Jesus meant actual revolution. He was not teaching any certain social scheme but the all-pervading principle of human brotherhood, which if put into practice, is sure to create great changes. Jesus was not an authority in economics, political science, or sociology, but he preached a simple faith that has revolutionized all three. And moreover, he realized what his teaching meant. He knew that there is no such thing as mere religion. He knew that religion always finds concrete application.

What changes did his teaching imply in the field of economics? What was his attitude toward wealth? We find our answer best when we consider the story of the rich young ruler. This young man was living an easy, respectable life and he must have been amazed when Jesus stated his terms. He has not thought of the possibility of being involved in any real change in manner of living. He hadn't supposed that Christianity was so revolutionary.

He thought it was only a side issue or a bit of trimming to an existence beginning to be dull. After he talked with Jesus he had no more misgivings. He saw that the bigger view demanded all of life, that the changes it wrought were fundamental.

The men who hold that Jesus taught any definite economic system such as socialism or communism are undoubtedly missing the point for he laid down no system. On the other hand, however, there is no doubt that Jesus saw the danger of great riches and knew that fellowship of the best sort is impossible between those of widely separated social standards. He knew that excessive wealth and excessive poverty are incompatible with the conception of a kingdom of God.

What changes did his teaching imply in the field of government? Jesus was constantly coming in contact with the powers that be. He lived at a time when exploitation of the masses at the hands of those in power was the established order. Palestine was a Roman province, and thus under the emperor, but the real rulers were Jews. Taxes were farmed out to collectors and the poor citizen was the victim of multiplied graft. Much of the government was ecclesiastical, the priests and lawyers becoming actual tyrants. In the face of all such tyranny in both church and state Jesus proclaimed his adventurous belief in the common man. His view was most democratic. It is no wonder they crucified him. If his democratic teaching had crippled the people much longer the special privileges of the ruling class would have been lost. When they saw him drive the rascals from their temple traffic the holders of vested interest must have begun shaking in their boots. No doubt, the Standard Oil Co. of Jerusalem got out an injunction against him. He was a revolutionist who dared to stand for democracy in an age of tyranny.

What changes did his teaching imply in the field of social ethics? What was his attitude toward race prejudice? None but the most superficial observer can fail to see what changes he hoped to bring in this field. He refused to let race, color, sex or any other barrier keep him from the broadest sort of human fellowship. He saw that the barriers set up by men are artificial. His dealings with the woman at Jacob's well, with the Roman Centurion, and with the Syro-Phœnician woman are too well known to need repetition.

REVOLUTIONIZED REVOLUTION

It is plain that he did imply revolution in various avenues of living but, more than all, he revolutionized revolution itself. The regular method was to get up an army and destroy the established order but Jesus conceived a better way. Although he was a radical, he was not of the wild-eyed sort preaching wanton destruction. His message was always constructive and he did not resort to force. It is possible that he would not have countenanced a strike. He knew of a better way—the way of love. It was on this point that he had his greatest difference with Judas. Judas, too, had a wonderful view of what the gospel would mean but it is probable that he wanted to organize the followers, overthrow the government and inaugurate the kingdom at once. But Jesus knew it would never come that way. He was the most thoroughgoing revolutionist who ever lived—not a revolutionist only in his conception of the end to be attained but also in the manner of attaining it.

Jesus went into the conflict open-eyed. He had no false notions about his relations with the world at large. He knew he would encounter hardships. His way involved loss of ease and respectability and he told as much to his immediate followers. He said in substance, "If you aren't willing to suffer ostracism, don't come." When one proclaimed his willingness to follow anywhere the truth was pointed out that the birds and beasts were more certain of physical comfort. The weak and fearful left at once for they wanted a safe investment. They were more interested in saving their own souls than in preaching the kingdom. As the movement went on the antagonism became more bitter. Calling a man a Christian was much the same as calling him a bolshevist or an I. W. W. today. Most of the disciples suffered eventually in some sort of martyrdom.

SPIRITUAL DESCENDANTS

When we contrast our own boasted Christianity with the virile type that existed in the first century we realize that we, all too often, are the spiritual descendants of Constantine. If we are to have that early vigorous faith we must lose some of the high respect in which we are held today. Christianity has lost immeasurably by becoming the recognized order. The virile young blood that is demanding real adventure is disgusted by it and naturally turns to non-Christian movements to expend its energy. This is happening every day. It means that the so-called non-Christian movements are often more Christian than our own. Large groups of foreign students have declared themselves as absolutely opposed to Christianity. They link it up with war and nationalism and excessive greed. Why shouldn't they? If the churches put their stamp of approval on such things, aren't those very things the standards by which the church should be judged?

Our only hope lies in our ability to meet this demand for adventure. If we present the teachings of Jesus as they appeared in the first century there will be no difficulty. The trouble has come with the teaching that has filtered in since that time. Let us show plainly that ours is not a decadent religion but that it is the most daring adventure possible. The best in American youth doesn't want anything safe and easy. It demands a religion that involves danger. There are still problems to be faced if we are willing to face them. We need not pine for lack of new worlds to conquer. It is relatively easy, for instance, to get thrown into prison for conscience sake. You can get all the anathemas hurled at you that you like if you are willing to take the part of the under dog. If the church is willing to forego the respectability it has enjoyed for so many centuries, it can survive.

As the days go by, we see more and more what a terrible contrast there is between the religion we practice and that of Jesus. Day after day we are brought face to face with this awful reality. In a situation like the present no easy religion will suffice. We, too, must challenge the vested interests of every sort. We, too, must breast the tide of popular feeling. We, too, must stake all on an adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man.

The Turn of Events in Germany

THE Wirth ministry has resigned and a cabinet of industrial magnates and conservative statesmen has been given the task of attempting to guide the precarious financial and political affairs of the new German republic. The mark has dropped down to as low as 8,000 to the dollar and fluctuates all the way from 2,000 up to that figure. The mere history of the activities of the reparation commission and report of its coming to Berlin caused a plunge downward of the exchange. Thus far the commission's efforts to compel payment of reparations have defeated payment. The policy of forceful pressure fails to take economic laws into consideration; it is like beating the cow to compel her to give milk.

The ministry resigned because the united Social Democratic and Independent Socialist parties refused to enter a coalition with the People's or big business party. They have been at odds since the founding of the republic but were driven together by the growing power of Stinnes and his big business group. When the Social Democrats were in the cabinet the Socialists opposed them but upon the coming of big business joined hands against the common foe. Thus the coalition of Centrists (Catholic), Social Democrats, and Democrats gives way to a coalition of People's (big business), Centrists and Democrats. This leaves out the Nationalists (junker and militarist) on the right and the progressives and radicals of all kinds on the left. Since the Social Democrats are the largest single group, it is doubtful if any cabinet can live long without their co-operation, unless it performs a miracle in the herculean task of saving the government from an economic debacle.

All the signs of disaster are appearing on the horizon. If their unmistakable flaring up warns the French that force only defeats its own ends, the situation may be saved. The denouement now impending has been quite apparent to close neutral students of the situation for two years and to the English for more than a year past.

The French Machtpolitick

In considering the claims of France to sympathy we must differentiate between the has been France of the war and the Poincare government of France since the war, and also between the claims of the French people to sympathy and of the Poincare policies to approbation. For war-stricken France and for the French people all thinking Americans have the keenest sympathy, but for the temper and policies of the Poincare government they can have only reprobation, simply because the policies of Poincare antagonize every rational sentiment that urges sympathy for the French people. The present French government is the worst possible enemy of the French people, just as the government of Kaiser Wilhelm was the worst possible enemy of the German people. The brutal principles of Machtpolitick rule in the one as they did in the other.

That this is not a prejudiced judgment is amply shown, not only by an interpretation of the Poincare policies, but by two bold declarations within the past month. The first was by M. Locheur, former minister of reconstruction and a sort of J. Pierpont Morgan in Paris, who boldly declared in the Chamber a few days ago that in a choice between allowing Germany an opportunity to export goods and thus to get gold to pay the reparations, and keeping her weak and thereby ensuring France's security, there could be no hesitancy—she must not be allowed to become strong. In other words he frankly gave utterance before the world to the very principle which critics of the government's actions have declared to be its policy. To this declaration he added, with equal frankness, that France could not pay her debts to her allies. At the close of his address the premier dryly remarked, reiterating his oft made statement, that the period of occupation of the Rhineland, stipulated by the treaty, had not begun nor would it begin until the Germans had fulfilled the treaty. Now since all experts agree that Germany cannot pay reparations unless she can manufacture and export goods to get the means to pay, and since M. Locheur declares that France will not allow her to export to that extent, it looks as if there is a definite determination in high French governmental circles to choose the politico-military roadway even at the cost of forfeiting reparations.

Lloyd George stated the alternative suscinctly some time ago when he said, in speaking of the French-English quandary, "This is a struggle between the ideas of force and those of peace and conciliation." Commenting upon the cleavage between the two countries Sir Philip Gibbs says, "France believes only in force. All else seems to her sentiment, falsity, illusion." The most momentous question that faces mankind today is the antinomy here stated. For the moment the advocates of the force idea are in the ascendent. In France they are in power. In England they won the return of a Conservative Parliament. In Germany the swing is toward the right with Stinnes in the foreground and the reactionaries in the background. Turkey's bold stand has given courage and influence to the groups that advocate resistance in Germany. In Italy the Fascista armed 800,000 civilians and overthrew the government. And in America the Washington conference fades into oblivion without a single one of the pacts there made being signed by all the parties thereto, and the naval advocates are having their day.

A Startling Report

At the signing of the peace Marshall Foch declared in favor of a complete and permanent occupation of the Rhineland. Poincare roundly criticised Clemenceau for failure to annex the territory up to the Rhine. In the early days of occupation an effort was made to induce the people to set up a separate government under French and Belgian guardianship, and an abortive revolution was led by a group of native Rhinelanders, whose dislike of Prussia the French capitalized by offering large immunities from the peace terms and effective commercial relations with France. In all this one sees the background of M. Poincare's repeated declarations that the treaty period of occupation has not yet begun. Now comes a startling report by M. Dariac, the premier's commissioner, who was charged to report upon the economics and industry of the Rhine province.

It will be recalled that in May, 1921, the three most important industrial cities of the Ruhr district were occupied by French troops to enforce an ultimatum. The ultimatum was met but the troops were never withdrawn. Now M. Dariac advises that they shall not only not be withdrawn but that their presence there and on the Rhine should be used to divide the whole occupied area from Germany economically. He would move the customs frontier to the eastern line of the occupied area and introduce a policy of "approachment toward the populations," with "collaboration in the economic field," uniting the iron of Lorraine with the coal and furnaces of the Ruhr. Recognizing that the industrial unit cuts sectors out of the Ruhr, the Rhineland, and Lorraine he boldly proposes that France shall forcibly add the former two to her industrial base by a military-economic policy that would segregate Germany's richest industrial district, saying "the Rhenish populations are sufficiently malleable to accept the decisions of force."

The commissioner's logic is set forth in a few of his outstanding phrases:—

"The region we are occupying constitutes the principal element of German wealth, which is based entirely upon iron and coal, their transformations and derivatives.

"We do not hold the whole of the Ruhr but by our simple occupation at present we hold in reality the whole of its industrial production under our domination.

"We could, by a simple raising of tariffs, either levy a virtually unlimited title upon the German metal industry or completely disorganize it.

"In case of the insolvency of Germany we can still levy on inward and outward goods, duties which, suitably graduated, would replenish the reparations chest.

"We cannot demand that Germany shall pay enormous sums for thirty-five years, and on the other hand we are afraid of seeing her industries develop in the proportion which would permit her to assure the payment of the debts she has acknowledged.

"The judicial thesis of the foreclosure, the right of the unpaid creditor to enter upon the property which he holds from his debtor as guarantee, is applicable here.

"The whole of French policy in the Rhineland is at all times subordinate to one prime condition—the prolonged maintainance of our army of the Rhine in the occupied territories."

What of the Morrow?

Bonar Law comes into power with a declaration of greater sympathy for and co-operation with France. He says he knew from the beginning that Germany could not pay the great sums demanded but that Britain shall have all that is collectible. The words of this statement might meet with verbal approval if they did not carry an import couched in the circumstances of Lloyd George's policy of conciliation and constructive economic rehabilitation.

It seems scarcely possible that Poincare will do more than use his commissioner's report as a political sounding board for the present. That it represents his own desires is scarcely to be doubted. As a gesture of force he may trust it to dismay the Germans. Its effect in England will be to dismay the partisans of France and give moral cohesion to the partisans of conciliation and economic reconstruction. In Germany it can do nothing but give the partisans of force and non-fulfillment of the treaty a causus belli and the partisans of fulfillment and good will greater difficulty. Any movement in the direction of carrying out any policy other than one granting a moratorium and a stabilization of the mark will only hasten a debacle for all central Europe. Dr. Wirth declares that the German masses face a winter of cold and hunger and that unemployment is in the offing. Even French authorities recognize that Germany must have at least two million tons of food, for which the eight hundred billion marks necessary under present rates of exchange are beyond hope unless the mark is given a fixed value soon.

Sir Eric Geddes, British minister of transport during the war, recently said "that Germany's condition today was desperate and that it was impossible for any German government to have the confidence of the people if it was not master in its own house. The position would only improve when the allies came to an agreement as to a definite amount which Germany was capable of paying, but that it was preposterous to attempt to enslave a nation of seventy millions for generations. Not reparations but normal business conditions must be the goal. When the people of Great Britain actually realize what is happening in Germany they will come to the conclusion that they are pursuing a policy which it is impossible to realize." ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, Nov. 7, 1922.

IF there were not such grave matters at stake, there would be much material for comedy in the political situation. Everyone seems to be hitting any head that is near at hand. The members of the late government are revealing to an astonished public how little they loved one another. Mr. Lloyd George calls the present cabinet a "dormitory;" Lord Derby comes as near to calling Lord Burkenhead a liar as he can go without saying the word; and the ex-Lord Chancellor says urbanely "you're another!" In the absence of any very vital issue to divide parties, the time, if the newspapers are any evidence, is filled with amiable or barbed gibes. So far as I can judge, the Liberal shares are up a little in value; labor too has hopes of a larger number of members—it speaks of 200, but I should think it would be satisfied with 150. What many of us hope is that parliament may have a large number of honest men, not too much tied to the traditions of party. They will have many new situations to meet. Even now there is grave news from the near east. Kemal Pasha is playing the old Turkish game—"divide and conquer," but he will scarcely defy the three powers if they are united and there appear to be signs that they will give a united answer to his last demands. It is unthinkable that 750,000 Christians in Constantinople shall be left to the tender mercies of a Turkish nationalist, flushed with victory and eager for revenge. But this is only one ot many situations which are sure to meet the new parliament. We shall be happy if we have men who set their country before their party.

Armistice Week and the Election

This is not the first time Armistice week has been followed by an election. In 1918 the emotion of that memorable 11th of November was still unspent when the country was called upon to elect a new parliament. Much of our emotion was dissipated in the futility of vengeance. It was the anger in us which was uppermost. The nation redeemed from peril and called upon to make a new world, like Lot's wife, looked backward. Much of the energies of that glorious time were devoted to idle cries for the blood of the kaiser. We gave far too much of our strength to tasks which were not our chief concern. Those ends which our anger sought have proved unattainable. We are left, and not we alone, disillusioned and a little cynical. We have used up our motive power in vain, and there is too little left. This again needs much qualification. There were never wanting men who, in the joy of deliverance from peril, used their freedom and their energies, released from war, for the tasks of peace. They tried to build a "city of peace on the wastes of war," and so far as they have converted the armistice emotion into such a purpose, it is still found undiminished. The sorrowful confession must be made that these wise men were too few. It was the other voices which prevailed. Now we keep Armistice day once more before an election, but there are few cries for vengeance heard. Vengeance is always bad ethics; it is now seen to be bad business. Today we are most eager for a period of recovery and high ideals of service to the brotherhood of nations are not cherished by most of us. "Afterwards we will think of such things, for the moment let us rest;" such is the prevailing mood. How we can reconcile such a mood with the sacred memories of our fallen, it is not easy to say. They trusted us with the task which they laid down. That task was not the rescue of a nation for its own sake, but the deliverance of a nation into its true service. There is a touch of mockery in the solemn observance of such a day, if they whom we recall are not allowed to speak to us again in the silence.

"And us they trusted; we the task inherit,
The unfinished task for which their lives were spent;
But leaving us a portion of their spirit
They gave their witness, and they died content."

These words of Dr. Alington appeared in The Times in 1918, and they are still true and binding upon us.

Housing Conditions

If the readers of The Christian Century hear that our housing problems are solved, they would do well to remember the following facts, which are from an article on the London census in The Challenge: "Take what the registrar calls private families, with no doubt an occasional stress of irony on the adjective. There were 147,797 families living in homes of one room; of these nine had 10 members, ten had 11, two had 12 and two had 13; that is, there were 23 families consisting of just 250 persons living in 23 rooms. In 1911 there were only three families of over 10 persons living in single roomed houses, 32 persons in three rooms. Previously to this census there had been through several decades a steep decline in the number of single room families. The registrar must surely have dropped one of his tears as he recorded that previous decreases of 23,283 and 11,298 had been turned into an increase of 9,571. It is many years since the late King Edward, then prince of Wales, presided over a royal commission upon housing conditions. His leadership meant much at that time. Once more there is need to remind all our people that whether it is of the physical or of the moral welfare of our people we are thinking, the housing problem must be set in the foreground of our policies. One illustration I remember; from the very day the army began to be given increased barrack room for its soldiers, the drinking in the army began to diminish.

Carrying On

While the storm of an election is raging, there is much solid and good work being done within the churches and Sunday schools. The campaign for personal evangelism is still doing much to encourage the leaders in our churches. The National Sunday School Union is throwing its weight—no small weight—into this form of service. In Birmingham a well-planned united campaign was carried through in the early autumn. It is a sound appeal to the Christian disciple that he should try to share with his friends and neighbors his greatest of gains. They do this in Korea, why not in England? The best of such a method is that anyone can begin it at any time without calling a committee or hiring a hall. "One loving heart sets another loving heart on fire."

A Caricaturist of Power

America has given or lent us a very powerful caricaturist in Mr. Boardman Robinson. There is a show of his drawings on view at this moment in London, and he is drawing for The Outlook, I believe, week by week. If the league of nations' union is wise, it will use some of his terrible caricatures of the war-spirit. He has one of the Friends of Militarism, hate, fear, distrust, prejudice, selfish interest; another one represents poor wizened humanity feeding the white elephant of militarism. But in all likelihood the American public will be familiar with his work. His bold and defiant dealing with religious themes comes out in his subject, "The Second Coming." There the Lord Christ is seen directing a gang of laborers who are carrying a huge beam to break down a church! This again is a picture I should like to see used. Is that what the church dreads for itself? Lest the coming should need once more to cleanse His temple?

On the Eve of Election

The following is a passage from Wordsworth suitable for the eve of an election.

"We shall exult if they who rule the land
Be men who hold its many blessings dear,
Wise, upright, valiant; not a servile band,
Who are to judge of danger which they fear,
And honor which they do not understand."

CORRESPONDENCE

The Real Trouble With the Klan

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your correspondent who writes anonymously under such titles as: "Ti-Bo-Tim" makes certain confessions (October 26th).

"I've talked to a number of klansmen who have told me that they would rather read your paper than any religious paper on the market to date; but if you didn't cut talking about klansmanship you just as well throw your paper in the middle of the Atlantic ocean."

In the initial statement I concur. The Christian Century is the best religious journal coming to our respective reading tables. What makes it the best? Surely, the principle of "the kept press" would not improve but rather lower its quality. This lifts the real issue as to the ku klux brethren, the issue in which Brother Ti and I radically differ. With the best of intentions and a platform strong and frank the klansmen move out upon the supposed evils of America with methods totally unworthy their platform and methods which tend to defeat every one of their good intentions. Do good ends justify wrong means? Not often, if ever.

Recently in conference with a ku klux organizer, we discussed this issue. He could not see why the secrecy of membership, secrecy of methods of training the hidden guard, secrecy of officials, and secrecy of vote by the klan are not all justified by the fact that the Knights of Columbus already use secrecy in certain particulars. That is, I am justified in a misdemeanor by the fact that another committed it before I did. Such is also Ti's argument. Suppose Wilson did assume arbitrary power, does that justify me or any 100,000 Americans in doing so without the backing of at least fifty-one per cent of the one hundred million who constitute the nation? Then, of course, the ku klux head is not the President of our republic, and we are not now in a war with our backs against the wall.

The Wilson illustration is a pertinent one. As a rabid Wilsonian, intent always upon claiming that Wilson, as a President, was second only to Lincoln, I confess that his arbitrariness in the selection of his men for the peace treaty duty seems to have been the error which has brought democratic defeat, international indifference on the part of America, bad blood in politics and pathetic unwarranted hatred of the great author of the fourteen points, etc. The ku klux brethren are just about to duplicate those tactics through the errors in method and the false assumption that two wrongs make one right. The klan gives promise soon to go the way of all flesh and leave our ku klux brethren disappointed because their fine ideals written on the card have failed, their methods checked progress and left their beautiful dreams in the discard.

I hope The Christan Century will encourage others to write upon this subject and, of course, offer even to the klansmen who obscure their identity, full opportunity to reach the reading public through your splendid journal.

Pulpit Praying

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Does the pastoral, or as the English term it, "the begging" prayer of itself induce wandering thoughts, letting one go a 'dreaming into space? Often it seems "longer" than it is broad and thicker than it is "long." How can a congregation "assist" in pulpit-prayer when it runs true to form and goes on its meandering, its monotonous, meditative way? Is it because there are few or no flashing high-lights in it? Because it lacks afflatus eager and aglow with reality? Possibly the intending worshipper is half-conscious that the earlier stretches of praying are a kind of heaven-informing bulletin of local and national news, or strike into sermonizing in advance of the text and sermon-hour. Anyway, leaders in extempore pulpit prayers might, to the advantage of the congregation, study the method used in ancient and modern prayer-books thus to learn how to offer bright and brief thanksgiving, specific petition, soulful intercession, frank confession, paying due regard to free absolution.

Each prayer-element could be cameo-cut with its own marked appeal to the Lord Jesus, thus giving the worshippers a pause to catch breath, then go on to the next in order. Hardly anything else could give more the sense of liveness in pulpit-praying than occasional direct address to Christ Jesus by name. Is it ungracious to say it? but frequent and extended listening to pastoral prayers, both east and west, compels one to note the almost absence of alertness, or elan, in him who prays. He doesn't seem all there, that is, not as if "praying in the spirit." What abandon of mind, what direct address to the Lord, as when Stephen lifted his eyes, and cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Why not again and again hear Christ spoken to in fervent words? What a relief and outgoing of heart for worshippers this direct, intimate address! Instead of this the Lord Christ, if mentioned at all in praying is treated as an historical personage, greatly revered to whom a great debt is owed, who is a splendid example two thousand years in the past, but never addressed as the always present Helper and Lord.

Methodist Procedure in the Buckner Case

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Journalists, even in the religious field, often find themselves among pitfalls when they attempt to deal with Methodist usages or polity. Here for example is your "News of the Christian World" editor remarking: "When Bishop Stunz retired Rev. J. D. M. Buckner on an old age pension . . "

Neither Bishop Stuntz (for so he is spelled) nor any other bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church could retire any minister either with or without "pension." This can be done only by the annual conference, composed entirely of fellow ministers. Formally, the bishop could have done no more than to declare legal a motion to retire the minister in question without a trial. The legality of both the bishop's decision and the action of the annual conference is subject to review, on appeal duly taken, by the next general conference.

As to the wisdom of the course pursued by Mr. Buckner's conference there is room for wide difference of opinion. But it should be remembered that many so called heresy cases are complicated by questions other than doctrinal ones—notably, that of personality. These words are written without personal knowledge of Mr. Buckner's case or reading of his pamphlet. There have been other seemingly arbitrary retirements of Methodist ministers by annual conferences, but I do not recall a judicial decision on the subject.

A Sample Copy Wasted

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A copy of The Christian Century has come to me with a request that I avail myself of the opportunity of securing your paper at the rate offered to ministers of the gospel. I want to be frank with you and tell you that your paper would do me no good. I am a believer in the old Bible as the inspired word of God and nothing can shake me from that belief. Judging from a brief glance at your paper it is a defender of modern heresies and pseudo-speculations. I am satisfied that your paper would start fresh doubts in the minds of most people which in the end might lead them to lose their soul. It is all "bunk" for the critics or even editors to say that they know more than anybody else when they wrest the word of God from its right meaning.

All the infidels of the world from Celsus to the modern critics have used their hammers on the anvil of God's word, but the hammers have been used up while the anvils remain. When the modern critic speaks of newly discovered evidence to overthrow the word of God he simply talks "hot air." I for one am not ready to follow the leadership of The Christian Century as it will eventually lead its readers in theology and sociology into a Ignis Fatuus Jack o'Lantern quagmire.

It is very kind of you to speak so flatteringly of Dr. Fosdick's little books on prayer, service and faith but you said nothing about his denials and why he calls our inspired book a book of myths, nor have you said any thing in regard to his denial of the virgin birth, the vicarious atonement of Christ, the physical resurrection of our Lord, miracles, etc. But may I ask, while the learned and cultured doctor who preaches in the First Presbyterian church draws such crowds to hear him, have you ever heard of a poor sinner rising up in the old meeting house, while under conviction of sin, and saying, "What must I do to be saved?" Or have you ever heard of any of the modern "liberals" bringing men and women to Christ?

Never, that's not their business. I defy you to show men of such faith bringing men and women to Christ. You seem to think that this disseminator of heresy in the First church is doing a fine work and the presbytery of New York is satisfied with him. I think you are mistaken. Some may be satisfied but the dissatisfied ones have not the courage to speak against the broadcasting of error. A large number of persons in the Presbyterian church are like Gallio, "they care for none of these things." The trouble today is that so many persons in the Presbyterian church who are filling positions of trust as pastors, secretaries, superintendents and what not, are on the church's bounties but are not men enough to go where they belong—into the Unitarian church.

A Different Kind of Fundamentalists

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am a Shaker elder and a subscriber to The Christian Century. I find in your issue of Nov. 9th an article entitled "Shaker Fundamentalism Shaking." There has been much misinformation in the newspapers lately about the Shakers. We are said to be dying out—in fact dead. "The press is now recording our break-up," you say. The press has been doing this, though we still live on; but to class us as fundamentalists and millenarians, as you do, is the unkindest cut of all.

I understand that a fundamentalist is one who believes in the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures; and that a millenarian is one who believes that Christ or Jesus will personally reign on earth for one thousand years. If I am right in this, then the Shakers are not, and never were, to be so classed. The end of the world was never to us so immiment. We do not marry for the reason that we consider the continent life the more Christ like, and that we can serve God and each other better being free from the distractions of the generative family life, and the contaminations of the soul by carnal lusts. If this is a "grotesque" doctrine, so be it.

We are "believers in Christ's first and second appearing." First, in Jesus of Nazareth as the expounder of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Second, in our founder, Ann Lee, as completing the exposition by declaring the motherhood of God and the sisterhood as co-equal with the brotherhood. Christ is to come to us in spirit, not in the flesh. We have a hymn, "Christ of the Ages:"

"Thou uplifting spirit—The Christ of the Ages
Draw near to us now, be our comforting friend.
Thou has lighted the pathway of prophets and sages,
In times of affliction a helper did send.

Thine shall the honor and glory be
While the eternal years roll on."

How far we are from being fundamentalists, as that word is now understood, I will quote from the preface of an old hymn book we published in 1813.

"It is not expected that Believers (Shakers) will ever be confined in their mode of worship to any particular set of hymns, or any other regular system of words; for words are but the signs of our ideas, and of course must vary as the ideas increase with the increasing work of God. Therefore these compositions may evince to future Believers the work and worship of God which may hereafter be required of his people."

Also the following from the preface to the fourth edition "Christ's first and second appearing" 1856 (first edition 1808).

"The idea which so extensively prevails that all inspired revelation ceased with the canon of scripture, is inconsistent with both reason and scripture. Is it not unreasonable to suppose that the work of God should alone remain stationary whilst all the natural arts and sciences among men are continually improving and increasing? In all the works of God throughout the order of the visible creation, there is an evident relation of one thing to another, as the effect is related to its cause; and we may everywhere see one thing springing out of another, and progressing on to still higher degrees of perfection."

The Shakers were convinced evolutionists before Darwin's time and among the first "higher critics." We believe with Tennyson, "I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs, and the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns." The Shakers never believe in the resurrection of the natural body. The resurrection we believe in is spiritual—from the Adamic to Christian. We do not accept the doctrine of the immaculate conception. We do not believe in a vicarious atonement. It is not the death and sacrifice of Jesus on the cross that saves sinners, but in the following of him in his life and teaching.

The Shakers are by no means ashamed of their record or principles—should it prove in the providence of God that all of our societies should in the course of time cease to be, we remember that we have had our fore-runners, at intervals, for thousands of years.

It is safe to assume that all that is enduring in the past will be preserved and carried forward to the future. The Shakers will not be the last to organize to these ends. Shakerism is applied Christianity to the best of our understanding.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Good Samaritan

I AM bound to say that I never saw the point of this parable until an Irishman dramatized it in my pulpit. Some of you will remember the visit to America of the father of the "Catch My Pal" movement. He preached in our church on saving drunkards—the object of his movement—and he used the story of the Good Samaritan as his text. My neighbor—who is he? I—who am I neighbor to? We cannot love God without loving our fellow men. This is a profound truth that we need to fathom. Again and again Jesus puts his emphasis, not upon outward form, but upon inner reality, not upon ceremony but upon the love that serves. How can men mistake this? They cannot if they think at all but it is so easy to become formal and so hard to practice love. It is as if Jesus said: "A Catholic priest came by; he was fresh from church where he had celebrated the communion. He looked upon the needy man, but feeling that he had done his holy work for that day, he passed on. Then a missionary secretary came by. His mind was full of schemes to raise money to help the heathen in Asia. He looked, absent-mindedly, almost untouched by the present need, and passed on. Then a member of the Gideons—a traveling salesman, who made no pretense of belonging to any church, came by. He had a big heart and he did what needed to be done and generously provided for the sufferer." What a severe blow that would be to formal churchmen! Here are men discussing whether we shall use grape-juice or wine at the communion service, whether we shall button our clerical collars in the front or in the back, whether the markers in the Bible shall be purple or red, whether or not women should be permitted to wear rubber caps when being immersed, whether the preacher should preach in a gown or a cut-a-way coat and particularly whether there should ever be any color in his preaching necktie! Ye gods—and the world burning! All of the above questions are very vital. I can bring you the men who are interested. Should we baptize with a bowl or in a tank, should we order our supplies from any other source than the denominational publishing houses, who should prepare the communion bread and what should be done with that which is left over! Such is the tweedle-dum tweedle-dee of Fiddle D. D. and his parishioners. Official boards have been known to spend hours discussing such inconsequential details. And all the time the poor traveler waiting for human help. It was a masterful stroke in Jesus to give us this point of view, calling us back to that pure religion which visits the fatherless and the widows and which remains unspotted from the world. Next to the parable of the Prodigal Son stands this illuminating story. Religion—the only kind worth any consideration—is that which in love of God produces loving service to men—poor men, diseased men, despised men, ignorant men, foreign men—all men. How often we have come upon this same idea, from various angles, in this study of Luke! Scholars tell us that Luke had the social note more than any other New Testament writer. The beloved physican was a lover of men. Being himself a great-heart, as well as an accurate student, he caught the big note in Jesus' life. As we mellow and mature, as we experience deeply, travel far, read much and know men intimately, we come to see that Luke has laid hold of the one vital element—kindness, gracious humanity, sympathy, loving help. It is this that is so rare. Steinmetz, the great electrical engineer, says that the problem of the future will be power. Men will have wit enough. There will be no end of machines and inventions—but where will we get the power to run them? Even now not cotton, but Coal, is King. Nations are wrangling over the coal beds—the Ruhr, the Saar, the black diamond tells the fortune of the world. In the ethical field it is also a question of "power." There is no lack of wit, there are plenty of plans, no end of bright schemes, any amount of machinery—but is there enough love to run the works? That gives us pause. How many great sermons—how few noble deeds; how many clever books—how few kind hearts. The literary mountain seems to bring forth a mouse. How many great churches—how few happy homes. How much theology—how little love. Why, you can count the great hearts on your ten fingers! yes, five would be too many. I cannot write the names of five living Shaftsburys—they do not exist. Is there another Lincoln? Ah—here is the pre-eminence of Jesus—the lover—the great lover, the supreme lover. Others may have had his ideas—no one ever had his heart. The world is tired of talk, weary of schemes, disgusted with campaigns—the world wants to be loved. Napoleons may batter us—we want some Christ to love us. It is not more excitement that we crave, but more love. This is the story of the Good, Kind Samaritan.

A Progressive and Efficient Church in Grand Rapids

The Fountain Street Baptist church, Grand Rapids, Mich., laid the cornerstone of its new and splendidly planned church edifice on Nov. 9, with impressive services. For fifty years the congregation has worshipped on the same spot. Five years ago the old church was burned, and since that time Dr. Alfred W. Wishart, the pastor, has conducted services with increasing congregations in a nearby theater. The annual church banquet was held on the evening of the same day. More than one thousand persons were present, almost all of them members of the church. The speakers were President Cutten of Colgate University, and Prof. Herbert L. Willett of the University of Chicago. The work of Fountain Street Baptist church has been notable in the western metropolis of Michigan. Dr. Wishart's activities have been tireless and his leadership has been most effective. During the past five years, with no building, and without the ordinary facilities for work, the church has reached larger numbers than ever before, and under the wise leadership both of minister and officers, is facing a future bright with opportunities for even greater achievement.

More Than Fifty Years in One Church

Distinguished loyalty among lay people in the church has never properly been chronicled. In Los Angeles recently Mrs. Sarah H. Clough finished a life of singular devotion. For more than fifty years she was a member of First Christian church in that city. Sometimes resident in other cities, and active in other churches, she returned to Los Angeles to finish her life without having ever transferred her membership. Her daughter is Mrs. A. C. Smither, wife of a prominent Disciples minister.

Will Promote Community Study

The Conference of Allied Societies Engaged in Community Work, held in Washington in October, proposes to carry into hundreds of local communities the methods which were employed recently by national organizations in securing a comprehensive survey of the task. They would seek thus to eliminate the duplication and waste of religious work and to insure the cooperation of societies and churches for the good of the community. The principles on which religious cooperation should go forward are stated in these words: "We have faced together the new and startling tendencies of the post-war years, which are imperilling our American standards of morality, law and order. We have been challenged by the growing violence of the attack upon our American constitution through opposition to the eighteenth amendment. We have been impressed anew by the imminent peril to civilization that grows graver day by day through industrial, class and racial conflict and our terribly torn international relations. It is impossible to be at all clear as to whether the world outlook is for peace or war, brotherhood or revolution. Of one thing we become increasingly sure that only spiritual imperatives are sufficient to maintain our dearly bought freedom and our most cherished ideals of personal and social life. We are sobered if not fairly appalled by the responsibility which the machinery of our complex social organization requires."

Religious Education Students in Demand

The churches about Boston evidently appreciate the students in the Boston University School of Religion for 71 per cent of these students are now employed in churches in various capacities while in school, and earn a weekly salary of $2,334. They are preaching in churches and acting as Sunday school superintendents, teachers, soloists, directors of boys' and girls' work, and in other capacities. Eighteen religious denominations are represented in the group though the majority are Methodists. At a recent special occasion called "President's Day," when President Murlin was present, Dr. Luther A. Weigle of Yale spoke as follows: "It is in the name of religion that religion has been taken out of the public schools of this country. Avowed infidels or secularists have had little or nothing to do with it. Christians have done this in the interest of their own particular brand of Christianity. The practical exclusion of religion from the public schools of this country is fraught with danger. This situation will imperil, in time, the future of the nation itself. The principle of the separation of church and state is fundamental and precious. But it must not be so construed as to render the state a fosterer of non-religion or atheism. It would seem to be necessary for the state to afford to religion such recognition as will help children to appreciate the true place of religion in human life."

Three Years of Federation at Wichita a Success

The organization of groups of city churches into a federation proves to be a wise procedure throughout the country. The Wichita, Kans., federation is now three years old and has rendered good account of its stewardship. Dr. Ross W. Sanderson is executive secretary. Among the activities of this federation is the project of bringing Gypsy Smith to the city in the spring of 1924.

Annual Meeting of the Federal Council of Churches

The executive committee of the Federal Council meets annually for the review of the work of the year, and the presentation of its program and proposals for the ensuing twelve months. The executive committee is the representative of the council during the quadrennial period between its most important gatherings. It numbers about two hundred members, the denominational delegates, the members of commissions and important committees, the representatives of the local federations, and the officers. This year its meeting will be held in Indianapolis, Dec. 13 to 15. The headquarters will be the Hotel Severin, and the meeting place one of the larger churches of the central part of the city. The Church Federation of Indianapolis will act as the host of the occasion, and already its plans are well advanced. The sessions of the executive committee are open to the public, but the evening sessions will be of special public interest, dealing as they will with the evangelistic movement in the nation, the most outstanding phases of the industrial question as related to the churches, and the international situation in the light of Christian obligations. Prominent speakers will be on the program, including Dr. Robert E. Speer, president of the council; Bishop Brent, Dr. Tittle, Professor Commons, President J. Ross Stevenson, and others of note. The local arrangements of the gathering are in the hands of Rev. Charles H. Winders, secretary of the Indianapolis Federation of Churches.

Indianapolis Has Unique ex-Convict

A layman of Indianapolis secured the release of Leslie Lee Sanders from the Atlanta federal prison some time ago and placed him in charge of the publicity for Cadle Auditorium at a large salary. The ex-convict has devoted much of his energies to helping other prisoners. He does not hold the point of view, that prisoners are all angels, or that officers of the law are all devils. In a recent address in a church in Nashville, Tenn., he said: "Don't forget that the men in jail are human. The indictment which I bring upon you is that you do not hear. I do not mean that all of the men in the various prisons can be redeemed, for I believe that a large portion of them could never be aided by humanity, and that the world would be better, if I had my way and hanged some of them before breakfast. The way to deal with the crime problem is to dig to the roots, teaching afresh the reality of judgment, the sinfulness of sin and that God's retribution is just and will overtake the sinner. We must bring back into the world a respect for God and for constituted authority."

Next R. E. A. Convention at Cleveland

The Religious Education Association will hold its next convention at Cleveland, April 10-14, 1923. It has completed twenty years of history, in which period changes of great import have been effected in the work of religious education. The organization itself has been one of the greatest influences in bringing about these changes. The general topic this year will be "The New Day in Religious Education." The various departmental sessions will be held as usual.

Presbyterian Churches in Washington Consider Merger

Realizing that the big church is attractive to the city man, the various denominations tend to combine churches these days, and there is far more conservatism about the founding of new ones. In Washington the New York Avenue Presbyterian church and the Church of the Covenant are negoitating a union. The former is a historic organization in which many presidents have held membership. The latter is a younger organization which has had only two pastors. Should the two congregations unite, they would form not only the largest church in the capital, but one of the largest in the entire United States. The plan of union will have to be ratified by the two congregations, and then by the presbytery before it would become effective.

Disciples Will Found Standard College in Georgia

The recent state convention of the Disciples in Georgia which was noteworthy for its advanced stand on education launched a campaign to pay off the indebtedness of Southeastern Christian college, and to found an entirely new standard institution for the conferring of the A. B. degree. A junior college will be conducted at Auburn. The money raising for the new project has already been started, and Disciples in adjacent states will be invited to join in the task of founding the new college. Rev. L. O. Bricker was president of the convention.

Disciples Urged to Take Over Baptist Mission

Near the thriving mission work of the Disciples on the Congo is the Baptist Bololo mission. This was started as an independent Baptist mission, and has been supported by English churches. More and more the English churches are giving through regular denominational channels, and financial conditions make it difficult to secure money in England to continue its support, hence the Disciples have been urged to take over the Bololo mission with its staff of workers. There are fifteen thousand native Christians and a number of well organized stations. The cost of the enterprise is $75,000 which is a challenging fact to the United Christian Missionary Society at a time when great economies are being made in every department of the work.

St. Louis Ministers Hold Long Pastorates

Of the eighteen ministers in St. Louis who have held their present pastorates for fifteen years or longer, it is noteworthy that half of these are in the service of the Evangelical Lutheran church. Three are Evangelicals, two Baptists, two Presbyterians and two Episcopalians. Meanwhile one notes the absence from the list of Disciples, Congregationalists, Methodists, and others. The minister who is longest in service in St. Louis is Rev. H. Bartels of St. John's Evangelical Lutheran church who has been with his church for forty-seven years. Rev. H. Walker has been with St. Luke's Evangelical church for forty-one years.

Dean Brown Tired of Having the Church Mauled

Among the books getting sermon reviews at the hands of the ministers this winter is Dean Brown's "The Honor of the Church." Among his thrusts are these: "It is considered very good form and very good fun in certain quarters these days to maul the church. It is a chilly day when some light-hearted newspaper reporter does not make merry in a column or two over what he regards as 'the faults and failures of the Protestant church.' In my judgment it is very poor business all around. It gives aid and comfort to the enemy. It amuses some, wounds many, and helps none. I wish to protest against it, and to say a word here as straight and as strong as I know how to make for the 'honor of the church.' "

College Professors Carry on School of Missions

Students of Carleton College have had a unique opportunity for a year past in the School of Missions conducted on Wednesday evenings by the local Congregational church of Northfield, Minn., in that three valuable courses have been given, one on home missions, one on foreign missions, and one on modern missionary problems. This fall Dr. William Ernest Hocking of Harvard lectured on "The Comment of Christendom in Christianity as Observed by the Orientals," and Rev. Arthur S. Olson on "Every-day Life in China."

Community Church Protests Intolerance

Most community churches organized over the land have arisen through combinations of existing churches, but a new type seems to have emerged in Kennett Square, Pa., according to the Community Churchman. "This church was organized in February, 1921, in part as a protest against the spirit of intolerance which prevailed in the other churches of the town. The membership, now in excess of 100, is striving 'to bring about the union of all who love in the service of all who suffer.' The pastor, Rev. Elias Auger, was a chaplain in the world war, and saw service at the St. Mihiel and Meuse Argonne drives." The church has recently purchased a site and will now proceed to erect a chapel.

Layman Provides Equipment for Community Work

Modern industrialism has often been portrayed in its more unpleasant aspects, but in the meantime many business men are making earnest efforts to realize the will of Christ in their business enterprises, as may be seen from the fact that schools, and other community organizations at North Canton, O., now have splendid equipment. The Community Churchman tells the story as follows: "One of the finest community buildings in the middle west is being completed at North Canton, O., through the generosity of Mr. W. H. Hoover, of the Hoover Suction Sweeper Company. The three-story building, of yellow sandstone and brick of mottled hues, is planned to fit all requirements of the community for recreational, social, and educational life and physical training. One economical feature of the building is the commodious gymnasium on the real half of the second floor, which is designed also as a community auditorium. Complete equipment for gymnasium work is being installed, but most of it will be movable, and when the room is used as an auditorium, canvas will be stretched over the floor, on which the chairs will be placed. This auditorium, with balconies, will seat 1,000 people. Besides community gatherings of a more general nature, motion pictures and dramas will be shown in the auditorium, and shop meetings will be held there."

Eureka College Working Hard in Endowment Campaign

In an effort to raise nearly a half million dollars this winter for debts and endowment, Eureka college is using every friend in an intensive campaign, which started with a conditional gift of $135,000 from the general education board. The college canvassers have raised $150,000 this autumn and are still going strong. The campaign ends in June.

Promoting Church Pageantry Throughout Country

Never have the Protestant churches shown such interest in the use of the arts in promoting Christianity as during this autumn. The organizing spirit is Prof. H. Augustine Smith of the Boston University School of Religious Education and Social Service, who will visit a number of cities this winter showing them how to carry on pageantry and how to put on special Sunday evening programs in which dramatic art, music, and pictures combine to produce a religious impression. The churches have conceived many novel ideas for Christmas programs through this leadership.

Churches Make Ready for International Sunday

The various religious organizations of America will join on Dec. 17 in observing International Peace Sunday. Various denominational commissions have made plans for the observance of the day according to their own genius. The Unitarian commission on international justice and good-will has prepared an extended reading list, and urges pastors to induce the public libraries to place the suggested books on the shelves. Among the journals commended is The Christian Century. This commission would have the United States join in the philanthropic work of the league of nations and in the court of international justice without becoming committed to the whole program of the league.

Presbyterians Now Well Organized at University of Pennsylvania

Several hundred Presbyterian students of the University of Pennsylvania attended a banquet at the Hotel Normandie in Philadelphia recently. They were members of the two Presbyterian clubs of the university, of which one is for resident students with homes in the city who have formed the Commuter's Club, and the other is the Affiliate Club, whose members have united with Philadelphia Presbyterian churches in an affiliated relationship. Rev. Charles A. Anderson is student pastor at the university in the service of the Presbyterian denomination, and through his efforts this autumn more than 25 students have allied themselves with the church.

Annuity Problems Solved for Community Church Pastors

Loyalty to the denomination has been greatly quickened in ministerial circles by the setting up of annuities and pensions for ministers when they reach the retiring age.

Want Delegates Not "Observers"

ON the eve of the Lausanne conference, representatives of great church bodies and organizations interested in Near Eastern problems made a final appeal to Secretary of State Hughes on Saturday, November 18, to make the "observers" of the meeting fully accredited delegates. This action by the various churches and other organizations was taken at a meeting called by the Federal Council of Churches.

In the resolution which was presented the committee in charge assures President Harding and Secretary Hughes that they welcome the government's intention to stand for the freedom of the Straits, the protection of religious minorities in the Near East, the protection of American property rights and the lives of American citizens and freedom to carry on religious and educational work. But they point out that even more important than property rights are human rights involving other people than ourselves, and laying upon us inescapable moral obligations. The resolution then says:

"We believe these things can be more surely accomplished by the appointment of accredited delegates at Lausanne clothed with more power than mere observers, and we believe this can be done without entangling America in European political affairs. We also hope that America may have among her representatives at the Lausanne conference someone from this country who is intimately acquainted with the humanitarian interests of the Near East, and who is so closely in touch with present day public opinion in America that he can voice the sentiment which has expressed itself in the gifts for relief, missionary and educational work of over $120,000,000.

"In making this request we believe that we are expressing the sentiment of approximately 50,000,000 members of the Christian churches of all faiths in America. We make definite request of the administration at Washington to open the way for appropriate congressional action at the earliest moment, so to modify the immigration laws as to permit for a short time the presence of more than the present quota of persons from those countries from which the stricken people of the Near East are now fleeing; it being understood that the requisite evidence shall be given that they will not become public charges.

"We make an earnest plea that this government use its powerful influence to secure for the Armenian people a protected national home, so that the stricken people may not find in Soviet Russia their only friend, and that America may enter into its present opportunity of expressing again its historic interest in oppressed peoples of other lands."

The resolution which was presented by a committee headed by Dr. John H. Finley of New York, Bishop Charles H. Brent of the Protestant Episcopal church, Dr. Stanley White of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian church (north) and Dr. E. O. Watson, Washington secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, was signed in addition by Ernest W. Riggs, Walter George Smith of Philadelphia, Dr. Robert E. Speer of New York, Albert W. Staub, Dr. Henry Allen Tupper and Samuel McCrea Cavert. Mr. Smith is a Roman Catholic layman.

Announcement was made that Dr. James L. Barton of Boston, of the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions and chairman of the Near East Relief, and Dr. George R. Montgomery, secretary of the American Armenia Society and associate secretary of the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of Churches, had sailed to attend the conference and would serve as advisors to the American representatives on matters regarding missionary and relief work of the United States in the Near East. Though not sent officially by the Federal Council they were authorized to present the view point of the Federal Council of Churches as shown by the action of its administrative committee from time to time.

The Associated Press dispatches on Sunday, November 19, stated that American representatives will take an active part at the Lausanne conference and will speak and speak out vigorously when the occassion demands it. The dispatches further stated that the American observers with certain reservations became full fledged delegates regarding American rights and policies.

In serving community churches ministers often forfeit valuable rights which they once held as members of some denominational organization. Rev. Charles Deems, a member of the Colorado Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, has been for a number of years pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York, an independent church. Recently the Church of the Strangers made arrangement to pay into the Colorado Conference enough money each year to maintain the annuity rights of their minister. This is probably the way out for a number of other community churches.

Ministers Will Visit the University

The University of Missouri has long had Farmers' Week and Journalists' Week, but now there is to be a Ministers' Week. Lectures of special interest to the visitors will be given every morning and evening. The ministers will be invited to interest themselves in young people of their own churches who may be in school. About 75 per cent of the students of this university are members of some church. The rural ministers will receive special attention in the school of agriculture.

New Anti-Catholic Organizations Springing Up

The spirit of the Ku Klux Klan is more anti-Catholic than anything else, and in many parts of the country there are evidences of a reviving spirit of protest against Rome. It is the task of Roman Catholic leaders to account for such religious bigotry on some other hypothesis than the infallibility of the Roman church, but intelligent Protestant leaders will deprecate a tendency that threatens greatly to delay the brotherhood of man. The stricter old-time evangelicals in the Protestant ministry are yielding themselves to this campaign of hate, and there was formed in New York recently "The Evangelical Protestant Society" with headquarters at 113 Fulton St. Among the charter members are Dr. D. J. Burrell, Dr. J. R. Straton, Dr. C. L. Laws, Rev. Edwin D. Bailey, Dr. R. S. MacArthur, Bishop William Burt, and Rev. O. M. Voorhees. The effort is to secure the names of outstanding leaders of the fundamentalist type, and as soon as one hundred of these are secured an election of officers will be held.

Will Have Dollar Day

The campaign for funds for the women's colleges of the orient is being conducted on a union basis, and is making good progress throughout the land. The Laura Spellman Rockefeller Foundation has promised a million dollars, provided two million more is raised. The women's organizations of the country have raised one million already, and on December 9 there will be an intensive campaign for one dollar gifts in various parts of the land. The following words from the campaign document indicate the nature of the appeal that is being made: "Asia appeals to the men and women of America for relief from physical suffering caused by ignorance of physical laws, utter lack of sanitation, impure living, incredibly early marriage and motherhood, cruel superstitions which make child birth a frightful tragedy, lack of knowledge regarding the care of children leading to barbarous treatment and intense and needless suffering and absence of medical aid. These women plead for education to open the doors of their minds. Only one in one hundred of the women of India can read. Only one in one thousand of China, the great literary nation, know their letters. These women have minds notwithstanding the teaching of their religions which deny to women minds and souls. They have proved that they can learn and can teach, and now they plead for the opportunity to prepare themselves to serve their people."

Conference on International Relations

A noteworthy conference was held in New York on Nov. 17 composed of various leading church officials. The topic of consideration was the cause of Protestantism in Europe. The conference was composed as follows: The moderators and presiding officers of the denominational bodies; representatives of the constituent bodies of the Federal Council; the executive and administrative committees of the Federal Council; the commission on relations with religious bodies in Europe; the commission on relations with France and Belgium; the foreign missions conference of North America; the American Bible society; the international committee of the Y.M.C.A., and the national board of the Y.W.C.A.

Bible Now a Sectarian Book in California

By court action the Bible is now a "sectarian book" in California. A high school at Selma purchased two Bibles for the school library and in the lawsuit that followed, the superior court ruled that the Bible was not a sectarian book. This decision did not stand, however, in the supreme court. Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan rule the Bible out of schools by similar court decisions, though welcoming the book in jails and penitentiaries. It is upon this "sectarian book" that the President of the United States takes his oath of office. The new constitution in Illinois if adopted will give the Bible a legal status in the commonwealth.

Churches Not Afraid of Large Enterprises

The excessive cost of building these days does not seem to hinder the church from going forward with vast enterprises. The expanding institutions find that they cannot afford to wait for some problematical reduction in costs. Westminster Presbyterian church of New York is erecting a new church plant which is to cost $350,000. The plan of this building helps to visualize the change in church methods that has come within a few years, for it calls for large assembly rooms for religious educational work among the young people, a chapel, library, cradle roll quarters, rooms for the pastor and session, church office, women's work room with power sewing machines and other equipment, kitchen, serving room, dining rooms, game rooms, recreational room, large auditorium and

Big Bible Classes for Men Compete

There is a neck and neck race just now between three great men's Bible classes in various parts of the country. The largest for several years past has been in a relatively small town, Long Beach, Calif. This class, which is taught by Rev. George P. Taubman, has an enrollment of 2,200. At a special session the Business Men's Bible class of First Baptist church of Kansas City recently brought together 2,581 men. At a recent session of the class three traffic policemen were necessary to handle the crowd on Linwood boulevard, for several large churches are located near each other in a certain residence section of Kansas City. This class is in a contest with one in Calvary Baptist church of Washington, the church attended by President Harding.

Russia Has Confusion Worse Confounded

Before the revolution, Russia had more than a hundred and fifty religious sects all her own, mostly unknown to the western world. Since the new regime began, many of the western sects are rushing in seeking what opportunity they may find. Four hundred Roman priests are at work in various parts of the empire. The Methodists are at work in Russia, and the Presbyterians seek to enter the field. There is a native Baptist movement and the Disciples claim kinship to the Evangelical Christian movement of Russia, which is, however, more closely related to the Plymouth Brethren.

Plan Theological University at Hartford

The cornerstone for a women's dormitory was laid at Hartford, Conn., recently in connection with the project of a theological university. The new buildings to be erected will provide equipment for five hundred students. According to present standards such a student body would be the leading theological institution of the land. Religious work is now differentiated into a number of professions, preparation for all of which may be secured at Hartford.

Evangelicals Unite with C. E. Movement

When the two branches of the Evangelical church united at Detroit recently, the matter of the union of the young people's societies was considered and acted on favorably. The older denomination had the Young People's Alliance, while the United Evangelical church had the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor. These will be fused into an organization to be known as The Evangelical League of Christian Endeavor, which will cooperate with the United Society. The Evangelical Alliance alone contains 1,635 societies. The young peo-

"The Daily Altar" is the perfect Christmas gift. Don't neglect it in making up your Christmas list. (Gift edition, in leather, $2.50; bound in beautiful purple cloth, $1.50. Add 8 cents postage per copy).

What is The Daily Altar?

IT IS A GUIDE and inspiration to private devotion and family worship. Presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these hurried and high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost. this beautiful book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

The authors of the book are Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison.

ESTIMATES OF THE BOOK

The Christian Advocate: This compact volume will be very helpful in the stimulation of family worship. a grace that has been a diminishing factor in the family life of Amerca for some time. It will be a great advantage to the religious life of the nation if this asset of faith and prayer can again become effective among us. And this book, with its excellently arranged selections for each day, will be of large assistance in that direction.

The Homiletic Review: If we are to meet, successfully, the great and growing number of problems in this eventful time, it is necessary that the quiet hour of meditation be observed as never before. For only a mind nicely poised, only a spirit daily enriched and nourished and guided by an unselfish purpose can adequately meet the situation. Every aid, therefore, to thoughtfulness and prayer should be welcomed, as we do this manual before us. It has been prepared "with the purpose of meeting in an entirely simple and practical manner some of the needs of individuals and households in the attainment of the sense of spiritual reality."

The Presbyterian Advance: For meeting the need of those who would enjoy the privilege of daily prayer, but scarcely know how to begin, the authors have prepared this excellent and beautiful book.

The Central Christian Advocate: Beautifully bound, this book with its tasty and neat appearance, prepares one for the equal taste and care in its contents. Of all books for devotional use, this one in appearance and contents cannot be too highly commended.

The Christian Standard: The binding and make-up of the book are beyond all praise.

The Christian Evangelist: This book is beautifully arranged, handsomely bound and typographically satisfying. It should be a real help toward restoring the family altar.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D.D.: "The Daily Altar" is a bit of fine work. It certainly provides something to grow up to. Unlike many books of devotion, it is free from pious platitudes and pays the highest respect to the intelligence of its readers. Its devotional spirit is pervasive.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor Emeritus The Christian Evangelist: The book is happily conceived, happily worked out and most beautifully bound.

Price of the book, $1.50 in beautiful purple cloth; in full leather, $2.50.

ple of the two denominations have been almost solidly in favor of a union of the two denominations, hence they will find much joy in the new fellowship.

Will Educate Ministers at Greeley

While ministers tread on each other's toes in the middle west, in the Rocky Mountain region vast areas do not have a single located minister. This is true in Catholic churches as well as in Protestant. Bishop Johnson of the Episcopal church has started a theological school at Greeley, Col., where students for the ministry will be trained in the atmosphere of the state university. This may lead to similar steps on the part of other denominations. The hope is to raise up a native ministry which will not be lured away by calls to the east, as happens now to eastern bred men who have received their training in the east.

Jews Will Meet in World Congress

It is reported that the Jews are about to call a world congress to consider some of their fundamental problems. Anti-semitic hatred is flaming up afresh in many parts of the world. Every country which has economic troubles tends to blame these upon the Jews, and Austria is reported to be ripe for a series of pogroms. In Palestine the situation is difficult and the Jews are alarmed over reports that the British government is about to turn over the mandate for Palestine to the pope of Rome. Mohammedan forces in Palestine are also very hostile to Jewish occupation.

Conservative Presbyterians Want to Split

In most of the denominational camps of America an ultra-orthodox minority is demanding that the "rationalists" withdraw from the denomination, and if they do not withdraw, that they be thrown out. Disciples and Baptists will recognize the sentiment contained in the following editorial printed recently in a conservative Presbyterian journal, The Presbyterian:

"The rationalists have intruded their teaching into the Presbyterian and other churches, and they ought in all honor and manliness to meet the issue fairly and openly. These two parties cannot dwell together. They have tried and failed. The rationalists are constantly and violently imposing their teachings and practices. The separation has already begun. It is only a question as to who shall be on the outside, the rationalists or evangelicals. The Presbyterian church belongs to the evangelicals, historically and by rights. The rationalists should withdraw in peace."

will be especially valuable to the thoughtful readers of "The Christian Century" for understanding present-day international problems and tendencies, and indispensable to those interested in the world-wide activities of the Christian Church. These carefully-compiled, well-edited articles will appear quarterly in 1923 in which, representing the Protestant missionary forces of the entire world, has exceptional facilities for studying and estimating movements and events, both international and inter-racial, which bear on the missionary enterprise. It is because of these facilities that authoritative articles are sought by ministers, laymen, educators and missionary administrators for careful study.

The Missionary Survey of the Year 1922
which will occupy a large part of the January 1923 number, will present the present missionary situation with a completeness and accuracy not found elsewhere.

Specific Problems and Spiritual Movements in Mission Fields
are discussed with a thoroughness arising from the special facilities of the "Review" which enable it to keep in close touch with missionary problems in the entire world. A few articles which will appear early in 1923 are "Polygamy and the Christian Church in West Africa" (Bishop Melville Jones), "The Christian Church and Public Health" (Dr. Arthur Lankester and others), "The Kilafat Movement in India" (W. Paton), "Relative Racial Capacity" (Dr. D. J. Fleming). Among contributors to the "Review" are such outstanding missionary authorities and students as Robert E. Speer, Charles R. Watson, Samuel M. Zwemer, Canon Gairdner, and James H. Franklin. To an unusual degree the "Review" reflects the viewpoint of native leaders of the Christian Church on the mission field, affording an insight into the missionary movement not otherwise obtainable.

Meaty Book Reviews
All important books on missions appearing in English, French, German and in Dutch are carefully reviewed in detail. These reviews appear over the signature of some of the most careful students of missions, giving the reader the gist of current missionary literature in these four languages.

The "Review" is published in the months of January, April, July and October.

Subscription price: $2.50 per year, 75c a copy.

Is Liberalism Losing?

The achievements of the past three years are superficially disappointing.

The nations of the world, after a war to end war, are still enmeshed in the toils of the old diplomacy and the pre-war militarism.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

tells you what the liberal mind of England is thinking about the serious problems of today. Week by week it has an unbiased discussion of international politics, a complete presentation of important general news from every country, and a full book review that keeps the reader posted on the best in current literature.

Given an hour or two of time each week The Manchester Guardian Weekly will keep a man's knowledge of the world in repair and enable him to be an authority in that subject in which it tells most to be an authority—one's own times.

Give Your Pastor This Wonderful Set of Books

Maclaren's Expositions

With a First Payment of Only $5

Edited by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, LL.D.

With Five Days' Examination Privilege to The Christian Century Readers

THIS is a set of books which he will prize in the using; these with his Bible and his own fundamental knowledge of things human and Divine, will provide spiritual and mental meat and drink for himself and those who look to him for spiritual teaching and uplift. Send no money in advance. They are offered to the readers of The Christian Century at a price less by 37% than this monumental work sold at in its original 34 volumes.

Read these Sixteen Authoritative Opinions of this Great Work

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D., Recently Pastor Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York:

Dr. Maclaren is as distinguished for his mastery of the Bible in the original language as for his marvelous oratory.

Rev. Robert S. MacArthur, D.D., President of World's Baptist Congress, New York:

The wide circulation of these volumes will prove a blessing to the entire Christian Church.

Prof. William Cleaver Wilkinson, Author of "Modern Masters of Pulpit Discourse":

Dr. Maclaren's work equals, if it does not exceed in present practical value to ministers, any single similar body of production existing in any literature, ancient or modern.

The Continent:

These Expositions are the ripe fruitage of a long pulpit life. It is a modern preacher's commentary. It is a busy student's short cut to the main spiritual meanings of the Bible.

The Christian Advocate:

It would be difficult to find in equal compass so much of sound learning and spiritual insight.

The Christian World:

Dr. Maclaren's work is fresh, stimulating, brightened by the play of a sanctified imagination, and equally helpful in the closet and the study.

The Westminster:

The complete set forms a commentary on the entire Bible that cannot be replaced by any other.

The Congregationalist:

Fruitful and stimulating lessons to living men and women. These volumes have abiding value.

The Presbyterian:

Dr. Maclaren expresses his thought in such exquisite and accurate language as to put it into the reader's heart.

The Baltimore Methodist:

Spiritual wisdom, sound and lucid exposition, apt and picturesque illustration, are combined in Dr. Maclaren's work.

The Record of Christian Work:

Of priceless value to ministers and Bible students alike.

The Christian Intelligencer:

Of superlative value as a contribution to Biblical knowledge. Truly a monumental achievement!

The British Weekly:

Few, if any, expositors have the same felicity as Dr. Maclaren in perceiving and lifting into prominence the really essential points.

The Outlook

These volumes are a treasury of thought for all who study the Scriptures.

The Baptist Argus:

Dr. Maclaren, a Colossus, seizes upon the hilltops of importance.

The Christian Index:

Nowhere can there be found clearer exposition of the Word, deeper insight into its spirit, nor richer clothing of its truths in language.

IS YOUR OWN WORK EFFICIENT? In these days such great emphasis is being placed upon the mechanical and social activities of Church organization that failure of the real object of the Church's mission is threatened. Safety against such a condition is provided only in the highest spiritual equipment of preacher and teacher. The people will follow devotion to fixed and well-established principles. The money to equip and work the machinery of an active Church will come freely from a people who can "give a reason for the hope" that is in them.

WHICH ARE THE SUCCESSFUL CHURCHES? Cast your mind back over the preachers who come to your easy recollection. You will agree that where the preaching has been of the Evangelical expository type there have been enduring results. D. L. Moody; C. H. Spurgeon; G. Campbell Morgan; Joseph Parker; F. B. Meyer; J. H. Jowett; Alexander Maclaren; George F. Pentecost, and many more are conspicuous examples. Is it not notable that not one of these men depended upon so-called timely topics or essays—but rather on emphasis upon the teachings of the Word of God?

HOW ABOUT YOUR OWN CHURCH? The mission of your Church is not to go into active competition along parallel lines with the theatre, the moving picture show, the lecture platform, or the concert hall; if you do you are defeated before you begin. The message and the power of the Church are greater than any one or all of these social forces combined. The world is hungry to-day for the Gospel—and its need is great. The success of your Church and of every Church is in the effectiveness of the pulpit message—in the simple, earnest, fearless preaching and teaching of the Word of God—such preaching and teaching as Maclaren's.

S. S. SCRANTON COMPANY,
110 Trumbull St., Hartford, Conn.

Send me the set of Maclaren's Expositions of Holy Scripture in 17 volumes, for which I will pay you $5 within five days after receiving the books and $3 each month for ten months ($35 in all) or $32 in full within five days. I reserve the privilege of returning the books to you within 5 days and I will owe you nothing.

EDITORIAL

Not a War Policy But a Peace Policy

OF the stream of letters from Christian Century readers commenting on our attitude toward the near east crisis a sufficient number prompt us to say a further word by the assumption that our attitude implies war or the threat of war against Turkey. Interestingly enough, our readers who write upon this assumption are divided into two classes, one of which protests against while the other ardently approves our "war policy!" The reading of such communications is both humbling to our consciousness of journalistic skill and to our pride in our readers' perspicacity. We cannot see how our demand that Mr. Hughes accept for America a place of responsibility in the league of nations or else make some serious attempt to live up to the Republican campaign promise that it would form some "association of nations," is a demand that would involve this country in European entanglements implying our willingness to engage again in a European war. Nor do we consent for a moment to a militaristic interpretation of our oft-repeated plea for American intervention in the near east. If there were to be war The Christian Century is by no means convinced as to which side would command its sympathies. Just as in response to M. Clemenceau's plea that America form an alliance with France and England against Germany our practical though by no means our ultimate reply would have to be that we are not sure but that in the event of another war between France and Germany our sympathies would be with Germany, so with respect to the near east it is by no means clear that all the guilt of that highly complex situation is with Turkey. Facts are coming to light which tend to make credible at least a part of Turkey's contention that the horrors of Smyrna and the retreat were of Greek origination. In the near east the whole European chaos of hatred and suspicion, of nationalistic, religious and imperialistic cross-purposes, finds its present most acute expression. What is needed is not the intervention of American military force—that would only spread the contagion of Europe's disease to America and through her to the entire world. But Europe needs counsel; it needs that the solving and healing truth shall be spoken, not merely by newspapers and writers of books, or by individual statesmen, but by a great, respected and distinterested moral tribune such as the league of nations with America in it would be, or some association of nations such as President Harding championed when he was seeking the votes of the American people. That America's participation in such an international fellowship of justice and reconciliation implies to any mind the use or the threat of war is a dismal commentary upon our historic failure to conceive our international relationships in any terms save those of self-interest and military force.

Too Late to Save Armenia Now

EVENTS, however, seem to be swiftly relieving us of the responsibility of giving Mr. Hughes a popular mandate to intervene directly in the situation of which the new Turkish democratic state is the center. A tragedy that has in it much of the majesty of the judgment day has pronounced doom upon us who would have saved the Christian minority groups in the near east but kept putting off our action until a more convenient season. Week by week it is becoming more clear that it is now too late to save Armenia. The nation is virtually already extinguished. Ninety-five per cent of the men of the minority groups in Anatolia have been massacred or have fled. Of the million yet remaining, nearly all women and children, the difficult but heroic machinery of the Near East Relief will be able to save permanently but a few. Thus we see enacted before our eyes the annihilation of a people that has for over three thousand years withstood the mutations of empires whose rise and fall have made epochs in world history. Egypt, Chaldea, Persia, Greece, Rome, Arabia and Turkey all have held sway over Armenia, but it was reserved for the new Turkish state to complete a work of destruction carried on for generations by the now defunct Turkish empire. All this has taken place before the eyes of a fully informed western Christendom whose imperialistic ambitions and economic greed tied its hands and rendered them impotent to offer effective succor. Meanwhile over $120,000,000 of American money has been spent on measures of relief, education and missions, with death as its reward. The hour of effective direct intervention by America is in all human likelihood past. The Turkish democracy holds sway. It will gain and possess Constantinople and Thrace. Whether it, rather than the allies, is to have control of the straits or not is no longer a vital consideration from the military point of view, since a bombardment of Constantinople from the air would hardly need to reckon with those fortifications which stood impregnable against the British attack in the Gallipoli campaign. The new state of Turkey will complete its purpose to extirpate every alien survival and make the population within its borders homogeneous. Meanwhile a million and a half of refugees are outside of Turkish rule. Such of them as the Near East Relief with its present herculean effort is unable to save, will die of hunger and exposure. Many will find homes and be assimilated in Greece, Italy, the United States and South America. Their ancient culture will be preserved only in the pages of history. The judgment of God is pronounced and as good as sealed against the "Christian" nations which passed by on the other side while the wounds of Armenia cried out for some good Samaritan to come to its aid with protection and healing.

The Church Problem on the Stage

MINISTERS who denounce the stage are under some obligation to appreciate the courtesy of playrights who set themselves the task of presenting the minister's cause. "Thank-U," which is showing in Chicago this winter, is a most friendly interpretation of the minister's life. An idealist in the pulpit and a friend to the people is the rector of the play, albeit he suffers from the small-town gossip which abounds all to often in the churches. The domination of the vestry by an old money-bags is patiently borne by the minister though it often results in curtailment of his plans for work in the community. The young niece with French ways who takes up residence in the rectory makes a serious problem for the prudes of the parish. A girl who smokes cigarettes must be bad through and through! The vestry meeting scene will convulse any minister who has any sense of humor left. The piffling economies which engage most of the attention of this church-governing body to the exclusion of religious and humanitarian concerns is all too true to fact, and is confined to no one denomination. Perhaps the solution of the minister's problem found in the play is not a big one. A rich man whose son has been rescued from wrong habits insists that the minister in the past has been treated as a "thank-you" man, living on the little fees and donations of the parish, so he gives enough to make the minister independent. A butler is installed at the rectory, too. Most ministers would prefer to be emancipated from the mean little economies of their existence through another means than the coming of a rich patron, however benevolent, but the point that the play makes is altogether true: the community degrades the minister by a beggarly wage and then fails to respect him after he has made his sacrifice. Though it is full of happy humor, one would not call the production a work of art, but it indicates an attitude of friendliness on the part of theatrical people. And the public does not altogether dislike ministers or people would not fill the house every night to see the play.

He Made the Journey and Kept All His Treasure

READERS of The Christian Century who know of the close fellowship existing between this journal of religion and the late Philip H. Gray of Detroit, whose death is recorded elsewhere in this issue, will be able partly to estimate the quality of his philanthropic impulses by just the fact that he did have sympathetic and practical fellowship with this paper. He grew to mature manhood in an atmosphere of religious doctrines far removed from those which characterize these columns. Until some years after his marriage to the daughters of a distinguished Methodist minister he was a member of the Plum Street Church of Christ in Detroit, representing that wing of the Disciples movement opposed to missionary societies, instrumental music in worship and salaried pastors, and practicing not only close communion but in many cases "close contributions" as well. The evolution of this Christian layman's mind and sympathies from the legalistic system in which he was brought up to the breadth and richness of vision and interest characteristic of his later years is an inopportune though tempting theme for the friendly pen that writes these words. Yet this spiritual pilgrimage of Philip H. Gray is one which in varying degrees thousands of unprofessional Christian laymen are now in process of experiencing. The most grateful aspect of the adventure in the case of Mr. Gray was not the fact that he arrived at a high goal of new intellectual vision, but that, arriving there, he brought with him all the rich endowment of piety and faith characteristic of the parental household and the faithful flock from whose doctrinal fold he had wandered far away. Too often, alas, this intellectual evolution is accompanied by a spiritual tragedy. Not so in the case of Philip H. Gray. As a lay teacher of the "same" young people's class for a score of years he brought to his students a wealth of biblical understanding, liberated from narrowing dogma and vitalized by his own personal, glowing, inner fellowship with God. He made the intellectual transition without loss either of spiritual faith or spiritual power. He shared professionally the fundamental presupposition of The Christian Century's message, namely, that modern views of the Bible, of God, of Christ, and of the church's task in the social order are not ends in themselves, nor substitutes for spirituality, but means of enriching the life of the spirit and of releasing the impulses of a yet finer devotion. Coming to the aid of this paper at a crucial moment in its history, none more than he rejoiced in the wide and significant constituency of whose views and aspirations it has become a distinctive interpreter.

The American Legion and World Peace

IT is interesting to note that the allied Veterans of the World War were represented at the recent convention of the American Legion in New Orleans. The Veterans of the World War is an association of those who took part side by side from the different nations. Mr. J. B. Cohen of Great Britain appeared before the American Legion as the spokesman of the Allied Veterans. Mr. Cohen laid before the Legion eight points upon which the wounded veterans of this inter-allied federation have agreed. Among these eight points are three or four of great significance. In the first place they insist that all international agreements among governments which affect the entire people shall be open and above board with full publicity. Again they are opposed to all territorial aggrandizement by nations. They insist that an international court be established to which all nations shall take their cases for adjudication. Almost simultaneously with this demand such a world court has been established by the league of nations and it is intimated by our government that we may have part in it. But perhaps most important of all as coming from these soldiers is the demand that "as rapidly as conditions permit and when the decrees of such court become operative (except the machinery necessary to maintain them and the minimum police forces) to entirely disarm land, sea and air forces and destroy the implements of warfare."

World Convention Rallies Liquor Foes

THE world convention of the temperance forces at Toronto during the last week in November was one of the outstanding meetings of the autumn season. Coming from various nations of earth, the delegates, who represented a wide variety of societies, gave the most optimistic account of the way the mind of the world is changing with regard to alcohol. Press reports from Germay gave good cheer to the gathering, for temperance mass meetings are being held in various sections, and many villages have voted themselves dry with overwhelming majorities. While temperance sentiment among German-Americans lags, the motherland under the whip of poverty and disaster dares to face fundamental issues in the reconstruction era. Parliament when it convenes in London will have for the first time a prohibitionist member. This is not much, but it indicates that in Great Britain progress has been made when even one district will elect a representative on a dry platform. The convention also finds comfort in the attitude of the President and his cabinet in the United States. The whole business of enforcing the law is receiving attention at their hanls and the department which has the prohibition laws in hand will undergo a thorough house-cleaning. In spite of the nullification efforts of a liquor-owned press, and the clamor of a wet minority, the referendums in the various states show for the most part an ever-increasing vote in behalf of law-enforcement. The majority in Ohio anl in California this year on the referendum vote was greater than ever, and even in Illinois, which is filled with unassimilated immigrants, less than one-half of the voters declared in favor of the wets, while many drys following the advice of the Anti-Saloon league did not vote. The convention at Toronto is not following a mirage. The same facts that made the United States vote for prohibition will prevail everywhere at last. Putting the ban on liquor means longer life, greater material prosperity, happier homes, and more efficient industry.

Activities of Peace Societies in Japan

EIGHT peace and kindred organizations were recently brought together into a new council. Other organizations will be affiliated later. These eight organizations are: the Japan Peace Society, the League of Nations Association, the Tokyo Y. M. C. A., the Women's Peace Society, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Y. W. C. A., the Association for the Reduction of Armament, the Japanese branch of the World Alliance for International Friendship. The council is first undertaking a co-operative movement for the reduction of armaments. As a result of the Washington conference, Japan expects to save 250,000,000 yen on her navy and the army will save 400,000,000 yen in the next ten years. The appropriation for the coming year will be much reduced. The total naval appropriation in 1921 was over 500,000,000 yen. The total appropriation for 1923 is expected to be less than 320,000,000 yen. There is a strong demand for a further reduction. In regard to the army the people wish that it might be cut to half the present number of divisions but the military authorities are opposed to this demand. Japan has evacuated Siberia and Shantung.

In the Novels and in Life

FICTION writers of the realist school in America have been growing sentimental over the glories of free love since the war. The best sellers either had the heroine committing adultery or flirting with it, a situation supposed to represent what actually goes on in the average home in our world, for the realist would scorn to represent life other than it is. Meanwhile the newspapers would seem to indicate that the freedom which has been glorified by fiction writers and formerly exhibited upon the screen has been sampled by some folks. The press has served up to the public in continued daily chapters the tragedy of two clergymen's homes. The disgusting details of the South Bend case drag on through weary weeks. Yet the reporters who tell the story of these domestic troubles have done the public an unwitting service. Free love in the novels always means elevation of the spirit and fresh spiritual power. In real life it means the reverse. This kind of freedom as we see it in real life is but little removed from the coarsest animality. It is ugly, sometimes hideous. It has broken the careers of men who had the promise of greatness in them, not because of society's prejudice entirely, but because the men themselves have found their talents tarnished by lust. The women have lived through a hell of jealousy, and sometimes have come into crime under the devil's whip. And the reporter has not failed to tell us about the children. Their tragedy is greater than that of their parents. Not only do they have the scornful finger pointed at them everywhere. That might be charged to society's prejudice. But they grow up hearthungry for a love that has been denied them. It is from the children of the unfaithful that the underworld recruits most of its harlots, criminals, and outcasts. Monogamy is more than a prejudice of the pious. It is written not only upon the tables of stone; it is engraved on the fleshly tablets of men's hearts. No society has ever been perfectly monogamous, but it has been only in societies that have come nearest to the divine ideal of the home that human life has reached its greatest dignity and happiness.

From Syllogism To Symbol

RELIGION, dealing so often with intangible things, presents an easy temptation for men to be victimised by their own vocabulary. Words have a mighty power of hindering thought. Not with any touch of the cynicism of Tallyrand, but simply as a sober statement of fact, do we often find that language reveals facts while concealing the truth. Instead of being a guide-post to truth beyond the forms of faith it becomes a high line fence wherein facts are corralled in captivity. And truth still ranges the far infinities. If language has been at once the strength and the weakness of Protestantism in past centuries, especially as it was mediated through Puritanism, it is now encouraging to note that the children of the children of the Puritans are at last beginning to outgrow the slavery of religion to forms of words. We do not have the naive belief that our fathers did with regard to the sufficiency of language for the articulation of our faith. No longer do we feel that words are all comprehensive and all powerful. The Puritan, being an intellectual child of his age, assumed that nothing was so great but its essence could be captured in a word. All things in heaven above, or on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, were amenable to words. With adamic facility these Puritans were able to give all things a name. From an abridged volume by the Rev. G. Burder of Owen's work on "Pneumatologia" bearing the information "Third Edition," 1820, one finds this sub-title: A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit: wherein an account is given of His Name, Nature, Personality, Dispensation, Operations, and Effects: HIS WHOLE WORK in the old and new creation is explained; and the doctrine concerning it vindicated." What need of aught else was there for such a one who could explain all through the mighty power of words!

It was a strange conceit of these men of a former time that all things could be compassed in language. Dr. W. N. Clarke has some words of wisdom in his "Outline of Christian Theology," wherein he shows how easy it is for men to think that they can rear a complete and rounded system of theology which finds full and inclusive articulation through words, words, words. Walter Rauschenbusch, in one of his incisive comments tinged with irony, has well said of the creed of the Methodist church, which it inherited from Puritanism, that "it seems to get the better of the starry universe"; while if one would find where this naive belief in the power of words led philosophy it is but necessary to recall the titles of such works of the eighteenth century as Tolland's "Christianity, Not Mysterious," and Locke's work on "The Reasonableness of Christianity." It was a day when men were not given to quoting the words of the psalmist who exclaimed, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me." The power of the syllogism was at its height, and, be it noted, the vital power of religion was at its lowest ebb. Just as Amy Lowell has recently reminded us that "man is something other than a synthesis" so religion is something more than a syllogism. Not always are the lives of men touched to finer issues by an argument. Intellectuality as often as not fails to quicken the emotional life to expression. And where the syllogism fails, the symbol succeeds. Words, words, however many-syllabled and numerous do not contain all the good of our Christian faith. There is a faith beyond the forms of faith. There is a glory and a dream that never was on land or sea. Who or what shall catch for us the evanescent glories of the unseen life and make of them things of everlasting worth. There are times and occasions when, like Paul, we are carried into the third heaven: "thoughts, feelings, flashes, glimpses come and go; we cannot speak them." Words cannot enwrap them, but to make them communicable to our fellows we turn to the symbol.

This is the gate of freedom through which we can move to greater hope and larger life. We are not of those who fetter themselves with the shackles of accuracy and call it Truth. Truth must be sought on the heights of vision as well as at the bureau of information. "The bed is shorter than a man can stretch himself on it, and the covering narrower than a man can wrap himself in it." We need not merely to stretch our limbs, we need room to spread our wings. And thus symbolism becomes for us the highway to the ineffable.

Were it to our present purpose it would be easy to show that in common life as well as in the socalled more religious phases of it we have come into a new valuation of the symbol as a means for the interchange of thought. Turn the pages of the modern magazine and the value of the symbol for life will be revealed in a two-fold sense.

With this observation in mind notice how dependent the advertiser is upon the power of the symbol to express his particular claim, while one can scarcely read through an article today, having to do with any phase of life but that one comes on the use of the word symbol. We have reacted far from the complacency of the eighteenth century philosophers, and, be it added, from the presupposition of nineteenth century science that facts are all. Having followed the road of their beckoning to the point where their inadequacy as a disclosure of truth stands revealed, we are turning in these days to the liberating values of symbolism.

For us who look at life from the religious point of view it is worthy of note that the theologian, Dr. D. C. Mackintosh, who has done most in our day to show that theology is an empirical science is also the one who has most to say of the values of symbolism for faith. In philosophy the same trend is noticeable. Hocking tells us in his own suggestive way that "religion is so spiritual a thing as not to be able to dispense with the material," while Bergson in his "Creative Evolution" freed our minds from "the Spencerian snare of mechanical explanation." Today we are emancipated from "the long nightmare of empirical slavery" which has played so terrible a part in the thought of the last two centuries. Today God is to us "the Nameness of a hundred names." Therefore we call to our aid symbol as well as syllogism.

And when we say "we" in this connection we are thinking of the plain practical men and women who lead our Sunday schools and churches. What means the present interest in pageantry if it is not a proof of what we have been saying with regard to symbolism? The average man may think he has said all in saying that it is but a new form of entertainment, but the psychologist knows that the genius of pageantry is the embodiment of the spiritual through symbolism. It is not a mere photograph of experience, it is a glimpse into the unseen. To paraphrase the words of Freeman we may say: "Things more excellent than any pageant are expressed through pageants." Some prosaic folk see in a pageant nothing more than a decorative scheme; they who are wise see in it a divine revelation. Or again we find that increasingly in religious education we are depending upon the power of art and even architecture to impart the truths of religion. The symbol carries the truth across from essence to expression, from teacher to pupil, where words "in closest truth" fail.

There are those in our Protestant churches who have not discerned that in symbolism we have something more than an aid to the aesthetic appreciation of life. By all means let us be appreciative of that phase of symbolism, but not to the neglect of the diviner aspect of its distinctly spiritual values. It is well to enrich our sanctuaries with all that is beautiful, but our love of the beautiful will be but a pagan passion if there is not some suggestion of the ineffable in the things that are beautiful. Without this added fact our churches will be only pretty.

If we have analyzed the present psychology aright Protestantism is at the dawn of a new renaissance. Our gateway of freedom lies open. No longer do we feel it necessary to enslave ourselves with words and systems of words. We feel also the need of the quickening power of symbols. It is more effective to surmount our steeples with the flaming cross than it is to place the text, "God is Love" in the same place. As Protestants we have long given symbolism a theoretical place in our worship. We even pray in song: Hold thou thy cross before my closing eyes," but we have been too timid to answer our own prayers! The day is past when all of truth can be expressed in a syllogism. A faith that is adequate will use the liberating power of symbolism for its own enrichment and interpretation.

Urbane Democracy

A GOOD many people dislike democracy because they think that it inevitably breeds crass and rude men and women without grace of thought or nobility of bearing. They think that democracy consists in bringing all people down to a common level of mediocrity where everybody is comfortable because nobody has any distinction of mind or spirit. It is rather important to remind such people now and then that there are a good many people to whom democracy is not a low-lying plain where everybody is to live but a mountain which everybody is to be allowed to climb. It is not distinctions to which such thinkers object. It is artificial distinctions which dwarf personality and restrain ambition and crush aspiration. They believe in standards of taste and character. But they believe in a society which is all the while making it easier for all people to conform to these standards.

The whole matter can be put in one penetrating question: Can democracy produce the aristocratic virtues? And perhaps this is the most important question which democracy has to face today. A good many clamorous voices are lifted the moment the question is raised. There are those who declare that only a decadent society with an effete social group in control produces the effeminate refinements which are so dear to the subtly sophisticated mind. There are those who declare that the battle for economic rights will inevitably be a hard and unlovely affair. When the great contention is over and the smoke of the conflict has cleared away it will be time enough to talk about the graces of civilization. It is an impertinence to talk about the delicate refinements to people who are underfed and overworked, to people who lack pure air and wholesome sunshine and warm clothing. The graces of the new society will be the natural expression of its developing life. It is far and away too soon to talk about good manners while the economic conflict is at white heat. There are those who insist that the amenities of the life we know are all the result of sanctions we are outgrowing. The age of machinery will produce its own social code even as it has produced its own standards of production. Give the machines a chance. Before long they will be secreting poetry and creating sanctions of deportment all of which will have the sincerity of the life which produces them. We cannot carry the manners of feudalism into the age of highly organized mechanical production and transportation. And there is more of this sort to be said in various ways and with varied qualities of emphasis.

When we begin to think these things over a bit the atmosphere begins to clear. There does not really seem to be any reason why a man should be impolite just because he has learned how to drive an automobile or control a machine in a modern factory. Indeed, since the machine does so much of the work once wearily done by human hands it would seem clear that part of the energy released from unlovely tasks might well be used in the cultivation of all the gracious amenities of life. There is no reason why a man fighting for a more just and brotherly world should be less gracious in his demeanor than the soldiers who fought with such chivalric eagerness for causes which will not bear a very searching scrutiny from the modern student. In fact, it seems clear that if we lose the noble and gracious things while we are fighting we shall descend to the level of our practices and the golden radiance of ampler ways of living will be lost forever from our sky. There is such a thing as victory which leaves the victor unable to make any noble use of his triumph. The battler for social justice, for the sake of his soul must fight for every capacity for the appreciation of the gracious and the lovely even as he fights for a new economic opportunity.

The study of multitudes of men in whose eyes there shines the light of the hope of a better day reveals the sad fact that many of them are thinking only of the material result and have no eye for moral or spiritual or aesthetic values. And so in a sense they are defeated even before they begin to fight. And so a material victory would sometimes mean only a fuller revelation of poverty of ambition and hope and aim. It is true that tragic economic conditions have often produced this lethargy. It is true that we must go back of the men to the environment which made certain limitations almost inevitable. At the same time it is clear that each step of the journey toward the better day must be taken with open eyes and with heart kindled with high expectation which cannot be expressed merely in the terms of physical welfare. All men must be taught that the art and the music and the letters of the world belong to them. They must be taught that the deepest ethical insight of the world belongs to them. They must be taugh that the spiritual splendor of the life of the seers belongs to them. And with disabling circumstance brushed aside they must be brought face to face with the summons for self-discipline, for noble restraint, for industry and for the patient learning which must be met by those who would indeed enter into the promised land.

It is this ampler aspiration which will give new dignity and new moral and spiritual quality to the whole struggle for social justice. Not merely a full dinner pail; but a full mind, a full heart, a nobly disciplined taste, and a capacity for all the lovely ways of a nobly ordered life are to be brought within the reach of all men. So democracy will produce the aristocratic virtues. So the community of noble disciplined spirits shall at last become possible in the world.

The Purifying Plant

A Parable of Safed the Sage

NOW there came to me an Engraved Invitation, paid for by the money of the Taxpayers, and saying unto me and unto many others:

The Honour of thy Presence, with Ladies, is desired at the Formal Opening of the Purifying Plant which the City hath Erected. And behold, it is the Greatest and Most Modern and Most Wonderful in the World.

Wherefore we went, I and Keturah and behold, it was more wonderful than they had promised that it would be.

And there were may Noted Men and Women there, and they served us Refreshments, and gave unto each Lady a Rose, and for all of it did the Tax Payers pay.

Now one of the Engineers took me and Keturah, and showed unto us the Whole Works.

And first, the Vile and Filthy Water that cometh from the Sewer is pumped up, and made to run through a Grating, where men stand with Rakes, and remove all Large Objects, Cats and Dogs and such like. And then the water is made to pass over large sloping wheels, with Corrugated Bottoms, which catch the Gravel, and remove it with Brushes. And then the water floweth through a series of Canals, that go forth and turn back, and go and come again, and all the time Air is being pumped through the water from below. And there be other Tanks and Canals, into some of which no Air is pumped. For the method is that of the Killkenny Cats, that fight each other. Even so is it with the Bacteria, which they call Bugs. For there be some that are more easily killed when no air and light is given, but mostly they be given air and light, and plenty of it, and one kind of Bug doth fight another kind of Bug until they all be destroyed.

But this I noticed, that at one stage, they did pump back, into the tanks that were to be purified, some of the Sludge that had been taken out of the tank below.

And I marveled, and I inquired, saying, Wherefore when thou hast wrought so hard to get rid of this stuff, dost thou pump it back?

Now the answer which they gave unto me was in Scientifick Terms, but this is what I understood it to mean. There is a certain Balance of Nature, and it goeth down even into the region of Bacteria. And it were desirable to keep this Balance all the way down, and to eliminate one kind of Bugs just as fast as every other kind. But in certain stages of their work, they succeed too well. They Kill off so many Bugs of one kind, they have to pump back some Bugs of that sort to eat up the Bugs of the other sort. Therefore, do they pump some of the worst of their Sludge back into the Purifying Tank and add more vileness as a part of the process of Purification.

Now I have seen the same method in Politicks, and in various other spheres of life, and I wonder if it must always be so; or whether the time might come when methods of Reform would have such Equilibrium and Efficiency that the process of Bug Destruction could be trusted to carry itself out to a Finish, with righteous men furnishing Light and Air. For at present we have to pump back too many Bugs that we hoped we had eliminated, and still the process of Purification goeth limping.

The Church and the Middle Class

By Reinhold Niebuhr

THE church is the bearer of a gospel of brotherhood and love which is supported not only by the authority of Jesus but by centuries of human experience and which therefore may claim divine sanction without suggesting blasphemy. On the other hand, the church is a very human institution, subject to human prejudices which are aggravated, at least in the case of the Protestant church in America, by the fact that only a few of the classes whose interests are involved in the many problems of social reconstruction are represented in her membership. The church is a middle-class institution. Her membership is drawn from the various middle classes, low and high. If America had an aristocracy it would undoubtedly be well represented in the church, as it is in other countries. But America's custodians of wealth and power do not form a class sharply distinguished from the other classes in traditions and social outlook. They merely form a higher middle class. Whatever it may be termed, it is fairly well represented in the church. The other middle classes are even more largely represented; and labor is absent. This is true in spite of the fact that there is no labor movement in America actively hostile to the church as in many countries of Europe. A few of the higher classes of labor may individually belong to the church but her contact with organized labor is practically nil.

IS LABOR HOSTILE?

Eager social reformers will immediately ascribe this interesting fact to the conservatism of the church on social questions by which she is alleged to have alienated labor. But the facts do not bear out this theory. American labor is not yet hostile to the church; it is simply indifferent. Years ago the church did have laborers in her membership and they did not leave her. They simply graduated into a complacent middle class. The epic of their rise to affluence fills the annals of our history. Roger Babson thinks it is a striking proof of the truth that godliness is profitable unto all things, piety being seemingly the secret of their burst of fortune. But the sober historian will probably ascribe the indubitable fact to a less intriguing cause and record that north Europeans, who were overwhelmingly Protestant, settled this continent, exploited its resources, consolidated their power and have since been importing or generously permitting the immigration of South Europeans to do their "dirty work." These southerners have been mostly Catholic or irreligious.

Whether the Protestant church can or will make an effective appeal to these people is a problem in itself, though it is not unrelated to the greater problem, whether the church can preach a gospel of brotherhood and love and apply it to the issues of economic life, when those classes which are the victims of present economic injustice are not in the church to voice their woes while the privileged classes of the present order are very much in the church and do voice their prejudices. Can the church present a message that is clearly the "voice of God" without accompanying whispers of class prejudice? Can she champion a social ideal that will challenge the special privileges of her friends and inevitably seem to favor those who are not now in her own household? This is the searching question which the church confronts and it is one providentially calculated to test her prophetic keennees of insight and purity of motive.

THE SIN OF EQUIVOCATION

The natural and instinctive reaction to that kind of challenge is equivocation. The true prophet is on the alert against just such natural instincts but the church is not yet sufficiently versed in the prophetic function to which she aspires to be fully conscious of her human instincts. So she has not been above the sin of equivocation. One method of evading the issue, to which the church is easily tempted, is that of abstracting her principles so highly that they will not come into contact with a practical issue. The church declares her faith in the gospel of love and brotherhood but fails to be specific in applying it to the urgent problems of modern life. Economic traditions that violate every principle of brotherhood and racial bigotries that outrage every sentiment of love escape her scorn. Thus the arduous duty of bearing witness against her own friends is circumvented, but at the price of transforming a divine message into a vague and impotent sentimentalisb. For truth is made sterile when divorced from life; and the church can not escape this fact, however she may argue that it is her business to present truth and not to apply it and that she must be careful not to descend into the contentious atmosphere of current economic and social issues. The vague and ambiguous sentimentalism which frequently characterizes religious utterances on economic issues does not only save the powerful elements of her constituency who are now the chief beneficiaries of economic wrong, but it is also a natural expression of the moral convictions of her preponderant middle class membership. Sentimentalism is a middle class vice. Aristocrats and workers are more likely to be realists. The former are not without social responsibilities which discipline their lives and the latter are schooled by their acute needs and miseries to maintain a stoic fortitude. But our modern age of many inventions has built a paradise for our middle classes in which they escape the discipline of adversity and are denied the responsibilities which fall upon the shoulders of the economically powerful, with the result that their moral idealism, unharnessed to specific tasks, issues in impotent sentiment.

NEUTRALITY STAND

Another method of equivocation to which the church sometimes resorts is that of declaring her neutrality between the contending factions in the great economic struggle. She solemnly declares that the gospel recognizes no factions and that the business of the church is to reprove both sides for the depredations which they invariably commit in the heat of the struggle. Thus the church hopes to remain true to the gospel and at the same time play a commanding role in modern life by aspiring to the position of umpire. If her ambition is realized it will doom her to a position of utter futility. The heat of a conflict makes violations of the moral decencies inevitable and the task of the umpire who piously admonishes both sides to be gentlemanly is a thankless and a fruitless one. America knows something about that from her experiences prior to American participation in the great world war. Warfare, both international and intranational is condemned not by its sins but by its sin. It is as morally fruitless to take economic conflict for granted and inveigh against "bad unions" and "bad trusts" as it is to permit wholesale slaughter but draw the line at poison gas. The sin of modern society is that it is so organized as to make economic conflict inevitable, and the business of the prophet is not to preserve some vestiges of decency in the struggle but to find a way of abolishing the conflict. Even if he can not take this high ground he still has a better moral alternative than neutrality and that is to help the more righteous side to win.

THE CHURCH AND THE STRIKE

There are many in the church who are impatient with the equivocation of both an impotent sentimentalism and a futile neutrality and who have the sincere ambition to abolish economic conflict. The Interchurch World movement report on the steel strike and many pronouncements of the Federal Council of Churches prove that the leaders of the Protestant church are moving steadily in the direction of an intelligent application of gospel principles to economic life and fully realize the necessity of changing the whole motive power of our modern industry if industrial strife is to be abolished. But the rank and file of the church is not in step with its leaders and frequently betrays its middle class prejudices when it essays the task of industrial pacification. Lacking imagination, it takes the present industrial organization for granted and throws the burden of guilt upon those who disturb its order. To mention an instance, it generally opposes the strike. In common with average public opinion, it reluctantly grants labor the right to strike in theory but invariably follows the same public opinion in opposing every specific strike. It does so in the name of the principles of brotherhood to which the church is pledged and which the strike is alleged to violate. The strike is outlawed as an anti-social weapon. As industrial warfare is being carried on in larger and larger units, the weapon of labor, the strike, is becoming increasingly anti-social. The general feeling against it seems, therefore, to be justified. But if those who oppose it fail to see and to say that the organization of modern industry, which the strike disturbs and challenges, is as anti-social as the strike itself, they manifest a lack of prophetic detachment from the social order which they are morally evaluating; in other words they prove their middle class prejudices. For the higher middle classes possess the economic power which the strike imperils and the other middle classes enjoy the comforts which the high productivity of modern industry secures for them and in the enjoyment of which they are hindered by its momentary disorganization. Instinctively they blame not the entrenched but the attacking party for the conflict which disturbs their comfort. American newspapers, faithful exponents of the middle class point of view, never tire in their exposition of the "rights of the public," in critical strike situations. These rights must undoubtedly be considered and are frequently unjustly imperiled by unjustified strikes. But a real prophet of brotherhood can not fail to see that the public has obligations as well as rights, and one of them is to see that its comforts are not purchased at the price of the human well-being of the men immediately engaged in their production. The instinctive abhorrence of the strike no doubt arises out of the modern generation's recognition of the vulnerability of its interdependent economic life. The self-sufficiency of the ancient individual, family and communal life has been completely destroyed by the highly complicated processes of modern social life. A strike in any one of the basic industries immediately affects so many interests that physical life itself may become imperiled by industrial disturbances in certain fields of labor. It is only natural that a community should jealously guard its life against the periodic threats of starvation which strikes can make. But society must learn that the best way to guard against them is to remove her vital social and economic processes from the domination of selfish motives which now exploit them. As long as selfishness is enthroned in economic and industrial life labor will not only be provoked to use the weapon of the strike but will be compelled to avail itself of its power to equalize its unequal struggle with capital. Compulsory arbitration, a substitute for the strike which the church now frequently champions, gives labor no adequate guarantee for the progressive development of human well-being in industry. It would never abolish more than the more flagrant specific abuses from which labor suffers. The general public, whose power and opinion would determine the judgments of arbitrators, is too indifferent to the more fundamental inequalities of modern economic life to use its power for the sake of enforcing thoroughgoing changes in economic relationships.

CONSISTENT ALTERNATIVES

If the church wishes to maintain her attitude of antipathy to the strike the principles and ideals of brotherhood will not offer her the justification. She could justify herself only upon the basis of a thoroughgoing and consistent espousal of the ideal of non-resistance. But the church at large has never seriously entertained the ideal of non-resistance. Only a small minority of her prophets have espoused it. The church as a whole has had more sympathy for war with its violent use of physical force than for the strike, which is a form of resistance but does not require the use of physical force. One of the most curious anomalies of respectable public opinion, which the church has too slavishly followed, is that it condemns warfare in theory but always sanctions a specific war, while it sanctions the right to strike in theory but always opposes a specific strike. A consistent prophet of the Christian gospel is compelled to prefer the strike to international war, not only because its weapons are less violent but also because the ends which it seeks are more promising to general human welfare than those of war. The one tries to make the benefits of modern industrial civilization more equally available to all men while the other is frequently fought for the very reason that wealth has not been sufficiently divided but, piling up in vast surplusses, seeks fields of profitable investment in the undeveloped areas of the world where it invariably comes in conflict with the wealth of other nations.

If the church seriously aspires to the position of moral leadership to which the gospel seems to destine her, she must prove her right to that kind of gospel by the kind of prophetic insight which discovers the covert as well as the overt violations of its principles of brotherhood in the complexities of modern life; and by the kind of prophetic sincerity that banishes from her message every vestige of prejudice and bias to which her human associations tempt her. To approximate the prophetic ideal more closely the church must be wise as a serpent in penetrating the moral significance of the intricacies of modern life and harmless as a dove in rendering her judgments without regard to those considerations of expediency which so easily influence her message. Prophets who dare to speak to men in the name of God, as the church does, assume a terrible responsibility and are saved from being humbugs only by the most contrite self-analysis and the most courageous sacrifice of their own interests.

Studies in Sin

The Sins of Adolescence

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

THE ways of young manhood have always been a puzzle and a scandal to graybeards. State, church, home and school, from Roman Juvenal to American juvenile courts, have been at their wits' end to find a place in the moral and social order for a phase of life which is normally abnormal, and whose cosmos is chaos. Solutions have not been lacking. There have been the stern condemnation of self-righteousness from "age outliving heats of youth"; the laissez faire attitude of "sowing wild oats"; the naturalism of those who talk about "necessary evils"; the epicureanism of "the flask of Falnerian and the lips of Lalage"; the frank innocency that sings:

> What is love? 'Tis not hereafter:
> Present mirth hath present laughter;
> What's to come is still unsure;
> In delay there lies no plenty;
> Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty;
> Youth's a stuff will not endure.

But the problem renews itself afresh with every generation. Recent psychological research has, indeed, thrown a flood of light on the nature and causes of those "fits and starts" of youth, and the literature of "adolescence" has at least made for sympathy. But even Stanley Hall and his co-workers will scarcely maintain that the last word has been said; and it is possible that even the psychologists, not to speak of those to whom the problem is more intimate and personal, may be able to learn something from a study by a master psychologist of a typical case of youth and its recovery.

HENRY V. IDEAL HERO

Henry V. is Shakespeare's ideal hero. How much is history and how much invention in the picture may be a question; but, whether historical or inventive, the touch of the dramatist is everywhere that of love and admiration. With reference to no other male character in all his gallery is his eulogy so explicit. Not only does he represent him as the embodiment of the very spirit of England at one of its most heroic moments, but again and again he devises for him situations that reveal a nature touching life harmoniously at every point. Here was a real man, he seems to say, and no counterfeit; a democrat sounding "the very bass-string of humility" in an age of aristocratic aloofness; a despiser of shams, whether in the punctilios of his father's court or Falstaff's "All-Hallow'n summer"; a humorist, who could laugh at life, a moralist who could condemn it, an idealist who could glorify it. His was the genius of friendship. At the top of the scale his courtiers discuss him among themselves in terms which would be fulsome, were they not the poet's way of letting us see how he bound his friends to him with hoops of steel; and at the other end, the London apprentices initiate him into their fellowship:

> Sirrah, I am sworn brother to a leash of drawers; and can call them all by their christen names, as Tom, Dick, and Francis. They take it already upon their salvation that tho' I be but Prince of Wales, yet I am king of courtesy; and tell me flatly I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff, but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy . . . and when I am King of England, I shall command all the good lads in East Cheap.

Yet this paragon is first introduced to us as a youth in "the far country," among the swine, if not the husks. How with dramatic truth to bridge the gulf—to make a hero out of a runagate, or what the wiseacres took for such—was Shakespeare's task. True, he inherited the paradox as part of the English tradition; but he was not anxious to avoid a difficulty which was as much a part of life as the ambition of Macbeth or the jealousy of Othello. If he were no moralist, as they say, at least moral perspective was his in an extraordinary degree, and his sense of dramatic fitness unerringly detected in the wander-jahres of his hero the discipline and struggle out of which came the strength and balance of his developed character. So he lingers lovingly over these years, while the shafts of his humor fall like a promised redemption on their too intimate contacts with low life. And he is just as frank as he is idealistic. He glozes over nothing. His prince "went all the gaits." He was the "black sheep" of the family—the sweet morsel of court gossip. He frequented places of ill-fame. He engaged in street-brawls. He sat at greasy tables on wine-sodden floors, and bandied drunken ribaldry with bawds, cut-purses, ruffians, and knights of the road. Falstaff, with all Shakespeare's love for him, is not the final excuse for these scenes of low life. Henry himself is the excuse; Falstaff and his coterie are just his foil—the background of essential vice against which the prince's basal virtue is displayed, as he fights his way thro' lawlessness to heroship. In them the sin is displayed at its worst, lest the victory go unexplained and its moral be less convincing.

ADOLESCENT REVOLT

Yet there is a path thro' the slough. Shakespeare understands his hero and accounts, if he does not apologize for, his follies—in this, be it said, proving himself the ideal father of this child of his brain. The prince is a study in adolescent revolt. He is doubly a rebel. On the one hand, his father's court irks him. Its pretentiousness, its petty ceremonies, its genuflections, its flattery, its intrigues, offend his sense of reality. He is of Carlyle's opinion that a king should be a king—a konig. a "man who can"—reigning by right of ability, not of plotting and murder. The "Oxford triumphs" that were to celebrate the treasonable coup whereby his father gained the throne, calls forth from him only a gesture of contempt:

> His answer was, he would unto the stews
> And from the common'st creature pluck a flower
> And wear it as a favour; and with that
> He would unhorse the lustiest challenger.

And when on the outbreak of the Percy rebellion, he is summoned to court, it is in no ribald sense we must interpret the scene of the mock court audience:

> Prince: Do thou stand for my father, and examine me upon the particulars of my life.
> Falstaff: Shall I? Content; this chair shall be my stall, this dagger my sceptre, and this cushion my crown.
> Prince: Thy stall is taken for a joined-stool, thy golden sceptre for a leaden dagger, and thy precious crown for a pitiful bald crown.
> Falstaff: Well, and the fire of grace be not quite out of thee, now shalt thou be moved. Give me a cup of sack to make my eyes look red, that it may be thought I have wept; for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Cambyses' vein.
> Prince: Well, here is my leg.

And so he laughs at tinsel royalty. His solemn obeisance is just " a leg." It is all play-acting anyhow—lath, plaster and fustian! Falstaff is as good a king as any—if kingship be but the chance upheaval of civil broils. Indeed, he prefers Falstaff. for he at least is real, as sin is real and hypocrisy is not.

A DEEPER REVOLT

But there is an even deeper revolt in the prince's soul—revolt of the new against the old. He stands not only symbolically, but psychologically as well, for a new era. Here, again, Shakespeare is in the main true to history. The age of chivalry was wearing to its close in a surface show, that could not quite hide its inner decrepitude. It had become a thing of wind, formulas, bombast. The Norman-French influence, always an alien thing, had been waning since Chaucer and the Lollards, while the Anglo-Saxon spirit of democracy heaved tumultuously under the crust of a half foreign nobility. And Prince Hal was the embodiment of that spirit. He is the first great Englishman. He thinks in terms of the nation, not of warring "houses." Better than the knights in shining armor, he loves the common people, their rough humors, their sense of fair play, their forthrightness, their very foibles and weaknesses; and while his father had courted them for policy's sake, he does so because he finds in them a kinship beyond the ken of Lyon King at Arms.

Hotspur here is Henry's opposite, the ideal youth of that feudal generation, the "good boy" who was always being held up as an example to the ne'er-do-weel. Bolingbroke, like many another father, and just as foolishly, wished that he and not Henry were his son:

> O that it could be proved
> That some night-tripping fairy had exchanged
> In cradle-clothes our children where they lay,
> And called mine Percy, his Plantagenet.

With design Shakespeare puts the word "honor" on the lips of both; but with Hotspur it is the honor of an artificial and rhetorical code, worn egotistically as a feather in the cap, with the prince it is that of noble deeds unostentatiously done and not boasted of afterwards.

> By heaven, methinks it were an easy leap
> To pluck bright honor from the pale fac'd moon.

—so Hotspur; and that kind of honor the poet ridicules by giving to Falstaff, the arrant despiser of honor, the "honor" of the fire-eater's death. "If it be a sin to covet honor," says Henry, "I am the most offending soul alive"; and then goes out to kill Percy and let another have his "honor."

And so the prince seeks in the freedom and frolic of the London streets the reality his nature craves. He will experiment with life. Like Don Juan or the rejuvenated Faust—how well Goethe understood youth!—he will taste all flavors and drink of all cups; though unlike those (and this is his salvation), objectively not subjectively, always maintaining an inner detachment which keeps him from being swamped in "mad humors":

> I am now of all humours that have showed themselves humours since the old days of goodman Adam to the pupal age of this present twelve o'clock at midnight . . . Well, thus we play the fools with time, and the spirits of the wise sit and mock us.

A NEEDED EXPLANATION

This surely is the explanation of the passage which at first seems so foreign to the sincerity of his character:

> I know you all, and will a while uphold
> The unyok'd humour of your idleness;
> Yet herein will I imitate the sun,
> Who doth permit the base contagious clouds
> To smother up his beauty from the world,
> That when he please again to be himself,
> Being wanted, he may be more wondered at,
> By breaking thro' the foul and ugly mists
> Of vapors that did seem to strangle him.

As they stand the words are, to use Rolfe's phrase, those of "a charlatan and snob"; and it is, no doubt, possible either that Shakespeare here did "make a great mistake," or that this particular piece of bombast was to please the groundlings with an heroic exit. But the error would be too gross. What Shakespeare must have meant was that his hero, being in reality detached from the baseness of his companions, is here self-consciously—is not youth always self-conscious?—trying to express, albeit in cant phraseology, that sense of mastery of the situation, whose true significance he failed to grasp.

Thus Shakespeare prepares the way for the prodigal's return. His prodigality had been only provisional. He had never been really at home in the Far Country, which was only a baser and temporary substitute for a less dangerous and more stable freedom. The call came when Hotspur, his temperamental enemy, raised the standard of revolt against the throne. His break with his old associates is, if not abrupt, decisive. He pays one more visit to the tavern, when after a final jest, he generously announces that he has procured for Falstaff "a charge of foot," and then, abruptly:

> PRINCE: Bardolph!
> BARDOLPH: My lord?
> PRINCE: Go bear this letter to Lord John of Lancaster, to my brother John; this to my Lord of Westmoreland . . . Go, Pet, to horse, to horse; for thou and I have thirty miles to ride yet ere dinner-time.

The lightning has struck. The roysterer has become a soldier, a patriot, a man of action, and as the scene shifts to the field of Shrewsbury and he meets and vanquishes Percy in fair fight, we see the freedom of the London streets manifest itself on another and nobler stage.

* * * * * * *

Such is the heroic version of the prodigal's return. Has it any message for us in these days of adolescent psychology? In the first place, we note that it is ethically right. Shakespeare is on the side of the angels. He neither endorses sin nor minimizes the dangers of "sowing wild oats." His moral is that of Ecclesiastes: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth: but know that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Judgment is clearly seen in the prince's associates. Bardolph's red nose is more than a jest: it is an emblem, as Falstaff on his death-bed dimly appreciates, of fires more awful, because less material. The dramatist does not shun the conventional ending: vice is punished as in the vulgarest melodrama. Bardolph and Corporal Nym are hanged, Doll Tearsheet ends fittingly in "the 'spital of malady of France," and for all his trick of fun, old Jack dies in terror, crying: "God, God, God!"

Nor does Shakespeare apologize for his hero. There is no hint anywhere of that not uncommon excuse for the immoralities of genius—that it is a question of temperament, of being misunderstood, of being above law, et id genus omne. Sin is sin, whether in the genius or the clodpate. De Quincey's opium, the cups of Charles Lamb, the debauches of Turner, the "sprees" of Poe, Byron's orgies at "The Abbey," the deviltries of Bulwer, the sensuality of del Sarto—are not to be excused on the score of "the nervous organization of the artist." What Shakespeare really thought of the sins of the flesh, whether in youth or age, is seen in Falstaff, the prince's evil genius. The prince is the type of a liberty which, though wrongly exercised at times, never loses altogether its touch with law, while Falstaff represents a liberty that is essentially lawless and licentious, in the primitive meaning of the word. The prince is a libertarian, never a libertine: the artificialities of his father's court drive him into loose ways, but he never ceases to be under law to the deeper dignities and loyalties of life. Falstaff, on the other hand, is the essential libertine, defying every law of right-living—honor, truth, courage, chastity. His grossness is of the soul. He sweats lies as he sweats "lard." His very wit is a sort of libertinism of the mind. Clothing him in that "tun" of flesh and making him the colossal humorist of all literature, shaking the very sky with his enormous laughter, Shakespeare would have us know that there is no trick of wit, nor artifice of sentiment or bonhommie that can win approval for lawlessness of life. And when, at the end, the prince turns on him and says:

> I know thee not, old man, turn to thy prayers, while we are startled for the moment because we have laughed so loud and so long with the old sinner, yet out of the surprise comes the conviction that we are listening to an echo from a higher tribunal which irrevocably links license with defeat and disaster. And the pathos of it is that Falstaff was once young like the prince:

> When I was about thy years, Hal, I was not an eagle's talon in the waist.

and Dame Quickly notes that as he passed, "'a babbled of green fields"—the green fields of a lost innocence.

NATURE TO BLAME

But while all that is true, Shakespeare held the mirror too closely up to nature not to discern that Nature herself was in part to blame for all the trouble. The prince was too big for the palace. In youth there comes a flood-time of life never again repeated, of which the sexual impulse is the most striking but not the only symptom. Energy is at its maximum, and we dam it at our peril. The normal, healthy youth is nature's iconoclast. The staid, the proper, the orderly weary him. He despises what he thinks to be the insincerity of social conventions and usages. He "gets sore" at his parents, because he is not yet wise enough to indulge their harmless pomposities and pretend like "mother" to be interested when "father" demonstrates periodically to the breakfast table "how to eat a herring." Above all, he is adventurous. The teeming life within him is ever urging him to anchor and sail for undiscovered seas. It is the typical voice of youth that sings with Gareth in the idyl:

> And never yet
> Had earth appeared so green or heaven so blue;
> And all my blood danced in me and I knew
> That I must light upon the Holy Grail—

which is all very well so long as it is the Holy Grail that is in question; but unhappily there are unholy counterfeits of the Grail, that hold out the same promise of adventure. The environment of Gareth's youth was at once good and romantic. But not all are so fortunate. Goodness is more frequently associated with dullness than romance, and a stupid security than glorious adventure. In "The Way of All Flesh," Samuel Butler in fierce and unrepentant terms pictures with thinly disguised phrase his own boyhood revolt against the kind of religion exemplified in the home of his father, a stern, old-school evangelical. The picture may be unjust to evangelicalism, but it is only too true to boyhood. Boys do run away, in spirit, if not in body, from such homes and such "religions": homes where goodness is made unattractive and all the zest squeezed out of life; religions, which present the ideal of life in terms which youth resents as an abridgement of its liberty and which offers him no field on which to win his spurs. Meanwhile, there is plenty of liberty and spurs of another kind to win in Mistress Quickly's tap-room and the company of Falstaff and his friends!

> Then hey for boot and spur, lad,
>   And round the world away!
> Young blood must have its course, lad,
>   And every dog its day.

LESSON PLAIN TO READ

The lesson is plain to read. Church and home cannot rid themselves of responsibility for their prodigals. It is a fact that there is much in our current orthodox religion inhospitable to youth. In a church with which the writer is acquainted, the members of a Young People's group were debating the "relative attractions of the church and the world"—the very subject, by the way, being a good example of how not to appeal to adolescents!—when one boy, franker than the rest, said that the trouble with church "affairs" was that "the fellows felt they were under restraint all the time: they could not do even the quite harmless things they really liked to do." It is a valid challenge, not, perhaps, for the church to become a more skillful amusement caterer, but certainly to interpret religion itself in terms of the suddenly expanding life of youth. What is needed is a program that will catch the adolescent imagination. There is an interesting parallel here between youth and art. "Consider," says John Ruskin, in a letter to Stopford Brooke, "what it was to me, when the fact came full in my fairly examining thought that the only work done of any good quality in my own business was by men apparently abandoned by God to their own ways; that on the whole religious people were powerless, that all painting and poetry were done by men like Shelley, Byron, Keats, Turner and the like." He need not have been puzzled. The mediaeval church, starving the intellect and feeding the emotions, was the nursing-mother of art; while, by reversing the process, much of our modern religion has tended, on the whole, to rob life of its glamor and poetry—the very things which are the breath of life to youth and art. Youth is poetry and art in action; and the same cause that stifles the artist, alienates the youth. It need not be so. As Donald Hankey has poined out, there is an essential religion in many young men, which goes unrecognized even by themselves because the official interpretation of religion precludes it even as a possible basis for a fuller religious experience, yet youth is of the same heroic stuff of which Christianity itself is made. True religion is youthful—radiant, adventurous, free. It provides the ideal outlet for youth. The late William James spoke of "the moral equivalent of war." It is for the church to discover the moral equivalents of the far country.

But the tempest of youth has a racial as well as an individual significance. Prince Henry, in Shakespeare's thought, represented the rising generation. He stood for a new England. This, also, is true to life. Youth is nature's artifice to keep the world perpetually on the move. The young are the pioneers, the adventurers, the discoverers of new truth, the exponents of new faiths. As Mr. Barrie has so eloquently pointed out in his recent Lord Rectorial address, the prodigality of youth is its strength, its lust of life is the hope of the world. In theology, in art, in poltics, in economics, it is the young men who are the heretics, the prodigals, over whom Respectability shakes its wise old head and prophesies the worst, but who hold in their hands the keys of the future. Halvard Solness, in "The Master Builder," who in his youth built churches with high towers, but later contented himself with constructing "homes for the people," is typical of every generation which, ushered in with aspiration, soon folds its hands under "the vine and fig-tree" of its own formulas, and itself has to give way to another generation that is not afraid to build towers. Of course there is danger. Youth must take its own risk. The sweetest fruit is on the topmost bough, and the bough may break. God's El Dorados lie across the sea, and the ship may sink. The new is not necessarily the true. Youth needs badly enough at times the balance-wheel of age: an old pilot and a young ship-master is the ideal combination. But, for all the risk of it, let us greet youth with a cheer whenever it cuts the cables and sails out of the sheltered haven into the unchartered seas where lie the new continents of truth.

RACIAL SIGNIFICANCE

But we would miss the full intent of the drama, if we did not recognize that the Prince's wild days were not merely a regrettable incident in his career, but, in some sort, the raw material out of which he built a purposeful and worthy life. The old chronicles represent the change that took place in him as due to a miracle; but Shakespeare does not so conceive it. He thinks of it in terms of character-development. The youthful follies had not only been provisional, but preparatory. One cannot follow Henry in his subsequent career without feeling that he made good use of lessons he had learned in the London streets. His finished strength was that of self-conquest, and an enriched experience. The adjective that above all others applies to him is "human," and humanity of his sort cannot be acquired in a palace alone. He learned comradeship in a rough school, but he learned it; and on the eve of the battles of Agincourt, as he bandies jests with the common foot-soldiers, we feel that even Falstaff had something to give to him. And when he says:

> For he today that sheds his blood with me
> Shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile,
> This day shall gentle his condition;
> And gentlemen in England now a-bed
> Shall think themselves accurs'd they were not here.

is there not an echo of the days when he was "hail-fellow-well-met" with Francis and his "leash of drawers?"

FRUIT OF EARLY EXPERIENCE

It is no doubt an intricate question, and moralists will frown; but the world is full of people whose power in after life has been, in some sense at least, the fruit of their earlier experience of sin. We quote, indeed, "The bird with a broken pinion never soars so high again," and argue sententiously that if so-and-so had not misspent his youth, he would have been, in so far forth, stronger and more serviceable in after years. But the argument is an irrelevancy. There is the same fallacy in it that lurks in the "ifs of history." Some lessons sin alone can teach. Was it not the gutter that bred Jerry McAuley, and the alabaster box that was paid for by the life of shame? There is a challenging passage in Tennyson's "In Memoriam":

> How many a father have I seen
> A sober man among his boys,
> Whose youth was full of foolish noise,
> Who wears his manhood hale and green;
> And dare we to this fancy give
> That had the wild-oat not been sown
> The soil, left barren, scarce had grown
> The grain by which a man must live?

As the poet recognizes in the next stanza, it is a dangerous doctrine to preach "to those who eddy round and round." Yet Life seems to teach it—? At all events, we are surely safe in accepting Carlyle's summing-up, when he says of Robert Burns, that, when the ship returns to port, the question that really matters is not whether its hull is battered and its rigging torn, but whether it has been "round the world or only to Ramsgate and the Isle of Dogs."

Religion in Czechoslovakia

By Mary E. McDowell

THE Czechoslovak people have been compelled to couple religion with politics because in their past history religious and political persecution were one. On the top of a hill near the edge of the capital city, Prague, there is a monument commemorating the battle of Bila Hora. Surrounding this monument you may see twenty-one young trees. On the road near by stands one of those many shrines that hold sacred pictures where peasants stop to pray. I stood the other day and asked a working man what the trees meant. He said: "Here we lost our freedom, and when we got it back again in 1918 we planted a tree for each of the twenty-one Czech leaders executed in 1620—and then," pointing to the shrine, "we tore down the holy pictures."

Only in a limited portion of Prague was there this desecration of holy pictures, but it is an illustration of the fact that to the Bohemian the historic past links together the sins of the state church and the state politics, condemning them as one.

INFLUENCE OF HUS

In the ancient market place in the center of the old city of Prague has been erected a modern heroic statue of Jan Hus—modern because only a few years ago were the people permitted to have this memorial of their religious leader. Clustered about the impressive figure of this martyr to freedom of conscience in church and state are symbols of his social faith in human form. All who needed defending, comforting and education are in this remarkable group at the feet of the great preacher. The figures are pressing forward as if carried on by his ideas. Since before the time Columbus discovered America, this dominating personality, together with the political leader of the same period, has held sway in the imagination of the Czech people. Both Zizka and Hus were fighters for liberty, liberty in religion and politics. Jan Hus has always been dear even to the Catholic Czechs, in spite of his excommunication. A Bohemian neighbor of mine in Chicago is, I fancy, not an isolated case. As he stood before a picture of Hus that hung in the settlement he reverently pulled from beneath his shirt a picture of Hus that hung with his Catholic amulet near his heart.

The Czechoslovaks are a religious people, but in their revolt against ecclesiasticism they give a wrong impression to the outsider, who does not consider the oneness of the Hapsburg dynasty with Catholicism. Their hunger is for a social expression of religion, a religion that is a vital living reality—or for a mysticism that is vague. It is true as I have said. In some parts of the country during the excitement of the 1918 revolution, they destroyed some of the holy pictures just as they removed some of the Hapsburg statues. At this time also the old shrine of the Virgin in the market place of Prague was removed. This act is now considered by thoughtful Czechs to have been a great political blunder, but here again we must remember that since the fifteenth century religious and political persecution have gone hand in hand. To the Czechs religious and political freedom are synonymous. I have just visited the city of Tabor—the most picturesque small city in the republic. This is the historic center of the reformation, for here Zizka the military leader stood for freedom for the people, and here the Taborites were organized. Even today in the feelings of the people Zizka still holds the picturesque old fortification for the common cause of freedom in church and state.

PRESENT RELIGIOUS TREND

The religious trend is now toward a simple and unecclesiastical expression of the spirit of Christ. During and after the war young men and women found their desired opportunity for serving humanity in the organizations that were called into being because of a great need. Catholic, Protestant and free thinker went into the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations and into the Red Cross for social service during the war and after the armistice. After much discussion the women of the Y.W.C.A. formulated a creed so simple and broad that those of different confessions could work in common. It says:

> I believe in God, and I pledge myself to follow the spirit of Christ's teaching, and especially to live a life of service and love toward all my fellow creatures.

The Student Renaissance Movement is one of the most promising beginnings of the working out of the new religious gropings of this very alive country. One of the student leaders has said: "With the birth of the republic there came an almost nation-wide feeling of the need of a vital religious movement—a longing for a regeneration of life on a religious basis." Young men and women ot the universities banded themselves together to study the teachings of Christ and Hus. The movement is undenominational, and has members of all and of no "confession." Most of them believe in private prayer, but are strongly prejudiced against public prayer and object to clericalism and ritual of every kind.

PRESIDENT MASARYK

It was President Masaryk who inspired this movement among the students. On his seventieth birthday he made a memorable address to the people. I quote from it:

> I have always looked upon the ideals of humanity and democracy as an aspect of eternity.

Referring to the effects of the war the president said that it brings all people inevitably to a realization of religious problems.

> I myself find in religion the highest type of perfection and an objective for all human endeavor. The sense of eternity makes us humble and strengthens our moral responsibility. Our faith in progress is strengthened, we know that it is impossible to attain perfection at once, but we learn patience, not passivity. The comprehension of a perfected social order leads us all to cooperation towards a common goal.

The educated man and woman find it difficult to subscribe to a creed or to an organization for religious expression. The long struggle for religious freedom seems to have created a fear of any limitations. The newest illustration of this trend of mind is that of the Student Renaissance Movement. At their conference this summer they discarded their former simple creed that was broad but Christian. Now they will have only a program of service. Membership is based on the test of six months of work for some cause in their social program. This program includes study of all questions of human welfare, such as the alcohol question, social purity, war, international friendship, etc.

An international committee was formed of German, Russian, Ukranian and Czech students. Several times this group has protested against unfair treatment of German students. On one occasion they publicly expressed their disapproval of the president of the university because of his bitter criticism of President Masaryk's liberality toward the Germans. President Masaryk had vetoed a parliamentary bill to do away with the German university, leaving only the Czech university. His action showed that he refused to permit the method of retaliation—refused to do unto the Germans as they had done unto the Czechs prior to 1918. The international committee of students agreed with the president of the republic and condemned the president of the university.

MOVEMENT FROM ROME

For years there has been in Bohemia a large organization of free thinkers, not all of them atheists. Before the war they were chiefly in revolt against the state church and all that it stood for. Since the war they have felt that they must not limit their action to fighting churches, but must also take positive creative action. They have doubled in numbers since 1918. It is reported that over a million and a half have left the old established church. Some have gone into the Protestant church, which is said to have trebled its membership. A large number of priests with their parishes have allied themselves with the Serbian Greek church.

Over and against the two and a half million non-Catholics there are still about ten million Roman Catholics, but even these are growing more liberal. There is within the Czech Roman Catholic church a movement toward greater liberalism and a stronger national feeling. The constitution of the new republic states in articles 121 and 124 that:

> "Liberty of conscience and religious creed is guaranteed," and "All religious confessions shall be equal before the law."

President Masaryk when a professor in the university of Prague, and as a member of the Austrian parliament, always protested against the domination of the influence of the church in politics. However, against certain superstitions of the church he was always on the plane of the scholarly attack. His spirit is clearly shown at Lany, the country presidential residence that was formerly the home of an Austrian noble, a Catholic who had a chapel connected with the chateau. As a guest this summer at Lany I have been interested to hear the church bell call the Catholics to mass as in olden times, and to see the parish priest and the village people come and go through the garden to and from the service.

The religious feeling of the Czechoslovaks is social and is trying to express itself in service for all kinds of people, especially Russians. But the disintegrative effect of the long struggle of the past prevents at this time a tolerant spirit of "different confessions" as they put it. It is for this reason that the sincere movement among the students is so full of hope for a more tolerant spirit in the future. The influence of the great leader Masaryk, who finds guidance in action and spiritual help in repeating daily the Lord's prayer, will eventually win a good understanding and good will among all the people of the republic.

ONE way remains; the way of heaven doth always open lie.
Doth open lie? Oh, pilot word! Let me remember aye,
Though shore and sea afford no pass, there's yet a star-

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

"I HAVE been thinking about the inhibitions of optimism," declared the Lion.

"How about the inhibitions of pessimism?" I retorted.

The Lion smiled at that.

"Oh, I have heard all that story," he said. "We are all the while being told that doubts are chains and beliefs are wings. I don't deny that there is something to it. But I am becoming surer all the while that there are grave dangers in professional optimism. And I am very sure that America is suffering right at this point."

I settled down in my chair to hear my friend develop his theme. He had gotten through several days with less pain than usual and there was a vital energy in his voice which was good to feel.

"We have developed a cult of success. I am not denying that it has accomplished many notable achievements. But it has come perilously near to wrecking our critical faculty. If anybody calls attention to our limitations we feel at once that he has violated all the sanctions of our glorious optimism. We must believe that we live in the best town with the livest business men and the most wonderful spirit of progress to be found anywhere. We grow lusty in self-appreciation. We grow corpulent with self-complacency. And the pity of it is just that all this produces a set of inhibitions which prevent all honest and searching analysis of our own life. We instinctively avoid the surgery of candid criticism and so we travel farther from the reality of things all the while."

"You would hardly point to 'The Spoon River Anthology' and 'Main Street' as examples of this tendency." I ventured.

The Lion laughed outright.

"True enough," he said, "But that isn't a reply. Its only the statement that some people are beginning to see the danger. As much as I dislike 'Main Street' I am willing to forgive Sinclair Lewis a good deal because he has at least punctured our self complacency. But the trouble with both Lewis and Masters is that they half like the things which they hold up to scorn. It is true however that they are an indication of the fact that we are beginning to pass out of the period of naive incapacity for self analysis."

"There are certain other intellectuals who have rather enjoyed telling us unpleasant truths about ourselves," I suggested.

"And unpleasant falsehoods," declared the Lion. "There are a good many decadent chaps who are critical enough. But they lack the quality which would give their work moral insight or spiritual validity. Sometimes I read a book which seems to suggest that a preoccupation with sex is the golden gate to distinction of thought and feeling and that free love might at last release a sense of beauty in this depraved and degraded land. I find it rather difficult to be enthusiastic about the hectic intellectual who would make his own lawlessness the standard of society."

"Then you are rather between the devil and the deep sea," I surmised.

"Between a rather superficial devil and a very shallow sea," replied the Lion. Then he went on:

"Of course there is a criticism which manages to be friendly with the ten commandments. And there is even an analysis which is on speaking terms with the Sermon on the Mount. You do not have to surrender to all the primitive lawlessness in order to find a rich life unless you are a decadent by nature and more so by practice. And you do not have to become so frightened by the young apostles of lawlessness that you fly in a panic to the arms of a senile complacency with things as they are. We need Aristotle's doctrine of the golden mean. On the one hand we must be delivered from the professional optimists. On the other we must not surrender to the young pagans whose only happiness is in finding something forbidden in order that they may do it. How sad they would be in a world which had no ten commandments to break."

VERSE

Labours

NOTHING is worth doing
That does not eventually send a man
On a higher and wider quest.
All labours that narrow,
All toils that deaden,
All pursuits that enslave,
Are enemies to be fought
With the sword of enterprise
And the arrow of adventure.
Therefore, at any moment
Of this eventful and uneventful life,
It behooves a man to ask himself
What he is doing
And whither his work is leading him.
If it is leading him to prison,
To lethargy, or to mutilation,
To dishonour, or to death,
Let him arise and take ship
To the furthest port he can reach,
Or let him wander among the mountains,
Making new observations,
And finding nobler labours.

The Poet's Call

BY day the fields and meadows cry,
By night the bright stars plead;
He hears the message from on high,
And to the call gives heed.

The roses tremble as he nears
And cry, "Rejoice, rejoice!"
The rocks break forth as he appears,
"God sends a Voice, a Voice!"

Making Germany Pay

IN recounting last week the report and recommendations to the Poincaré government of Special Commissioner Dariac on policies to be pursued in the matter of reparations, we said that the report would probably be used only as a political sounding board. The recommendations are so utterly lacking in consideration of the rights of other governments in the entente, so subversive of every principle in the psychology of peace making, so brutally an appeal to force, and so utterly a repudiation of all the high principles that led America to go to the rescue of France, that it seemed impossible to believe they would be seriously considered as a basis for real action. Now comes the news that the fundamentals of that report are the basis for actual proposals by the Poincaré government, and that the premier's bold contentions that France should go it alone in applying force as a method of collection are on the point of being applied.

The French object to the British plan for stabilizing the mark because it "breaks the solidarity of the allies," and now they propose to break that solidarity by not only acting alone but also by adopting a policy strongly disapproved by England. The past history of the attempt to collect is a history of disaster caused by pressure. In January, 1921, the total was fixed at the impossible sum of 220 billion gold marks plus 12 per cent of the exports, and the mark dropped to one-half the value of one year before. The "sanctions" (an arbitrary customs frontier through the Rhineland) were applied, the London ultimatum was issued, (scaling totals down to 132 billions but raising collections on exports to 26 per cent) demanding three and one-third billions in gold for the year, and the mark tumbled again. The payment of the first billion in August caused a great demand for foreign bills, which resulted in a rise in their value and a corresponding decrease in the value of the mark. The Silesian verdict in October brought another tumble. In May the dollar was worth 62 marks, on August 1st, 87, and in November 330.

Every effort of the reparations commission to force things has resulted in a fall of the mark, with its resulting depreciation of values and loss of ability to do business across national lines. Back of the politicians lies the hate of peoples and its accompanying policy of force in defiance of the laws of economics. An angry man may by law and decree destroy every possibility of collecting from his debtor.

Why the Mark Depreciates

Out of a war-time tendency to ascribe every kind of strategem to the enemy we make the charges that the Germans have deliberately depreciated their currency to escape payment and to profit by the advantages deflation is supposed to give to their export trade. What explanation have we to make to the query as to why there have been a greater depreciation in the currencies of Poland and Austria, and such large declines in the value of exchange in France, Italy, Belgium and Czecho-Slovakia Even the English sovereign is still off value nearly ten per cent. With the confidence of every nation, with nearly all the industries of old Austria within its borders, with a stable and popular government and with no reparations to pay, Czecho-Slovakian exchange on the dollar is fifty to one.

No doubt there have been those in Germany who welcomed the "flight of the mark." Speculators profit, exports are helped for a time, and trade is given a stimulus. Extreme nationalists welcomed it because it might mean the early overthrow of the republican government and of the policy of "fulfillment." But the officials realized that it meant the steady debilitation of their own salaries, the possibility of allied interference, and the ultimate destruction of both confidence and trade. There are at present French financiers who propose the deliberate depreciation of the franc as a means of selling to advantage. The paralysis of Austria ought to be sufficient warning.

As a means of increasing trade a falling currency is an illusion. Everyone rushed to Germany for goods when the mark began to tumble. The first result was feverish activity. The next was a depreciation of stocks at home and the raising of embargoes abroad with multiplied difficulties in obtaining raw materials for manufacture. As exchange rises, prices rise and wages must be raised, but prices go up on wings and wages trudge along in stogies. Thus the working and salaried classes are always poorer, vitality is lowered, and productive capacity is lessened. Demands for credit urge the printing presses on, discount and bank rates rise, and speculation increases; indeed business itself becomes a speculation. With money depreciating no one wants it, so that everyone who can buys goods, and waste and extravagance grow with increasing poverty.

Exchange has arisen out of all proportions to the inflation of currency. The total value of the 440 billion paper marks now issued is only one-sixth that of the 36 billion in circulation three years ago. While paper marks have increased thirteen fold, prices have increased at home by more than twenty fold and exchange by more than eighty fold. Wages have been able to keep up to one-half the increase of prices of goods on the market and savings have gone completely into the discard. Rents have been held down by arbitrary governmental action with corresponding depreciation in buildings.

There is little logic in accusing the ministry of Dr. Wirth, whom Briand, Clemenceau, and most of the British officials called a sincere man doing his best, of deliberately bringing such disaster down upon his own administration. The real cause of the depreciation of the mark was the stripping of Germany of her productive enterprise and then demanding that she pay enormous indemnities without giving her a chance to start business. With shipping all but ruined, colonies gone, coal mines requisitioned, iron mines taken over, soil robbed by war necessities, a revolution negotiated and an enormous internal debt, time was needed to balance the ledger, stabilize the new government, beat down militaristic opposition, and start up productive enterprise. Germany should pay and she can pay all required by genuine reparations, but the policies thus far pursued are not those dictated by sanity and business judgment. French politics calls for ruin as a victor's peace. English economics calls for the judgment of equity on a debtor.

Proposals That Carry Promise

The British Ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer McKenna says Germany can pay only when she can obtain the same privileges and profits from export trade that others possess. The French banker and Ex-Minister of Reconstruction Locheur says that it is better to lose all reparations than to allow a reconstructed Germany. Before retiring, Chancellor Wirth said the inflation process had reached the point of bursting and that only quick action could prevent disaster. Mr. Barthou, the French member of the reparations commission, replied that the patient was ill and must be treated quickly. The government took sharp measures to conserve gold supplies and prevent speculation. The Hamburg trades protested vigorously that it interfered with necessities of business, thus revealing a vital phase of governmental trouble in adopting any policy. The Bavarian government sent up its memorandum, asking that the export of necessities be reduced to a minimum and the importation of luxuries forbidden, production increased, and governmental expenditure curtailed—all of which means "Do what you have failed in trying to do." And Poincaré says pay and pay now, or we will take over your most productive enterprises.

Stinnes demands control of the public utilities as the price of business credit and the practical control of government finances by big business. The social democrats refuse to collaborate with big business, the cabinet falls, and big business takes the reins. In the shadows on one side stand the monarchists and those who rejoiced at Rathenau's murder, knowing that Stinnezation means a step toward the old order; on the other side stand the communists, confident that a step toward monarchism will swell their ranks and precipitate a bolshevik revolution. Behind all hovers the ghost of ruin brought about by further armed occupation, by a depreciation that drops to Austria's level, by increasing unemployment as winter comes, and by a hopelessness that paralyzes the hearts of the toiling masses.

One Convincing Proposal

To meet all this there comes one clear, convincing proposal. It is that of Sir John Bradbury, British member of the reparation commission. He proposes that all payments on reparations be commuted into five year bonds which each creditor government will guarantee and sell under its guarantee; that a complete moratorium of two years be granted and made renewable for two years more; that the reparations commission be reorganized, located in Berlin and work sympathetically with the German government; and finally that the mark be stabilized by using all the gold available in the Reichsbank, plus such a loan of gold as may be necessary to accomplish that result, the price of the paper mark in exchange to be fixed by a mixed neutral commission. The leaders of the German Democratic party, still in the coalition government of Cuno, agree to this proposal as do many leading financiers. A neutral committee of experts, invited to Germany by Wirth, and composed of such men as Professors Cassell of Switzerland, Jenks of America, Keynes of England, Vissering of Holland and others, make substantially like recommendations. They propose that the paper mark be retired on a basis from 3,000 to 3,500 to the dollar. This would mean the stopping of the printing presses and the substitution of a new currency based on gold. It would relieve the government of an ever expanding budget. The governmental budget is now balanced with the exception of reparation charges, but these charges formed the margin that caused the "flight of the mark" and put business over into the category of speculation. The Social Democrats manifest a willingness to help the new cabinet so long as there is no attempt at Stinnezation or monarchy. Poincaré and his iron hand alone threaten failure.

Will peace now be made or will the war be continued? In a recent address the British General Ian Hamilton stated the case quite clearly. He said: "Why do we fall from one convulsion into another and find that any fanatic or adventurer has the power to drop sparks into the powder magazine The root of the matter is this: we have never made peace. Peace was the last thing the men who made the treaties of Versailles and Sèvres were thinking about—punishment is what they were after. Had we truly aimed at peace and the demilitarization of Europe instead of at the twenty-four thousand million sterling and the kaiser's head, held out like glittering baits to the people at the end of 1918, we might have inflicted a mortal wound on war. Even now there is time, though as we hesitate the sands are running out apace."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Friends or Foes of Jesus*

WE cannot take a neutral attitude toward Jesus. "He that is not for him is against him." Jesus stands as the supreme moral reality of our universe. We cannot be neutral toward righteousness; neutrality there means moral indifference and when one is indifferent to morality one is evil. There may be an extraordinarily good library in the home in which you are stopping, the owner may be very proud of its possession. One evening by the fireside, a friend of your host asks, "And what do you think of his library?" You reply, "To tell the truth I am not interested in libraries." What do you do? You instantly brand yourself as a man of no literary qualities. Traveling in Europe you come to some noted art museum. Everyone in the party is keen to see the famous pictures—everyone but you. You turn away from the gallery and go to the races. Yes, it is your own business, but you cannot escape the just criticism of your friends when they accuse you of having no artistic side to your nature. The leading business men of your city are planning the organization of the Associated Charities, properly to handle the hundreds of cases of want. You are invited to the luncheons where the movement is being launched. You ignore the invitations. You take your own customers out to lunch while your fellow business men are unselfishly devoting themselves to the wise care of the poor. The organization is perfected. The newspapers come out with the story and the names of the business houses that backed the public enterprise. At breakfast your family reads the news and your oldest boy remarks, "Dad, I don't see your name." "No," you reply, "I work for all I get; I am not interested in this charity stuff." It's a free country and you can do as you please about the poor—but—but you cannot escape the just scorn of your family and neighbors. To be neutral on this question of the care of the poor—well, you cannot be neutral, you either are a benevolent man or a contemptible money-grubber—and that is precisely how your associates on the street will classify you. Here is the church. Sunday comes. Your neighbors take their children and the good old parents living under their roofs and go to church. But you—you crawl out from under the deluge of the Sunday paper, with its elevating stories of pretty actresses who have been married to three or four millionaires, flick the ashes from your Pall Mall, and motor out to the golf club. You speed by the church and your neighbor's boy, seeing you, says to the lad beside him: "Gee, I'll be glad when I grow up and can go and play golf on Sunday, instead of going to this stupid Sunday school." The preacher comes to call upon you and you inform him, none too kindly, that you are not interested in any church. Churches are all right for those who like them, but you can get along very well without a church from January to December. Yes, you can get away with that, but to be indifferent to the church means to oppose the church. There is no neutral attitude. The world is built that way, my friend, you may not like it, but that is the way it is. You are either a friend or foe of Jesus; you either gather with him or scatter abroad. This statement may make you squirm, but you know it is true. In our lesson we see Mary sitting at the Saviour's feet, earnestly listening to every word that falls from the Master's lips. Here we have positive acceptance, beautiful friendship, whole-hearted approval. In the next section we see the Pharisees "laying in wait" to catch him, to destroy him. Friends or foes—there you have it. Indifferent to books—you are against culture; indifferent to art—you are against beauty; indifferent to the weak and poor, you are against charities; indifferent to Jesus, you are the foe of morality. No man who is keen about goodness can be indifferent to personified goodness as it appears in Jesus. I have more respect for that man who is openly hostile to the Bible and to Christ than for the indifferent, neutral, careless, thoughtless man, who makes light of Christ and his church. You can attack the hostile man; you have a clear case before you—but what can you do with the selfishly indifferent man? Our communities are filled up with these morally indifferent people. They have no definite standards; they are dangerous citizens. "Get the money—have a good time"—this is their whole creed. By that they live and die. I know thousands of such moral imbeciles. "O, the church is all right," they will tell you. But everything is all right with them—bootlegging is all right, home-brew is all right, easy divorce is all right, week-end debauches are all right, vicious dances are all right, unethical practices in business are all right, vile shows are all right! Such people are dangerously near being moral perverts—people who call black white, and bad good. Be positive, stand for something—and stand for the best. Be like Roosevelt.

British Table Talk

London, November 14, 1922.

THE Silence on Armistice Day was kept this year with all the former reverence and solemnity. This nation has never been credited with any aptitude for symbolic actions. An Englishman does not like dramatic scenes, and he has almost banished symbolism from his daily life, but the two finest symbols, the Great Silence and The Burial of the Unknown Warrior, both had their origin here. The Silence was so deep on Saturday morning that even the horses felt there was something strange happening. In the center of London the vast crowd joined after the two minutes' pause in the hymn, "Our God, our help in ages past." It is said to have been impressive, but the Silence spoke louder than the hymn. There is no problem more baffling than to provide means for the expression of a common emotion in the vast cities of our modern civilization. It was an inspired thought to decree a brief silence, during which the nation becomes for a moment as one man with one awful memory, and with one debt, not repaid yet, and never to be repaid. The fact that there is a quickness to respond to this symbolic moment is one which might make our spiritual guides ponder. Is it possible that they have not estimated rightly the idealism of the average man? Or that they have lacked the bold imagination which penetrates beneath the surface to the "imprison'd splendor?"

The Election

Before this letter embarks upon its voyage over the Atlantic, the election will be over. It has been unlike any other election I remember. Never has the thought of the electors been less absorbed than it is now with great causes. The one definite proposal which has excited comment has been the proposal for a capital levy, which has filled the columns of the press with dissertations all more or less obscure. There is very little doubt that the general mind of the public is afraid of any such measure. It is not that it is in theory confiscation, but that it threatens to disturb still more the already disturbed industrial life of the country. A levy on capital is resisted by all parties but Labor, and some friends of labor are hedging. For the rest people are thinking in terms of "personalities." They are for or against Lloyd George, Asquith, Bonar Law, but curiously there is no one standard-bearer in the ranks of Labor. Henderson, Thomas, Clynes are active and responsible leaders, and behind them are men uncommonly able, but there is not one man who has captured the imagination of the man in the street. Perhaps that is all the better for Labor. Among the picturesque figures is Mr. C. B. Fry, the great athlete who is standing for Brighton. He was at Wadham college, Oxford, at the same time as Sir John Simon and Lord Birkenhead and was a good scholar. Since those days his fame as a cricketer has obscured the fact that he has given most notable service to the training of boys for the navy, and latterly he has served with his old friend "Ranjitsinjhi" at the league of nations' assembly. Together these two have made many centuries at Brighton—some of which I too have seen in former days—and most of us will not be sorry—politics apart—if "C. B." enters parliament. But the interest in his candidacy is one indication among many that it is an election in which personality has a place seldom given to it before.

The Churches in Election Time

The traditional division, especially in the north of England, was between the church of England which was largely conservative, and the free churches which were largely liberal. There was a time, for example, when almost all Congregationalists were liberal. That is not the case today, though still a large majority would be liberal. Some are in the Labor party and some are conservative, and today there is a considerable body of national liberals, the party of Mr. Lloyd George in every free church assembly. On the other hand there are a number of Labor advocates in the church of England. Dr. Gore, for example, one of its foremost teachers, has spoken in this election on a Labor platform. On temperance questions the free churches are almost entirely in favor of drastic reform, and there is a large section, not I think a majority, in favor of prohibition. This, however, is not a practical issue ot the present election, the more immediate question being, whether or not the country is to have local option and Sunday closing. He would be a dreamer who imagined that there was any likelihood that such reforms would come into effect with the present government in office. The promise of negations made by Mr. Bonar Law really means that the advocates of such reforms will have to wait four or five years at least before there is any opportunity. Isaiah called Egypt "Sit-still;" it is the proud boast of the prime minister that he will sit still, and our brewers will not complain. The idea is that the patient, Great Britain, needs a few years' rest. Meanwhile the near east is beginning to make it uncertain whether there is to be any tranquillity after all.

A Catholic Biography

The late Father Plater of the Society of Jesus was a keen worker in his church. He did much to make "retreats" possible for working people, and during the war his services were given without stint to his people. He was known and loved far beyond the circle of his own church, and his biography, told by the skilful pen of Father Martindale, shows clearly why. It was in the fellowship of the Social Service Union that Father Plater came to know a new range of friends. It is a union in which the social unions connected with the various churches meet together on their special ground, and already they have done much. The Roman in this assembly remains Roman; there are times of silence, but no united prayer; yet there is a larger measure of sympathy and understanding among them because of their common interest in the application of the Christian gospel to social life. It is one of the most fruitful ot our "inter"-operations. Father Plater was a saintly man and a man with a large measure of humor and hilarity. That indeed is part of the perfect Christian character.

"Jimmy the Bulldog"

Father Plater had a dog—a dog more than four stone in weight. This dog went with his master and everywhere helped towards fellowship. Divines who had patted the head of the bulldog were more favorably inclined to each other. It may lighten this column if I transcribe the lines which reached Swanwick from Jim. There was a conference at Lesscon and Father Plater with Jim had had to leave before the end. To their friends this poem came:

I'm Jim the bulldog. Candid friends remark
They wouldn't care to meet me in the dark.
My face perhaps is ugly. I don't mind it,
I have the happiness to be behind it.

There's only one thing that I cannot bear
And that's the interval for silent prayer.
I hold my breath! My master says I must;
But I confess, I very nearly bust.

I'm very mild and faithful unto death,
'A simple dog that lightly draws its breath';
But when a lecturer begins to bore,
I do what others do; I gently snore.

I'm of all creeds; when starved a Protestant,
A Methodist in getting what I want.
A Quaker when my master shows the stick,
When I'm at large, a Roaming Catholic.

I'm fond of books, I pull them all to bits,
And throw their outraged owners into fits,
Yet these same owners hardly think it matters
To tear each other's characters to tatters.

Children I love; and if you are as these
I love you too and do my best to please,
If you are not, well let me put it thus,
As Christians, you have simply missed the bus.

St. Francis loved all fishes, beasts and birds;
With reverence they listened to his words;
And if at Swanwick I encountered him
I fancy he would call me Brother Jim.

The stars and hills praise God, I hear you say,
I don't pretend to be as great as they;
Yet a poor comrade in this tearful vale,
Is it for nothing that I wag my tail?

Business Methods of Near East Relief

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with great interest, your editorial called "Nearing the Danger Line" in The Christian Century of October 26th. No one I think, will recognize more quickly than the officers and directors of Near East Relief, the importance of responsible control of public charity and trust organizations. In fact it has been one of our main purposes to keep the closest practicable, representative committee control over all Near East Relief operations. In this I think we have perhaps come nearer to success than any other emergency relief organization of which I know, but we are not perfect and we welcome most heartily any constructive criticisms that may be sent to us by the editors of The Christian Century or others, and that will help us to serve humanity more faithfully and efficiently.

There are certain practical problems that one soon confronts in the application of any theory of constitutional federated control. The danger is that pace and progressiveness of a federated body, necessarily usually becomes that of the most conservative and perhaps reactionary, constituent members. On the other hand, an independent relief or charity organization is liable to develop a progressiveness bordering upon radicalism that results from uncontrolled individual initiative. It is of course desirable to avoid these two extremes. An illustration of the deadly conservatism that might fetter a rigidly representative organization is shown by the recent Smyrna disaster.

On September 6, the state department in Washington called our attention to messages received from the American Consul in Smyrna; these messages were received in New York on September 7th, and the same day—September 7th—$25,000 was cabled to Constantinople for emergency relief; 300 tons of clothing and shoes were shipped, and the U. S. destroyer left the Near East Relief warehouses in Constantinople with a cargo of food supplies. Similar prompt action was continued during the succeeding days, and a message just received from the Bishop of Smyrna, assures us that 200,000 lives were saved in Smyrna as a result of this prompt, energetic action on the part of Near East Relief.

All of the above action was taken with the knowledge and approval of the responsible executive committee here in New York, which is constituted for an interim action by our board of trustees, which in turn is incorporated by congress and makes regular, full audited reports to congress and to the full giving constituency. Suppose, however, it had been necessary to have taken counsel and secure the approval of a number of heterogeneous assemblies, general conferences, synods and other ecclesiastical gatherings, in order to have rendered this relief at Smyrna; the result would have been an additional colossal loss of life. At the same time we recognize that there must be a control that in a true sense represents the givers, and this we earnestly seek. If we do not have it, we want it. In this connection, may I call your attention to our method of transacting business?

(1) We are incorporated by congress and our trustees include leading representatives of most of the more important religious and missionary bodies of America.

(2) The board of trustees meets, and in addition to other business, elects an executive committee, which is made up almost, if not quite, exclusively of mission board secretaries and Christian men, who are members of some of the leading mission, educational and benevolent boards of America.

(3) This executive committee meets at least once a month, and before each meeting, a docket containing the minutes of the previous meeting, financial statements, cables, and reports from the field, together with a full list of proposed votes and appropriations, is usually sent two days in advance of the meeting to each member of the committee, and as a rule every member of the committee reads before coming to the meeting, not only the minutes and the financial reports, but all the proposed motions, votes and appropriations that are to be presented at the meeting. Thus there is opportunity for advance study of every expenditure and transaction of the organization, by all the members of the executive committee.

(4) Copies of this hundred page docket, together with the minutes of the executive committee, are mailed to every member of the board of trustees, in order that they may be fully informed on every detail of the committee's work, and call the attention of the executive committee to any action which they may desire to question.

(5) These dockets and financial reports are likewise accessible to any contributor or sympathetic friend who may care for detailed information. They are also in summarized form included in the annual report made to congress and given to the public.

This procedure may not be perfect, but unfortunately our modern world with its division of sects and creeds and denominations, good people and bad, religious and irreligious, Christian, Catholic, Jew and Agnostic, has not yet attained full perfection. We recognize there is an ideal better than the Near East Relief realization. We are earnestly striving and reaching out toward that ideal, and will greatly appreciate any assistance that The Christian Century or others may be able to render in attaining it. Your editorial certainly points toward the ideal, which we cherish, and we appreciate all the constructive suggestions you may have as to how we can achieve.

Noteworthy Home Mission Pageant Has Been Developed

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church has produced a noteworthy pageant setting forth the home mission task in America. It has been supervised by the Drama League of America, and Dr. Linwood Taft has given constructive criticism of the production. The Missionary Education Movement is now at the task of publishing the pageant, and it will be given to the churches at twenty-five cents a copy. The title of the production is "America's Unfinished Battles." Among the aims of the pageant is the following: "The challenge to service is presented by the millions of people in America who for the most part have not had an equal chance for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. These millions include some 14,000,000 foreign born, 12,000,000 Negroes, 3,500,000 Latin Americans, 1,750,000 Mexicans in the southwest, 5,500,000 southern mountaineers, 1,500,000 migrant laborers, 334,000 Indians, etc. Helping these millions to secure the necessities of life and the blessings of America is a tremendous task that confronts our generation and must be accomplished by us if we are to be worthy sons of worthy sires."

Texas Baptists Torn Asunder Over Fundamentalism

Probably no layman in modern times has brought more controversy into the evangelical ranks than has William Jennings Bryan. In many sections of the southland, religious organization is disrupted, and the bitterest charges are hurled from opposition camps. At the present time the Baptists suffer more than any other denomination. Dr. J. Frank Norris of Ft. Worth is leading an attack on the organized work of the Baptists in the south and is one of the sponsors for a fundamentalist conference which will be held at Ft. Worth next April. William Jennings Bryan will be the leading speaker as usual. This movement is being withstood in most vigorous terms by Rev. George W. Truett, one of the most progressive spirits among the Southern Baptists, and pastor of their largest church at Dallas. Dr. L. R. Scarborough, leader of the Baptist seventy-five million dollar campaign, sees in the current reactionary theological movement a concealed covetousness. In a recent issue ot the Baptist Standard he says:

"Here is a clear-cut effort on the part of 'Norrisism' to undermine the Southern Baptist Laymen's Movement and establish a new laymen's movement inter-denominational in its makeup, and it is supposed with the purpose to destroy the denominational drives, such as the Centenary movement, the seventy-five-million campaign, the enlarged movements of Presbyterians and of Disciples and others, all in the name of opposition to Darwinianism."

American Legion Wants a Sunday in the Churches

Colonel Irvin M. Owsley, national commander of the American Legion, has given out an interview in favor of trying to secure in the churches a national Sunday in behalf of legion interests, and he is already booked in a number of churches to speak at the noon hour to business men. He is a member of the Disciples of Christ while his chaplain, Rev. William P. O'Connor, is a Roman priest. The legion officers seek to establish legion Sunday adjacent to April 6. They want a day not for the dead, like Memorial Sunday, but for the living. On legion Sunday the post would attend in a body the church it had selected.

Methodist Russian Worker Has Large Responsibility

Dr. George A. Simons, formerly stationed in Petrograd as a Methodist worker, is now located at Riga, Latvia. He has been superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal church in Russia since 1907, and in addition to this responsibility he is now supervising the Methodist work in the Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, besides carrying on the American Methodist Relief for Russia. He is assisted in the latter work by his sister, Miss Ottilie A. Simons, and Deaconess Anna Eklund of Petrograd. The second session of the European central conference of the Methodist Episcopal church was held in Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, at which Dr. Simons served as secretary. He is now editor of the Official Journal which is to appear shortly.

Pastor Indicts New and False Brand of Americanism

The new and noisy brand of patriotism abroad in the land, which is inspired by selfishness and provincialism, was arraigned recently when Rev. Byron Hester spoke to the American Legion Post in the Disciples church at Electra, Tex. He was a chaplain in the world war and has never

Relief Worker Praises Quakers

So broad has been the policy of the Quakers in their work of relief in Europe that they have in many cases accepted workers from outside their organization. Among these workers is Rev. Karl Borders, formerly in charge of the Disciples immigrant work among Russians in Chicago, and now living in the famine country. In a recent communication to The Christian Century he tells the story of the death of Russia's hopes for a harvest this summer. He says:

"Two months ago I rode past smiling fields of grain and blithely gathered statistics on the probable crop, amused at the reluctance of the peasant to predict the result of his sowing, and his invariable "Bog znaet," "God knows." The inspectors from other fields likewise gathered optimistic reports, and all of us came to monthly conference assured that the worst of the famine was past and determined upon a program of reconstruction for the winter.

"Then the plagues descended. Grasshoppers, worms, birds and finally drought, with weeks of scorching sun which dried the half-filled grain in the head and hastened the harvest to an early and empty end. A dreadful lack of work animals had made it impossible to sow more than half of the acreage of the year before, and even this year's sowing was far below normal. And now where a hundred or a hundred and fifty poods should have been reaped per desiatine, the average will not be more than thirty poods per desiatine, and much is completely lost."

His appreciation of the Quaker organization under which he works is phrased in these terms: "Our Christian programs of aid must be conceived in terms of more than the present crisis. In the long run, to my mind, the greatest calamity of the war is not the loss of human life, wasteful and horrible as that may be, but the heritage of hate which lingers and sours and warps the souls of generations that follow. These Quakers—and I am not a Quaker—have seen with clear vision the other pole, and steadfastly and quietly bear their testimony of good-will and love into these war-ridden lands in measures of unforgettable service. This, too, will bear its fruitage, and good-will and love must, by the self-same law which breeds hate out of war, spring up in the path of service.

"Hasten the day when Christendom shall be done entirely with back-door charity for conscience' ease, and shall launch upon these larger ventures of world helpfulness in measureless witness of her boasted faith in the power of love. I am convinced that it is only by such measures as these that we shall be able to induce that spirit of international friendship and good-will which we are fond of calling the kingdom of God."

Dealing with the emergencies of the present hour, Mr. Borders says: "Reconstruction plans on a large scale have been abandoned and again this area assigned to the American Friends' Service committee faces the simple alternative of foreign help or starvation. We estimate that at least 73,000, or 45 per cent of the population of our area must be fed, which means not supplementary feeding, but entire support until next harvest. Forty thousand of this number will need feeding at once, and the number will increase as the small stock of grain reaped is eaten. We are seeking to make it possible for as much of this new grain as necessary to be sown instead of being used as food.

"Now many a cottage is swept bare, and the shreds and tatters that hang to the bodies I see are scarcely warm enough for the cold rains that have already set in as I write in late August. Last year there was meat to eat, sheep, cattle, or even horses. This summer a single group of animals for the village have been fed in the broad meadows where once ten shepherds drove their flocks and herds afield."

been connected with any pacifist movement. His fellow legionnaires cheered strongly when he made his attack on the spurious loyalty that is now abroad. He said: "Have we held high the torch of Americanism? No. We have dashed it to the earth. Have we kept the home fires burning? On the contrary, we have stamped those fires of idealism out, and have kindled fires of another kind, fires of selfishness, narrowness, and provincialism. We have broken faith with those that died. And though they lie beneath the sleep-inducing poppies, they do not sleep, but they must turn in their graves as they see the arrogant, strutting, so-called Americanism of today masquerading as the Americanism for which they died."

St. Louis Church Federation a Live One

The Church Federation of St. Louis which has always been known as one of the more active organizations of the country, is now giving fresh attention to the matter of church publicity through a paper read recently by Mr. H. R. Wilson on "The Principles of Group Advertising As Applied to Go-to-Church Publicity." The Federation is taking an active part in trying to secure a better constitutional provision for the incorporation of religious organizations. The annual meeting of the Federation will be held at the Hotel Chase on December 7, and Dr. Robert E. Speer will speak.

Duluth Federation Stresses Religion Education

The Duluth Council of Churches has ten years of history behind it. Firmly entrenched in the community life, it is a strong friend of every great religious cause in which cooperative action is essential. A unique feature maintained by it is a Tuesday noon luncheon which is held in the Y.M.C.A. On Oct. 31 Dr. H. Y. Shahbaz, a Persian missionary who escaped from the horrors of his land, spoke on "Islam, a Menace to Civilization." The largest interest of the Council of Churches is in the cause of religious education. The pastors and superintendents are assembled regularly, and at these meetings the Christian strategy for the city is planned so far as it relates to the work of religious education. Samples of good Sunday school literature are kept at the council office for the inspection of the superintendents. A training school for modern Sunday school workers is maintained on Monday evenings, with a good attendance, and the courses are modeled after the latest ideas in this field. The organization has been less concerned about legislative questions than some city federations, but it has been able to get what it went after, among these being the enactment in Minnesota of a red-light abatement law. Four successful dry campaigns have been conducted during the past ten years and many meetings have been held in the interest of world peace. Rev. W. L. Smithies is executive secretary of the organization.

Fresh Evangelical Movement in Australia

A very interesting evangelical movement has been under way in Australia during the past year, which takes the form of a great campaign for the circulation and the reading of the scriptures. In a period of twelve weeks, 32,000 pocket testaments were given away. One business man has given five thousand pounds for testaments. The movement has had the approval of Dr. Harrington Lees, Archbishop of Melbourne, and many other leading churchmen. In colleges, mining camps and many other places groups of young people have felt deep religious interest and thousands are reported as converts. Mr. George T. B. Davis is prominent in the movement.

Successful Church Forum at Terre Haute

Terre Haute, Ind., has a forum which packs the auditorium of First Congregational church every Sunday evening. This forum has already heard some of the foremost interpreters of the social reform in America, including Edward A. Steiner, Thomas Mott Osborne, Shailer Mathews, Norman Angell, Maude Wood Parke, Jane Addams, Harriett Vittum, Toyokichi Iyenaga, Rabbi Harrison, Donald Cowling, John Haynes Holmes, Harry F. Ward, and S. K. Radcliffe. The procedure of the forum is thus set forth by a member of the group: "To illustrate the vitality of the forum method this forum arranged a series of addresses on the industrial problem. First it brought a man who spoke eloquently on the political labor movement. His argument was so poorly sustained, however, that the crowd reduced him se-

M. E. Bishops Debate Lively Issues

THE recent meeting of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church at Baltimore is characterized by an anonymous writer from the circle as "the greatest debating society in the Methodist Episcopal church." There was discussion of the minutiae of various reports, and the differences which make popular church assemblies lively have also run the line of cleavage through the bishops' organization. Bishop Joseph F. Berry was elected to give the episcopal address at the next general conference, but not without spirited opposition.

The "Buckner case" which is now known in every hamlet in the United States had as much consideration as under the rules it could get. Bishop Stunz cannot under the law have his official acts reviewed by the other bishops, but this did not prevent their speaking their minds. It is clear that the majority do not support the idea that the retirement clause in the law of the church can be used to settle heresy cases. When a man's doctrinal reputation is attacked, he has a right to a trial on demand.

The report of Bishop Nuelsen on conditions in Russia helped to dispel the cloud of suspicion and misinformation that rests upon the American mind with regard to conditions in Russia. There is a vast difference between the reports of religious workers who have been under the pay of no propagandist organization and the reports of newspaper men who are given their point of view before they start to Russia.

The social and international pronouncements of the bishops was the most radical they have ever made. We quote the following:

"The second corrective is the organization of political and social life everywhere upon the basis of the welfare of all, instead of privilege for the few. Here, and here only, lies release from the military heritage of the past and from the present economic causes of war. This program means broadening of brotherhood; the substitution of service for reward; the discovery of the spiritual values in labor; a policy of freedom in speech, press, conference, and contact; toleration and cooperation in religious, economic and social organization. Such a program will so mold political procedure by the principles of Christ as to make it meet the basic economic and social needs of the entire community.

"We deplore the unjust accumulation and inequitable distribution of huge surplus profits by financial corporations. We insist that Christian principles shall be applied alike to capital and labor.

"We deplore the distribution of rewards of conquest in the form of governmental monopolies and territorial control for personal and selfish advantage.

"We deplore the investment of taxes in armaments and pompous display, and urge the nations of the world not only to limit but to destroy this bulwark of hatred.

"It is our solemn judgment that nothing short of the actual application of the principles of Jesus in governmental, economic, religious, educational, and racial life today will meet the need. The whole world stands appalled at the colossal failure of other programs. Let us now frankly and honestly practice the teachings of Christ.

"We pledge ourselves to cooperate with all governmental, social, and religious bodies that seek a practical program to heal the suspicions and hates which wound mankind today. Various suggestions are being made. Ours is not an exclusive voice.

"Conference is essential. Therefore, without regard to traditional divisions, we are eager to join hands with any agency which will take adequate, decisive, and immediate action. This is the hour for all Christians in broadest charity to say, 'If you love what I love, if your vision is as my vision, if your heart is as my heart—then give me your hand!'

"America unhesitatingly should accept her full responsibility for leadership in the restoration of a broken word. She should not acquiesce in imperialistic policies and tempers that make war inevitable. She should refuse to sanction any war except for strictest self-defense or the defense of humanity. She should continue to advocate universal disarmament and should not hesitate in asking that an international conference be called for this great purpose."

verely in the second period. Next the forum brought a man who spoke with very telling effect on the golden rule in industry. The members profited greatly by the message, but made it clear that something more concrete and specific was necessary than the generalized belief expressed. Interest in the whole problem had by this time so mounted that the speakers' committee arranged a trio of speakers—the first on the open shop, the second on the closed shop, and the third one of the ablest of the "human engineers" who are today helping to solve the industrial problem by throwing all silly prejudices and class feelings resolutely to one side and adapting industry to the human nature of men whose loyalty and intelligent labor are indispensable."

Ohio Pastors Will Assemble at Columbus

Probably few states would venture to challenge the statement that Ohio has the strongest interdenominational organization of the churches to be found in the United States. One of the features of this fellowship is the annual interdenominational convention of pastors held under the auspices of the state federation, which will be held in First Congregational church of Columbus, Jan. 22-25. A strong program is being arranged and there will be an interchange of speakers with the state convention of the Y.M.C.A., which will be in session at the same time. The following have been invited to speak at the convention: Bishop Williams of the Protestant Episcopal church, Detroit; Dr. Robert E. Speer, president of the Federal Council of Churches, New York, and Rev. Guy Black, evangelistic worker of the Methodist Episcopal Board of Home Missions, Gary, Ind.

Minister Dares to Tackle Delicate Subject

Rev. Bourner Ernest Allen, pastor of Pilgrim Congregational church of Oak Park, Ill., recently spoke on "The Sex Problem." His desire to break the conspiracy of silence regarding some of the worst evils of the age is typical of the point of view of many earnest ministers of the gospel. He said: "The minister who speaks upon the sex problem today is charged by the conservative with being immodest; and if he does not speak upon it, the radical calls him a coward. Of these two alternatives, I choose—neither! For I believe we can talk over some of these sex matters without being indelicate or cowardly. The real danger lies in silence or side-stepping. What does the sex problem involve? It involves the relation of men and women to one another; the understanding and mastery of the sex instinct; the guarding of the new freedom which has come to woman and which she has demanded; a fresh appraisal of the business and protection of the home; the training of children; the form of their education on leaving home; the ideals of social pleasure; the knowledge of the time when it may be safe for boys and girls to stay out late together, and jazz; an appreciation of the normal sex instincts for fellowship; a sense of the sin of making the home a jail. Most of all, the sex problem involves a fresh devotion to Christian ideals."

Chicago Federation Now Has Day in Church Calendar

The Chicago Church Federation now has a day in the ecclesiastical calendar and will present its appeal in many communities on Dec. 10. A budget of thirty thousand dollars a year has been approved by the constituent denominations. In the earlier days of the federation, it had to subsist on the free-will offerings of Christian business men who were canvassed in their offices, but the work of the organization has grown to such an extent that a more dignified mode of financing the organization is now in vogue.

Successor to Phillips Brooks Made Bishop

The Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann, rector of Trinity church of Boston, has just been elected bishop of Pittsburgh. He has for many years been the presiding officer of the house of deputies of the Protestant Episcopal General convention, and has been an interesting figure in that he has held the position of successor to Phillips Brooks at Trinity church. Dr. Mann has several times in the past refused an election to the episcopacy. He was elected bishop of Washington in 1908, but declined. In 1915 he was elected suffragan bishop of Newark, but did not accept. In 1917 he was chosen as bishop of Western New York, but this noteworthy appointment he also refused. Dr. Mann is now sixty-two years of age, at the height of his power. His communion is strongly entrenched in the Pittsburgh area, and he will have large administrative responsibility. His appointment will strengthen that element in the house of bishops which believes in having fellowship with the evangelical churches.

Christian Charity Will Be Put to New Test

The Nationalist government of Turkey has posted notices in Anatolia that Christians would be permitted to depart during November. It seems, however, that men between nineteen and fifty-five are being detained in the villages. Meanwhile families have piled their earthly belongings on carts and are making all haste to the nearest seaport where they may secure passage to Greece. Thus the Christians of the whole Turkish empire are being forced to take temporary residence in Greece which will create a food problem of the first magnitude one of these days. Meanwhile the allied statesmen, including those of the United States,

The Passing of a Christian Philanthropist

THE religious life of Detroit has suffered an immeasurable loss in the death of Philip H. Gray, whose passing occured in a Boston Hospital after an illness which has removed him from active life for nearly a year. It is probably well within the truth to say that no citizen of that city was connected more vitally and helpfully with so many significant movements of uplift and advance in church and community than Mr. Gray. His two outstanding connections were with the Y. M. C. A. of his city and the Central Christian Church. He was president of the former organization for nearly a decade. To it he gave no perfunctory service nor conventional alms, but intelligent support, both of money and time. He projected an elaborate boys' camp on the shores of a lake in the eastern resort district of the state upon whose development he is said to have expended a quarter of a million dollars, providing in his plan for the physical, social, aesthetic and religious renewal, not of boys alone, but of their fathers as well. He founded under Y. M. C. A. auspices the Detroit School of Religion, a new departure in the field of popular religious instruction intended to provide a more adequately equipped lay leadership in church and home and Sunday school. He founded an osteopathic hospital in Detroit in order that this particular school of therapeutics might be given a fair chance to demonstrate the value of its principles. This philanthopy was characteristic not of his partisanship for one school above another but of his tolerant sense of fair play toward a movement which he felt was handicapped by established professional standards and procedures.

For the church of his denomination, in which his children had been reared, he had proposed a plan intended to rescue it from the disadvantages of its location and the modesty of its appointments, and make it a factor of the first magnitude in the religious life of the city. Matching his vision and generosity with a devotion equal in their degree to his own, the membership of the church is going forward with its work of enlargement. Hiram college, in Ohio, recently dedicated Gray Hall, a dormitory for boys erected by Mr. Gray at a cost of $100,000. He was one of the founders of the Detroit Symphony orchestra and had a leading part in every civic forward looking movement. Innumerable causes and individuals and institutions, owe their success to his sympathy and practical help. A son, a recent Harvard graduate, sailed for China last summer under appointment of the Episcopal mission board, and has already begun teaching economics in Boone University. The funeral service in Boston was conducted by his pastor, Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones, and Dr. Charles Clayton Morrison, assisted by Professor Vernon Stauffer of Transylvania College and Dr. Charles M. Sharpe, dean of the Detroit School of Religion.

with their eyes on the oil fields beyond the Dardanelles, continue to play politics against one another. The Near East Relief is making every effort to make provision for the needs of the deported people. However, their available resources are already taxed to the limit to care for the orphans for whom they are responsible, thousands of the orphans have been ordered out of the Turkish empire, and they will be housed temporarily in an old royal castle in Greece and on the island of Corfu in a summer home once occupied by the kaiser of Germany.

Churches Hunt New Members

Various churches, including those of Cincinnati, are using the months of November and December as a time to stress church attendance. During this period they will be hunting up new prospects. The Walnut Hills group of churches has recently made a house-to-house canvas of their territory. The churches of Park Ridge, Ill., near Chicago, have found a way to tabulate the entire city without the burden of ringing every door bell. Securing the water lists from the city hall, the pastors have each checked off their parish from the list. Even the Roman Catholic priest cooperated. That leaves only a small percentage of the community to be canvassed by the interdenominational committee appointed by the various ladies aid groups of the city. The ministers found some interesting examples of divided families, but no effort was made to handle these cases.

Rabbi Sees in Passion Play Incitement to Anti-Semitism

While Protestants have joined Catholics in their admiration of the devotion of the Oberammergau peasants, Rabbi S. Wise in a recent address in Chicago, spoke in terms of severe criticism of the Passion Play. He finds in the play the bitter spirit of prejudice against the Jew which he thinks brought the play into being three centuries ago and which will today make many people hate Jews once more.

Issues New Bible Study Manual

Father Frederick C. Grant, rector of Trinity Episcopal church of Chicago, and a popular teacher of the Bible, will soon publish a new Bible study manual, "The Early Days of Christianity." He has already written an excellent manual for the study of the life of Christ. He teaches the Bible two nights a week in the diocesan religious education schools of Chicago and one night a week he teaches at South Bend, Ind., in a union school.

Methodist Federation Makes Good Beginning

The Methodist Federation for Social Service, which made a beginning in a meeting held at Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston last spring, is giving a good account of its stewardship. During the past year the receipts of the federa-

Hymns of the Centuries
is the FIRST dignified hymnal to be published with the words printed within the music staff.
The publishers of a competing book which closely resembles "Hymns of the Centuries" in form and content, claim that theirs is "The hymnal that is revolutionizing congregational singing in hundreds of churches"!
If this be true, "Hymns of the Centuries," published six years before the other, started the revolution!
Hundreds of churches are using "Hymns of the Centuries" with ever increasing satisfaction. Pastors report that their congregational singing has improved wonderfully.
"Hymns of the Centuries" is still the favorite. It retains the old and well loved hymns set to the right tunes, while it gives ample space to hymns of Social Service, Brotherhood, the Kingdom of God and the Spiritual Life.
"Hymns of the Centuries" does not sacrifice the dearly loved hymns and tunes for those untried selections that have not proved themselves worthy of a place in a modern, usable and thoroughly satisfactory hymnal.

Note the Following Favorable Comments:

Nelson Trimble, Manager of Interstate Lyceum Bureau, Chicago, says:

"The little book has been the source of much personal and spiritual inspiration to me and to those in my home. The author shows an unusual ability in grasping the fundamental teachings of the Master and in interpreting them in the light of present day needs."

The Christian Evangelist, St. Louis, Mo.: "These sermons must have been very impressive when delivered before a popular audience."

The Christian Standard, Cincinnati, O.: "These fourteen choice sermons are direct, heart-reaching and inspiring."

Geo. Hamilton Combs: "What a beautiful and helpful little book!"

The price, postpaid, is only seventy-five cents. Kindly send orders to

Exodus XX:2

Commandment I

"I Am Jehovas Thy God." אנכי יהוה אלהיך

or

Jehovah is the God
Americanism the Religion

Because the second Commandment contains this: "... for I Jehovah thy God am a revengeful God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, etc.," Jehovah is thought of as a fearful, merciless God.

If two young men would apply for a position of trust: one whose father is a decent working man or honest business man; the other whose father is a thief and is serving a term in jail, which one of the two would you employ?

Is Jehovah fearful, merciless or natural?

SELECTED CHRISTMAS GIFTS

The Outline of Science

Edited by J. ARTHUR THOMSON.

The most attractive work on science ever published. It will eventually go into the homes of every family of cultural ideals. Why not present it to your family this Christmas? Will be sent immediately upon receipt of your order. (Price for the four volumes, $18.00).

Dictionary of Religion and Ethics

By SHAILER MATHEWS and GERALD BIRNEY SMITH.

A fitting gift, not only for a minister, but for any thorough Bible student. A treasury of religious knowledge which can be appreciated only when it is on the study table, at one's elbow. (Price $8.00).

Nelson Concordance, American Standard Bible

Just from the press! Dr. M. C. Hazard, editor of the book, has presented to the religious public a work which has been eagerly awaited by every minister, Bible teacher and student using the American Revised Version. An indispensable working tool. Why not present this volume to your minister — or to your mother, husband or father? (Price $5.00).

The World's Great Religous Poetry

Compiled by Caroline M. Hill, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago. Contains the finest religious poems of all times, being especially complete in its selection of modern poems. Is almost as valuable as a concordance to a minister, and is as beautiful a gift for anyone of literary tastes as can be selected. Beautifully printed and bound. Foreword by Herbert L. Willett, Ph.D. (Price $3.50).

The Daily Altar

By WILLETT and MORRISON

Your friend will think of you for many years should you present this charming work of devotion to him at this Christmastide. It will mean a new outlook on life if he begins his day with the reading of a page from this volume. Now being used in thousands of homes. (Price, leather, $2.50; purple cloth, $1.50).

tion have been over seven thousand dollars. Miss Winifred Chappell has been secured as one of the secretaries, and is charged with conducting research and caring for the office work. She was at the head of the social service department of the Chicago Training School for City, Home and Foreign Missionaries for a number of years, and during a leave of absence was employed for a time as a special writer by the Young Women's Christian Association. The organization is seeking a man for field work, and many Methodist conferences will receive him when appointed and give him a hearing in the churches.

Roman Catholic Church Gets Into Relief Work

Stung into activity by criticism in many quarters, the Roman Catholic church has at last begun to do something for the starving populations of Europe which are outside the Roman Catholic church. Pope Pius XI is calling for contributions from his people, twenty-five cents each from the poor and five dollars from the rich. Eleven priests and religious brothers are being sent into the districts of Moscow, Ekaterinador, and Rastow to administer relief. The commission is headed by Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, S.J.

Episcopal Church Starts on Big Campaign

The Episcopal church has set for itself a most ambitious program for the next three years. It proposes to secure $12,600,000 for missionary, social, and educational work and $8,400,000 for a forward program, making twenty millions in all. The drive was begun on Nov. 28. During 1923 it is hoped to secure six millions on the twenty million fund. As the membership of the church is only about a million people, the per capita of giving will be generous.

The WIDOWS and ORPHANS of the NEAR EAST wish everyone in AMERICA a MERRY CHRISTMAS

THEY are grateful to America for its aid in their distress. 110,000 orphans are being cared for and trained for future citizenship in the homes of the Near East Relief.

WE must help save them until they can be rehabilitated by economic reconstruction.

OUR Churches and Bible Schools will be asked to present this cause adequately and receive offerings in February.

Endorsement of International Convention of Disciples of Christ.

Be it Resolved:

"That we urge upon our churches and all Christian people the need for continued relief for the distressed people of the Near East. . . . .

"That our churches and Bible Schools be urged to make generous offerings to Near East Relief in the month of February. . .

"That we authorize the appointment by the Executive Committee of an advisory committee to cooperate with the Near East Relief, chartered by Congress, and to bring this appeal to the Disciples of Christ."

Foremost Among New Religious Books

"Preach It Again"
By BERNARD C. CLAUSEN, D.D.

The story of an attempt to learn what a congregation thought about a year of preaching. The experiment made possible conclusions that cannot fail to be interesting and suggestive to laymen as well as preachers and students and teachers of pulpit work. In five captivating chapters, Doctor Clausen sums up the results of his investigation. The sermons follow—strikingly unusual in form and content. $1.25 net

The Christian Faith and Human Relations
STEPHEN GREENE LECTURES

The lecturers in this course were W. C. Bitting, Shailer Mathews, William Douglas MacKenzie, Roger W. Babson and Edward Caldwell Moore. Their themes were the family, the community, the state, industry, and international relations. Historical, constructive and practical, rich in information and keenly stimulating, of fine feeling and intelligent thinking, these essays are a contribution of unusual worth to the discussion of the times. $1.25 net

If America Fail!
By SAMUEL ZANE BATTEN

Our national mission and our possible future. Dr. Batten discusses first the meaning and mission of America; then reviews the field of history and notes the great causes of the decline and fall of nations, and considering America again, finds those familiar diseases at their oldtime work. The second part of the book is constructive, showing how the national life may be purged, and its mission for the world fully performed. $1.60 net

God's Better Thing
By A. D. BELDEN, B.D. (Lond.)
Essays of Concern and Conviction

The author's conviction is that the evangelical faith is seriously cramped by a purely individualistic application, and that it must find its flowering and fruitage in the gospel of the kingdom of God on earth before it can adequately satisfy the spiritual needs of mankind and give just proof of itself. Here are thought and passion, matter and style, that should make the book attractive and worth while to a multitude of readers. $1.50 net

How can YOU acquire the art of being interesting?

The coupon at the bottom of this page is the Key to a new world of fascinating enjoyment

YOU KNOW MEN and women in social and business life who, to all outward appearance, are alike. But what a difference when you are in their company for more than a few minutes at a time!

One is helpless in a conversation that goes beyond the narrow circle of his own daily existence. The other always holds your attention and interest, whatever the subject may be.

Around commonplace facts he weaves romance founded seemingly upon knowledge that spans centuries. Wherever he goes he seems to have known the spot when it was in the making. His conversation illuminates the present with the vivid colors of the past.

How can you, whose time for libraries, museums and travel is limited, acquire the fascinating information that causes your company eagerly to be sought? How can you know the hidden story behind a prehistoric relic, or a mystifying freak of Nature?

There is no mystery to the art of being interesting. It is known to all who read an amazing story which the coupon below will bring to you for free examination.

Imagine a story that begins 10,000,000 or 100,000,000 years ago; imagine being carried through the ages from one dramatic scene to another—as if you sat in a motion-picture theatre and saw the whole drama of the human race displayed on the screen before you—imagine the thrill of such an experience and you have some conception of

H. G. WELLS' Outline of History

In 4 Library Size Volumes

Profusely Illustrated

Although more than a million copies have been sold here and abroad, virtually the only complaint we have heard of Wells' "Outline of History" has been that it was too bulky to hold comfortably while reading.

So we decided to bring it out in a form that would be not only convenient and easy to handle but as handsome a set of books and as beautifully illustrated as any History ever made. That meant starting all over from the very beginning, setting everything anew in fresh, clear type; gathering from the four corners of the earth a hundred of the most famous historical paintings for illustrations.

Mr. Wells threw himself into this task with all his marvelous enthusiasm. For a long time he had felt that certain parts of the "Outline" needed elaborating, certain other parts revision. This was his chance. Starting at the very beginning, he made changes on every single page of the text, rewrote whole chapters, added page after page of material.

Here Is Our Offer:

And now, at last, we can offer you the new, revised, illustrated history, complete in four beautiful, hand-tooled volumes, in convenient library size at 25% less than the price of the original two volume set!

Think of it! Thoroughly revised, printed from brand-new, clear, readable plates, with a hundred famous historical pictures from the great art galleries of the world, and bound up into four hand-tooled, library size volumes — all for a fourth less than the ordinary two-volume set would cost you even now in any book-store!

And the Review of Reviews, Too!

Wells begins with the dawn of time. Before there were men. Before there were reptiles. In broad, magnificent strokes he paints the picture, bringing you straight down to today. He shows the thread of human purpose binding men together the world over from one age to another.

And where Wells stops, the Review of Reviews takes up the story. It ties together the events of today the world over, shows their relation one to another, gives you a background of facts for your daily news.

Only One Condition We Make—

There is but one condition — that you mail the attached coupon at once. Such an unusual offer as this cannot last long. You must act at once.

Send the coupon — without money. If for any reason you are dissatisfied with the History, if it doesn't seem to you the utmost of book value and satisfaction, send it back and cancel your order. There'll be no quibbling — no questions asked.

But mail the coupon now — today — before it is too late!

THE YEAR'S GREATEST BOOKS ON RELIGION AND THE CHURCH

The Reconstruction of Religion

By PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, of the University of Missouri.

A vindication of the teachings of Jesus from the standpoint of modern sociology.

Says Professor George A. Coe: "The book is thought-awakening, conscience-searching, uncompromisingly frank; yet, because it is profoundly religious, it is profoundly friendly."

S. Parkes Cadman: "A valuable contribution to the task of rebuilding the world in justice and peace."

Prof. Edwin L. Earp (Drew Seminary): "In my judgment, after careful reading, this is the most thorough analysis of the whole range of religious thought and practice from the point of view of sociology since Rauschenbusch."

Bishop Francis J. McConnell: "Any one depressed on the religious outlook will do well to read it. I found its optimism positively bracing—with none of the bad after effects which come when optimism is not grounded in reason."

Prof. G. Stanley Hall: "I found real edification in this remarkable book."

Prof. Franklin H. Giddings: "I rate it one of the three best religious books of recent years."

Bishop Charles Bayard Mitchell: "The best book I have read in five years. I am urging all my ministers to read it. Sane, scientific, and loyally Scriptural."

Prof. Charles Foster Kent: "Its spirit throughout is not merely critical, but constructive. In fearlessly declaring that the religion of Jesus contains a solution of our modern social problems he has voiced a conviction that is held by thousands of thoughtful men today."

Prof. Edward Alsworth Ross: "This is a great book, profound, logical, lucid, good tempered, and wise. I do not see how any serious man—least of all a clergyman—can afford to neglect it."

Price, $2.25 plus 12 cents postage.

The Church in America

By PROFESSOR WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, of Union Theological Seminary.

"To all who have won from yesterday's experience the hope of a better tomorrow"—so reads Dr. Brown's dedicatory word, and he could not more effectively indicate the spirit of the book. He says further: "I hold with growing conviction the thesis to which this book is devoted; namely, that it is vital to the future success of American Protestantism that we re-think our doctrine of the church; not that we should continue our discussion of church unity in the abstract, but we must determine what should be the function of the church in our democratic society and come to a definite understanding how the existing churches can see that this function is adequately discharged."

SOME CHAPTER HEADINGS

The Question of Democracy to the Church of Today.
The Religion of the Average American.
Emerging Problems.
The Wider Outlook.
Where the War Left the Church.
The Old Religion in the New Intellectual Environment.
The Church and the New Social Order.
The Church as Spiritual Society and as Ecclesiastical Institution.
The Church in the Community.
The Church Specializing for Service.
The Churches Getting Together.
The Church as a School of Religion.
Finding and Training Leaders.
Thinking Together.
The Contribution of the Church to the Democracy of the Future.

What reason is there for believing that the church will do the work which may be expected of it by the forward-looking men and women of our generation? That is the question Dr. Brown attempts to answer in this book.

Price, $3.00 plus 14 cents postage.

IT CAN BE DOUBLE

A Big but Hopeful Undertaking

FOR the past three years The Christian Century set out each year to double its subscription list. We did not quite reach the goal in either of the first two years, but did succeed in the third year. With our present enlarged subscription list we have not dared think or talk so glibly about doubling yet again in the season of 1922-23. Our faith has been hardly equal to so ambitious a project. But events are rebuking us. The months of September, October and November have made such a fine beginning — such a startlingly fine beginning — that the conviction of the possibility of doubling our subscription list yet once more has now something more than faith and hope to rest upon.

¶ As usual, we take our readers into our confidence in this endeavor, and for the very good reason that it has always been, is now, and ever must be the regular readers of The Christian Century upon whom we depend for every advance made in our circulation. We have no paid agents in the field. Nine-tenths of the new subscriptions we receive come through the voluntary activities of our readers. If we can have a bit of cooperation from every present subscriber we are now certain that the prodigious feat of doubling again can be performed. We believe we can count upon such cooperation. During the next few weeks we expect the subscription department to be taxed to its enlarged capacity in handling the flood of new subscriptions which our present readers will send into our office.

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: For the last week or so I have had a subtle feeling that I was not up to standard physically, mentally, morally, and spiritually. There seemed to be a kind of immeasurable vacancy in this study and hereabouts. Something was missing! And it was not the "missing link!" I have discovered the source of my undoneness. The Christian Century had just, in the course of human events, failed to "act," being taught to stop its visits automatically when the one visited forgets to renew his subscription! Hence the poverty of my reactions on my own part these last few days. I trust that the enclosed document will start our great American journal my way at once! With good wishes, I am,

Faithfully yours,

FREDERICK F. SHANNON.

The Editors' Part

AND what can we expect our editors to do? The answer to that is something like Sir Christopher Wren's monument—"Look around you!" The pages of The Christian Century speak for themselves. Yet the editors promise for the year ahead the most attractive feast that has ever been spread in the whole range of religious journalism. The dominant note of the new year will be the inculcation and interpretation of the spiritual life. Subjects like these: "Piety and Culture," "Science and Mysticism," "Prayer and Law," will bulk large in the program. Dr. Newton and Dr. Hough—the latter recently having become a member of the editorial staff—will join with the editors in attempting a reinterpretation of the life of piety in an age whose ruling passions are science and social salvation.

¶ The social essence of the Christian task will continue to be interpreted by great articles of original and illuminating insight, such as, to name but a single example, the two articles by Samuel McCrea Cavert, which appeared in the past two issues. Persistently will The Christian Century work away at the business of interpreting the mind of Christ to all aspects of modern life.

¶ Persistently, too, will our editors keep before us the vital question: Is the church as we now have it a competent organ of religion as we now conceive it? This is no casual inquiry to be settled in a single article. It is a sort of symphonic motif that our readers feel recurring again and again in the unfolding of the editorial program.

¶ But how better can the editors tell their part in the all around cooperative effort to double the subscription list than merely to set down a few of the names of notable contributors of past and future. Call your friends' attention to this list of

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

The President Sees His Duty

AFTER an unconscionably long evasion of his constitutional responsibility President Harding has at last squarely confronted his duty with respect to the prohibition law. In his message to congress last week his treatment of the scandalous condition that has been allowed to develop in many parts of the country brings a sense of relief and reasurrance to all our citizenship in which there remains any root of respect for law. The essential function of the President is to enforce the law. His administration is launched by his oath to support the constitution. The carrying out of this vast executive function demands that the responsibility be divided and subdivided into many departments and that specially appointed agents of the President be put directly in charge of these departments with power to act. But all such agents are only the hands of that authority of which the President himself is the head. When an agent fails to enforce the specific laws over which he is given charge it is the President who fails. If such failure is flagrant and scandalous the President is bound by his oath to assume more direct personal charge and see that the law is obeyed. We believe that Mr. Harding should long ago have interfered with his agencies under whose vicarious authority the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead statute were being openly defied. That he has at last done so and in a fashion that not only gives an unmistakable impression of his sincerity but that promises an adequate policy of enforcement is sufficient cause even now for congratulation. What prohibition needs is simply the faithful and resourceful authority of the government behind it. Its ill-repute is derived from its non-enforcement. Wherever it is enforced its intrinsic character and its beneficent effects speak so loud that opposition cannot get a hearing. With the federal government stirred to its duty the scandalous conditions that have prevailed may be expected to come to an end.

No Discouragement In Present Laxness

PASSING from the point of view of the President's duty to that of popular psychology, it is perhaps not so strange, after all, that the period immediately following the adoption of prohibition should be one of disrespect and defiance toward the newly enacted law. It is better to have this experience near the beginning of the new regime than later. Had a strict constructionist policy of literal enforcement been followed from the beginning, it is conceivable that a period of license would have followed during which a national debauch of incomparably greater cost and injury would have taken place. Compensation for the present deplorable conditions may therefore be found in the reflection that the extreme opposite course of precipitately suppressing the traffic could have produced a condition even more deplorable. It is well for temperance folk to keep reminding themselves of the radical character of the moral revolution which American society has determined upon. A demon which has inhabited the social organism so long as has the liquor traffic will not leave without wrenching and tearing the body from which it is being exorcised. Experienced prohibitionists know this. They have seen it in every state, in every county, in every community from which during the past generation under the local option principle this same demon has been banished. In no case did he go out at the behest of any mild, lady-like command. In no case did he show respect for a law that was decreed against him. He had to be driven out and vigilantly kept out, until the body, cured of its unnatural thirst and greed—the greed infinitely more violent than the thirst—found for itself a new moral and practical orientation. From that point on the task was progressively less difficult. So will it be in the nation. The opening years of the prohibition regime are far more crucial than any other stage of the movement—more crucial than the period of bringing the law into being. President Harding's firm word will clear the air. His policy of enforcement, calling upon the governors of all the states who share with him under the constitution concurrent authority to enforce the eighteenth amendment, is logical and hopeful. It may result in a sharp political alignment two years hence, but unless he loads his candidacy down with reactionary social and economic policies, Mr. Harding need not personally fear the result. Good government and we believe good politics underlie the President's firmly stated position.

Y. M. C. A. Convention At Atlantic City

TOUCH any delegate to the international convention of the Y. M. C. A. recently held at Atlantic City, reported elsewhere in this issue, and you will meet with a hearty, vibrant, and whole-souled enthusiasm over the things which that convention did. This enthusiasm is partly an expression of the deep relief felt as the result of the settlement, or at least the arrival at a method of settlement, of many internal problems of organization, coordination and practical policy within the movement. But it extended to other matters of far more vital public interest. Among these was the explicit emphasis made by the convention upon the fact that it is a young men's movement. It has been long felt that the "Y" instead of being an organization of young men had become a sort of paternalistic organization of mature and well-seasoned men working for young men. At Atlantic City the movement definitely turned the corner and appears to be headed toward a youth goal. High school and employed boys spoke from the floor. Young men were conspicuous on committees. The new president, Mr. Judson G. Rosebush, of Appleton, Wis., while 42 years old, is young compared to those who went before him in that honorable succession. The spirit and point of view of the student associations were more influential in the convention than ever before. The convention failed, and we think it was a serious failure, to make a challenging utterance on the problem of war and of the industrial responsibility of any organization that wears the name Christian. But that the sentiment of the gathering on these subjects was the sentiment characteristic of the student branch of the organization was manifested again and again by the ardor with which the delegates received the most pronounced utterances from the platform in direct opposition to the older "zone of agreement" policy upon which the bourgeois and capitalistic metropolitan branch has hitherto operated. Contrary to newspaper reports which in certain cases conveyed the impression that the convention took action breaking its bonds of union with the evangelical churches, the action taken was explicitly in behalf of strengthening these bonds. The basis of membership is still the historic Portland basis—membership in an evangelical church—but it was agreed that 10 per cent of the members of a board of directors need not be members of a church provided they personally profess an evangelical faith in Christ. The basis of membership in the student associations is more liberal, being the signing of the statement of the purpose of the organization, which, however, is thoroughly evangelical in character.

Discredited Millenarian Predictions

IT is a diverting experience to come upon some of the confident predictions and identifications made by people of the apocalyptic mood during the war period. In those days the books of Daniel and Revelation were studied with an avidity which searched with nervous eagerness for every utterance that could be tortured into allusion to current events. It was claimed that in the books of the prophetic type most of the occurrences of the war time could be discerned in prediction. The kaiser was the antichrist who was to be consumed by the wrath of God. But there was no prediction of his quiet and comfortable retreat into Holland, nor of his spectacular second marriage. Turkey was to be driven out of Europe; but nothing was forecast as to its early return, which the world is now contemplating with astonishment and shame. One of the most vivid of all the pictures presented by the adventist dreamers was that of Mr. Wilson as the mighty angel of the tenth chapter of Revelation. Even the most devoted admirers of the ex-President must have winced at the fulsome identification of that description with the man then in the white house. Had he not sent a rainbow division to Europe? Did he not hold in his hand a little book, the American constitution, whose principles he was extending to all the world? Was not his right foot upon the sea, in the act of launching a great navy, and his left upon the land, where a great army was assembling? Was not his voice heard around the world? If this and numberless other vagaries of the millenarian sort could be reread by the zealous advocates of such systems in the light of the passing years, much might be done to cure them of their hallucinations and to provide them with hints for a sane and satisfying study of the word of God.

The Menace of Unbelief

UNBELIEF may be a very destructive thing. To reject the real fundamentals cuts the nerve of progress and keeps the social order in a state of suspended animation. But few, however, realize just what this dangerous unbelief is. During the war we enacted laws against freedom of speech which are in direct violation of the constitution and by which many of the Presidents of the United States could have been sent to prison for their utterances. The war time legislation of the United States is not unlike the decrees issued by the czar against the free speech before his downfall. The unfaith that is dangerous in the political order is not rejection of political dogmas, but the rejection of the fundamental of all democracy, freedom. In the church there is a like confusion concerning the skepticism that destroys. Dr. Torrey has recently issued a book which makes the major troblem of the church the restoration of faith in such things as hell, verbal inspiration and the second coming. But Dr. Torrey and many men of like mind are themselves skeptics of the most dangerous sort. They do not believe that the truth of God in religion is vigorous and patent enough to care for itself, but that it is a tender plant to be kept and guarded in a hothouse. John Milton held another view of truth. He said: "And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to doubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple. Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?" If the Methodist bishop feels that the teachings of Rev. J. D. M. Buckner are dangerous, it would be far better to give the misguided minister a public and official hearing than connive at his removal from active service. Why do not the conservative dominies of Philadelphia who are making a great hue and cry against Dr. Fosdick find their satisfaction in exposing his errors in honest forthright discussion instead of trying such coercive weapons as excommunication? Do the Philadelphia critics fear lest the virgin birth may not be established in honest discussion? Does Dr. Torrey fear that his doctrine of physical hell-fire cannot sustain itself in honest argument?

Scientific Study of Race Prejudice

PREJUDICE is being scientifically studied by our sociologists, for it is a social fact that bulks just as large in the matter of racial relationships as any other fact. Chicago's Commission on Race Relationships which was appointed following the clashes between Negroes and whites in 1920 has produced a large volume full of scientific findings which are of vital importance in any understanding of the racial problem. In this volume there are gathered together in one of the chapters some of the numerous myths that are commonly believed by white people with regard to Negroes. Some of them are ludicrous as well as pathetic. Here are samples: that if one hits a Negro on the head with a cobblestone, the cobblestone will break; that whenever a Negro is educated he refuses to work and is a criminal; that all Negro prize fighters marry white women and then afterwards beat them; that the minute a Negro gets eight dollars he goes to a dentist and has one of his front teeth filled wild gold; that a Negro ball always ends up in a grand free-for-all fight in which several of the participants are mortally slashed with razors. The reason why Negroes are shut out of labor unions is set forth by testimony from union officials. These men who are barred out of organized labor often act as strikebreakers, but union men never draw the logical conclusion from these facts. The following judgment of a Negro business man found in the book is worthy of consideration: "There is no race problem; if the white people would only do as they would be done by, we would not have need of commissions to better conditions. This won't be done, but an easier plan is to enforce the law. The laws are good enough, but they are not enforced. Riots grow out of hatred, envy, jealousy and prejudice. When a man becomes a contented citizen there will be little chance of causing him to fight anyone. Give us those things that are due us—law, protection and equal rights—then we will become contented citizens."

Good Books Have a New Competitor

ABRAHAM LINCOLN is reputed to have spent his evenings reading a few great books over and over again by the flickering light of a wood fire. How deeply the Bible and Shakespeare entered into his every day thinking one can easily learn by a study of his speeches. Since his day good books have many competitors. The phonograph came into the American home with its program of Negro dialect and popular songs. In some homes this was supplemented by the better music. The moving picture came with a message much more easily grasped than that of the printed page. The illiterate were instructed by something more ancient than hieroglyphics. And now the wireless craze has the nation in its grip. The other evening an aged grandmother sat in her lonely home in the middle west working the dials on the radio set her sons had provided. Fort Worth, Tex., sent her the music of a high school band. A slight turn of a knob, and Atlanta, Ga., presented its favorite soloist. Another turn, and Minneapolis sent out "the call of the north" with a more serious message. Thus a country home in the middle west heard speeches, music and comedy from a score of leading cities of the land. Weather reports, markets, directions on the care of the teeth and some propaganda made up the medley program of the evening. But after all none of it was a worthy competitor of a great book. We do not get Shakespeare over the wireless, nor does John Milton perform for us in the movie show. The new inventions undoubtedly quicken the intelligence of a sodden mass in the citizenship who would never read books. But these inventions can never displace the greatest single invention that has come in all of human history, printing from movable types. The art of reading these days tends to become more and more limited to a select class. There is in each city a small intellectual aristocracy that lives with great books. But the church does not hold with aristocracy. It is the business of the Christian church to keep alive in the people the hunger for great literature, especially that which quickens and feeds the spiritual life.

The Intellectual Detective

THE heresy hunter is not particularly loved by men of eager and pursuing mind. For often he is the shouting apostle of an aggressive ignorance. And when he would silence the voices which speak out in the name of general mental exploration he becomes a pest and a menace. It remains a matter beyond dispute, however, that there is a difference between truth and error and that there is a place in the world for the intellectual detective. He must be a man of adequate training who knows the field in which he is to speak. He must be a man of that hearty erudition which has been fed by the richness of many and varied treasure houses of the mind, the conscience and the heart. Being such a man, what is he to do when he discovers that able men are using great powers quite unconsciously as propagandists for the making of the worse to appear the better reason? The first thing he must do is to get back of the logic to the psychology of the situation. Here he will find that genuine aspects of life and experience have been inhibited until at last they have come forth with an expression more vigorous than wholesome. And he must seek to find a way to satisfy this genuine hunger with nutritious and upbuilding fruit. In all that he writes he must show understanding sympathy with the sound basis in human need even when he finds it necessary to say that it has not been dealt with in the right way. Then his court of resort must be not the unreasoned prejudices of men, nor the invisible energies of roused passion, but the steady persistent appeal of a vital setting forth of the truth as he sees it. When men disagree every man must be allowed to set forth his view in his best fashion, and the impact of vitality and reality must be trusted to secure a verdict. When a victory for truth is won by intellectual sharp practice it is a bad day for truth. A detective must always scrutinize himself lest he develop from an understanding to a criminal mind. And the intellectual detective must guard himself lest he become the sleuth of a prejudice and not the agent of truth.

The Miraculous

WHEN it is asserted that the thought of the modern world is turning away from the miraculous features of the Bible, and is finding its satisfaction rather in the ethical and religious values of the Christian faith than in its portents and marvels, a certain alarm is felt by those who have become habituated to the traditional conception of the scriptures, as though their vital qualities were thereby being ignored. If one affirms that he is not interested in the miracle narratives of the Bible and regards them as non-essentials of the record, he is likely to be understood as denying their reality. It is often charged against those who decline to consider as vital such narratives as those of the prophetic miracles of the Old Testament, the virgin birth of Jesus, and the wonders reported in connection with his ministry, that they have abandoned their belief in basic elements of Christian faith.

Of course such is not the case. One may accept as credible every story of miracle included in the two testaments and yet not regard any of them as essential to a competent faith. This is the case with many people in the churches. If asked to define their attitude regarding the miraculous element in the biblical records they might say unhesitatingly that they hold to the credibility of such accounts, but have ceased to consider them as important factors in their belief, or even as items to be included in a summary of accepted truth.

On the other hand there are many who have given over any belief in the miracles without suffering in any manner a diminution of their confidence in the Bible as conveying to the world of our time the supreme religious message of history. It is to them the word of God, disclosed in the lives and messages of the most unique and forceful personalities of the ages, and most of all by our Lord, whose word is final in the realm of the spirit. But the values of this collection of documents are not affected either favorably or otherwise by the manifest marks of the age and the human hands from which they have come. The miracles are features of periods of time and types of thinking from which the modern world of scientific knowledge is separating itself by increasing distances. They were entirely congenial to a view of the world which asserted that it was directed by capricious and changeable moods on the part of the divine ruler and those who from time to time acted in his interest. Early man lived in a realm of the marvelous. Things happened because God willed that they should, without reference to any laws of order and precision. It took mankind a long time to learn the simple truth that in the universe of God's ordering seedtime and harvest, and summer and winter, and heat and cold, and day and night do not cease, but all things are moved in harmony with laws which are also God's ways of working.

That miracles do not occur today is not the proof of unique relations between heaven and earth in the past, relations which no longer obtain, but rather of the fact that miracles never did happen in the manner in which the men of the former times understood them. The facts on which the reports of such events were based are as true today as then, but they have a more reserved and satisfactory explanation. In many parts of the world the belief in the miraculous persists, and it is confidently asserted that works of supernatural character are performed. There are levels of intelligence in more enlightened regions in which similar views prevail. But as education spreads it becomes increasingly evident that narratives of this nature are either due to errors of observation and statement, or to exaggerated explanations of real happenings.

The sanctions of the great truths of our religion are not dependent on signs and wonders, though such there were in the lives of the prophets and of Jesus, as will be shown. But these were not the proofs of a divine mission in any degree comparable to the lives and the teachings of these great moral leaders. Jesus distinctly declined on more than one occasion to trust himself to the following of men who were attracted to him by his ministries of healing. There was an appeal in such activities, but it was to a lower and less trustworthy element in human life. And as to the present value of the miraculous features of Jesus' ministry, they are no longer proofs of his character and purpose, for it is more difficult to persuade the men of today that they were real happenings than to convince them of the divine nature and saviorhood of the One of whom they are affirmed. Men believe in Jesus today rather in spite of the miracles than because of them.

One who attempts to study the miraculous element in the scriptures soon discovers that these narratives divide themselves into several classes. There are first those which do not even impress the student of general literature and history as making claim to be actual miracles, but seem rather to be forceful figures of speech, emphasizing the theme, as when the psalmist declares that at the presence of God the mountains bowed themselves, and the little hills skipped like rams, or that God cast great stones down upon the advancing foes of Israel, or that he prolonged the day for the more complete extermination of Israel's enemies.

Then there are wonder stories whose difficulty lies not so much in the miraculous nature of the event as in the moral implications which accompany it, as in the cases of the companies of soldiers destroyed by the prophet whom they had been sent to bring to the king, or the destruction of the Gaderine swine, or the cursing of the fig tree. These and others of the list are less troublesome by reason of any physical difficulty involved than disturbing to the moral sense of a generation that has been trained by the teachings of Jesus to different conceptions of the divine work in the world.

Again there are narratives of healing and helpfulness that are so convincing and so harmonious with the spirit of the men of God in the older days and with the character of Jesus that they have had for all the generations the value of complete reality. The centuries are full of accounts of healing by words of command, by the touch of sympathy and power, by the exercise of forces that are not yet very well understood, but are no longer doubted. Were the prophets and Jesus withheld from such ministries of kindness? Most of the activities of these great leaders fall under the classification of works of mercy and good will. No one need be troubled in accepting as scientifically valid these signs of the power and the love of our Lord and his friends in the prophetic and apostolic groups. They can abide the test of the most careful scrutiny of the records, when once those criteria are applied which history and criticism have made available.

For the rest, we have to say that there are many occurrences both in the Old Testament and the New that we do not understand. Perhaps in some later time when more of the secrets of nature are disclosed, and man's control of them, these narratives will fall into their appropriate place as capable of explanation. Today they are not. We have the choice between wondering if they have been rightly reported, and reserving them for future examination in the light of widening knowledge. If we have to give an instant judgment regarding them, they fail to convince us. But experience has corrected our first conclusions at so many points that we stand hesitant in the presence of things even the most difficult to understand.

In the meantime it is increasingly clear that the miracles of the Bible are neither the proofs of its authenticity as the word of God, nor the evidences to the modern world of the divine mission of Jesus. On much higher levels these great convictions rest. Every miracle could be dropped from the biblical list and the authority of the gospel and the Lord whose message it is would not be less. But it is not necessary that a single one of these narratives be challenged by the most outspoken and progressive interpreter of the faith. They are not essential, but they are unique features of the record, deeply embedded in the affection and appreciation of the church. Even as parables they have value and will always have as illustrations of the spirit and ideals of the kingdom of God. All words and works of power in the lives of Jesus and the prophets were signs and wonders. But they need not be regarded as violations of those laws in accordance with which all life moves.

Thus far the miraculous. As to the supernatural, we are plainly dealing with another sort of category. In popular speech it is used ambiguously, now to connote what we have treated above as the miraculous, and now with quite a different meaning. If by the supernatural one is designating that universal reign of divine power in this world and in all worlds, then all Christians of the modern mind are devout believers in the supernatural. Of the implications of this view of the world we shall speak at another time.

The Air Brakes

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me one of the sons of the prophets, and he said, Great and Venerable Man, I bring unto thee Salaams.

And I waited until he should tell me what was on his mind; for the men who approach me with Great Reverence have always an Axe to Grind.

And I said, How is it in the Oasis where thou dwellest? And how doth it fare with those who attend thy synagogue?

And he said, They are the worst old Mossbacks who ever drew the breath of life; and they would not draw that if it cost them anything.

Then did he get busy with a line of talk, concerning all that he suffered at the hands of those men who are Conservative, and who agreed not with his Up to the Minute Opinions. And I let him talk.

And when he had finished, I told him that I had just returned from a Journey, and that I had ridden upon a Train that is called the Limited, and that it made Fast Time. And he was interested in Speed, as also am I.

And I said, Consider the Air-brakes.

And he said, I am not so much interested in Brakes as I am in things that make for Speed.

And I said, Then shouldest thou consider the Air Brakes, for it is they that make high Speed possible.

And I said, In my boyhood the trains had only Hand Brakes. And if a train were going Twenty Miles an Hour. the Brakeman had to run nearly the whole length of the Train, and set one Brake and then another by hand. And the Engine could do no more than shut off its own steam, while the Fireman set a dinky little Hand Brake on the trucks of the Tender. But now may the Engineer apply all Brakes at once, the whole length of the Train. Otherwise the Trains would all go to smash, like the herd of swine that ran down a steep place into the sea. It is the Air Brake that maketh Speed possible.

And he was interested, but he saw not the lesson.

And I said, The Crown Prince is always a Liberal, and the King is always a Conservative; for responsibility doth make men reconsider their earlier theories. All young men ought to be Progressive, and all old men ought to be Conservative. Every young Ruler of the Synagogue ought to be glad to have a few Conservatives in his Congregation.

And he said, Thou sayest that all young men should be Progressive and all old men Conservative; yet thou art a Progressive.

And I said, Certainly, for I am Young.

Our Changing Morals

By William J. Dawson

IN the popular literature, art and drama of a period we have probably the most accurate reflection of its life. For example, he who would understand the social and moral life of the eighteenth century can find no better guide than is afforded in the novels of Fielding and Smollet, and the terrible pictures of Hogarth. The "Tom Jones" and "Joseph Andrews" of Fielding, the "Roderick Random" of Smollett, the "Gin Lane" and "Beer Street" of Hogarth, are a more vivid commentary on the morals of the time than can be found in the pages of any writers who have dealt specifically with the sociological aspects of the period. No one who has read these books or looked on these pictures can avoid the conclusion that life in England had never sunk to so low a level of debasement as in the latter half of the eighteenth century.

Some day the student of history will turn to the literature, art and drama of the twentieth century, with the same appreciation of its documentary value. He will see in clearer perspective than is ours the drift of thought, the change in moral values; yet it is not impossible for us to attain at least a partial perception of this drift and change. According to our tempers, we shall be pessimistic or optimistic in examining the tendencies of the times in which we live; but at all events it is the duty of every thoughtful man to examine them. I write neither as pessimist nor optimist, although it is impossible to escape altogether the bias of one's temperament; but so far as I can contrive it, with the colorless candor of the student and spectator.

REVOLT AGAINST MID-VICTORIAN

The first thing I perceive—and it is a kind of clue to the whole—is a derisive revolt against all that is called Mid-Victorian. It applies to furniture, art, dresses, literature, modes of life, ideals of conduct, and estimates of greatness. Queen Victoria herself is now depicted as a dull-witted German woman, ignorant of art and literature, full of narrow prejudices, capable of feminine spitefulness, who by dint of living a long time became a kind of fetish. The supermen of her time were equally unworthy of the regard which they attracted. Manning was a notorious liar, Newman a befogged casuist, Arnold a pompous pedant, General Gordon a dangerous fanatic, impartially devoted to the Bible and the brandy-bottle; Disraeli a mere trickster, and Gladstone what Disraeli called him, "a sophistical rhetorician intoxicated with the exuberance of his own verbosity."

The Victorian gods of literature have been exposed as equally clay-footed. Carlyle owed his prophetic rage to an undiscovered ulcer in the stomach; Tennyson was never more than a milk-and-water versifier, whose poetry in a more masculine age world have been despised; and George Eliot was a ponderous preacher who had not the most elementary notion of how to write a novel. So the indictment runs, and it covers all the popular forms of life. The Victorian age was, in short, according to this calm verdict, an age of stupidity and dullness, of false conventions, of social snobbery, of hypocrisy in religion, and of intolerant stodginess in morals.

Now I say nothing of the general truth or untruth of this indictment; but I am concerned to mark the direction which the revolt has taken. The first point of attack has been the conventional decencies of life. The mid-Victorian period inculcated what may be called decent reticence on certain physical aspects of life as an absolute quality of fine behavior. When "Adam Bede" was published, there was a great to do about the seduction of Hetty Sorrel; and not all the delicacy of treatment of that pathetic episode could save George Eliot from the charge of being a coarse-minded person in introducing it at all.

DECENCY STRESSED

I can well recollect the time when Mrs. Annie Besant was tried and punished for publishing a very carefully worded pamphlet on Malthusianism; she was regarded as an offender against public decency. Mr. Vizitelly, the publisher of an English translation of Zola's works, was arraigned on the same charge. No question was ever raised as to whether Mrs. Besant or Zola stated facts; the assumption was that certain facts relating to the sexual life of mankind must not be stated, that it was indecent to state them, in spite of the common knowledge of such facts disseminated by the Bible, or the knowledge which every school-boy gained by a study of the classics. And here may be formulated a Victorian axiom—decency was of superior importance to truth.

This position was so inherently absurd that a revolt was inevitable. It came when Zola was publicly feted by the civic authorities of London, and when Mr. George Moore challenged the public taste with his fine story, "Esther Waters." But no one foresaw how far it would go. Numerous novelists of today appear to take a positive delight in indecency. Scott made us familiar with the courts of kings—the modern novelist with the squalors of the brothel. There is no secrecy of vice which may not be found fully described in a popular novel. The reader who has read David Graham Philips' "Susan Lenox" knows all that is to be known about human bestiality. And as for the theme on which Mrs. Besant wrote, the necessity for birth-control in view of the alarming increase of population, it is now advocated in papers sold at the street corners, it is discussed in open conferences, and the means of practicing it are shown in the windows of the drug stores. All reticence on these subjects is ended, and the Victorian axiom that decency must take precedence of truth is thoroughly exploded.

ATTACK ON MARRIAGE

But the attack goes much further: it has become an attack on marriage itself. Take a recent and very popular novel called "Brass": it is concerned with five marriages, only one of which is fortunate, and its effect is to create the strongest kind of prejudice against the marriage relation. In the case where a marriage is at least not a public failure, the reason given is that the wife has been complaisant enough to be silent on her husband's infidelities, because he was always kind and courteous to her, and this accounted to her for wisdom. Take another story, "The Sheik," which was acclaimed the best seller of the season and is now produced on the movies, in which an English woman of title is violently raped by an Arab chief, and is so little resentful that she loves him and finally marries him.

DIFFERENCE IN INTENTION

Or take any one of a dozen books of English authors, and what do you find? Educated and well-born women think nothing of going off for a week-end with a man. They regard casual sexual indulgence as their right. There is no dishonor in bastardy. In one novel a girl, desirous of maternity, deliberately chooses the man who shall seduce her; in another, Rose Macauley's "Dangerous Ages," a young girl is angry and offended because her lover refuses to live with her without marriage. In Mr. George's recent novel, "Ursula Trent," we are asked to believe that a well-born English woman can become the mistress of two men with so little scandal attaching to her profligacy that when she finally chooses to marry she can marry a gentleman and be received by county society with no diminution of respect. What were the intentions of the authors in writing these books we do not know, but their effect is clearly to inculcate contempt for the marriage bond. Chastity is the virtue of the ugly. It is a stupid restriction to which no intelligent human creature should submit. The morals of the poultry-yard have replaced the old-fashioned sanctions of society which ruled the mid-Victorian period.

The difference between these books and the novels which mid-Victorian critics labeled realistic is moreover not one of method but of intention. Zola, when he writes "Nana," George Moore, when he writes "Esther Waters," are as keenly aware of the retributive working of moral law as Hawthorne when he writes "The Scarlet Letter." Nana sinks into unutterable degradation, Esther Waters pays a terrible price for her unchastity; and both books are, therefore, in the medieval sense of the term "moralities," and their general effect is to strengthen the forces of morality. The cardinal difference with our modern novelists is that they are entirely unconscious of moral law. No social or spiritual penalty waits on unchastity. Men and women can do as they please with their own bodies; no one thinks the worse of them, and they do not think the worse of themselves. It is in this respect that the novelists of whom I speak are a public peril, and their books a direct incitement to social and moral anarchy.

ATTACK ON RELIGION

Let it be further recollected that these books are widely distributed. They are in all the libraries. Boys and girls rush to the libraries on the way home from high school, and struggle with one another for their possession. The older authors of classic reputation are little read, but any novel dealing with illicit passion sells like hot cakes; and even decent middle-aged women, whom no one would suspect of erotic tendencies, rush up to you in the street and cry, "O, have you read 'The Sheik'—it is splendid!"

The third point of attack is religion. The battle-ground of religion in the mid-Victorian period was the authenticity of the scriptures and the person of Christ. The beginning of all the trouble in the mind of Mrs. Humphrey Ward's "Robert Elsmere" was the date at which the book of Daniel was written. The scriptures were an elaborate mosaic or jig-saw puzzle put together by a divine hand, and the loss or removal of any part invalidated the whole. As for the person of Christ, the subject of debate was not his essential humanity, but his claim to divinity. Thus Bishop Colenso was violently denounced as the worst of heretics for questioning the authorship of the pentateuch, and Professor Seeley challenged the same condemnation by the publication of his "Ecce Homo." Added to this there was the bitter controversy over evolution, which was generally rejected by the churches, and violently denounced by men like Mr. Spurgeon, who must have rejoiced in Carlyle's description of Darwinism as "gorilla damnifications of humanity."

We have moved so far from these controversies that we are now almost incapable of comprehending the heat which they engendered. Our modern controversy is whether there is a God at all, and whether, if he exists, he is a God worthy of the admiration of any intelligent man. Mr. Wells has written reams to prove that it is quite possible that there is a God, but that certainly he is extremely limited in power; a deity perpetually defeated in his plans, but obstinately hopeful in pursuing them. Probably a large number of his brother novelists think him crack-brained for troubling himself at all with such contentions, for they are sincerely convinced that God does not exist. One can reap more of the bitter harvest of what our fathers called infidelity from half a dozen modern novels than from the entire works of Tom Paine and Ingersoll. And it will be noted that while the revolt of Tom Paine and Ingersoll never went far beneath the surface, the revolt of the modern novelist is an entire deliquescence of the spiritual nature.

ONLY PHYSICAL SCIENCE CERTAIN

The modern novelist feels no need for God, even by way of a working theory of the universe. The world can go on very well without God. God explains nothing, but needs himself to be explained. The only certain thing is physical science. The only redemption of mankind from destructive follies lies in obedience to the ascertained laws of science. The thought of God springs from the ineradicable romanticism of human nature; it is at best nothing more than a poetic rainbow projected across silent firmaments; it is evanescent and bodiless; but the eternal stars of science remain and fulfill their inevitable courses.

Of course it follows that in the new heavens and new earth of the modern novelist, the church has no place. It is regarded as an anachronism. In one of the last novels which I have read, a work of extraordinary poetic brilliance, "The Beginning of Wisdom," by Stephen Vincent Benet, this attitude is summarized in a stinging paragraph.

His hero takes refuge in a church from a sudden rainstorm and thus records his impressions:

"Philip sniffed at the dried air about him—it was sick and musty—the whole church had the smell of clothes shut up in a closet that had not been worn or used for a very long time. From its altar with its limp cloth border that said holy, holy, holy forever to emptiness, to the crisp black hymnals bought two years ago and still stiff and rattling, as good as new, God's official house drowsed in a plushy solitude, a prim catalepsy, that belonged neither to the queer drunkenness of living nor the queer sobriety of death. 'You wouldn't come looking for a minor virtue here,' thought Philip, 'unless you wanted it embalmed.'" The church not even the home of minor virtues, you observe, clearly not the school of heroic ones—that is Mr. Benet's conception of the church—and he says with kindly irony what many other novelists say with savage contempt.

CHANGED SANCTIONS

Here then is evidence of what I have called changed sanctions of conduct. It is not a change of manners only, but of the sanctions which produce manners. Men are thinking in a new way, shaping their lives by new principles, and their manners are in accord with their new views of life. It is customary to attribute this change to the great war, but this is only partially true. The war did undoubtedly produce a dislocation of moral ideas corresponding to its economic dislocation. Hundreds of thousands of men found themselves suddenly released from conventional restraints. They were treated as heroes to whom no gratification should be denied; and the peril of sudden and complete deprival of all the joys of life which menaced them made them avid to seize such joys while they were theirs. War has always had this effect. Part of the price which it exacts has always been the loosening of the bonds of moral restraint, in spite of the fact that it has at the same time created a new spirit of courage and manly heroism.

But the process of change had begun long before the war; all the war did was to emphasize and accelerate it. The plea for unrestrained personal freedom, the contempt for conventions even when they were manifestly rooted in good sense, a cynical attitude toward religion, a resentment against the authority of parents, the claim made by the young to order their own lives, and to explore for themselves regions of life which lay beyond the bounds of ordinary social geography—all this may be found in writers long precedent to the war. We must go back at least as far as the writings of Ibsen, Bernard Shaw and Samuel Butler to catch the first notes of this revolt; probably, indeed, much further.

PART OF GENERAL REVOLT

The revolt against the church is simply a part of this general revolt against moral restraint, for the church is not only the custodian of spiritualities, but represents a code of morality, gives a standard of behaviour. The lamentable fact that united Christendom was not able to prevent the great war has done much to discredit the church, but it was discredited before the war; the war only accelerated a movement which had already grown to wide proportions. For a generation the mass of the people have ceased to look to the church for leadership. Yet with all its shortcomings it has furnished a standard of conduct for multitudes who needed arbitrary guidance; and one cannot but ask in what direction men are to look for any other institution that can exercise the same authority?

As to the revolt against mid-Victorian conventionalisms, this was inevitable. We may frankly admit that many mid-Victorian ideals were foolish and deserved to become obsolete. The mid-Victorian squeamishness in dealing with the vital facts of physical existence was absurd, and had a strong trend toward prurience. Its conventional moralities were often elaborated pruderies. Its modesties were rooted in fear of realities. I took some small part in championing George Moore's "Esther Waters" against its vindictive enemies, who succeeded in proscribing its sale upon the book stalls, and I would do the same thing again, because I believe that the worst kind of unwisdom in dealing with social sins is to conceal them. I took a similar part in supporting Mr. Stead in his public revelations of odious vice made in his horrifying pamphlet "The Maiden Tribute," which caused his arrest, trial and imprisonment. I did so because I felt, as a great majority of his countrymen felt, that such vices could never be extirpated unless they were exposed.

DECENT RETICENCE LOST

But what I did not foresee was that this breach of traditional reticence in a good cause would lead to the casting away of decent reticence in dealing with sexual relationships. Even our school children today know more about the sexual instincts and their perversion than our grandparents knew at eighty. Are they the better for the knowledge? I cannot pretend to think that they are. I would not venture to say that they are less moral; possibly in knowing more of evil they are better guarded against it; but it is not a good thing to be sophisticated at sixteen, and there is tragic truth in Landor's lines—

> And modesty, who when she goes
> Is gone forever.

The position, as I see it then, is this: for large sections of society the ancient sanctions of conduct have disappeared. Marriage for many persons is merely a system of consecutive polygamy. In any fashionable hotel women, well-born and not ill-educated, can be seen, who in dress and behavior ape the manners of courtesans. Parental restraint has been relaxed, and indeed all forms of restraint. The idea of having a good time is the one gospel that is popular, and if it leads to gross license there is no public opinion to rebuke it. The church, not only in great cities, but even in small-town communities, plays an insignificant part in shaping public sentiment. Puritan ethics are despised as antiquated. Puritan virtues are stodgy. The one passion is to be emancipated, and in the process not only are many unjust fetters justly flung aside, but also the nobler restraints which made for plain living and high thinking, for balance and sobriety of thought, for dignity and equipoise of character. Nor can we dismiss these things as a passing phase of human conduct; it has gone on too long and is indicative of a deliberate revolution.

Will the tide run its course and turn back, flowing as far as it has ebbed? No man can answer that question. But one thing is certain; unless all past history deceives us, the dissolution of moral bonds has always been the precursor of those catastrophes which have destroyed empires, plunged mankind back into barbarism, and overthrown the civilization built by the immortal sacrifices of patriots, saints and martyrs.

The Break-Down of the Denominational Church

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

THE denominational church is all right,—if it is all right. If everybody likes it, why, it is the kind of thing which everybody likes. No one has a word against it, if and where it is serving the ends which are proper to an institution of religion in a democratic American society. None other of our social institutions has been and is so free from malicious attack. Everybody, insider and outsider, wishes the church well. No other institution is so unreservedly commended for the good it does; the shortcomings of no other are so generously excused; no other has so free access for its financial appeals; no other gets such respectful attention from high and low, rich and poor, learned and unlearned. If the church's message fails of its appeal, or if its shortcomings stand out offensively, it has itself to thank, and none else to blame.

There is no organized propaganda designed to supplant the denominational church in its field. The so-called community church has sometimes been championed by members and agencies of the denominations, and, again, it has sometimes been condemned for its encroachment upon the preserves of the denominational churches. But the community church movement is not organized propaganda. No national agencies are promoting it. In so far as the community church movement is menacing the denominational church, inherent weaknesses and voids are themselves demanding compensations which the community church movement spontaneously supplies. Nor from any other quarter is the denominational church suffering from overt attack. No other institution has so free a field, and so generous a support, financial, moral, and, within the proper bounds, official and governmental.

PROFOUND DISSATISFACTION

Yet no observer, no reader of the religious or secular press, no church-member and no intelligent non-church-member is unaffected by the profound and wide-spread dissatisfaction with our religious system as dominated by the denominational church. In any community where this dissatisfaction is not keenly felt, and among any social groups not greatly disturbed by this unrest, none will be disposed to stir up strife, nor create a dissatisfaction which does not already exist. Certainly no word in this discussion should be construed to such an effect. It is precisely because the denominational church has not stood the test of social efficiency, though operating under the most favorable moral and sentimental conditions, that the search for something better is justified. What is proposed to take its place may be theoretically satisfactory to few or many, but of the general dissatisfaction with results and prospects of the denominational church system there need be no debate.

Not to prove a point but to lay the course for intelligent inquiry about more satisfactory measures, let us hurriedly analyze the shortcomings and misdirections of the denominational church. This may be done with a degree of comprehensiveness under four counts.

I

First, it violates community loyalty. The over-reachings of denominational home missionary effort have often been pointed out and deplored. Money is used for subsidies. Multitudes of denominational churches have been thrust upon communities against their will, or through the factional zeal of a small group, or under short-sighted booster policies, financial interests in the community foolishly believing that to get easy money from outside insures prosperity. Countless communities have been and are bribed by large initial or by smaller annual subsidies to maintain an organization of the denomination furnishing the money. Prejudice can alone justify this course. In so far as money has been needed to reinforce the resources of the community itself, the amounts expended in denominational subsidies could have been employed with immeasurably more wholesome effect through religious organizations already established in the community. The reason this plainly common-sense course was not followed is because denominational loyalty has prevailed over loyalty to the spiritual welfare of the community.

Is not this an unwarranted arraignment of the great and good men and women who are supporting and administering the denominational home mission work? Not at all. It is not an arraignment of anybody. It is not an imputation of motive of any sort. It is simply a record of the facts. Prejudiced defenders of the denominational system are many, but they are or may be sincere. None, who knows what he is talking about, will raise question of the personal character of those who are conducting the denominational propaganda. Their high character only makes the indictment of the denominational church the more severe and conclusive.

In older and stable centers of population, where the denominational churches have been long established, disloyalty to the community takes a different form. Factions centering in the churches often render real community action impossible. Churches are the commonest seats of division in the community. Churches assume to be agencies or institutions of religion. Religion, however it may be superficially defined, is true to the etymology of its name, and to its genius, only when it is a social bond. The Latin root from which the word is derived signifies that. It is designed to bind the life of a community together. Yet the practical effect of denominational churches is directly the contrary. The more vigorously the denominational program is pressed, the deeper become the schisms in the community life, and the more irreconcilable become social functions.

WHEN DIFFERENCES ARE SUBMERGED

But is this universally true? Are there not numerous communities where the members of the several denominational churches live in beautiful Christian fellowship, and loyally unite in the support of the enterprises of good citizenship? To be sure. There are many such. They are the communities where denominational loyalties count for least. This rule is invariable. Where the community spirit is sweetest, where neighbor lives and works most heartily with neighbor, where all social groups spring forward most promptly and continue most unreservedly to further enterprises for the good of all, is it not, indeed, invariable that denominational differences are submerged, and attempts to magnify denominational values and interests are most frowned upon or laughed at? The logic of such facts is clear. To be sure, some of us stick at the point where we have softened these factional asperities at the first limit of endurance: we believe in curbing the denominational spirit, not banishing it. But the widespread admission that as the community increases the denominational church must decrease, is a clear indication of where the logic is eventually to carry us.

In that last sentence lies bedded what some will point out as a saving symbol for the denominational church. John, the Baptist, decreased that the Christ might increase. John, the Baptist, was not a criminal; he was a prophet, the greatest of the prophets. If, similarly, any is pleased to look upon the denominational church as a John, the Baptist, among American religious institutions, none will be disposed to say him nay. Grant all honor to the forerunner, to the prophet who shows the way through the wilderness of "established churches," of ecclesiastico-political hierarchies, of stagnated spiritual life, which prevailed before the denominational church emerged. But the community has now come. Religion must claim a sanction and render a service to American democracy of which the denominational church is inherently and hopelessly incapable. The meed of honor due for its prophetic service none should withhold, but it is to be condemned, and it can only tarnish the glory of its past, if it shall stubbornly hold the field, foment and foster faction, resist the winsome grace of the new community spirit, as denominational churches are lamentably doing all over the country today. The new community life is having a harder struggle to survive, and to bring forth its beneficent fruits, wherever denominational churches are active and magnify their denominational genius.

II

In the second place, the denominational church hinders the formation of natural associations based on sincere and untrammeled spiritual affinities. The first generation of a denominational religious body is its hey-day. Those enlist in its mission whose souls have been stirred by its appeal, who are prepared to surrender their lives and their unreserved endeavors to its program. There is moral grandeur in that. Something like that experience expressed in forms and movements, suited to the time and place, must recur from generation to generation for the spiritual refreshment of any society. Democracy lives off of such experiences, and they will be provided for in the organic social program when democracy comes fully to itself.

But these glories are surrendered, and a deadening formalism settles down upon any denomination which survives the first generation. There is no assurance that the son of a Methodist will turn out an ardent and convinced Methodist. No guarantees can hold the daughter of a Baptist to Baptist loyalties. Yet denominations advance such claims and cherish such aims. Every denomination has become more or less hereditary. The law is not absolute; religion would lose all vitality if it were. But the denominations apply it with such zeal as preaching and teaching and arbitrary institutional forms can contrive. The denominational Sunday school is a vehement attempt to make denominational loyalty hereditary. On the contrary, social health requires that spiritual associations shall be free and voluntary and sincere and congenial. Arbitrary or artificial contrivances to a contrary effect are anti-social, and are, of course, anti-religious.

Similarly, social health requires that these spiritual associations shall be in a constant flux. The mind should be constantly expanding. This induces new mental and spiritual attitudes, and sends the individual ever in search of new fellowships. All this the denominational church tends to inhibit. Thought stagnates under the system. Theology becomes rigid. Creeds get set beyond any but Herculean efforts to alter them, and even denominations which boast of having no creeds soon develop them, or fall under the control of administrative machines which force them upon their communions.

INTERCHANGE OF MEMBERSHIP

Yet, as a matter of fact, our religious life today does not show this rigidity. Sons of Methodists become Baptists, and daughters of Baptists become Methodists, and the interchange of membership among certain "liberal" communions is so free as to cause little sensation of change. Precisely. In the degree in which the denominational hold weakens, in that degree do we avail of the wholesome effects of voluntary and congenial associations. But the liberty is not nearly complete enough, under the most "liberal" operation of the denominational system. A Lutheran may become a convinced Congregationalist, but he is likely to shock and even incense the hereditary Congregationalist.

There are now 200 or more different denominational bodies in the United States, and they are multiplying all the time. Doctrinal and other schisms in each of the larger denominations threaten their disintegration into smaller bodies. Our tragic embarrassment in American religious life is that we have not enough denominations to give sincere expression to spiritual enthusiasms, though the landscape is so infested with them that their numbers cause our most acute religious distress. Such a dilemma is certain to get us sooner or later. We shall be impaled upon one horn or the other. Our denominational churches are too rigid. They must be broken and fall to pieces in just the degree that our spiritual life becomes sincere and vivid. Our denominational machines are lumbering. They labor and creak and groan under their institutional load, turn out a product with which nobody is satisfied, and occupy the room which an enlightened social science must speedily claim for contrivances designed to serve the manifest religious needs of our society.

Thus, for our spiritual e pluribus unum, the denominational church, falls short of the unity which is essential, and fails to provide the kind of diversity not less imperatively required.

III

In the third place, the denominational church makes impossible the efficient application of the social gospel. Numbers of persons in our churches do not believe in the social gospel, or think they do not. Our discussion does not assume to take issue with them. A strong case can be made out for their contention that it is not the business of the churches to conduct social service enterprises. Experience and reason make it clear that they cannot continue to be denominational agencies and do efficient social service. Those who wish to keep our churches what they are today are quite justified in their insistence that they let social service alone, and, as the phrase has been employed, refrain from "dabbling in affairs which are none of their business."

On the other hand, whether rightly or wrongly, an ever-enlarging proportion of the leadership and of the people in the churches do believe in the social gospel, or think they do. As this sentiment dominates the counsels and policies of the churches, the limitations and cross-purposes of the denominational system must become more and more apparent. Theory need not be urged here as conclusive; a fund of experience has by this time been accumulated. Denominational churches have tried social programs in great variety and elaboration. There should be no disposition to deny their success. The point is that their success has been in direct ratio to their reduction or abandonment of the denominational emphasis. The failure thus to reduce or abandon such emphasis accounts generally for the many failures in the social service programs of churches. National agencies promoting social service among the churches fail in the degree that they magnify their denominational character and aim, and, given a reasonable degree of technical efficiency, they succeed in the degree that they submerge or set aside that aim. This does not call for argument; it is a fact which every one has noted who has taken the trouble to investigate.

INHIBITS SOCIAL PASSION

In our communities of all sections of the country, the fret of ministers and other religious leaders who attempt to express their social passion in concrete churchly enterprises, is notorious and invariable, where denominational rivalries are encountered, and where the religious allegiance of the people is divided between two or more denominations. A thoroughly efficient social service program under church auspices is quite impossible in such communities. This is so apparent in the small towns that not even the most superficial observer can overlook it. In the cities, which are, for the most part, vastly under-churched, or unchurched, appearances sometimes deceive. There are city churches conducting a very elaborate social service, and are sometimes also acutely conscious of their denominational affiliations. This they are able to do and be because of the relatively large numbers of people in city populations not reached by rival churches. And the tendency even among these is to employ social ministries as a bait to entice fish into the denominational net.

That this aim and spirit are universally prevalent no one who knows the facts will assert or assume. But the tendency is to be expected, and is sufficiently manifest in experience to have called forth very strong condemnation of the practice by socially-minded religious leaders. In so far as this spirit is infused, it, of course, vitiates the social program. Social service which is not an end in itself loses character as social service. Social enterprises conducted as a means of rolling up denominational membership, and increasing the prestige of a denominational machine, take rank among other ingenious methods of advertising, and in corresponding degree miss the spirit and purpose of social service.

The economic inefficiency of denominational social service is a detail of first rate significance. In the larger cities this is sufficiently apparent. In the smaller cities and larger towns it is often glaring. Here is a center of some five or six thousand, struggling to complete three large brick churches, for as many different denominations. All are temporarily bankrupt. They will eventually recover and complete their buildings. One is to have thirty or forty rooms, another twenty or more, and the third twelve or fourteen. This can mean nothing else than that an aggressive social program is contemplated by each organization.

DUPLICATIONS

In the same town two other denominations are talking new buildings, and will certainly proceed with their plans not to be too far outmatched by their rivals. The present building operations are said by one of the bankers to cost in the end a half-million of dollars. It is perfectly clear that the population to be served will not utilize these expensive plants to anything like the limit of their capaciy. Duplicating organizations and programs are inevitable. Only on rare occasions will the auditoria be used at capacity. By adjustments of program, which would better meet the convenience of the population, as well as conserve the community's financial resources, one plant could be made to serve all the uses to which these three will be put in that town, and would gain all other ends, for which social service is intended, far more efficiently at the same time.

While all this is going on, the town mentioned is devoid of a community library. It has no community building; these denominational plants will never be used freely for the numerous purposes for which a modern community requires auditoria and council chambers and recreational facilities. Parks and public play-grounds exist only in the longings of intelligent citizens. The town is sadly poverty-stricken in those features which every canon of modern social science requires of an efficient community. It is at the same time so loaded with denominational social equipment, which will never and can never be used economically, that it is, at least temporarily, bankrupt. This is not an isolated case. With variations the story may be told over and over again. No other kind of story can be told of communities where denominational system is true to its genius, and is bringing forth its proper fruits. The social gospel, grafted upon the denominational stem, is no solution at all for our religious problems. They are correct who maintain that our churches, as now conceived, are out of their sphere when they espouse the social gospel, and proceed to put it into practice under their own auspises. Their genius and the genius of social service in a democracy are mutually antagonistic; there is no possibility of wedding the two, while they both retain their essential character.

IV

Finally, the denominational church hinders the development of a competent religious leadership. What constitutes competency? Apply almost any test. Is anybody satisfied with the present religious leadership? It is true that the kind which would satisfy some elements would seem very incompetent to others. But all elements are agreed that our society is not now developing a satisfactory leadership. The denominational system has had its own way in this. Nobody has positively or maliciously interfered with it. Even the general educational institutions, which denominational leaders have so often denounced as godless, have opened their doors wide to the churches. State universities have encouraged the erection of church houses in connection with their campus and their official program. Only the rivalry of the denominations themselves has debarred positive religious instruction and training from the universities. There is not a university in the land which would not introduce a far-reaching religious program in its organic system tomorrow, or as soon as possible, if the denominations would let it. With all these advantages the denominations have failed to produce a leadership which is satisfactory even to themselves. It is even farther from satisfactory to society at large. These are well-known and accepted facts. The reasons, we are not particularly zealous to seek, in detail, in this discussion. The single outstanding fact that the denominational program has broken down at this crucial point is the end of our present inquiry.

To preserve their lives our denominational churches have been compelled to build and endow schools in which their leadership can be trained in all stages of its development. For other professions early training is social and broadly democratic; only in technical preparation is education for them specialized and segregated. For professional religious leadership specialization begins in the early stages. Denominational leaders make great capital of the fact that seventy-five, eighty-five, even ninety per cent of the educated ministry come out of colleges builded, and protected for their interests, by the denominations. They are not less pronounced in their declaration that students trained in the unprotected atmosphere of the undenominational colleges and the general universities are unsafe leaders of the reliigous program projected by the denominations.

DEFECTIVE EDUCATION

As a result of this policy the standards of education in the ministry have not nearly kept pace with the rising standards of American society at large. There may be actually more educated ministers now than ever before, but relatively to the educational standards of the country, ministerial education is seriously defective, as the repeated pronouncements of alarmed denominational leaders themselves show. To make up for the shortage in religious leaders, even of those educated under the artificial conditions created in denomination institutions, numbers of ministers are admitted, even to denominations priding themselves on high educational standards, who have not completed the conventional high school course.

The fact that such a large proportion of this ministry has been stampeded by the fundamentalists in their campaign against evolution, is striking indication of their educational status. The question here is not of the truth or falsity of the doctrine of evolution. The only point is the fact that so large a proportion of our religious leadership is ignorant of the staple pabulum of modern education. This campaign against evolution has come as a great surprise to educators in all parts of the country. The doctrine is so universally accepted in all class-rooms of all sciences that it has passed beyond the stage of debate. Most educators either do not know what our religious leaders mean by their campaign, or else they find in it only a hilarious jest. The real alarm of the faculty in the University of Kentucky alone awakened many to the possibility of there being anything serious in such intellectual attitudes as the campaigners display. Let us not attempt here to decide who is right and who is wrong, but simply to point out the impossibility of a religious leadership which is so far aloof from the educational tendencies of American society. The people who are expected to sit in the pews of the churches come from these general colleges and universities. The leadership which is capable of such profound misunderstanding of their intellectual attitudes cannot be competent. At every point the system which the denominations, of their own choice, and with a free field, have builded up is going to pieces. Experience demonstrates this, and an examination of the fundamental causes of this collapse would show that failure is inherent and inevitable.

Rating our denominational leadership by tests of community efficiency, the demonstration of failure is quite as clear. Ministers of denominational churches cannot qualify for efficient citizenship. They do not continue long enough anywhere in residence. To be sure, ministers do often prove eminent and useful citizens, but they attain that reputation in the degree that their denominational loyalty is reduced or abandoned. The case of a minister was reported in the columns of The Christian Century some time ago, who was voted the most useful citizen of his town, but it was also noted that he had found it necessary again and again to resist the demands and tendencies of his own denomination.

DEMONSTRATION OF FAILURE

Here is a town with four resident pastors. He in longest residence has been in the town almost three years. During that time he has seen the pastors of each of the other churches change twice and two of them three times. Another town of ten churches has not a minister in town, resident for more than two years. These are not isolated instances. In wide sections this is the rule. In one state, where numerous home mission pastors give the denominational system its least trammeled opportunity, pastorates being subsidized and thus largely controlled by the denominations, it is reported by denominational superintendents that pastorates average less than two years; in the smaller communities, where constancy of residence is of the first social importance, it is less than one year.

Nobody excuses these conditions or desires to see them prevail. No one would be so wicked as deliberately to contrive them. We fall short not in deploring them, but in failing to realize that they are the legitimate result of our denominational program. If we do not like them we ought to cease to like the denominational church, and hasten to find some program which would not make such havoc among spiritual values. Many of us are very fearful that someone will say or do something which will bring religious interests into peril. We deprecate disparaging remarks about our churches. These conditions are more or less familiar to all, but none must cast slight upon the system which produces them, lest religion be brought into disrepute. The solution lies, for these persons, not in abandoning the denominational church, but in charging it with the spirit of Christ, in banishing its self-seeking, and inducing Christians of all names and orders to love one another. How long will we be in discovering the shortsightedness and folly of such proposals! Keep the mill running, but do not permit it to deliver its grist! The reason the spirit of Christ does not prevail is largely because we persist in keeping this denominational program in operation. It generates the evil spirits which we so loudly deplore. And it will continue to generate them, so long as it exists and operates according to its essential genius.

Let none be alarmed for our denominational system and our denominational churches. No malicious foe has appeared anywhere to do them harm. They will fill the domain of American religion without challenge as long as the breath of life remains in them. When they die it will be by a natural death. But is it not apparent that they are dying? Their only signs of survival are those which are contorting them out of resemblance to themselves, and are steadily making of them new creatures. Having become these new creatures they will happily have ceased to be denominational churches.

A succeeding paper, when space in The Christian Century will permit, will deal with such phenomena as the federated church, the union church, and the community church, in their bearing on the facts and prospects of religion in American communities.

Is Japan Making Good?

By George Gleason

"YOU would scarcely recognize the attitude of the ordinary man. There seems to have come an almost complete emancipation from a number of the old ideals that were so binding. The Washington conference marked an epoch in the thought development of Japan." Thus wrote one of my Y.M.C.A. associates from Nagoya a few weeks ago. Even a cursory reading of the Japanese papers brings amazement at the rapidity of progress during the last year. Already Japan has taken twelve steps which more than carry out the agreements made at Washington:

I

FRUITS OF THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE

The arms treaties have been approved by the prince regent and sent to Washington for final ratification.

Many of the warships to be scrapped have already been dismantled and are waiting at the appointed naval ports for the ratification of the treaties by other nations before they are finally destroyed.

The army personnel has been reduced by 56,000 men and the navy by 8,000 men.

Most of the negotiations for the return of the German rights in Shantung have been completed.

Public announcement has been made that the eighteen Japanese post offices in China will be closed by January first.

The garrison at Hangkow has already been removed.

The troops from Siberia are being withdrawn and Japanese residents are pouring back home, many of them provided with transportation by the government.

The military intelligence officers heretofore stationed at various points in China and Manchuria are being withdrawn.

A considerable portion of the troops stationed in Manchuria are returning home.

Japan's relations with the Chinese Eastern Railroad, a part of the Trans-Siberian system, are being ended along with the withdrawal of the American engineers.

The treaty with America which provides for no further fortification of islands away from the Japanese mainland, will, of course, be carried out.

Japan has agreed to appoint a commission to study the removal of foreign concessions in China and the giving up of extra-territorial rights.

Even friends of Japan must be amazed at this crop of early fruit from the Washington conference.

II

GOVERNMENT ENERGIES TURN IN NEW DIRECTIONS

A new diet building in Tokyo, the third largest in the world, to be completed in six years, is now in process of construction. Not a palace for the emperor, nor offices for the general staff, but a home for the representatives of the people.

Abolition of the nobility seems to be the latest move among a little group of young nobles. Promoting this plan are such famous families as Soga, Kido and Sasaki. These young scions "fail to see the reasons why with no special merit on their own part, they should be entitled to the distinction of nobility rank."

Profiteer hunting by municipal governments and chambers of commerce is the new sport. In Osaka secret investigations were made by a group of government officials who, in street clothes and market baskets, went about making sample purchases. They found retail profits in clothing ranging from 80 to 104 per cent; in food, from 30 per cent on sugar to 176 per cent on dried fish. Meat profits were an even 100 per cent. The result is that the government is establishing public markets in the leading cities throughout the empire. It is reported that from the national treasury about $25,000,000 will be advanced to build a few model municipal stores where prices on daily commodities can be regulated. Maruzen, one of the big book sellers, has announced that beginning in September, prices were to be cut from ten to thirty per cent.

"Moving pictures are to be used in all the prisons after September for the purpose of character molding." It is expected to show movies throughout the fifty-six penitentiaries in the empire, with lectures by the chaplains.

III

LABOR

Scarcely a week goes by without some new move on the part of working men. Strikes are an every-day occurrence and the interesting thing about them is that most of them are moderately successful. A recent strike of tramway employes resulted not only in raising their own wages, but in a prompt increase by similar companies operating in the same city. "The one big union" idea is now being promoted. The type of organization is to be "similar to the American Federation of Labor, and the French Confederation General de Travail." At present the various labor associations of the country comprise about 300,000 members, or 10 per cent of the total in Japan. On September 10 representatives of fifty-eight labor unions met in Tokyo and organized "The National Federation of Labor Unions."

Progress in labor organization could not be made without police protest. One speaker in Kobe was ordered from the platform and later arrested for saying "the capitalists fear the despotism of Lenine, but they themselves cherish an abominable dictatorship." Toyokiko Kagawa, the outstanding Christian labor leader and sociologist, in the course of his speech remarked "even in the heart of Japan there is a low pressure over the freedom of speech." Whereupon the police ordered the dissolution of the meeting.

That there is much work for the labor unions in Japan to accomplish is evident by the report made to the National Christian Conference held in Tokyo last May, that "throughout the empire the work day of factory workers averages 11 hours, and 301 days in the year. In factories operating under the factory law, the hours run from 8 to as high as 36 hours consecutive work, while the average is 12 to 14 hours per day. In 1918 eight of the leading chambers of commerce, such as Osaka, Kobe, Yokohama and Tokyo voted that one day's rest in seven was impossible at the present time in Japan's commercial and industrial world."

In a September paper is a report of a study made of Tokyo citizens by Dr. K. Morimoto. He finds that 92 per cent of the residents of the capital earn less than 500 yen ($250) per year. The extremely poor families number 460,000, while those who belong to the middle rich and very rich classes, number 3,000. He classes as rich the three-tenths of 1 per cent of the population whose incomes are over 3,000 yen ($1,500).

An Osaka daily announces that laborers are to be prepared for this new labor movement by a Y.M.C.A. "co-educational school for laborers," which will deal primarily "with spiritual matters and character building." Instruction will be given in economics, sociology, politics, civics, factory management, European and American labor conditions and social science. Moving pictures are to be used and instruction also given in labor insurance and the prevention of disease. Two of the missionary ladies in a tent in the center of one of the poorest labor districts will teach cooking, dressmaking, care of the teeth and laundry work.

IV

WOMAN'S PROGRESS

The latest news, which indicates the rapid rise of Japanese women, is a cable dispatch dated October 16th, indicating that an eighteen-year-old geisha girl has won her freedom by a suit in the appeal court. The court maintains "that when the contract was entered into Kuniwaka was a minor so that all her earnings were pocketed by her master. Such a contract is against morality and is void." If this decision is upheld, it means that any one of the 59,161 geisha girls of Japan may flee the slavery which the managers impose upon them under the guise of debts for training and gorgeous attire.

"Mrs. Hideko Tamamoto has been appointed secretary to the Osako municipal education department. This is the first municipal position to be occupied by a woman in Japan."

On September 9 the Osaka Women's International Association "for the promotion of friendly intercourse between foreigners and Japanese" held its first meeting under the presidency of Mrs. Toyoko Furuys. Membership is open to those who speak some English and who desire to promote good international relations. In article VIII of the by-laws we read "The members of the association shall voluntarily offer to entertain foreign tourists and visitors in case of necessity."

The first women's political meeting was held in Kobe, Japan, May 10. This was the day on which the police regulations prohibiting women attending political meetings were revised. The leading speakers at this meeting were: Mrs. Nobu Jo, one of the great Christian social workers of Kobe; Mrs. Kagawa, wife of the well known Christian social worker and labor leader, and Miss Utako Hayashi, now in this country, who for years through the Women's Christian Temperance Union, has been fighting the cause of women of the under-world.

That the women's movement in Japan has a long road ahead is evidenced by the fact that there are 9,837 houses of licensed prostitution in Japan with inmates totalling 47,268. The total annual visits to these dens of infamy number 24,106,163. On this form of vice the sum spent in 1921 was 46,115,782 yen. By adding to the above 59,161 geisha and more than 100,000 waitresses in restaurants of doubtful repute—one can get a picture of one phase of the Japanese women's problem.

V.

PROGRESS OF CHRISTIAN CHURCH

The outstanding Christian fact is the organization in May of the National Christian Council which is uniting the labors of missionaries and Japanese churches in one national movement. An interesting sidelight on the growing influence of Christians is the report that Christian leaders in Tokyo appealed to the Japanese government to remove the Mimizuka monument which was erected in Kyoto "on the spot where the ears of Koreans were buried at the time of the conquest of Korea by Hideyoshi Toyotomi in 1597." This reminder of cruelty, the Christians claim, should be removed. Growing out of this appeal "the officials at Tokyo took opportunity to consider whether all the war trophies in different shrines and temples cannot be disposed of in some way."

Christian education is enjoying a period of unprecedented prosperity. With the exception of theological schools, all kinds of Christian schools from kindergarten to university, are nearly all full to overflowing. Some of the more popular boys' and girls' schools of high school grade have five or six times as many applicants as they can accommodate.

An editorial in one of the prominent papers suggested that to relieve the scarcity of dwelling houses the hundreds of temples which on one street extend for more than ten blocks, might be used for dwellings.

VI

JAPAN'S PROBLEM

With the population of Japan increasing as it did in 1921 by 724,609, the people are facing a real problem. Can the factories absorb a sufficient proportion of this oncoming tide of humanity to meet their simple economic needs?

One of those little events which have in them great significance happened late in August over in Dairen. Prince Yamagata, the governor general of Kwantung, went to the station to take the 3:20 p.m. train for Port Arthur. As he stepped from his automobile the train had just pulled out. The engineer, however, at a signal from the station master, stopped, backed the train into the station and allowed the prince to board the train. The departure of the train was delayed eight minutes and "an issue has been raised out of the incident among the people of Dairen." Behold the new Japan!

The Common People to M. Clemenceau

By Robert E. Lewis

M. CLEMENCEAU, let us explain ourselves to you. We, the common people of America, have been listening to and reading all you have had to say to us and about us. Would it be possible for you to stop a moment and let us tell you what we are thinking about, and why? We would not be disrespectful in the least, but you yourself have asked for a good measure of candor.

Very well, we will take you at your word.

In national matters of vital concern, the people have convictions. Whether they be right or wrong we have them. We have made up our minds in regard to the settlements of the war and in regard to you. We came to understand you in 1919. We do not feel that we understand the intricacies of your diplomacy nor the finesse of your art, but in the articles of the great treaty we saw a full-length portrait of yourself, and now that you are closer at hand it seems to be a true portrait.

Our hearts are stirred by your presence, but not as you expect them to be. To attempt to push back the deep current of our convictions is a pathetic effort. Why do not our convictions run swiftly with your own as they did in 1917 and 1918?

You covet frankness. Let us tell you what is on our minds. You were part and parcel with America at the armistice. All Europe responded to the terms proposed by Mr. Wilson who was then America incarnate. Victory, moderation, fair play, healing of the war-torn world, a peace of justice resulting in good will; a chastened world about to live a better life.

But within seven months after the armistice we were terribly disillusioned. The terms of the treaty of peace appealed to us as essentially a repudiation of America. The treaty restored the bad days of Tallyrand. The balance of power emerged as a monster galvanized into life again.

We asked ourselves the question: "Did France to gain our help practice deception?" We could not really believe it so, and yet the settlement looked wrong, and from that day gradually there stole over us in our towns, farms, hearths, factories and marts the feeling that American ideals had been cleverly but cruelly disowned.

By an overwhelming voice we pushed the treaty from us. We were sorry to see our hopes dashed to the ground. We regretted to part company with recent comrades. We did not spurn the friendship of France; far from it. We coveted that, but not upon the terms you offered.

We had hoped for a decision which would bring good will amongst nations and peace amongst men. We joined you in the war for that end. We were "fed up" on it. But when it came to the decision after the armistice, did you not out-Bismarck Bismarck? Hateful to us, as to you, this comparison, but we cannot ignore it, no matter how disquieting the words. Regarding boundaries, seizures, restorations, provinces, colonies, partitions, plebiscites, mandatories, humiliations, secret agreements, indemnities, sanctions, and the terrible Turk, wherein do we find you and your successors different from the iron chancellor?

M. Clemenceau, you said in your St. Louis address that we "have grown faster than our ideals," and by that you mean that "America owed it to Europe to help enforce the terms of the Versailles treaty because she had had so large a hand in the making of its terms," etc. Is it not a fact that before the treaty was even finished we Americans became deeply suspicious of the process and the results which were being obtained at Versailles? As soon as the treaty was promulgated we were forced to believe against our hopes that the suffering world had been wronged.

The revulsion of feeling against Mr. Wilson amongst the common people of both Europe and America was due to bitter disappointment. They and we acclaimed Mr. Wilson in 1918 because through him America was to prevent such a world settlement as European diplomats had been in the habit of making. "Open covenants openly arrived at" was generally understood to mark the turning point of the world's diplomacy. But the politicians of France, England, Italy, Japan and the little entente had their way. It was not the American way. You think us unsophisticated, and we are, but dear M. Clemenceau, we can tell the husks from the corn in the ear, and the hands of our negotiators were filled with husks when they came back to us from you.

You think we are "a very complacent people." You think we enjoy our present aloofness. You are mistaken. We have assumed an independent position because you would have no other settlement of the war than the settlement which you made. We distrust the Bismarckian type, whether wearing the glove of mail or a glove of white kid. Your settlement seems to us to be based upon the tyranny of conquest, and the tyranny of conquest settles nothing; it postpones all.

You ask that "France, Britain and America work together." You really mean that we should work with you upon the basis of the French conception of international relationships. You rejected America in 1919. We studied the conduct of your representatives in the Disarmament and Far Eastern Conference at Washington in 1921, and we noted that your government is playing true to form. The Washington treaties of accommodation and disarmament have not been approved by France.

You now appeal to us to enter partnership with you upon your well-known terms. You do not understand. We are in earnest. We are not capricious. We are not uninterested, but we cannot put the power of America back of you.

Is this cold? Is it terribly frank? It must be. It would be a blunder of the first magnitude for you to go away without understanding what we mean. We are deeply appreciative of a great man like you. We like you personally. We admire your pluck.

We are glad you visited us, even though we do not seem to be living in the same age, paradoxical as it seems to say it.

I speak for the impersonal people. No German blood in my veins; no German friends in my counsels. Two of my sons warred in your land for our joint cause. They were among our first to volunteer. We made war together, you and we. But we did not make peace together. As a people we would have none of it. We parted at Versailles. We believe you took the wrong road. It nearly breaks our hearts to say so. But we must. Au revoir!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Rich Fool*

IT IS Christmas time. It would seem to be the day to consider generosity—God's gift—our gifts. Perhaps we can see this the more clearly against the black background of this selfish business man. A Toledo preacher asks if this picture does not perfectly describe the modern business man—the abundant production, the enlargement of factories, the selfish keeping of all the profits, the attempt to find life in material possessions. "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, be merry." Full barns—but you cannot feed your soul on hay! A Chinese proverb says: "Had I but two loaves of bread, I would sell one of them and buy a white hyacinth to feed my soul." You can feed your soul on beauty, on goodness, on spiritual things. Shailer Mathews says: "The problem of heaven is how to be happy without a stomach!" When his physical body is gone—how can your sensualist have a good time? "Eat"—but you cannot eat; "drink"—but you cannot drink, "be merry"—but imagine unmaterial merriment. Heaven will be a dull place for the man or woman who has lived, only in the flesh. People who think only of clothes, food, houses, cars, appearance—what will they think about?

This is the hell to which materialism consigns us. "Ask and ye shall receive money. Ask for bodily satisfactions—and you shall receive them. Ask for worldly possessions and they will come to you, but they will not feed your soul. On the other hand, you may pray for beauty and beauty will appear on every hand—flowers, clouds, forests, lakes, stars, gardens, faces, but you may be poor in money. Would you rather be a poor artist or a rich materialist? Many choose to be poor scholars—finding their delights in books and ideas. St. Francis has many followers who practically renounce worldly success in order to help their fellows. There is one race of people much hated, and largely because they have renounced the spiritual leadership of Jesus and in a perfect frenzy of money-madness have gone out to get money and stuff in a most aggressive and disgusting manner. When they turn their immense talents to knowledge they become noted scholars; when they devote themselves to spiritual ideals they rise to sublime heights, counting no sacrifice too great. As shoving, grasping, insolent, materialists they bring down curses on their heads. Why can they not see this? I try to live above race-prejudice; I wish all men well; I believe there is room enough for all of us; but these people who sell their souls for pieces of silver, who flaunt their spangled ostentation, make it very difficult for me. Yet, we all know many business men, who do not belong to this peculiar race, who seem to imitate all the worst and none of the best qualities of this race. Do we not know people who will do anything for money? Every man has his philosophy, although he may not know it by that name, every man has a theory upon which he lives. "Life consists in the abundance of things which a man possesses"—there is the false philosophy of thousands of business men. The Bible says, "A man's life does NOT consist in the abundance of things which he possesses." That is true. The "Rich Fool" did not believe this truth; his philosophy was: "Life is measured by accumulations. He lives most who owns most. We count life by dollars. Bigger barns, more acres, larger crops, more income, more bonds in the deposit box—this spells real living, ease, pleasure. Years of such living are thus guaranteed." Do you see much difference between the "Rich Fool's" philosophy and that of thousands of hustling American business men? It is an utterly false theory of living and every church should overthrow this idea by teaching the true life of trust and harmony with God's spiritual universe. Jesus showed why the "Rich Fool's" theory was fallacious—all could be lost so quickly and completely. It is like putting all your money into a pretentious orange grove in the frost belt—one freeze and you are gone. It is like putting all your money into a pine building near an oil refinery—one blaze and you are done. "Thou fool—this night thou art stripped of all barns, all monies, all material things—how much soul have you to show?" I often think of this—take one of these materialistic men and suddenly strip him of all possessions—take away his house, his store, his cars, his clubs, his money—and what would be left? Something like seventy years, more or less, are given us—not to gather up a pile of stuff—but to build a soul—a rich, beautiful, sympathetic, cultured, generous, spiritual self. Death comes to such an one as examination day to the thorough student. Some day God will demand your soul—will you have one? Will you have a soul or only a handful of brass tacks?

JOHN R. EWERS.

British Table Talk

London, November 21, 1922.

THE position of parties in the new house of commons is not greatly different from the forecasts of the best prophets. The Conservatives are a little stronger, the Liberals a little weaker than was expected, but the house in its proportions is very much as the sober politicians, apart from their perorating moments, believed it would be. It is generally agreed that the house has gained many valuable recruits. There will be a formidable array of critics to face the government. Both Labor and Liberalism ought to have a weight in debate out of all proportion to their number. Labor in particular will be strengthened. In the last parliament it must be admitted that it did not make much impression in the house. Now it has Messrs. Ramsay, Macdonald, Philip Snowden, Sidney Webb, our greatest authority on English social history, Greenwood, Noel and Roden Buxton, Ponsonby and others who will immeasurably strengthen the party. Everyone here knows that in certain Labor circles there has been for long a jealousy of such "intellectuals;" but the party will not regret that it has given a place to them in the house where their knowledge is sure to tell. The house of commons always listens to the man who knows. While it is sure that we are dissatisfied with a method of election which enables a party with a minority of voters on its side to attain a large majority in the house, yet on the whole our people confidently look forward to a new beginning of keen political struggle. The air has been cleared. The one unknown factor, the "x" in the problem, is Mr. Lloyd George. What will be his future? In all probability, nobody knows, not even Mr. Lloyd George. But a word of gratitude cannot be withheld from this man who in years of unremitting toil has served his country. "There is no gratitude in politics," it is said; gratitude is left to history; but even before "politics" becomes "history" all decent-minded men will say a hearty "thank-you" to Mr. Lloyd George.

A New Missionary Society.

That very great society, the Church Missionary Society, has been passing through troubled waters for some time. It is the society through which the evangelicals in the Church of England have expressed their missionary passion. Doctrinal differences have appeared in its ranks. A sermon, condemned by many of its supporters as modernist, was preached some time ago in Hongkong cathedral; it was an attempt to answer the questionings of Chinese students upon the old testament difficulties; at a summer school in England a lecturer approached the old testament from the same "modernist" standpoint. These were the occasions but they were only occasions. It soon appeared that there was a deep cleft in the society. There were some leaders who believed that certain of its officers and members did not hold the evangelical faith in its purity—the test being their attitude to the inspiration of the holy scriptures. The society as a whole adopted in the summer a resolution which seemed to most men to give all that the conservatives could need. It pledged, for example, the society to the view of the scriptures embodied in the 39 articles. But this was not enough. The conservative theologians have now formed a "Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society." It is a pity that there should be a cleavage of old friends. But where fellow-workers cannot live together without reservations, it is better that they should work apart. The one thing to be desired is that they should respect each other and in the apostolic word, "receive each other." For years the missionary societies in the country have enjoyed a fellowship, free from any jealousy or rivalry. I do not believe that this fellowship will be broken by the formation of a new society. There are many places where Christ is not preached, to which a new society may go.

Mr. Chesterton as a Roman Catholic.

Mr. Chesterton has begun his life in the Roman communion with his customary gusto. His theme is that the church, by which he means the Catholic church, is always dying, but it leaves the other systems of thought and faith dead behind it. The church was dying, but Calvinism and the other rival systems were dead. This is an example of his thesis: "the reformation grew old amazingly quickly. It was the counter-reformation that grew young. In England it is strange to note how soon Puritanism turned into paganism, or perhaps ultimately into Philistinism. It is strange to note how soon the Puritans degenerated into Whigs. It was in the Catholic figures of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that we find the spirit of energy and in the only noble sense, of novelty. It was people like St. Theresa, who reformed; people like Bossuet, who challenged; people like Pascal, who questioned; people like Suarez, who speculated." Such arguments are valuable as a corrective to our Protestant self-satisfaction, but is not the whole contention supported by a selection of the favorable facts on the one side, set over against the unfavorable on the other? If the reformation in some ways lost its savor, was not that true even more of the counter-reformation? The whole passage seems to be rhetoric of the pulpit order, not a study in history. Really it is enough to raise the dead in protest to read of Pascal as in any way a child of the counter- reformation. Pascal, of course, was a child in the Catholic faith of Jansenius, who was a thinker directly in the line of Augustine. Pascal was much nearer in his faith to his contemporary Bunyan than to the Jesuits, whom he attacked with more passion than even Bunyan would have shown. An advocate has to take the bad things in his case as well as the good; and it is not playing the game for an author to trace, as he sees the history, the fallings away of Protestantism and to omit the fact that there was a rapid degeneration in the very movement which he praises. Indeed there are Catholics who deplore the reformation chiefly because it set up the counter-reformation which was itself in their judgment a departure from the pure Catholic faith.

Parish Magazines

A churchman once spent some time in trying to convince a well-known writer that his rendering of Christianity was not the one held by the thoughtful members of the church. "You will grant me, however, the parish magazine," was the answer. For often the parish magazine does not do justice to the Christian faith, and even as a journal it is capable of improvement. One writer has pointed out certain errors to be avoided; here are his words:

"Parish magazines could be improved if a little more care were taken. In one magazine the vicar announced that a herbal remedy was to be sold for the benefit of the church and asked for those who would sell it on commission. He guaranteed that the result would be profitable not only to the church but also to the undertaker. Carelessness in arranging paragraphs often leads to injustice. The two following should not have come together. We welcome the advent of Dr. F. into our village; we have never had a resident doctor before. The parochial church council at their last meeting decided that the time had come to consider the extension of the churchyard. Editors of parish magazines are apt to take for granted a certain amount of local knowledge, and this makes the subject somewhat difficult for the outsider. I know the vicar of a parish, a really modest man. I presume he was preaching a course of sermons, but all we saw in the magazine was:—

"Nov. 16th. 'The sort of man England wants.' The vicar.
"Nov. 23rd. 'The man of the moment.' The vicar.
"Nov. 30th. 'The man who really won the war.' The vicar."

Religion in India.

The following note appeared in The Christian World over the initials, "E. S.":

"The results of the last census of religions in India are now available. They will be studied with interest by all who are seeking to understand the spiritual life of India. If the results of the three years, 1901, 1911, and 1921, are compared there are some startling facts from which it is impossible to escape. The total population was:—

In 1901	294,361,056
In 1911	313,547,840
In 1921	316,128,721

That is, there was only a small increase in the last decade—1.2 per cent as against 6.4 per cent for the previous decade. In any attempt to explain this falling off the terrible influenza epidemic of 1918-1919 must not be overlooked; but India is always liable to suffer from plague and pestilence, and the havoc wrought by the influenza is not so unprecedented in India as in Western lands. The Hindus and Jains show a decline; Hindus, for example, in 1911, 217,586,892; in 1921, 216,734,580. But the Sikhs and Parsis have increased; Sikhs were, in 1911, 3,014,466; in 1921, 3,238,803. The Mussulmans, too have increased, from 66,647,299 to 68,735,233. It is in the light of these facts that the figures for the Christian community are to be read. They were:—

In 1901	2,604,313
In 1911	3,574,770
In 1921	4,751,079

That is, in the last decade the Christians increased 25 per cent, and in the previous decade 35 per cent; though this shows a smaller rate of increase. Yet, when it is set against the increase of the population, the figures mean, as The Mission Field says, that the Christians have increased twenty-one times as fast as the whole population. When the increase in India is compared with that of China, it seems very small; but no one who knows the conditions in the two countries will be surprised or discouraged. Besides, there is much more Christianity in India than can be tabulated in a census. The influence it has had upon the Hindu society must be taken into account, and during the last decade this has been far-reaching.

Books.

A book which at a glance can be seen to be of great value has come into my hands from America. It is "The Church in America" by William Adams Brown, who has been lately and still is, I think, in England. No one who recalls the splendid work done by the committee on the war and the religious outlook can question the authority and the knowledge of its distinguished chairman. His book on "Christian Theology in Outline" is widely used in this country. It is set for those who seek for admission into the Congregational ministry through the examinations of our county unions. I have examined candidates in it. The examiner comes to know the value of a book even more than the examined. We sometimes hear a complaint that there is not enough literature designed to make the Bible a living book for the modern man. The complaint is signally unjust. There are books enough for those who want them. Only yesterday I found three almost at random, three admirable books, "The Realism of Jesus" by Dr. Findlay, "The Oracles of God" by Dr. Orchard, and "The Interest of the Bible" by Dr. E. McFadyen. All three are by excellent scholars, who at the same time in classroom and pulpit are face to face with keen modern minds. They go far to show that the Bible will become, when such writers have "got their books across", as the soldiers used to say, the most fascinating and popular of books. Some one once said after meeting the great Wilberforce, "I knew he was a saint, but I did not know he was the wittiest man in England." Readers may come to admit not only that the Bible is a holy book, but as one ought to have expected, also the most interesting of books. "China Through Chinese Eyes" has been published by the Student Christian Movement. It is necessary for every student of China, who tries to keep pace with its movements, to read this book. In it four Chinese scholars describe the modern scene. There the renaissance in China is shown in all its amazing and far-reaching influence.

CORRESPONDENCE

Jesus and the Ku Klux

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The letter of Ti-Bo-Tim in a recent number of your magazine makes interesting reading in comparison with the thoughtful and moderate article of Mr. Sherwood Eddy's. It brought to me clearly a distinction which has not been manifest in much of the discussions of the Ku Klux Klan. The klan alleges to be concerned with the advancing of the principles of Jesus. Mr. Ti-Bo-Tim's words are "Yes, it is only standing for the principles of Jesus Christ." The biblical account of the wilderness temptation of the Master finds its point in the fact that the temptation was to advance the principles dear to the heart of Jesus by methods of domination and sensationalism, which were not in accord with the heart of his Father—and in consequence would defeat the end they were designed to serve.

Even though the klan stands for the principles of Jesus, on the basis of the discussion in your columns it will have a hard time to prove that in the pursuit of those principles it uses the methods which Jesus used, and, by his teaching and example, commended to his followers. This is a real distinction. "What thou wouldst highly, that wouldst thou holily." These words may be a taunt to Macbeth, sailing to power over bloody seas, but can be no less taken as a principle of action by the followers of Christ, and to my mind it is in this latter field of method that the klan most quickly and clearly shows its un-Christlikeness.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I very much enjoy reading your paper and very rarely find anything that I cannot agree with. But in your issue for November 16 there certainly is a blunder in Dr. Jordan's article on the Presbyterians. I was a college classmate of Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D., and kept up a correspondence with him until his death. And to my certain knowledge he was always—all his life—a Congregationalist, not a Presbyterian. And methinks it would make all the dead Presbyterians turn over in their coffins if they should hear Henry Ward Beecher called a Presbyterian. And Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, the present pastor of Plymouth church, Brooklyn,, his name is in the Congregational yearbook for 1921. And I am very sure you will look in vain for his name in the Presbyterian yearbook. The Presbyterian church is rich enough in great names without having any one steal Congregational names to pad their list of notables.

Anacortes, Wash. HORACE J. TAYLOR.

DR. JORDAN'S REPLY

On my desk are more than a dozen letters asking in almost identical language, "When were Beecher and Hillis ever Presbyterians?" Beecher was a graduate of Lane Seminary, a Presbyterian institution of which his father, Lyman Beecher, was president, and his pastorates in Lawrenceburg, Ind., and Indianapolis were with Presbyterian churches. Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis graduated from Presbyterian educational institutions and preached for Presbyterian churches until he was nearly forty years old. Among the people I mentioned in my article as Presbyterians, there were a number who were Presbyterians for only a part of their lives. Were I to write the article in the light of present experience, I would plainly indicate this for I fear some have forgotten my main points in following up this biographical interest. David Livingstone was a Presbyterian who later was employed by a Congregational missionary society. Dr. Torrey was a Congregationalist who became a Presbyterian. These facts were all well known to me when the article was written. In the case of Dr. Josiah Strong, if I was in error about his ever having been a Presbyterian, and I am not quite ready to concede that, this error arose from the ambiguity of a sketch in Bliss' "Encyclopedia of Social Progress," where he is set forth as a graduate of Lane Theological Seminary. As I admitted in the opening paragraph of my article, I did not hope that I or any other uninspired man could write of the genius of a religious organization other than his own without error. It is humiliating to me, however, that I should have made Roger Babson an Episcopalian instead of a Congregationalist or that I should have claimed Alexander MacLaren as a Presbyterian when he was a Baptist. One cannot make a large list of either great Congregationalists or great Presbyterians without finding many of the names are of men who have been in both denominations, for between 1801 and 1852, the two denominations were virtually one in the middle west. Since the days of John Milton, men have passed easily from one denomination to the other. Had I desired to make a complete claim for the Presbyterians, I would have added many other names of men who have belonged to both communions, including Jonathan Edwards, Henry Preserved Smith and Dr. Henry Van Dyke. What determines a man's liabilities to a denomination, being born and educated in a spiritual family or being added to it by conversion in middle life?

ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Thinks Prohibition Should be Discussed!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with much interest Mr. Taylor's editorial of November 9, entitled, "Facts Are Not Enough," and with this initial statement I am in hearty agreement. There is no question about the "dynamics of conviction", nor about the propriety and necessity of creating honest and well-grounded conviction by earnest and urgent appeal. To me it seems, however, that that sinister term "propaganda" should not have entered into such a discussion at all, at a time, especially, when its implicates are so painfully apparent to any thoughtful mind. Propaganda is the method of the rabid partisan, committed heart and soul to a policy, and stubbornly refusing to grant a hearing to the honest objector. The fifteenth amendment is largely a dead letter, because negro slavery as an institution was never impartially discussed, because the practical consequences of sudden and wholesale emancipation were never thought out with cool-headed deliberation, because well-grounded contentions on both sides were silenced by invective, rather than patiently met with opposing arguments. Nay, may I venture the conjecture that prohibition would have profited vastly by frank, unhampered discussion of all sides of the question, candid admission of undoubted facts, wherever existing, and an unprejudiced forecast of its probable working out as a practical measure? Might we not go even farther, and assert, with some show of reason, that the work of the church in years past has suffered in the long run from too much propaganda, a narrow, bigoted partisanship which garbled facts, stifled honest objection, met mild contention with an anathema?

No righteous cause needs to be a glass house, in fear of pelting stones. The stone-throwers have had their fling now and again at the ethics of Jesus, but very little damage has resulted. Jesus met the facts of life four-square, he never tampered with the truth to further his own views, he argued patiently with the devil, instead of stopping his mouth with mud.

Reports of Summer Schools Most Encouraging

The Methodist church in its recently inaugurated summer schools of theology has taken a step which will in a decade radically change the character of that denomination. While still admitting many ministers with a minimum of preparation, the conference study books are now of the modern sort and in the summer schools men of national reputation bring lectures which further expound the themes treated in the study manuals. From many sources the reports are coming in of great uplift to the ministry from the fellowship of prayer and study which the summer schools afford.

Zionists Create Unrest in Palestine

The growing unpopularity of the Jews in Palestine is one of the factors that rocks the boat in the Near East. The Zionist movement has brought in many American Jews who have been arrogant in their treatment of men of other religions. The result is that both Christian and Mohammedan populations have resented the presence of the new-comers. Zionism is a political philosophy and bases its hopes upon the idea of building up industries which will keep the newly arrived immigrants alive. Those rabbis who hold Judaism to be a religion rather than a nationality have not favored the Zionist movement, thinking of it as a hindrance to the developing religious ideals of the race. Bishop Rennie McInnes, of the Episcopal church in Jerusalem, in a recent sermon at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, criticized the attitude of Jewish immigrants in Palestine.

Versatile Minister Has Many Duties

The religious leader finds himself face to face with many new duties these days. One may doubt whether there are many ministers in county-seat towns who have more duties than Rev. Arthur Stout, Disciples minister in Nevada, Mo. With attendance growing continually at church, Sunday school, and young people's meeting, he still finds much time for community service outside the church. He is president of the chamber of commerce, vice president of the Civic club, active on the library board, and a trustee of Cotty college. Outside of Nevada, he serves as a trustee of Missouri College of the Bible and frequently lectures before chambers of commerce and in chautauqua work.

New Congregation Builds Church in a Day

The Disciples of New York recently organized a congregation on the Catteraugus Reservation. This group of Indian Christians wanted a building in which to worship God, so in a single day one was erected. Rev. G. W. Muckley, of the department of church erection of the United Christian Missionary Society, was present on the following day to preside at the dedicatory ceremonies. The cost of the building was three thousand dollars, most of the labor being donated. On the day of the dedication three girls of the Seneca tribe were baptized in the river, and in the afternoon there was a wedding with a Christian ceremony.

Ministers Have Naughty Play Closed Up in Cincinnati

On complaint of the evangelical ministers of the Cincinnati Church Federation, the mayor and three of his friends recently attended the exhibition of "The Rubicon," a play alleged by the ministers to be immoral. The ministers were upheld in their judgment by the mayor and his politician friends, and an order was issued to the Cox Memorial theater not to stage further performances. Meanwhile the theatrical people threaten court action against the mayor.

Annual Meeting of Home Missions Council

The Home Missions council and the Council of Women for Home Missions will hold a joint meeting at Atlantic City on Jan. 17-19. The general theme of the meeting will be "Home Mission Achievements in America to Date." Each of the home mission boards and societies of America will have representatives present. Provision is being made in the program for ample discussion of the various reports from the floor.

Church Installs Its Own Broadcasting Outfit

Kingshighway Presbyterian church is the first in St. Louis to install its own broadcasting outfit. The young men of the church constructed the outfit under the direction of a student who is a senior in the school of engineering of Washington University. Both the morning and the evening services are sent out. The reports coming back indicate that many people who never attend divine worship listen in with keen interest.

Seminaries Undergo Fundamental Change

The vote of the trustees of Meadville Seminary to remove their institution to the vicinity of Cornell University is symbolic of changes that have been going on for many years. Once it was thought that a theological institution should be in the country where living was cheap and distractions few. It was removed from other educational institutions, because theology in former days had no relation to other human disciplines. Now seminaries must have access to university equipment and libraries, and since the country becomes increasingly urban in population, a growing number of students want city experience during an educational career. A million dollars must be raised to make the change. Cornell has a liberal tradition and the Unitarians will be the only denomination with a seminary adjacent to the campus. The institution has only ten students this year. This is now the only distinctly Unitarian seminary in the land, for Unitarian churches have commonly secured their ministers from orthodox denominations.

Methodists Erect Great Building in Washington

Excavations have been made for the headquarters building of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist church in Washington. The various Methodist interests of the city will be brought together in this building when it is finished. The site is adjacent to many of the most important buildings of the city. The Italian renaissance style will be used in the structure. The upper floors above the offices will be made into high apartments which the promoters of the enterprise hope to rent to congressmen and their families.

Soldiers Will Sing the Messiah

The Army Post at Leavenworth, Kas., has an aggressive chaplain in Rev. Frank C. Rideout. Under his direction a chorus of forty voices will sing the Messiah again this year at the Christmas season. The Minsterial Alliance has asked for one rendition down in the city. The army post service will be broadcasted. The chorus will go to the federal prison and sing the Messiah to the prisoners during Christmas week.

Detroit School of Religion Unique Institution

The splendid ideals of religion which ministers may get in seminaries but which the pulpit has no adequate opportunity to present in their fullness are taught in the Detroit School of Religion, a unique institution with several years of history behind it. Dr. Chas. M. Sharpe, dean of the school, was formerly dean of the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago. He teaches a course in "The Bible as Literature." Prof. Harry L. Lurie conducts a course in "Problems and Ideals of Community Life." Dr. Gaius Glenn Atkins, pastor of First Congregational church, gives a series of lectures on "The Psychology of the Religious Life." Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr teaches "The Brotherhood Ideals of Christianity." Dr. Chester B. Emerson, pastor of North Woodward Congregational church, directs a group in the reading of literature which has religious significance. His course is named "The Spiritual Values of Current Literature."

Orthodox Methodists Organize to Oust Heretics

The protest against "modernism" is now being voiced in unofficial Methodist journals. The Texas Methodist, one of these journals, is published at Ft. Worth, which is also headquarters for the conservative movement among southern Baptists. The American Methodist League is the conservative body which seeks to organize northern and southern Methodists into a fighting group. Rev. H. C. Morrison, of Louisville, is president; Rev. W. C. Nixon, of Detroit, vice president; Rev. G. W. Ridout, of Wilmore, Ky., corresponding secretary, and C. C. Valade, of Detroit, treasurer. The following is a statement of principles: "Methodists who dance, play cards, attend theaters and horse races, are not eligible to membership in this league. It is the purpose of this league to propagate and defend the original doctrines of Methodism and to oppose the desecration of the Methodist church buildings by turning them into show houses and places of amusement and play. The Methodist league will vigorously oppose destructive criticism of the holy Bible in its various forms, but especially in Methodist pulpits, schools and literature." The conservative newspapers are bitter in their attacks upon Vanderbilt University which was once a Methodist school, but which does not any longer admit of sectarian control. The teaching of liberal theology in the southland centers

Roosevelt's Religion
By
CHRISTIAN F. REISNER

Was Theodore Roosevelt a Christian? President Harding, General Leonard Wood, Oscar Straus, Ex-Senator Beveridge, Mrs. Robinson (his sister), and others, answer.

Did he Pray, read the Bible, and attend Church? Bill Sewall, Gov. Gifford Pinchot, Dr. Lambert, and others answer.

Dr. Reisner's book is given to a minute study of Roosevelt's private and public life as seen from the religious angle. The result is very impressive and satisfying.

Catholics Now Well Organized at State Universities

The first Catholic work at a state university was begun less than twenty years ago, but the work has now so advanced that few institutions do not have a Catholic club, or a Catholic student pastor. Forty-eight colleges and universities in the United States have 130,000 students of which one-tenth are Catholics. Catholic clubs have enrolled seventy-one per cent of these students. Newman clubs are the favorite method of organization. In many cases the Knights of Columbus have provided a club house for students. The situation is thus summarized: "Full-time chaplains are stationed at the University of Wisconsin, University of California, Colorado State Teachers' College, University of Illinois, University of Michigan, Stevens Institute of Technology, Columbia University and Barnard College, University of Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania State College, University of Texas, University of Florida, and Yale University. Part-time chaplains are connected with twenty-one of the clubs. The Catholic chaplains give courses of study in religious subjects for which university and college credit is given in the University of Illinois, Columbia University, Barnard College, University of Texas, and the University of Florida."

Have Difficulty in Finding Basis for Religion

Like all violent revolutions, the religious changes in Czecho-Slovakia now shows signs of developing radicalism, and if one may credit the reports printed in a recent issue of America, there is a split between the orthodox group and the one of modernist tendencies. The patriarch-elect of the Czecho-Slovakian National church, Dr. Farsky, is reported as having drafted a catechism for the sect which says that "God is the living law of nature" and "Jesus is one of the men prominent in the religious education of mankind." The orthodox bishop of Serbia refused to recognize the church so long as it held to this catechism.

Southern Methodists Complete Reorganization

At the last general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, action was taken reorganizing the benevolent work of the denomination. The plan adopted by the conference is now being carried out. The board of missions consists of three coordinate departments, foreign, home, and woman's work. The latter has home and foreign sections. The new board has 38 managers, of whom 14 are women.

Growth in Religious Periodicals in America

Dr. H. K. Carroll has recently issued a statistical study of the religious periodicals in America. His report shows that the tendency is to have fewer papers but with more circulation. In 1880 there were thirty-nine Methodist weekly papers with an aggregate circulation of 221,000. In 1920 with fewer papers the circulation was 1,415,000. Presumably these figures must include Sunday school papers, for the denominational weeklies would never add up such a total. The Baptists in that period have increased from 143,000 to 459,000; the Roman Catholics from 271,000 to 1,367,000. The National Welfare Council of the Roman Catholic church has set a goal of one religious paper in each of the four million homes in America. During the past century the religious press has espoused many of the great reforms which often at

Churches do More Work in the Summer

THE closing up of church activities in the summer has been a scandal for many years, but it appears that the tide has turned and the churches now find new things to do instead of allowing their equipment to lie idle. Helen Ward Tippy, secretary of community relations in connection with the commission on the church and community service, has made a study during the past year of the summer-time activities of the churches. This study has been made under various headings such as: residential churches, down-town churches, industrial and foreign neighborhoods, etc. The coming of the daily vacation Bible school has given a new outlet to religious energy. Miss Tippy makes the following report on various interesting activities:

"An illustration of the magnitude of the outdoor recreational work of modern religion is the report of the woman's branch of the New York City Mission society. During the summer of 1922 the society provided two-week outings for 2,620 children, and day outings for 3,443 others. 1.060 were given two weeks each at Northfield, at the old bungalow home of Dwight L. Moody.

"In Boston some of the denominational city missionary societies maintain summer camps for their churches. The Congregational society has a camp at Pomp's Pond, Andover, Massachusetts, for the Congregational children of the city. It is open in alternating two-week periods to boys, ages 11 to 18 a month; and to girls, ages 12 to 18, a month. The cost of the two weeks is $15.20. Applications are accepted in the order of receipt up to the camp capacity.

"The Episcopal City Mission society of Boston maintains a Mothers' Rest at Revere Beach. Last summer a thousand mothers and children made use of its 'twenty-six bright bedrooms, its broad piazzas and ample dining-room.' There are four camps in the rear of the Mothers' Rest used by boys one month and girls the other. There are also six city playrooms open for five weeks. They average nearly 700 children daily.

"One important development of recent years, which began in the Chautauqua movement, and has been used extensively by the Christian associations, is the summer institute or assembly. Hundreds of these are now held by the various religious bodies and their organized societies throughout the country; by lake side, seaside, riverside, or in the mountains. Many thousands of young people, ministers and church workers are thus brought together every summer during their vacations for systematic instruction combined with organized recreation, elevating friendship and inspiring services of public worship. They are able to combine the best intellect of the country because of the appeal which they make to the imagination as well as to consecration. The leadership of the churches is being gradually transformed by these summer time church institutes.

"The auto-tourists are presenting a new summer problem to the church especially in the west, and with the establishment of city tourist parks a definite way of reaching them is opened. In the course of a two-months touring trip last summer, I stopped at about eight city parks. In most of them, the churches did not seem to be aware of their opportunity, but there were a few exceptions. In Salt Lake City, one of the churches held a "sing" on the grounds followed by an informal religious service. Many attended; some of course, purely from curiosity to know what was going on, but others apparently from genuine interest. In Boise, Idaho, we discovered that frequently the tourist becomes the permanent resident. This fact makes the work of the church in the parks doubly important. In the smaller camp grounds it may not be advisable to hold services, but at least the tourist should be invited to the churches and their children to the Sunday schools and in larger camps both services of worship and Sunday schools are needed. In cities where there are Daily Vacation Bible schools with supervised recreation, or other summer activities, it would frequently be a real service to the tourist if their children could be admitted.

"One of the most important developments this year has been the city-wide open air meetings in Detroit, organized by the Detroit council of churches. The city was divided into nine districts with a system of open air meetings in each of them. Special attention was given to foreign speaking districts, and to the distribution of the gospel of St. John and of pamphlets. The entire campaign was supervised by Rev. D. L. Schultz, labor evangelist, of the Baptist board of home missions, who was brought to the city for the purpose, and who conducted meetings in Grand Circus Park every noon, where he reached thousands of working men and the unemployed. Careful attention was given to personal conferences and to the follow up, and the results were quite unusual in conversions and reconstruction of lives."

the outset had no other support from the press. Dr. Carroll predicts a golden future for the religious press when it shall be rid of the handicaps of denominationalism.

Federal Council Comes Out Strongly for Intervention

The cablegrams reporting ever fresh atrocities against Christian populations in the Turkish empire have aroused the Christian people in this country. After conferring with the leaders of various large religious communions, the Federal Council has come out strongly for a non-military intervention in the Near East. The people of 100,000 churches are asked to send petitions to President Harding and to congress, urging that this country face its moral responsibility in the Near East. At the same time the council asks that the churches give liberally to the fresh calls for relief.

one town in the United States the students of an engineering school avoid the churches almost to a man because students are constantly denounced in the pulpits for wayward conduct. The motive of the churches is right, but the methods obviously ill-advised. The commission on men's work of the Congregational churches of the United States has been issuing a series of studies of the various kinds of situations in churches. There are five in all: Men's Work in Rural and Village churches, Men's Work in Down Town Churches, Men's Work in College Communities, Men's Work in Suburban Churches, Men's Work in Resort Communities. The first three are already out in the form of a mimeographed booklet, which suggests that students be taught church work just as agriculture is taught on a demonstration farm. The keynote is that students be set to work for themselves and for others rather than that the church be urged to work for students.

Conservative Editor Predicts Division

The editor of the Presbyterian, a conservative journal published in Philadelphia, predicts that the impending trial of Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick by the general assembly may result in a division in the Presbyterian church. This journal contemplates such a possibility with glee, as is customary with conservatives in many denominations. This journal says: "This will be healthy. In the body of the church as in the body of a man, when there is a hurt and wound, there is no healing until the line of separation appears between the sound and unsound parts. The history of separation in the church maintains this conclusion." It would appear that many Protestants have never learned anything from a study of the history of Protestantism.

Dr. Aked Denounces Clemenceau

Clemenceau, the eminent French statesman now visiting in the United States, was recently denounced by Dr. Aked in his pulpit in Kansas City as an atheist, a blasphemer, and a scoffer. After paying his respects to the visitor, he denounced the whole program of imperialism now being carried on by leading states. He said: "When they had Germany down where they wanted her, they put in a provision that was never discussed before, that is, the reparations should include pensions for widows and orphans and disabled soldiers. Any such demand is not to the advantage of the French people. Those statesmen wanted to milk the cow and cut the cow's throat, too. What they wanted was not the collection of the reparations but the complete destruction of the German people. Clemenceau is inviting us to come in. The people of America will have to say whether or not they acquiesce. Let me tell you, imperialism is breaking down. The United States is not going to bolster up an imperial brigandage that imperial brigands already are beginning to see totter. Great Britain before long will be out of Mesopotamia and Palestine. They are drawing in the lines of empire for the burden is becoming too great to bear. The days of imperialism have ended. Some of you will live to see Great Britain come out of India."

Kansas City Federation Wins Public Approval

The annual meeting of the church federation in Kansas City brought out facts concerning the organized life of the churches that made a favorable impression upon the whole city. The effect of solidarity which the federation projects make takes away the old-time reproach of competition in religion. The Kansas City Times said editorially: "But that the council has become such and demands recognition because of what it promises to do were evident from developments at the annual meeting of the

Y. M. C. A. Has Great Convention

THE forty-first international convention of the Y. M. C. A., which was held at Atlantic City last month, faced many fundamental issues in its sessions. Dr. Robert E. Speer contributed greatly to the spiritual atmosphere of the meeting, while Dr. John Mott challenged the young people of the nation with his forward-looking program. Rev. Howard B. Grose makes the following report of the results of the convention:

"The report that most closely concerns the churches was that of the commission on the approach to the churches, appointed at the Detroit convention in 1919, and composed of twenty lay and clerical leaders in their denominations, with Dr. William H. Day as chairman. For three years the commission had pursued its investigations, held conferences with representatives of the denominations, and studied the question of relationships, with a view to discovering the points of friction and overlapping, coming to a clear understanding of purpose, and finding the way to closest cooperation. It is doubtful whether a more thorough report or one fraught with more potential consequences to the future of American Protestantism, has been made in the history of the association. It was listened to with a deep appreciation of its significance, and its recommendations were adopted by an absolutely unanimous vote, after Dr. Speer had followed the forceful presentation by Dr. Day with an analysis that left its great import clearly in mind.

"This is a report that deserves careful study by the pastors of all the churches, and by all leaders in the denominational organizations. It makes clear the attitude of the associations and holds out the hand of kinship in service. In stating the basic principles of cooperation, the report puts first, the supremacy of Christ; second, the primacy of the church, which has always been affirmed by the association; third, the continued independence of the association of ecclesiastical control; and fourth, adequacy of relationship. The duty of the churches, in view of the purpose of Christ, the primacy of the church, and the autonomy of the association, is to sustain and counsel this specialized agency for work among men and boys. The duty of the association, on its part, is to promote its work among men and boys in such a manner as to lead them to become disciples of Christ, members of the church, and stable in Christian character. The association's work is to supplement that of the church, or should be conceived rather "as a work of the churches carried on by them through the association as a free and trusted auxiliary agency." While recognizing that for the motive of its organization, for its inspiring ideal of Christian manhood, and for its spiritual and material support it is indebted to the churches, the commission is convinced that the association can most effectually accomplish its mission by the maintenance of the independence of ecclesiastic control which it has had from the beginning.

"Another matter of special interest concerned the basis of membership. Despite the widespread reports, the convention made no change in the basis, which requires membership in an evangelical church for active membership in the association, save in the case of student or college associations, which were treated as a separate class. What happened was this. The standing committee of associations, which has long been studying the subject of the irregularity of associations in regard to constitutional practice, submitted in its report the following recommendations:

"Resolved, that in determining which churches are evangelical for purposes affecting the basis of active membership, local associations may regard as evangelical: Those conforming to the definition adopted by the international convention held in Portland, Me., in 1869; those designated as eligible for membership in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, or the corresponding body of the dominion of Canada. Another alternate definition was suggested, but was eliminated by a substitute which authorizes any association or branch at its discretion to elect or appoint not to exceed ten per cent of its managing board from members of the association not identified with churches defined as evangelical, upon their regular nomination by a nominating committee of the said board, and upon the acceptance by the nominees of the Paris basis as their personal declaration of purposes. The Paris basis adopted at the first intercontinental world's conference of the associations of North America and Europe in 1855, declares that the "Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour, according to

The Upward Climb

WHO were these far-distant ancestors of modern man? What did they do, and how did they live? What did they eat?

Above all, how did the human race climb from that dark past into its present place? Why and how did the big jaw and little forehead disappear, and turn into the lofty head of modern man? How and why did man cease to look on the ground and look to the skies?

Sometimes men lose heart over the world as it is to-day, but one glance backward into that dim past is the most encouraging thing that man can have, for it gives incredible hope for a glorious future.

The wonderful complete story of man's upward climb is told with all the romance, all the vividness of that greatest of novelists—

H. G. WELLS in the Outline of History

Now for the First Time—

4 Handy Full-Size Volumes. Profusely Illustrated—100 Extra Illustrations. Completely Revised by H. G. WELLS himself

Although more than a million copies have been sold here and abroad, practically the only complaint we have heard of Wells' "Outline of History" has been that it was too bulky to handle, too big to hold comfortably while reading.

So we decided to bring it out in a form that would be not only convenient and easy to handle, but as handsome a set of books and as beautifully illustrated as any History made. That meant starting all over from the very beginning, setting everything anew in fresh, clear type, gathering from the four corners of the earth a hundred of the most famous historical paintings for illustrations.

Mr. Wells threw himself into this task with all his marvelous enthusiasm. For a long time he had felt that certain parts of the "Outline" needed elaborating, certain other parts revision. This was his chance. Starting at the very beginning, he made changes on every single page of the text, rewrote whole chapters, added page after page of new material.

One Fourth Off!—SEND NO MONEY

And now, at last, we can offer you the new, revised, illustrated history, complete in four beautiful, durable, cloth-bound volumes, in convenient library size, at 25% less than the price of the original 2-volume set!

Think of it! Thoroughly revised, printed from brand-new, clear, readable plates, with a hundred famous historical pictures from the great art galleries of the world, and bound up into four durable, cloth-bound, library-size volumes—all for a fourth less than the ordinary 2-volume set would cost you even now in any book-store!

And the Review of Reviews, Too!

Wells begins with the dawn of time. Before there were men. Before there were even reptiles. In broad, magnificent strokes he paints the picture, bringing you straight down to today. He shows the thread of human purpose binding men together the world over from one age to another.

And where Wells stops, the Review of Reviews takes up the story. It ties together the events of today the world over, shows their relation one to another, gives you a background of facts for your daily news.

organization Monday night. Not only was it plain that sixty churches, representing sixteen different communions and an individual membership of more than thirty thousand, actually had got together but that they were setting up for themselves a program which in its execution would help make Kansas City a better place for the average citizen as well as the single church body. It was clearly realized by the ministers and the hundreds of representative laymen present that questions of a moral nature affecting the public, whether these be termed civic or political, must become the concern of organized religion."

Quakers Make Definite Demands

The Quakers with painstaking care have made estimates of the relief they must administer in Russia during this coming winter. They will be responsible for 250,000 starving people, most of whom are in tatters and must have entire outfits of clothing. Fifty hospitals and children's homes require medicines and equipment. Horses must be imported from America for not enough animals are left to continue the agricultural operations. An active campaign is being carried on to meet these needs. The American Relief for Russian Women and Children works through the Quaker organization and has headquarters in Chicago.

Religious Drama Strong Feature in Kansas City

Kansas City is quite alive to the matter of setting forth religious themes through the dramatic method. The Religious Drama Producing company of Kansas City recently presented in the Grand Theater a reproduction of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." "The Brotherhood of Man," an allegorical pageant in prologue and ten episodes, showing the age-long conflict between good and evil and depicting the power of Christ in the life of every youth and every maiden, was recently given in Central Methodist church. About a thousand young people acted in the various parts.

Church Has Most Remarkable Longevity Record

Rev. David Lyon in a recent report of his activities in Magnolia Park Disciples church of Houston, Tex., sets forth the fact that in four years he has not conducted the funeral of any member of his church, all his funerals being of those outside the membership. One might expect a record of this sort in a Christian Science church, but it is very unusual among Disciples!

Y. M. C. A. HAS GREAT CONVENTION

the holy scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men." After vigorous and courteous debate, conducted in the finest brotherly spirit, the resolutions were adopted by an overwhelming majority.

"The student associations were dealt with separately in regard to the basis of membership. The convention adopted the statement of purpose and qualification for membership on which the student associations of the country are practically united, and for which the student representatives made earnest pleas, affirming their loyalty to Christ and the church and their conviction that the change would enable them to do a far larger work in winning students for Christ. This statement does not make church membership a requirement, but leaves it optional with the student associations to admit as members those who declare themselves to be in sympathy with the following statement of purpose and willing to make it their personal program of allegiance and service; to lead students to faith in God through Jesus Christ; to lead them into membership and service in the Christian church; to promote their growth in Christian faith, especially through the study of the Bible and prayer; and to influence them to devote themselves in united effort with all Christians in making the will of Christ effective in human society, and to extending the kingdom of God throughout the world.

"It is required that only students who are evangelical church members can serve as officers, or represent the association at conventions."

WHY DAVID BELASCO READS THE OUTLOOK

THE value of The Outlook lies in its breadth of vision, normal view-point, and unswerving steadiness of purpose. The ideal precedes all things, and a magazine without an ideal is like a man without a country.

The view-point of The Outlook is much needed in these excitable times. Progress, development, and rational growth are attained only under normal conditions.

That we are reverting to a steadier mood, must be evident to all who think profoundly. Jazz in thought and writing is merely a phase, no deeper than the music that suggests the name; it is rather like a gay circus in a side street and soon passes by. When the brief glamour has vanished, the boys and girls go back to their studies.

Those who write must bring new faith and courage to all who labor for the welfare of mankind. The world has good sound reason to look forward to great international achievements.

America is the most idealistic country, as its past proves. The wise journals of the present are those that inspire hope in its future.

"Onward, Christian Soldiers!"

"With diplomats frightened," said John Haynes Holmes of the Near East crisis, "soldiers patient and tactful, newspapers in stubborn opposition, and labor in open rebellion, it is the churches that choose to sound the call to arms. Who can doubt that, if the bishops, missionaries, and religious editors had their way, the world would now be deep engulfed in war!"

Did you read Dr. Holmes's article, "Onward Christian Soldiers," in The Nation or in one of the thousands of reprints which have been made of it? As the Lausanne conference progresses and the Near Eastern situation grows more acute, his challenge to Christian ministers gains force. Is the Church to stand again convicted of fair weather pacifism—"to carry the resolution" for war "over the veto of Jesus Christ?"

Every Chrisian who believes the Church ought to stand squarely against war will find the ablest support for his position in

MORE than two thousand years ago, the ancient Greeks searched endlessly for TRUTH.

And they made an important discovery.

TRUTH is not an easy thing to find. It does not grow on the nearest bush, waiting to be plucked by the careless wayfarer.

On the contrary, it is a rare gem, attainable only to a few privileged persons.

These are the leaders of humanity: Statesmen, Scientists, Artists, and Philosophers. In every epoch, they reflect the true aspect of their times.

A Book of Inspiration, Encouragement and Suggestion

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?

The 20th Century Quarterly

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK
Editor

A Non-denominational study of the International Uniform Lessons for adult and young people's classes of twentieth century leanings.

THE remarkable success of this quarterly has proved that it is possible to interest deeply large groups of young and older people in straight-away Bible study. The international uniform lessons are used as the basis for this study, but the conductors of the various departments have so inspired their lesson treatments with the life and thought of today that the Old and New Testament prophets and preachers seem to have abandoned the more or less musty pulpits to which they have been bound by an obscurantist "scholarship" so-called, and to have stepped right down into the marts and streets of these twentieth century days. John R. Ewers, of Pittsburgh, knows his Bible, — and knows, too, the spirit of modern life; and all of the other contributors — Herbert L. Willett, Jr., with his oriental sidelights; W. D. Ryan, with his instructive lesson introductions; Prof. W. C. Morro, with his brilliant "Forum" questions — are particularly alert to today's problems and needs; and, finally, Ernest Bourner Allen, with his weekly "prayer thought," infuses the whole discussion with the spirit of devotion.

When you see this little booklet, you will say it is the handiest and most attractive quarterly you have ever seen — but you will say also, after you have looked into it, that it contains the most effective treatment of the international lessons which has ever been put between covers.

Put a new spirit into your school by adopting this Quarterly for your adult and young people's societies. Send for free sample copy at once, for your examination, then write us without delay how many copies you will wish for your school for the January-March quarter.

1. It is beautifully made. Typographically it is perfect, and the binding is superb. It is bound in full morocco ($2.50) and in beautiful purple cloth ($1.50, add 8 cents postage).
2. It carries a religious message. The Christmas season is a religious one and the ideal Christmas gift is a religious book.
3. It lasts the year round — and for many years. Every time your friend takes up the book for his morning reading he will think of the thoughtful giver of the gift.

What The Daily Altar Contains

There is a page for each day's reading. For each day there is a verse of Scripture, a meditation, a brief poem, and a prayer.

The Time Is Short! Order—on a postcard if you wish—the number of copies you desire, (indicate how many cloth-bound, how many leather), and books will be mailed to you at once, and the bill charged to your account, payable February 1, 1923.

WHAT THEY SAY OF THE DAILY ALTAR

The Central Christian Advocate: "Cannot be too highly commended."
The Presbyterian Advance: "Excellent and beautiful."
The Christian Evangelist: "A real help toward restoring the family altar."
The Churchman: "A beautiful book."
The Christian Standard: "Beyond all praise."
The Christian Advocate (New York): "Excellently arranged."

"Manifold Voices"

Book of Sermons

Note the Following Favorable Comments:

Nelson Trimble, Manager of Interstate Lyceum Bureau, Chicago, says:

"The little book has been the source of much personal and spiritual inspiration to me and to those in my home. The author shows an unusual ability in grasping the fundamental teachings of the Master and in interpreting them in the light of present day needs."

The Christian Evangelist, St. Louis, Mo.: "These sermons must have been very impressive when delivered before a popular audience."

The Christian Standard, Cincinnati, O.: "These fourteen choice sermons are direct, heart-reaching and inspiring."

Geo. Hamilton Combs: "What a beautiful and helpful little book!"

The Call of the Christ

By Herbert L. Willett

SELDOM has the challenge of Jesus to the present century been presented so earnestly, so persuasively. As a vital, living, convincing portrayal of Christ, scholarly yet simple, positive but not dogmatic, spiritual but not pietistic, it is a delight and an inspiration. A few of the eighteen chapter titles are: "The Authority of Christ," "The New Life in Christ," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Uniqueness of Christ," "The Fearlessness of Christ," "The Perennial Christ." "The book," says the Heidelberg Teacher, "is the utterance of a heart that has experienced the might and power of the Christ, and burns with a passion for the needs of the rising generation."

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

EDITORIAL

A Sky-Scraper Methodist Cathedral

OUR English brethren look askance at the methods of American churches. The Christian World sees in "the sky-scraper cathedral" of Methodism in Chicago an evidence of the passing of the old idea of religion—the religion that was a spiritual communion between man and his Maker, the religion which was humble and poor, and whose finest flower was the parish parson who trudged the roads in good weather and foul, ministering to the needy souls of his flock." The Methodist Recorder is moved to recall the satire of Ian Maclaren aimed at the modern church: "The chief demand is a sharp little man with the gifts of an impressario, a commercial traveler, and an auctioneer combined, with the slightest flavor of a peripatetic evangelist. Instead of a study lined with grave books of divinity and classical literature, let him have an office with pigeon-holes for his programs, circulars, and endless correspondence, and a telephone ever tingling, and keep books like a bank." Why all this mawkish sentiment and airy satire because the methods of a vine-covered English country church do not apply in the Chicago loop? The methods of Wesley were new, unconventional, and startling in his day, and he himself had to be urged on to new ways of working by his practical mother. For our part we rejoice and thank God for the Methodist sky-scraper as an evidence, not that religion is passing away, but that it is alive, active, and equal to the demands of the teeming life of a great metropolis. Always "a dream cometh with the multitude of business"; and it is the dream that redeems the business from brutality, rescues us from that unholy city where "heart treads on heart," and lifts us into a vision of that city where there is no trafficking in human souls. Whether it be on the far frontier, or in the crowded loneliness of a vast city, Methodism shows in ever fresh ways its genius for adaptation to new situations.

American Silence in International Affairs

MISS MARY McDOWELL, head of the University of Chicago settlement in the stockyards district, has just returned from an extended visit in Europe, studying conditions among the people of the various lands from which immigration to America is most common. During her stay, she spent several days in attendance at the meetings of the league of nations in Geneva, and reports many interesting features of the work of that organization. In the circumstances imposed by limitation of its personnel, chiefly through non-participation of the United States in its activities, the league has been carrying on very important lines of activity. It has taken vigorous steps to repress the white slave traffic in various European countries, and with notable results. It has returned more than half a million men to their homes from lands of exile and expatriation. It has put an embargo upon a considerable portion of the opium traffic which has devastated both Europe and Asia. It has limited and hopes to prohibit completely the private traffic in arms and munitions which has made possible no small proportion of the militaristic unrest and aggression in a number of the states of eastern Europe. One of the pathetic things chronicled by Miss McDowell is the fact that in sending for information from the different countries regarding conditions prevailing in relation to the above mentioned and other activities, time after time the documents of the league bore the record "No reply from the United States." Surely this refusal to give information from official sources in our government is not only a discourtesy to an international organization, but is a serious hindrance to the success of a great work in behalf of humanity. To be so sensitive to the very name of the league of nations that we cannot even answer courteously worded inquiries regarding prevalent conditions which the league is seeking to remedy is quite inconsistent with American traditions and American good will.

"A Mystical Hanker After Something Higher"

A BOOK to take up and lay down and take up again and again, for sheer joy in a good companion—humanly lovable, sanely American, and wistfully wise—is the Letters of Franklin Lane. It is aglow with a bright intelligence, and fragrant with the impress and atmosphere of a wholesome and winsome personality. To many questions he reacted in the conventional American manner, but his spirit was so sweet and sound, and all through his life, as a kind of undertone, ran what he himself called "a mystical hanker after something higher"; and in that, too, he was typical of his countrymen, who are ever in quest of a clear religious faith to explain and sustain their robust and unconquerable optimism. He found refuge in work, in praise of which he writes in a manner worthy of Carlyle, without his acid, finding in it release from the haunting mystery of life and sorrow and longing. "Work for the things that life needs, for things that are illusions, for dead sea fruit, for ashes; work for a look at the stars, for the sense of things made happier for many men, for the lifting of loads from tired backs. Work—it is the order of the Supreme One." Why is it that Americans are so feverishly active, and find so little joy in their work? Why do so many fine minds and noble hearts just miss the finest thing of all, laboring against time, in a mood not hopeless but unhopeful, lest the night come when no man can work? What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world, its prizes and applause, and find himself still heart-hungry and saved from dismay only by a stoic sternness?

Americanism Defined: An Outside View

SOME weeks ago we noted in these pages the amazing title found in an English booklist, "Americanism: a World Menace." The book has not yet been published in America, but the London Times devotes two columns to it, though even to the editor of The Times the name of the author, W. T. Colyer, conveys no information. The thesis of the book is that the world must make choice between Americanism and bolshevism, between the United States and Russia. The object of the author in posing such an alternative is to persuade the world—at least the workers of the world—to choose Russia. This he seeks to do, not by expounding the blessing of bolshevism, on which he is silent, but by exposing the curse of Americanism. There follows a rather rabid indictment of American civilization, on the ground that it standardizes human beings, and that its standards fall below the average of civilized humanity elsewhere; and, further, that America seeks to impose its standards on all the world and the rest of mankind. Americanism is defined as "a mixture of youthful extravagance, arrogance, and adaptability," resulting in a sham democracy, lack of real liberty, dollar-worship, lawlessness, the control of opinion by an interested few, the ownership of religion by capital, and a social mess made up of sickly sentimentalism and gross selfishness, the while Americans profess to be the chosen people of God and the leaders of the moral idealism of the world. In short, it is a very well written denunciation of America by a Marxian propagandist, and as such is worth what it is worth. The editor of The Times thinks it good for America to be told its sins, though he is hardly willing to say that there is "no health in us."

The Propaganda of Racial Prejudice

THE anti-Japanese campaign in the United States has long had able journalistic defense in the Hearst papers, but now the movie screen brings up reinforcements. "Pride of Palomar," now showing at McVicker's in Chicago, and doubtless in many other theaters throughout the United States, is so obviously a campaign document that one wonders how it goes down the throats of the audience. This film is produced by the Cosmopolitan adherence, a faithful pulpit can go far to undo the evils kept their agreements with the allies in Russia and in China and no good reason exists at the present time for keeping alive the anti-Japanese prejudice in the United States. Munition manufacturers, yellow journal vendors and similar interests would keep alive every kind of hate and fear. For the rest of us, well-being lies along the pathway of good faith and universal good-will. Where can the cause of universal brotherhood find a voice if not in the Christian journals and in the Christian pulpit? With three-fourths of this country interested in the church either through membership, contributions or other form of adherence, a faithful pulpit can go far to undo the evils that are wrought by an evil press propaganda. It was freely prophesied at the end of the world war that the next great war would be upon the Pacific. The implication of this suggestion was that there is inevitable enmity between Japan and the United States. The folly and sin of such a suggestion must be made apparent to everyone, or some day we shall find ourselves in dire straits from the machinations of the American war-lords, who are not one whit better than the war-lords of Germany.

What is Right with the Church?

THE November issue of The Modern Churchman, the organ of the modernist group of the church of England, has a most interesting article by the vicar of a country parish, telling how he made his church the center of community activity and enterprise, and he begins with this golden sentence: "The work of the clergyman is insignificant only where the man is insignificant." It is arresting to read the titles of the books which he found most useful for preparing special sermons in one month, such as Miller's "New Psychology and the Teacher," MacDougall's "Race Degeneration," Thompson's "Control of Life," Schweitzer's "On the Edge of the Primeval Forest," Wells' "Oxford and its Colleges," and Popenoe's "Applied Eugenics"—an astonishing list, as compared with the reading of a parson a generation ago. Accordingly, his methods were of a different kind, including a closer friendship and cooperation with the free churches in the parish, and with the Worker's Education association; in fact, with every instrumentality for good in the community—making use of music, play, art, nature with creative insight and communal imagination. The entire neighborhood was transformed; the parish church became a community church in a true sense, bringing people together without regard to denomination, not to make them Anglicans, but to make them Christian members of the community. The secret of it all is in the words: "Make the church the agent of great living ideals and aims. We talk of reunion; let us act it by being friends. Never yield to the temptation of proselytizing. That degrades religion. Let us proclaim by our methods that we serve the same Master and recognize our underlying unity. Christianity is a spirit, not simply an organization. We must be business like, no doubt, but our essential objective is the permeation of life with the spirit of Christ." The article is entitled, "What is and what might be."

Do the Colleges Short Change the Churches

PRESIDENT W. O. Thompson, leader of America's Sunday school forces, is the author of the startling caption at the head of this editorial. He says of the colleges: "They are prone to ask for financial assistance, for grants and endowments, and for other assistance of a varied nature. In return are the churches getting value received, or anything like a fair return on their investment? It is not enough to adopt a pensive attitude in relation to religious knowledge." A recent survey of Disciples colleges seems to show thatt the colleges of that denomination are preeminent among Christian schools for the amount of religious instruction being given. But Dean W. E. Garrison of the Disciples Divinity House, punctures this apparent conclusion with the following observation: "The survey apparently did not discover the fact that the unique emphasis given to Bible study in Disciples colleges is largely because our ministerial training is chiefly conducted as undergraduate work in these colleges, and their curricula therefore include much professional work. To compare them in this respect with colleges of denominations which train their ministers in graduate schools is obviously meaningless. We suspect that the average non-ministerial student in a Disciple college does get more Bible study than the average student in other colleges; at least we hope so, but the survey does not prove it." President Thompson suggests that tht apparent failure of the denominational college in religious instruction is due to the lack of freedom in the classroom. The denominational college ordinarily does not interfere with academic freedom save in religious instruction. In many church schools there is no honest quest for truth about religion but only propaganda favorable to a denomination. The truth-loving student turns away from propaganda with disgust. Therefore we have the astonishing phenomenon that often the most orthodox college has the fewest students taking courses to understand the nature of the Christian religion. The state universities are not allowed to teach religion at all, but on the edge of their campuses great schools of religion are growing up like those in Kansas, Missouri and Illinois, where a freedom not known in denominational colleges is being practiced. The denominational school must either be emancipated from the rule of creed-bound trustees, or it is doomed as a teacher of religion, and if it fails as a teacher of religion what distinctive function does it have as compared to state and other schools?

The Supernatural

THE Bible is the book of the supernatural. No one can rise from its careful reading without the conviction that the men who speak through its pages lived in a world which was ruled by laws more impressive and far-reaching than those which govern the mere phenomena of the physical universe. They believed implicitly in a world of spiritual forces, and they were not mistaken. The fact that they also believed in miracles does not lessen the value of their larger faith. We may or may not share their views regarding the miraculous, but if we are plastic to the meaning of the greatest facts in life we can hardly fail to accept the reality of that vastly larger thing, the supernatural.

Of course if by the term one signifies allegiance to the older dualism which underlay most of the discredited theology of the past, it becomes impossible to accord it hospitality. It is no longer of a double universe that we think, with its two compartments, lower and higher, one natural and the other supernatural. All life is one, and the very essence of meaning to the term universe is that it shall be universal and uniform in its laws. The concept of the supernatural was originally a device of the schoolmen to describe the upper section of the world of being, in which the divine principle had immediate control. This distinguished it from the natural world of physical laws and human interests. The passing of this dualistic idea has left to us the choice between the total rejection of the supernatural, and its interpretation in the larger and more adequate sense. It is with this meaning that it is here employed.

When so interpreted, as the universal reign of divine power in the world and in all the worlds, most men of the modern mind are believers in the supernatural. Life is a divine transaction. No experience is beyond the range of God's laws. Every act of life has the value of eternity. Every place on which we stand is aflame with the presence of the Infinite, and is holy ground. Every hour is charged with destiny, and every day is a day of judgment.

The men who wrote the most urgent sections of the Bible lived in this world of spiritual reality. To them God was imminent, present, real. They were not much concerned as to the manner in which they expressed this faith. At times they used the forms of speech which described God not only as personal but as visible and immediate in his contacts with men of like spirit. They were not hesitant in their use of the most anthropomorphic expressions to make clear their sense of the closeness of deity to their lives and interests. They spoke of God as talking familiarly with them. The picture is that of one man conversing with another. This was both figure and reality. When the prophets affirmed that the word of the Lord came to them in definite terms, they were quite within the limits of fact as experienced by them. This was only the more reverent and audacious way of asserting that they were endeavoring with all their powers to give a true interpretation to the divine purposes for their day.

The difference between them and us is that we are more reticent about claiming the divine guidance for our utterances. And yet the method of God is not different today from that which prevailed in the past. In our time a church convention, after due consideration of qualifications and opportunities, decides to send missionaries to some promising field, and on the minutes of the session it is recorded as an action of the body that has exercised its consecrated wisdom in the transaction. If the writers of the apostolic age had been chronicling the event, they would have written that the Spirit said to the church: Separate me these men for the work to which I have called them. Both records would be true, but the second would be in greater harmony with all the facts. We have not yet learned to write the story of the church or the proceedings of Christian bodies in such vivid and vital terms.

Historians record the fact that Columbus, impressed by many considerations of the opportunities and advantages to his country and to the world of an attempt to widen the ranges of commerce and religion, sailed out on his voyage of discovery, looking for new lands. If the writers of Genesis had been telling the story, they would have written that God said to Columbus, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred and from thy father's house to a land that I will show thee; and I will make thy name great. And they would have been entirely right, for the journey of Columbus was as much a divine transaction as that of Abraham. It is only as men understand the part which God takes in all human affairs that they are competent to write the story of the race.

It is not otherwise with the fascinating narrative of world building and progress. It can be put in terms chosen wholly from the vocabulary of modern science, with due attention to those processes which are observed today in the formation of planets and continents, and which are described in terms appropriate to the evolutionary interpretation. There may be no reference to any divine activity. And yet no description can exhaust the meanings and possibilities of the great unfolding of life. It was the belief of the men who wrought at the literary sources of our faith that God was implicit in the entire process, and we are of the same mind. We do not live in a godless universe. The technique of the operation we are discovering by every fresh adventure in the realm of scientific investigation. But the fact of the divine workmanship is an element in the story which is evermore accepted as valid by the reverent student. It is merely a difference of emphasis. The expert puts stress upon the physical laws and forces which he perceives working today to produce the result. He says nothing of God's part, because it is less apparent than the material facts. But the man of faith, like the writers of the Bible, is convinced that God's part is the more important, and he puts his emphasis at that point. There is no controversy between the two. The world of the man of faith is a world of physical laws, but these laws are only ways in which God works, and the result is a supernatural universe, in which God has the last word.

It is the privilege of all who are sensitive to the religious values of life to affirm with confidence their belief in the supernatural. By this they will not necessarily mean the miracles of the Bible. Those narratives will stand or fall in accordance with their credibility in the light of the science and criticism of the inquirer. But the reality of the divine presence and program in the world is not subject to any of the limitations met in these lower realms. The man of this age may be less bold in affirming the divine cooperation with him, but he is not deceived as to the actual experience. He may not see, as did Elisha's servant, the celestial help at hand in moments of trouble; but in his heart he knows that the mountains round about are full of the chariots of God. Moreover, in the final event he knows that the great miracles of the scriptures are true. He knows that God is evermore working, as Jesus said, in the creation of new heavens and new earth in which shall dwell righteousness. He knows that the life of Christ is no fable old, or mythic lore, but the most real and the most marvelous fact in history, the incarnation of the life of God in terms of flesh and blood. He is not able to understand all the mystery of the victory of Jesus over death, but he knows beyond all doubt that the early church built its faith on the assurance that the Master was alive forevermore, and that his presence and leadership is the vindication and pledge of the life that is life indeed.

It is in these great assurances, far above the level of any works of wonder, that the faith of the Christian reposes. He knows but little of the universe as yet. Science is slowly and painfully spelling out the vast secrets of its making and destiny. But he knows that the most precious thing in it is the soul of man, that the achievement of likeness to the Lord is the supreme adventure, and that the power to attain this consummation is no human device, but the winning of the complete good through cooperation with the Master of all life. To be conscious of this achievement, at any point along the great ascent to perfection, is to prove the ever-present power of the Highest, and to enjoy full proof of the supernatural.

A Christmas Stocking

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THE daughter of the daughter of Keturah spake unto me, saying, Grandpa, Christmas is coming.

And I said, Already have I been reminded of that fact.

And she said, I shall hang up my Stocking, and I know there will be something in it from Grandpa and Grandma.

And I have a suspicion that she is correct in her expectation.

Now when I was her age, I believed in Santa Claus, but the children of this generation outgrow their illusions sooner than did we. And she hath given up Santa Claus for Grandpa, and it is not so bad a trade at that.

And we sat and talked about the Christmas Stocking, and all that it shall hold.

And I said unto Keturah, and likewise unto the daughter of the daughter of Keturah:

Life is a Christmas Stocking. It is long and deep. It yieldeth not all its riches at the first, but its benefits must be taken out at the top, one by one. The Bag of Candy in the toe, and the big red Apple in the top have between them all manner of good things, which must be taken out.

We are all children, and we seek too often to live life all at once, but we cannot do it. The good God who giveth life unto us permitteth us to take out its joys and sorrows only one by one. They are not all alike, and some of the Prettiest are most Disappointing. The Little Woolly Sheep that cryeth Ba hath a bellows that breaketh soon. The Patent Top that singeth is so ingenious that it doth seldom spin. The gains of life bring with them their Inevitable Solemnities. The Stocking itself is not wholly gay in its color, and there be some who say it is black. But Christmas cometh and goeth, and other days come, and there is something always to pull out of the Stocking of life, and I have found much more that is glad than sorrowful.

Wherefore do I say unto the daughter of the daughter of Keturah, and unto all the sons and daughters of men:

May joy be yours in the possession of great Christmas gift of Life. For every man who is born hath his own birthday as it were a Christmas, and the angels sing above him their song of welcome and good will. And every man hath his long Stocking of life, with its presents stuffed in, one upon the top of the other. Take life as it cometh, for there is no other way in which it can be taken. Thou canst not take out life's blessings from the farther end, nor hast thou strength or wit enough to rip them out of the middle. Take them patiently out of the top, and enjoy them, one by one. And if there be those that seem not joyful, even of them do thou make the best, for these have their value in the long Stocking of life's Diversified Experiences. And on the day when gifts are numbered and exchanged, and faith is renewed in Santa Claus and his far scattered family, may yours be the full, rich joy of all the good and blessing which thou canst take out of what God hath stuffed into the Stocking for that day.

Yea, and Keturah, who on this day gathereth her children and her children's children about her, earnestly desireth for each one of you, a very Happy Christmas.

Dead Kingdoms

WHAT worth are empires and the pride of kings,
The spell of courts and conquest's tinseled fame?
What can avail the glory of a name
Far-echoed, borne aloft on magic wings?
Where is proud Caesar now? His legions lie
Fast-frozen to the tombs of things forgot;
And Caesar, when his bones were left to rot
Began his spirit-march to infamy.
He slew his thousands in a gory flood,
And countless millions curse his lordly might.
He taught the world to war, and endless night
Impends for Caesar and his men of blood.
He built a kingdom, came to great renown,
But Time and Love have torn his kingdom down.

Witnesses

THE centuries, since Christ to earthland came,
Are all aflame
With his fair fame.

The nations that have fallen in decay
In sad tones say,
"His is the way."

In this dark age of turpitude and blight,
Out from the night
Shines clear His light.

Life Is a Feast, They Say

LIFE is a feast, they say:
Yet millions of people are born hungry and die hungry—
And, dying, wonder why they ever had to live.

Life is a feast, they say:
Yet millions of women pass their years
Without seeing a country road or a field of clover.

Life is a feast, they say:
Yet millions of children, having glutted their eyes before a bright-colored Christmas window,
Must go home, heart-hungry, to a dark corner of a black wall, by Tenement Alley.

Life is a feast, they say.

Winter Harvest

WHEN summer days were here
And earth was arched with blue,
My heart was filled with fear,
My head was crowned with rue.

But now that winter reigns,
Despoiled each flower and tree,
I count the summer's gains,
And joy abides with me.

Christian Missions and Imperialism

By Tyler Dennett

THE Christian missionary proceeds on the theory that the political conditions which are most favorable for his work are the best for the country in which he labors. Wherever, as in India or now in China, missionary and religious freedom is voluntarily maintained, he is an ardent supporter of the government. Elsewhere, as in French colonies, in British South Africa, in Korea, and in the near east, where the policy of the government reveals itself as opposed to the utmost missionary freedom the missionary is in an awkward position. Although he is inclined to distrust ecclesiastical democracy and seldom extends autonomy to the native church as rapidly as the converts desire, he is in matters of politics a thoroughgoing democrat and it is very difficult for him to sail under any other colors or to sail under no flag at all.

Most of the missionary work of the last hundred years has been done under unfavorable political conditions. The first missionaries in the far east encountered the very active opposition of the British East India Company. China was not really free, politically, for missionary work until the establishment of the republic. In Korea there was always political opposition from one quarter or another, from China, from Russia, and then from Japan. Wherever the French flag has flown the American Protestant missionary has not been made fully welcome and from large areas he has been, and still is, entirely excluded. In Latin America there has been similar opposition and for similar reasons. From the near east the missionary would long ago have been expelled but for the steady support which he has received from his government. While many missionaries have been discreet enough to conceal the fact, it has been none the less true that wherever the missionary encountered political conditions unfavorable for his work he has been, deep down in his heart, an insurgent against the existing government. He could not conscientiously be loyal to a reactionary political regime, and when the revolution started as it usually did start some day, it was the radical who was likely to feel that he had the actual sympathy, concealed though it might be, of the missionary. When the existing government was weak the missionary often sided openly with the revolution, and where the old government was so strong that he could not do this with impunity he was very likely to become an advocate of political intervention. It is very difficult for an American missionary to resist the conclusion that if only the stars and stripes could be raised over the land of his labors the kingdom of God would thereby be greatly advanced.

MANDATE AND INTERVENTION

The enthusiasm with which a large missionary constituency in the United States advocated an American mandate over Armenia, and the recent demand for American intervention in the near east do not stand alone in history. The full force of this question of the relation between Christian missions and imperialism does not break upon us until we study these most recent expressions in the light of the many which have preceded them.

In China the missionaries were without any rights whatever until 1844. They carried on their work, what little there was of it, by a subterfuge which was winked at by the local officials. They allowed themselves to be listed as clerks in the American hongs. Until 1858 they were without legal right to live or labor outside the five ports, although they defied the law and began missionary work in the interior during that time. Religious toleration was enforced upon the Chinese government in the treaties of Tientsin (1858) but after the Tientsin massacre (1870) the imperial government would have removed all missionaries from the interior if it had dared to. For more than half a century the missionaries waited for the collapse of the Manchu government and patiently sowed the seed which was the seed of revolution as well as the seed of the gospel. They hailed the Chinese revolution with joy. When Yuan Shi Kai, whose hostility to the missionaries had expressed itself for a decade in Korea, attempted to found a new dynasty, the missionaries worked to thwart his plans. They hailed the next revolution with approval. It is not too much to say that the entire weight of missionary influence in China has been thrown against any government which has threatened to be unfavorable to the prosecution of their work. Even the integrity and the sovereignty of China have, historically, been subordinated by the missionaries to the demand for missionary liberty.

MISSIONARIES AND THE REBELLION

The Taiping rebellion arose about twenty years after the first American missionaries arrived at Canton. The rebellion, as will be remembered, assumed a quasi-Christian character. The rebel chief drew his first inspiration from the tracts of a Christian colporteur; he subsequently spent several months in a mission school and was an applicant for baptism; and about 1860 his former teacher, the Rev. Issachar J. Roberts, abandoned for the time his missionary labors and became the minister of foreign affairs in the rebel capital at Nanking. About 1853 almost the entire body of Protestant missionaries in China was committed to sympathy with the rebellion and they wrote home such glowing accounts of the new Christian movement that a substantial constituency was created at home which advocated the political recognition of the rebels. The American government was prepared to make a treaty with the Taipings and viewed without concern the possibility of the breakup of the Chinese empire into several fragments. The missionaries would appear to have viewed the integrity of the Chinese empire as much less important than the liberty to extend their work under the support of a new and progressive government. Only slowly did they come to realize that their faith in the Taipings had been misplaced and that China even under corrupt and impossible Manchus was better off than it would have been divided and under warring rebel factions. We can now see very clearly that had the rebels been recognized in 1854 in all probability within another score of years the Chinese empire would have resolved into a group of French, Russian and British colonies.

While this possibility of the dissolution of the empire loomed largest it was the Rev. Peter Parker, M. D., the first medical missionary to China, subsequently the diplomatic representative of his government, who rejoiced in the raising of the American flag over Formosa where it flew for a year. He it was who labored most zealously to have his government annex the island. The records of Dr. Parker's efforts, all of them printed by the government just as he wrote them, are among the most perfect expressions of budding imperialism to be found in any political literature. Although unsupported by any important commercial interest Dr. Parker rushed ahead, painting in glowing colors how the missionary would thus find a new opening to win cannibals to civilization, and wrote: "Great Britain has her St. Helena, her Gibraltar and Malta in the Mediterranean, her Aden in the Red Sea, Mauritius, Ceylon, Penang and Singapore in the Indian ocean, and Hongkong in the China sea. If the United States is so disposed and can arrange for the possession of Formosa, England certainly cannot object." As for the Chinese government, Dr. Parker did not feel that it had any rights at all in the matter.

CHINA COWED INTO SUBMISSION

Dr. S. Wells Williams was of a less emotional type than Dr. Parker. He has not been swept off his feet by the Taipings. Throughout his long service as a diplomat he had a fine regard for the integrity and the sovereignty of China. And yet it was Dr. Williams who wrote the article into the treaty of Tientsin by which the Chinese government was compelled to grant religious toleration and to open the empire to missionary work. When he returned to Shanghai he found that many missionaries were disappointed that he had not insisted upon even further concessions. This achievement has uniformly been recorded to the credit of Dr. Williams and the American Christian people have taken great pride in having prepared him for the service of his government. But when we look back upon the following sixty years of American relations with China we may seriously question whether the kingdom of God was really advanced when China, cowed into submission, was compelled to grant this concession. That same year Townsend Harris made his famous treaty with Japan and there was no toleration clause in it. In the next forty years Christian missions in Japan advanced far more rapidly than they did in China, and at the end of the century there was in Japan a sounder, abler, and more effective Christian constituency than there was in China. I am inclined to believe that the toleration clause in the treaty of Tientsin hindered rather than helped the missionaries and it is undeniable that its exaction was a smashing blow at the sovereignty of the empire.

The subject of religious toleration was ignored in the American treaty with Korea in 1882, but a clause providing for missionary work was inserted in the British and German treaties the following year. Some of the Koreans welcomed the missionaries, but with mixed motives. There were three political parties in Korea: a pro-Chinese party, a Pro-Japanese party, and a group led by the king who sought effective Korean independence. Of these parties the king's group was probably the weakest and the most corrupt. Li Hung Chang, instigated by Great Britain, who feared Russia, sent Yuan Shi Kai to Seoul to bring about the annexation of the peninsula to the Chinese empire. Yuan Shi Kai met with the solid opposition of the missionaries who could not view with indifference the establishment in the peninsula of conditions as unfavorable to their work as those existing under the Manchu regime in China.

POLITICAL ZEAL OF MISSIONARIES

The missionaries thus endeared themselves to the king. The more determined the missionaries were to hold their ground, the more energetic became the efforts of Yuan to have them expelled from the country, and the more fatuous became the hopes of the king, wholly without basis in the American treaty, that in time the American government would assume over him a protectorate which would none the less leave him free to pursue his vicious career. This is a very delicate subject in missionary circles and the writer would not like to be unjust to anyone, but from a very close study of all the records it would appear that the political zeal of the missionaries in the end greatly added to the sum of Korean woe. Although repeatedly warned and exhorted by their government to restrain their sympathies they plunged wildly forward and not a few of them appear to have been working to create a situation which would justify American intervention. It is probably not unjust to say that the establishment of an American protectorate over Korea would have been hailed with joy by most missionaries and accepted with complacency by a large American missionary constituency.

In the Hawaiian Islands the course of missionary policy was even more clear. There they took almost a complete control of the government at times and they did not hesitate to demand the political intervention of their government when their efforts were in danger of being thwarted. They usually received the desired support. When the islands were annexed in 1898 political and economic forces were very strong, quite sufficient to have brought about the annexation if no missionaries had ever gone there, but it cannot be denied that the missionaries were the very willing agents of American imperialism in the Pacific.

The retention of the Philippines was due to a variety of political and economic causes, but most important was the determination of President McKinley. When he decided to hold the islands he counted on the support of the missionary constituency whose representatives had hitherto been denied admission to the islands by a hostile Spanish government. His hopes were not disappointed and Professor J. H. Latané, one of the best authorities on this period of American history, enumerates the support of the religious press and the churches as one of the four factors which carried the day for McKinley.

PROTECTION FOR CONVERTS

An American mandate for Armenia, American intervention in the near east: how welcome such a policy would be to the missionary and to his unhappy outraged converts. The reasons which urge it are not new. Indeed they are so old that they are very alarming. The truth of the matter is that if we accept as sound the principle that the government which is most favorable to Christian missions is the best for the country in which the missionary labors, then the missionary is very likely to become, as he has in the past, a commissioner for American intervention, American annexation, or perhaps of domestic revolution in more than half the world. It has been the French political protectorate of Roman Catholic missions in the far east which more than anything else has brought these missions into disrepute. The application of the principle of intervention for the protection of missionary work often eventuates in efforts to bring in the kingdom of God with a sword, and always delivers the missionary into the hands of the imperialist. The principle is jesuitical and even mohammadanesque.

I realize that I have reached a merely negative conclusion. It is not easy to state the positive corollary. It will always be difficult for an American to send back the slave to his master and to return the woman to her former place under the heel of her husband but such actions are, when viewed in their consequences, as the beatitudes themselves when compared with the consequences of political intervention in the defense of every Christian minority.

CHINA'S WELFARE

Since the close of the war we have witnessed notable new efforts on the part of the churches to express the sentiments of American Christians in international affairs. Undoubtedly this comes in response to a popular demand, but it would appear that much of this effort has suffered from misdirection. At a critical stage in the proceedings of the international conference in Washington last winter when the American commissioners were seeking against heavy odds to approximate a little nearer to justice for China, the White House was snowed under with the memorials of church people demanding disarmament. In the face of these petitions—there were no less than 11,642,685 of them—Japan, France and Great Britain took heart and stubbornly refused to make further concessions in favor of China. They knew that even though the causes of future wars were not removed the American people were demanding disarmament and the President did not dare to return to his people empty handed. Within another twelve months comes a demand that the American government intervene in the near east, and so harrowing were the conditions which stimulated the demand that for the moment there was real danger that American protestant Christians would be stampeded to support this program. "The dove of peace has grown spurs," remarked a certain cynic.

Meanwhile the congressional elections were coming on and the paramount issue was made to appear to be prohibition. Was there any attention at all given to efforts to invigorate American political institutions, notably the morally and intellectually effete United States senate which, after all, is the constitutionally created body through which it was expected that American public opinion would express itself on foreign affairs? In these recent efforts to make helpful contributions towards the solution of international tangles we believe that the American church is attempting to reap where it has not sown and that the education of public opinion and of the churches must go back to fundamental concepts, one of the most important of which is that the kingdom of God has never been prospered by the armed intervention of one nation in the affairs of another. Furthermore, it is by no means always true that the government which restricts or refuses missionary liberty ought therefore to be overthrown and replaced by one more hospitable to Christian converts and missions.

A Great Scholar and Teacher

By Edward Shillito

GEORGE BUCHANAN GRAY died without any warning at Oxford on November 3. He was attending a theological board when he suddenly fell from his chair and died. He was fifty-eight years of age and in the maturity of his powers so that the loss to British scholarship will be grave. Dr. Gray was without question one of our leading Hebraists; he had published classical commentaries upon Numbers and Isaiah; when Dr. Driver left his job unfinished, Dr. Gray took up the work; he had written also upon Hebrew names and upon the poetical rhythms in Hebrew; his little book upon "The Divine Discipline in Israel" was an admirable example of his power to handle his subjects, so that the unlearned could understand. He had indeed a rich harvest of published works.

In Oxford every honor was given to Gray which it was in the power of the university to bestow. It could not have chosen him to succeed Dr. Driver because that chair is reserved for scholars "in orders," and Gray was trained for the Congregational ministry and remained in that calling to the end. But though the possibility of such an honor was denied to him, he ranked in Oxford among the really great scholars, and Oxford knows a scholar and honors him. There he spent all his days from the time when he came up from New College, London, to Mansfield College, then in its early days. For thirty-one years he taught in his own college; to it he gave a devotion and loyalty beyond price. Among the many gifts for which that young foundation had reason to be thankful, was the service of this scholar who was great as a teacher as he was great in scholarship.

But when some of us remember Gray, our teacher and friend, we know that there is much which will escape the public notices, and indeed any notices. Mansfield College is a young society still, and its men remain a body of friends with certain common meeting-places of memory to share. One such common joy was the friendship of Gray. Generations of us sat in his classroom; but the secret of Oxford does not lie in classrooms. There is often a relationship between tutor and students quite unlike anything merely formal. They work together as friends; they talk over subjects with complete frankness; they boat and play tennis and tarry late over their coffee—it was tea in this case—and when the hour to go down has come, they can always look forward to a welcome from their old friends who remain on the spot. Such a welcome was always waiting in Gray's home.

This was true in our day and remains true of Mansfield. When I went up to Oxford, Gray was a comparatively new teacher; we were all of us young in those days; the college was young but already proud of its first-born and proud of its principal Fairbairn. We found ourselves members of a brotherhood, not separated into two groups, tutors and students, but united in the love of sacred learning and in the desire to become ready for our calling.

To us Gray became a true guide; he had a supreme devotion to the things that were true; he shirked no problems; he had one purpose, to make us enter into an understanding of the Bible which would not give way beneath our feet. There was no gush or demonstrativeness in his friendship; it was simple and unaffected and lasting. He had a great fund of humor and was a sworn enemy of all that was pompous, or unreal. A more critical mind it would be difficult to meet; and yet there went with it a genuine kindliness and an unfailing temper. We used to make fun of his way of dealing with a defective translation, offered by one of us. "That's very good, very good," he would say in his jerky fashion, "but it's quite wrong." The service he did for generations of Mansfield men was inestimable. He was a critical conscience which bade us never seek for emotional side-tracks, but face the real problems of thought in the faith that light will dawn for the upright, however long he may have to wait. A man more disinterested in his love of truth and more devoid of personal ambition, it would be difficult to find.

In his thoughts of the church he remained in sympathy with the old-fashioned Independents. We loved to draw him out upon some modern forms of organized free church life. He took his part whole-heartedly in the service of the churches in Oxfordshire and the village chapels knew him as a simple and earnest preacher. In the wider life of our churches he was little known; his days were spent chiefly in Oxford, days of diligent study, and manifold service to the life of a learned society. Once at least he visited America; but only to make inquiries, when the principalship of Mansfield was still unsettled. I expect he got through the barrage of reporters, unnoticed.

During the Boer war he with so many of our scholars was opposed to the policy of this country. During the great war he was just as certain that his country was in the right; in his own downright way he offered what he had to give and went down the line to Didcot to do any manual work that was going on in that important depot.

The last speech I heard from him was at the Mansfield reunion in the summer. Dr. Hadfield, one of its "old men," had read a paper on psycho-analysis and kindred subjects on which he is a master. Gray, as always, was playing the part of Socrates, putting searching questions and, I think, pleading for the normal man; he was afraid the psycho-analysts paid too much attention to the abnormal. That, too, was like him.

We shall return to an Oxford poorer for the loss of this friend; but he will take his rank in the minds of all who knew and loved him with those in every age who have served sacred learning and in that way have walked humbly with God.

Bethlehem

I

GRAY walls.
Streets astir with weary feet.
Herod's tribute payers coming home.
Tumult of much crowding at the inn.
Stable off the alley.
Cattle fretting sleepily.
A drowsy foal swings front a heavy ear—
His keeper's voice breaks in upon his peace:
"No room at the inn for you."
A torch at the open door.
A vacant stall for one superfluous pair.
A bed of straw.
A tired sob.
Heaven is bending very close.
It settles on the manger crushingly.
Time stands tip toe with expectation.
Stars look on in hopeful awe.

II

Brown hills.
Silence brooding consciously.
Sheep lie quiet where they fall around their cote.
Low voices.
Shepherds musing round a waning fire.
They glance toward Bethlehem.
They fall asleep in their sheep pelts.
The camp fire flickers out
In a thin, lonesome trail of smoke.
Twilight kneels,
Covers her face,
And waits.

III

Dark night.
The city sleeps.
Bethlehem is very kind.
Her inns give comfort to her guests—
All but three.
Night has sealed the eyes of shepherds—
All but one.
Two waking at the manger;
One on the hill.
A miracle of fire hangs low in the sky.
City and hill are flooded with light.
A star of sudden magnitude drops flame into the manger.
The thatch glows with unconsuming fire.
The straw burns like the rising sun.
The sleepy foal stares with big eyes
And stops biting hay.
A member of his lowly tribe
Will one day walk on flowers
With a kingly burden on his back.
The watcher on the hill recalls a prophecy.
Far away three wise men set out upon a journey.
A mother's heart is bursting with joy;
A father is praying.
The air is full of heaven singing in a loud voice.
The city sleeps!
O, Bethlehem! Bethlehem!

The New Preaching

By Joseph Fort Newton

MY audacity in undertaking to discuss such a subject fills me with amazement, as it must strike you with consternation. Yet I am not altogether to blame for it. Some time ago a literary journal asked me to write an article to be entitled, What Has Taken the Pull Out of the Pulpit? After some diplomatic negotiations it was agreed that perhaps a better title might be found, one a little less provoking. When I ventured to suggest that it be called The New Preaching, the editor wanted to know if there is such a thing as a new preaching, and if so, what is it like and who are the new preachers? Is it new in its message, or merely in its method, or in both, and what are the signs of its appearing?

Alas, my qualifications for discussing the theme are few indeed; only one in fact, and that quite accidental. Partly because I had so able a colleague at the City Temple, and partly because so many sermons are preached on week days in England, I heard a great deal of preaching. Returning from England broken in health—broken in heart, too, owing to the abortive peace and the tragic moral demobilization of the world—by the kindness of my church I have not had full duty; and this has given me opportunity to hear preaching in New York. It has been a great privilege, and on both sides of the sea I have heard many kinds of preaching, good and bad, thrilling and ineffective; not much preaching in the older and more stately style, with polished phrases and elaborate homiletic; some pretty, perfumed preaching; some slangy, sloppy preaching; much virile, forceful, interesting preaching, topical, journalistic, often very striking, at times picturesque; very little expository preaching, as in the days of Maclaren and Dale; too much catch-penny preaching, taking up topics of the day in a cheap, sensational fashion; a great deal of wholesome, inspiring, edifying preaching, good to hear and heed; and now and then the haunting notes of a new preaching, of which I beg leave to speak informally, tentatively, and with the utmost frankness. At any rate, my experience has given me a new understanding of the men at both ends of the sermon, the man in the pulpit and the man in the pew. It has also given me a new sense of the worth and power and permanence of the high office and art of the preacher, to celebrate which is my solitary purpose.

PREACHING AND THEOLOGY

By the new preaching I do not mean a new theology—such as we used to invent over night at the City Temple—but the interpretation of the old, eternal gospel of God in Christ in the terms of the thought and need of our day, and its expression in our troubled and complex life as we have to live it. Theology will arrive later, its function being to formulate and set in order the truth wrought out by experience. Meantime, it is plain that something has gone wrong; in all the churches that I have attended the pews are filled, if filled at all, with church folk, or people trained in the tradition of the church. The failure of the pulpit to reform the wicked, to hold the attention of the laborer, to win the respect of the lover of science, to attract the man in the street, is clearly revealed. In a novel which everybody has read, "If Winter Comes," we hear Mark Sabre telling us what is wrong:

> "Hapgood, the remedy's the old remedy. The old God. But it's more than that. It's light, more light. The old revelation was good for the old world, and suited to the old world, and told in terms of the old world's understanding. We want a new revelation in terms of the new world's understanding. We want light, light! Do you suppose an age that knows wireless and can fly is going to find spiritual sustenance in the food of an age that thought thunder was God speaking? Man's done with it. It means nothing to him; it gives nothing to him. He turns all that's in him to get all he wants out of this world and let the next go rip. Man cannot live by bread alone, the churches tell him; but he says, 'I am living on bread alone, and doing well on it.' But I tell you, Hapgood, that plumb down in the crypt and abyss of every man's soul is a hunger for other food that this earthly stuff. And the churches know it; but instead of reaching down to him what he wants—light, light—they invite him to dancing and picture shows, and you're a jolly fine fellow, and religion's a jolly fine thing and no spoilsport, and all that sort of latter-day tendency. Damn it, he can get all that outside the churches and get it better. He wants Light, Hapgood!"

MULTITUDES WANT RELIGION

Must we say, then, that Christianity has failed to give light? No. Has zeal failed? Not at all. Never were zealous church workers more numerous than they are today, and never have they been more discouraged. Is the world more hardened against the influence and appeal of religion? Far from it. If we are not actually suffering from suppressed religion, as some hold, all agree that there is a deep and widespread desire for a personal hold on religious reality. Multitudes of people—many more than we think—want religion, but they do not know how to get it. The chief topics of interest, if we may judge by the press, are sex, personality, religion and sport. The modern novelist deals with sex and religion—human love and divine love. Articles on religion are to be found, as never before, in the daily papers, in magazines, and even in trade journals. People are hungry, confused, astray, adrift, and the church does not meet their need. What is wrong? A recent writer tells of conditions in England, at the same time giving us many hints as to what is wrong:

> Wherever I go, whether in conferences, in trains, in hotels, the one subject that men discuss is religion, and the failure of the churches. That is the attitude of the religiously-minded man-in-the-street toward the churches. Sometime he comes to a service to find out what it is all about, but the service is dull to him, and he goes away disappointed. The fact is, our services have taken a form which only the initiated can understand and enjoy. They presuppose a long training. They are food for an acquired taste. The hymns, music, phraseology and form of service require an expert knowledge which the man-in-the-street does not have. We have become connoisseurs in religion. We are as fastidious about our services as Beau Brummel was about his clothes, and, like him, we have become "arbiters of elegancies." What will be the end of it? I do not know; I only know the end of Beau Brummel: "After three years in drivelling imbecility, he died in a pauper asylum." We call our fastidiousness, reverence; but the world calls it dullness. If we must feed delicately, if we must pamper an acquired taste, can we not confine our fastidiousness to the morning service, and, in the evening, give the man-in-the-street a chance to save his soul by feeding on the Bread of Life? He is hungry, but cannot satisfy himself on our food. It is like offering a navvy afternoon-tea and a conventional "At Home."

ESTRANGEMENT OF YOUTH

Here is something to ponder, if we do not wish the church to be simply a group of nice, gentle, refined folk playing a little private game, and getting satisfaction out of it, without reference to the rest of the community. Surely we cannot be content to have it so. Hardly less distressing is the estrangement of so many of our young people from the church, and especially the young folk in our colleges and universities. They go from the village church to the university, where they are trained in the newer point of view and way of thinking. When they return the church seems antiquated, its gospel remote and unreal. They feel that the pastor is stogy, belated, fossilized, and they are not slow in saying so. The pastor thinks them careless, godless, flippant, irreverent; and too often he falls into a pessimistic and denunciatory tone—like the queen in the fairy story who said, "There was jam yesterday, there will be jam tomorrow, but there is no jam today." It is all wrong, all unnecessary. Lack of insight and understanding is fatal, and may mean the loss to the service of the church of a generation of educated youth. We need a new preaching, such as is now growing and taking shape, which believes in our young people, has the insight to discern behind their fantastic talk the old wistful quest of God, and knows how to interpret their eager, joyous, aspiring life in terms of the everlasting gospel.

What has happened that the old faith needs to be interpreted anew to a new generation? Why do men think so differently from their fathers, as if they lived in a new world? Why has so much of the thinking of other times become obsolete, not refuted but forgotten, like a dim memory of a previous state of existence? Just what has happened in all other ages, only more so, because of the amazing advance of thought and knowledge. A new universe of law, order and beauty has been unveiled, and the boy at the plough, the child at school, the youth in college, see all things—except religion—in different aspect and relations from those in which their fathers saw them. The sun, the stars, the solid earth itself, the story of the race, its habits of thought and methods of approach, its standards of criticism—all is transformed. All the great realities remain, but they are seen in a new light, against a new background. No wonder the people are bewildered, and if they turn away from the church, it must be because it does not speak to their "condition," as George Fox would say. New ideas are in the air, new vistas dazzle, new hopes allure. Indeed, the new knowledge has advanced so rapidly that the pulpit is perplexed and confused, unable to find its way. In "The Story of a Varied Life," Dr. Rainsford tells how, of a sudden, his old sermons became flat and unusable, because, as he learned when he looked into his heart, "my own idea of God was changing." The new universe has not been interpreted in terms of Christian faith: to blame would be unjust, for the task is very great and very complex. But it must be done, it can be done, and the New Preaching will help to do it.

First, as to the message of the New Preaching. Its message is the gospel of Christ in its creative, conquering, and redeeming wonder; the same gospel that stirred the souls of Francis, Luther, and Wesley—the eternal faith with larger realizations and wider applications to these new and changed times. If we speak of a new preaching, it does not mean, as some seem to fear, that the gospel of Christ is to be truncated, mutilated, and cut to fit the fads and altering fashions of thought in our age—nothing of the kind. Rather, it means that the gospel will show itself today, as in all other ages, able to live and triumph amid vast and unimagined developments of thought and life. Nay, more; the gospel will make the new learning an instrument, not an enemy, transfiguring it with a new splendor. Chesterton may have his fun about "the mindlessness of the modern mind"; but there is a modern mind none the less. As there was a mediaeval mind, so today there is an outlook, attitude, and point of view, the fruit of the Holy Spirit moving among us and within us. It had its origin in the union of four movements so profound that they were like tidal waves in the mind of man. Let me name them:

VARIOUS MOVEMENTS

First, the movement of philosophy which upset the idea of an outside, absentee God, and revealed God in his universe working out his purpose of creative goodwill. Instead of a world made like a watch, wound up and set going, with which God interferes here and there, the modern mind sees God as the life and soul of the world, his will its rhythm, his purpose its reason for being, his presence its sacramental consecration. For a few miracles, hard to grasp, it bids us behold a universe in which all things depend upon the mystery of the infinite will. It is a new setting for the old faith, in which the incarnation is no longer an interpolation in history, but a revelation of the God who is in all history; showing us the realities of religion not only as forces of history, but as facts of the cosmic order.

Second, the movement of historical research which threw men back from external authorities to find the basis of faith, and its verification, in the living experience of things immortal. Jesus, said Matthew Arnold, based everything upon experience; and the modern mind follows his way, knowing that there is no hope save in the experience of the living God, and that in that experience there is nothing but hope. It means the rediscovery of the church, not as a mere authority, but as a fellowship in the freedom and service of the spirit of truth. If the Bible has a new binding, it has also a new beauty, as the monumental witness of the presence in man of the Holy Spirit. In lyric and epic power it speaks of the love and will of God revealed in the life of the people which were of old, whereby we may learn to read his love and will in the facts, forces, events and personalities of our tangled time.

REIGN OF LAW

Third, the movement of science, the revelation of the reign of law as the organized will of God, and of evolution as the Divine way of working. There is no longer any doubt of the truth of evolution; all that is in debate is the method by which new forms of life are produced, whether suddenly by leaps or slowly by minute variations, or both. Nor does it matter; since, if God is in the process, his love its creative genius, his will its rhythm, it is for us to know his way and work with him. It is curious how, when we learn how a thing is done, some one is ready to say that God does not do it; whereas he calls us to be partners and fellow-workers. "I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth; but I have called you friends." Surely the Spirit of God speaks to us in Science, not only in the results of its researches, but in its humility, its austere veracity, its love of truth, no less than in its disinterested and beneficent ministry to body, mind, and spirit.

Fourth, the social movement, the rise and triumph of democracy, the growth of a social conscience and imagination, the increasing sense of human solidarity, making us members one of another, so that the injury of one, however small, is the hurt and horror of all. This vision came as an impulse of the Holy Spirit following the industrial revolution in England, and Maurice, Kingsley and Ruskin were among its early prophets. When Maurice confessed the sins of his age as his own, identifying himself with his fellows in their struggles and sorrows and tragedies, he discovered a new depth in the mystery of the cross. God has tied humanity together, and we can never be happy while others are miserable under injustice, oppression, and inhumanity. At last we begin to see, dimly but truly, the meaning of the great mysticism of Jesus: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

THE MODERN MIND

Where these four movements met and mingled the modern mind had its birth, and it is simply impossible for it to think in terms of the times before. Old things have passed away; all things have become new. It means not only a new point of view, but a new mood, a new spirit, a new method of approach—old truths have a new setting and old words a new meaning. The vision of God as the creative soul of the universe unveils a world of lengthening vistas, cleansing fires, and baptizing dews, in which the Christ stands like the angel in the sun, his personality its master light and interpretation, his words like suns and stars. The appeal to experience makes faith not a cistern, but a fountain; life no longer static but dynamic—a spring with infinite summers in its heart. A universe in which love works by law opens a book of prophecy, making history a scroll of hope and no longer a black bible of pessimism. The new sense of human solidarity asks for a gospel of salvation, and not the mere salvage of a few from the wreck of a divine failure. Thus in every way the old faith broadens, deepens, and grows, by virtue of its creative and expanding vitality, seeking the last vision and the newest task—and he who has a living faith will know that faith in new forms.

Such, in bare outline, is the insight and outlook of the modern mind, and if I have stated it rather starkly, it is from a desire to make it vivid. Agitation is inevitable, but God lives, and no precious thing will be lost, if we are heroic enough to follow him who, on a holy eventide, "made as though he would have gone further." Living, thinking, toiling in the fellowship of the living Christ, we have nothing to fear, knowing that all truth belongs to the God of truth, and that there is no schism between the last found fact of science and the old, deep faiths of the heart. The new preachers do not defend the gospel; they know that it is the gospel that defends us. Their concern is to make Christ known to men, bringing art, literature, and science to his service, showing that he can do for us today what he did for men in the days of his flesh. They know that he stands within the shadow of the world's restlessness, the one abiding reality, in whom "all things hold together," and that in his fellowship men become masters of life and time and death. Aye, they know what the poet meant when he wrote:

> Ah, Christ, it were enough to know
> That, brooding on the unborn things,
> Thou gatherest up the years that go,
> Like a hen's brood beneath her wings.
> The vision holds thee, lip to lip,
> Close to our love and makes thee ours.

Dr. Newton's treatment of The New Preaching will be concluded in another article dealing with the new method of preaching the old gospel.

Christmas in the Open

I WILL find my Christ in the open air
At Christmas morning's dawn,
For all His eternal signs are there,
And man's mean wrappings gone:

The azure bowl of the bending sky
Blue as His garment's fold;
The early breeze with its chilly sigh
Rousing the sleeping wold.

The snow-decked trees are jewels for Him,
His myrrh is the pine-sweet air;
And hearth-smoke rising from chimney's rim
Is incense offered there.

I turn my steps toward the church aglow
With storied windows' light
And feel again on the earth below
The glory of His birth-night.

May you find your Christ in the open air,
At the edge of a snowy plain.
He is nearer you there than anywhere—
His stars and His sky remain!

The Church in Russia

By Paxton Hibben

I HAD just arrived in Riga, coming from two months in Russia. In a shop where a baron of the old régime buys jewelry and finery of his fellow nobles and resells them to tourists at several thousand per cent profit, the baron himself was waiting on me.

"You're just from Moscow? Ah! then you know the dreadful things that are going on there! Executing people every day in great squads—shooting them down in the streets! Terrible! Terrible—isn't it? 1,768,418 people executed by the bolsheviki in four years—official figures. Yes, yes. Those are the official figures—and it is still going on! Terrible! But you saw it yourself, of course?"

Now if the baron had told me that people were being shot in the streets of Rome or executed in batches in Barcelona, I might have believed him. But I had just come from Moscow, and they were executing no more people in Moscow than in New York, and shooting down fewer than in Illinois. Moscow was as orderly as Boston. Yet to all and sundry in Riga, the baron still chatters on with his story of 1,768,418 people executed in Russia in four years since the revolution, and asserts that these are official figures. And unwary newspaper correspondents cable this nonsense to America, and you and I read it at our breakfast tables—and, perhaps, believe it.

On the steamer coming from Ireland to New York I met a Catholic priest from Quincy, Illinois. He knew all about Russia. He had got his information first hand, from a Russian countess whom he had met in Munich.

"The way the bolsheviki hold their power is through the nationalization of women, she explained to me," he said. "They gain over certain men by giving them the women they want, and others they terrorize by threatening to take their wives or daughters from them to nationalize." And he believed it.

I suggested that, as there is now woman's suffrage in Russia, this scheme might conceivably alienate the women voters from the Communist party. But the good father could not be shaken in his belief—was not his informant herself a Russian countess?

IMPOSSIBLE STORIES

When I arrived in New York I picked up on the first newsstand a widely read weekly where I learned that "icons set with gems, frameless pictures from the walls of the Hermitage gallery, and rings snatched from bourgeois fingers" were being sold by bolshevists in Esthonia. "Sometimes by error the fingers came along with the rings," the "Saturday Evening Post" added.

Now I had just quitted Esthonia, and neither rings, fingers, pictures nor icons set with gems were to be had there, save such jewelry as noble emigrés had brought out of Russia with them and were selling piece by piece so that they might continue to live without labor. I had just come also from the Hermitage gallery, and far from pictures being missing from its walls, many paintings previously hidden away in private palaces had been added to public collections. The only art treasures I have heard of being smuggled out of Russia and sold were the two Rembrandts bought by an American a year ago for $1,000,000. But no bolshevist did it. Prince Yusupov, second cousin of the late tsar and the assassin of the priest Rasputin, was the merchant, and so far as the public is concerned, these two Rembrandts have disappeared from view.

It is the same with the church in Russia. I have heard every imaginable story: religion of all kinds is taboo; Christianity must be practised in secret; the churches have been robbed and looted; priests have been slaughtered; those confessing the faith of Christ are in mortal terror of their lives, and so on and so on.

The day I arrived in Moscow I went to visit a friend, and in the apartment just across the court from his quarters a man was ill. All that long afternoon as my friend and I talked we heard the chanting of prayers, caught the odor of incense and across the court saw the priests in full canonicals pass and repass the windows as they conducted their service for the recovery of the sick. As twilight fell, when the service ended, the whole procession descended the stairs and marched across the court and out into the street, led by boys with censors and men carrying the huge icon of the Iberian Mother of God; and as the procession passed down the center of the street, men uncovered and women crossed themselves and traffic halted or turned aside.

RELIGIOUS PROCESSION NOT MOLESTED

Shortly afterwards, I was in the village of Michailovsenka, in Samara, on the Volga. As we drove into town, we met half the population marching across the fields towards the cemetery, following a coffin carried on the shoulders of peasant pall bearers, open to the sky, its lid carried by others behind. A priest accompanied by choir boys with censors and by icons borne in reverent hands headed the procession. Had anyone sought to interrupt or to belittle the ceremony, it would have fared ill with him. But no one dreamed of interfering.

On the feast of the Assumption I attended the service at the great cathedral of the Redeemer, in Moscow. The vast church was crowded far beyond its capacity, and hundreds stood upon the steps, without the immense bronze doors. There are no pews in the cathedral, and men and women were packed in as closely as they could stand. Among them there were countless officers and soldiers of the red army, in uniform, with their women folk and children. Archbishop Antonin, metropolitan of Moscow, conducted the service, wearing a mitre studded with brilliants, and carrying a great cross of gold, that the communicants kissed, reverently. His robes and those of the assistant priests were stiff with gems and embroidery in gold and silver thread. Within the Tsarsky dvery—the royal doors of the iconistas—the huge carved silver Sinai still stood.

Coming as I had from the famine area of the Volga and the Ukraine, it seemed to me that there was still too much magnificence in this ceremony, where a million children are starving today, and save for the help that comes to them from far America, will die before spring. But it was at least plain to anyone that the published stories of the looting of the Russian churches of their vessels and other treasures were a piece with much of the other matter printed about Russia, and quite false. What of its treasures the Russian church had yielded to be sold to aid the starving has been far from reducing the church to simplicity, as yet.

CROWDED CHURCHES

The same day, I went to several churches and monasteries, besides the great cathedral. I should say that every one of the more than three thousand churches in Moscow was crowded. In no city anywhere in the world have I seen a religious festival more strictly observed. Even the food stores were closed and those who had neglected to purchase their bread in advance, fasted perforce. The public markets under the shadow of the Sukharov tower and in the streets in the neighborhood of the Smolensky gate, usually crowded on a Sunday morning, were deserted, and a soldier with rifle slung across his back walked the silent pavements, authority for the suspension of all business in honor of the assumption of the blessed virgin. And over the still roofs of the Russian capital the deep tones of the big bell in the Assumption tower of the Kremlin reverberated like a prayer. Holy Moscow has been Holy Moscow for eight hundred years—and still is.

Throughout Russia, this is today the situation of the church, as one sees it who goes about villages, towns and cities with eyes open. Yet on June 8, last, The New York Times became sponsor for a Paris dispatch giving in wealth of detail

> "News from Russia of the sacking of churches and the arrest of the clergy, followed by dispatches reporting the violation of the tombs of all Russian saints and rulers by bolsheviki in frantic search for treasure with which to keep up their tottering regime. The work of desecration was carried on with fiendish glee by the bolsheviki as if the bloodlust against the ruling class which already has claimed a million lives could not be satisfied until the bodies of the dead were insulted and maltreated."

That a dispatch of this patent absurdity and evident propaganda character could find space in a newspaper of the standing of the Times seems almost incrediable; yet it is perhaps no more so than the wide circulation which has been given the fantastic figure of 1,768,418 people—over one thousand a day for four years—alleged to have been executed by the bolsheviki in the course of the Russian revolution. If this were true, it would mean that in every city in Russia having a population larger than that of Schenectady, New York, or Duluth, Minnesota, one hundred individuals had been shot daily, every day for four years, or that the entire population of fifteen such cities had been wholly wiped out! Had this comparison occurred to the copy reader who passed this silly story for publication in the Times, it is not credible that it could have been published; it seems even less likely that those who read this figure in the Times could accept it. Yet I have been asked again and again since my return from Russia whether this absurd figure of those alleged to have been executed in Russia is correct!

As a matter of fact, during the four years following the Russian revolution in November, 1917, fewer than 15,000 persons have suffered the death penalty for all reasons, in Russia, or, in proportion to population, about the number of those in the United States who annually lose their lives in automobile accidents. Even 15,000 is unquestionably a formidable number, and I am far from defending it. Nevertheless it is worth recording that o the 9,641 individuals executed under martial law during the first two years of civil war (1918-1919), 2,600 were ordinary criminals, bandits, drug sellers, dishonest communists, and persons guilty of murder, arson, rape and other offenses for which individuals are not usually mollycoddled in any land. It may be worth noting also that the communist rising in Paris in 1871 cost the lives of over twice as many individuals as were executed in Russia during the entire period from November, 1917, to date.

THE DEATH PENALTY

It is significant that the Paris dispatch to the New York Times which I have quoted was sent broadcast at the precise moment that the "Cult Pro-Soviet"—the church reform committee—of which Archbishop Antonin of Moscow is president, began its work "to give the church a creative and dynamic character" in Russia, to which end the first convention of what was termed "the living church" was called in Moscow for August 6, last. I was present at this convention, which 150 clerical delegates attended, including representatives of the "free Russian church" in America. Much of the work of the convention was formative, naturally; and there was displayed a radical tendency that Archbishop Antonin, in talking with me afterwards, deprecated.

"They want to go too fast," he said. "They are so anxious to eradicate abuses that they forget to build up, too—and what the church in Russia needs today is revivification."

Nevertheless, certain long strides were taken towards effective reform. The recommended conversion of all monastaries into hospitals, homes for "famine orphans" of whom there are a million and for the aged, and into cooperative workshops, to one familiar with the millions of acres of land, property of monastaries, which have lain and still lie uncultivated and unproductive throughout Russia, was an encouraging step in advance, whether or not the convention's general condemnation of monasticism and celibacy of the higher clergy meets with unchallenged favor with the Christian church outside of Russia. Perhaps the greatest weakness of the Russian church has been the gradual creation of a "priest caste," formed of the sons of the "white clergy"—the parish priests—educated in turn to the priesthood, without regard to the need for recruits to the ministry. In spite of reform measures calculated to remedy this evil, the excess of priests and monks over the needs of the people was marked in Russia in the old days, and in order to attach this potent element more securely to the imperial government of Russia, it became a matter of policy on the part of the state to stimulate the erection of churches far beyond the ability of the people to support, and so to build up a vast class of idle clergy bringing the priesthood generally into contempt as drones and drains on the meagre resources of a poverty-ridden population.

PEASANT ESTIMATE OF CHURCH

As I flew into Russia by aeroplane from Berlin, I was struck again, in every village we passed over, with the fact that the church alone stood out in disproportionate magnificence amid the squalid poverty of the huts of the people; with the vast untilled estates attached to the monasteries, and above all with the enormous number of resplendent edifices devoted to worship in towns of a population scarcely sufficient to support one or two churches. The Russian peasant is 85 per cent of the population of Russia; he is canny, hard-fisted and astute to the point, frequently, of sharp bargaining. For all his ignorance and the resulting superstition which has clouded his life hitherto, the Russian peasant knows the difference between industry and laziness even in his priests, and between reason and extravagance, even in his church. To him the village priest was often merely an idle, worthless incubus on a hard-working population, and a gorgeous cathedral, new-built in a town crushed by poverty, merely an incitement to resentment against the church.

In the old days, the Russian peasant might and indeed did think these things; but he scarcely dared to say them, especially under a rule of such over-emphasized piety as that of the late Tsar Nicholas. Today, however, he may both think and say these things—and he does so with very little reticence. The result has been most salutory for the petty clergy, without in the least injuring the fundamental Christianity of the peasants. The latter have simply come to differentiate between God and his ministers.

"What do you think of the church?" I asked many Russian peasants. Their answers were many, of course; but they all tended in one direction:

"I believe in God, but not in the priests," some put it; "they are good-for-nothings, who eat and do no work."

"I need no church," another said. "I have an icon in my heart."

It is to millions of this simple faith in Russia that the "living church" movement appeals—and upon whom it, and indeed Christianity itself, depends.

British Table Talk

London, Nov. 28, 1922.

ANOTHER of the men responsible for the Irish treaty ended his stormy life when Erskine Childers was executed last week by the authority of the state which he had helped to form. It is true that he went over to the rebels and as a republican renounced his part in the new nation, but much of his early work lives. This may be the irony of his life that he was put to death by a power which he as much as any man helped to create, and when the rebellion for which he died has spent its force, the state which he labored for years to create and afterwards renounced, will still be living. The general feeling in this country is one of sympathy with the Free State in its desperate struggle with lawlessness, and at the same time one of sincere admiration for the idealism of such a man as Childers. Once more in the story of Ireland there has been a sheer and wanton waste of that idealism, by which alone a nation can live. When we remember the men executed after the Irish rebellion of 1916, men like Pearse and Plunkett, and afterwards when we think of Collins, and now of Childers, there does seem to be a perverse power at work, turning the noblest in man to destructive and deadly ends. Why is it there is in the human heart so much wilfulness, mixed with the noblest idealism? Childers died as a rebel but his last words were words of strange nobility. He was a brave man to whom this country owes much; when the first great air-raid over Cuxhaven took place, it was Childers who led the flight.

The Unemployed

There are 1,400,000 insured workers unemployed today, that is, 12 per cent! In some industries the percentage is larger; in building 15.9, other works of construction, 21.4, engineering 21.9, iron and steel 25, and shipbuilding 36.3. These are all insured, that is, a man receives 15 shillings and a woman 12 shillings per week. Where a man is married, he has an allowance of 5 shillings for his wife, and 1 shilling for each dependent child. But since rent in a large town takes 8 to 10 shillings, there is not enough left and the workers have to resort to the Guardians for aid—a course which is regarded still as a humiliation. Every day a man is out of work impairs his efficiency and threatens his character. Under such conditions, it is not surprising that there have been great demonstrations of the unemployed in London. The government has announced its determination to do something; Lord Montague has suggested a great scheme for making and mending roads. Something must be done. In France there are a mere handful of workers unemployed—in this country, one out of every eight!

The New Parliament

It is too early to foretell what the new parliament will be like in character and atmosphere, but already the leader of the Labor party has stepped into his rightful place. A few years ago there were a number of men soundly hated in this country because of their critical attitude toward the war. Most of them are back in the house, and one of them leads the opposition. Rumor has it that the most learned of all the Labor members, Mr. Sidney Webb, will not prove its most effective speaker, but Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is a man of first-rate gifts, both as a thinker and a speaker. Reform in the Divorce Laws

The case of Mrs. Rutherford has revived the demand for reform in the divorce laws of this country. Mrs. Rutherford finds herself married to a homicidal lunatic who is shut away for the rest of his days. She cannot prove that he was unfaithful and she must still regard herself as married to him till the end of his days. Two former Lord Chancellors, Lord Birkenhead and Lord Buckmaster, have spoken and written in most powerful and moving language about such a case. It is not that they are pleading for any wide extension of the law, but for such a modification as would include among the grounds of divorce permanent lunacy or deliberate and persistent desertion. Lord Buckmaster is scornful of the argument brought in from the mystical union of Christ and the church. He writes in The Times:

"A woman recently came before the courts, four of whose ribs had been kicked in by her husband with as little ceremony as you may batter in the four panels of a door. It shows how wise our parents were when, relying on the literal interpretation of scripture and in ignorance of anatomy, they gave a woman one more rib than a man. She needed it. If the husband of this woman is an example of conjugal fidelity, or if he has merely deserted her and will never return, the law binds her to him for life, though it is true she may obtain a judicial separation, for which even the most patient investigation of the scriptures can find no authority at all. I ask myself what this symbolizes. To me it symbolizes rank brutality, and the law is as brutal as the deed."

Two Standards

The problem of divorce law has raised again the painful and yet obvious fact that in this country there are many who accept the Christian faith and many who reject it or are indifferent to it. The church has a perfect right to say to those who seek to be married with its sanction that the laws of Christian marriage are this or that; and it may rightly refuse to unite in holy matrimony those who will not accept the conditions. But marriage is also a civil rite. Can the Christian community justly say to all the members of the nation, "Some of you do not believe in our gospel, it is true; but all of you must obey its law of marriage!" Quite clearly there are two standards in being. The problem is how to secure for the church its authority over its own members, without giving to it a power of coercion over those who are not its members. One thing grows clear; if the church is not to bring itself into contempt, its ministers will have to see that the bride and bridegroom really derstand, before the day of marriage comes, what a solemn they are taking. At present when all and sundry can be in church, in many cases without any serious thought farcical to use the sacred words of holy writ about The mystical union between Christ and his church ly discerned in weddings like these.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Follow Me*

We have finished the first half of a six months' study of Jesus. Today we pause not to pile up our facts, but to ask ourselves what we think of Jesus, how well we know him and how deeply we love him. We need quiet hours when, in our hurly-burly lives, we may face these fundamental questions. Our attitude toward Jesus is the only thing that counts—the only thing.

One Sunday last summer I worshipped in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York. Robert Speer was the preacher. Twenty-five years ago, at Northfield, he first cast his spell over me, in an address on "Remember Jesus Christ." Afterward it appeared in book form. Clearly this masterful speaker lifted the Saviour above all theologies and riveted our attention upon the person of Christ. I can recall that epoch-making speech, as though it were yesterday. Remember Jesus Christ—not so much the facts about him. Jesus meets every age. Remember him in boyhood, youth, maturity and age. He understands. Jesus sympathizes with us and understands us in all temptations. He was tempted like as we are. Remember Jesus when you are tempted. Remember him in disappointment and sorrow. Keep close to the person of our Blessed Lord. So last summer I went to hear Robert Speer again. He rose to speak, the dark hair had turned to gray; years of missionary problems had given a deeply serious cast to the fine face. He announced his text, "Follow Me." How close the thought was to that of a quarter of a century before! It is the secret of his life; it is the mystery of his power; it is the heart of his simple faith; it is the word we need as we close this quarter—"Remember Jesus Christ"—"Follow Me." We must give ourselves body and soul to our Master. Dr. Speer devoted his time in narrating stories of men and women in foreign lands, who, under the influence of Jesus, had done brave, sacrificial and noble deeds. It was challenging to hear these stories. These people, newly carved out of heathendom, with a fresh and vivid experience of Jesus, had done these brave things. We were forced to ask ourselves what things of any value we were doing; what sacrifices we, with our rich back-ground of experience, with our invaluable inheritance of Christian culture, were making. Are we to be distanced by new converts in Asia? How simply, yet how powerfully Dr. Speer showed us what it meant to follow Jesus. What did those early men do? Why, to follow, for them, involved their very bodies. They followed—all there was of them—followed—body, yes, mind, yes, soul, yes—entire life was given. "Follow me"—that is all there is to our religion; it is as simple, as tremendous as that; I must give my all to my Master. We sang a hymn and went out; we were under the spell of the great preacher; we were gripped—held by the big idea—"Follow Me." Moreover we wanted to do that very thing. Some preachers and teachers entertain you—they are the lowest grade; some inform you—they are better; while some few make you want to be better—they are the great teachers and preachers. They win you to that feeling, let it be noted, quite as much by their personality, as by anything they may say. Do you leave that impression? Do you make goodness attractive? Are you succeeding in causing your hearers to follow your Christ? That is the test. There is no lack of clever people—but there is a lack of men and women who make you desire to be Christ-like. Now, there remains one word to be spoken before we close; it is this: a study of modern life reveals the fact that the arch-enemy of consecration is self-indulgence. How weak and selfish the average person is. We cannot deny ourselves, we cannot control ourselves. It is the lesson of denial and of control that the Christian must learn. I always marvel at the Stoics, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius and the rest. The Stoic exercised control for its own sake; the Christian cutivates control for the sake—the glorious sake—of his Master's cause.

Adequate Seminary Training

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I cannot believe that you realize how serious an injustice has been done to the Biblical Seminary in New York by the statement you have published in The Christian Century of November 9, by Dr. Cleland B. McAfee, of McCormick Theological Seminary. Dr. McAfee's wholesale condemnation of Bible institutes as unsuitable places for men to prepare for the Presbyterian ministery, in which he mentions specifically the Biblical Seminary in New York (formerly the Bible Teachers Training School) at the head of his list, and in his statement says: "Not one of these institutions is prepared to educate men according to the full requirement of the Presbyterian church", constitutes a startling indictment, and would be very serious if true. His main objection appears to be to "ordaining men without full (academic) preparation". Whatever may be said of Bible institutes, may I call your attention to the following facts with reference to this institution?

1. "For matriculation in the theological department of the Biblical Seminary, college graduation or its equivalent is required". (Catalog, p. 18).

2. After the most searching examination of the academic standards of the Biblical Seminary, the board of regents of the University of the State of New York, which is generally recognized as the highest educational standardizing agency in America, on July 1, 1916, granted a revised charter to the Biblical Seminary, by which suitable degrees of the University of the State of New York would be conferred upon the graduates of the seminary, including the degrees of S. T. B., S. T. M., and S. T. D.

3. For acceptance as a candidate for any one of these degrees from the Biblical Seminary, the student must not only be a graduate of a Class A college, as classified by the board of regents of New York state, but he must also have prepared for college in a first class high school. These complete records are submitted by us to the board of regents in connection with the matriculation of every candidate, even for the bachelor's degree, as well as for the higher degrees. Dr. Robert L. Kelly, secretary of the Church Boards of Education, recently expressed his belief, in a representative committee meeting, that no other theological seminary in America has such rigid academic requirements for its degrees.

4. The Biblical Seminary requires four years of graduate work before it confers its degree of S. T. B. upon any student. This is one year more than is required by McCormick Seminary or Princeton, or any other Presbyterian theological seminary in America.

5. Students in our theological department, because of these higher standards, are sometimes impelled to go to other theological seminaries in order to secure their bachelor's degrees a year earlier than they can secure them in the Biblical Seminary.

6. The Biblical Seminary has for some time had a working understanding with the officers of New York University, by which credits for the highest academic degrees will be mutually exchanged between these institutions.

7. We have 68 men in our theological department this year. Graduates of this department are preaching with acceptance in the pulpits of thirteen different denominations, including Baptist, Dutch Reformed, Christian, Church of the Brethren, Congregational, Disciples of Christ, United Evangelical, Lutheran, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Reformed Episcopal and United Presbyterian.

8. We have had in our classes as regular students, 833 foreign missionaries of thirty different denominations. Hundreds of these have been missionaries on furlough who had already received both college and seminary training and yet found the work of the Biblical Seminary of great value.

9. During the past two years we have had 135 experienced pastors in active service, come to the seminary for brief intensive courses of one month. These pastors represented 18 denominations and 25 states. The class of 37 of them in July 1921 drew up of their own accord the following testimony:

"We have found the school to be broad in its Christian spirit and orthodox in all of its teaching. The faculty is composed of men and women who are not only efficient, but who know how to teach. The spirit of the student body is like a large family, and the daily life in the school is like that of a Christian home. No Christian worker can find a better school for preparation and help in his chosen field, and no pastor can spend a more profitable season of study than here in this school. Therefore, we most heartily recommend it to Christian workers and pastors everywhere."

Does it not appear that Dr. McAfee's statements in your issue of November 9, need very radical revision, in the face of this recital of facts? In behalf of friendly cooperation among the recognized schools of the prophets, I am, yours very sincerely,

J. CAMPBELL WHITE.

Vice-President, The Biblical Seminary in New York.

DR. MCAFEE'S REPLY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am glad to have the letter of Vice-president White made available for those who read the article to which he refers. The facts which he mentions were familiar to me so far as they appear in the published material of the Biblical Seminary. My reference did not make clear that there is a distinction, both intellectually and in spirit, among voluntary institutions which have set themselves to the training of ministers for the Presbyterian church. Perhaps that should have been indicated, for the facts are undeniable, but one can imagine what might have happened from other quarters! However, I trust my long-time friend Dr. White will not think me unduly stubborn if I maintain my ground in spite of several letters which have come to me about the case. I think an inspection of the catalogue of the Biblical Seminary will show a Presbyterian that the institution, so admirable for many purposes, is not equipped to give men the training which the Presbyterian church requires for its fully prepared men. At least, if it is, then the regular seminaries of this and most other churches are carrying a ridiculous load of equipment. We could not ask a better lay training than can be given there, and I have advised men and women seeking such training to go there in preference to all other institutions, sometimes calling down on myself the criticism of my brethren for doing so when certain other training schools were involved. But, so far as I know, the expansion of the Bible Teachers Training School into a full-fledged theological seminary took place without any request from the Presbyterian church and without the expression of any sense of need for the peculiar phases of training that are magnified in it A careful reading of the literature will suggest also the possibility of something left to be desired in the attitude which men trained there may be expected to take toward their less fortunate brethren in the ministry who have had their training in the defective institutions elsewhere. I gladly recognize the insistent refusal to magnify the divisive "isms" which mark some other institutions; the brethren of the Biblical Seminary can hardly know how glad a multitude of us are for that. It is the sanest and most thorough training school for church workers that I know. I repeat, however, that the Presbyterian church must not look to such institutions for its coming ministry—and that is what I said in the first place.

It Isn't the Right of the Body but the Character of the Body that is Challenged

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

Sir: Let me have audience for a word or two to treat an outstanding problem that has been discussed in your paper since you began it with the "Bad Fundamentalist Strategy" editorial in the November 9th issue and continued through the Buckner case discussion. "Intolerance" was charged against the Fundamentalists in your November 9th issue and it was asserted that a "skulking conservatism" in the Methodist Church ousted Dr. Buckner.

I maintain the following thesis: That everybody has the right to be the judge of the qualifications of its own members This is such a well known principle in fraternal and legislative organizations that no one ever dares think it intolerant when one of these refuses admittance to one person or fires out another. But let the Presbyterian church say who shall be a Presbyterian or the Methodist church say who shall be a Methodist preacher and "intolerance" is charged. Yet if you allow that the Presbyterian and Methodist churches have a right to exist as organizations then you must allow them to judge who shall belong to their own number and who shall preach in their pulpits, else you yourself shall be the intolerant one in forcing your one will on the many.

That is the heart of the matter. In the case of Dr. Fosdick at the Presbyterian church there is a complication in the fact that he is a Baptist preacher and amenable to his own church—if Baptists are amenable to any one, they being a pretty independent crowd around these diggings. But consider a corollary from our proposition in re everybody being the judge of its own members, and that is: "That everybody has a right to be the judge of the things done on its property or in its name. For instance, the First Presbyterian church was built by Presbyterians and held in trust for them and has their name written on it. Then of course the ones who shall judge what preaching is to be done there shall be the one Baptist professor of Union Theological Cemetery or one editor of one paper! I hold this to be the real intolerance. The idea that there is a persecution on foot we feel to be wrong. The great Presbyterian church doesn't care a cent what you or I or any man preaches outside its own pulpits. This is a free country, as Dr. Fosdick very anxiously asserts in his New Knowledge-Christian-Faith Sermon. We have got a right to preach anything we please on the street corners or in our back yards,—or to buy a church building, found a denomination and there preach whatever we please. But as I am not a Presbyterian preacher I do not feel that I have a right to walk into their pulpit and use their name and stamp to promulgate my own gospel. Further let it be understood that by whatever means you do force on an organized body one whom they do not feel to be a part of them, whether you use ridicule or scoffing or political pressure, by so much have you become the intolerant one.

As to the Buckner case, we have simply this old issue. From what the writer has read we judge that the conference "located" Dr. Buckner. I am much more at home with this case than with the Fosdick one, I may well confess, for I also am a Methodist preacher. Methodist conference have always been the judges as to who may be preachers according to the doctrine and discipline of that church. Further than that they do not go.

Now writes one John Josiah Munro from Brooklyn to The Christian Century of November 30, in which he asks a very irrelevant question as to whether anyone ever heard of the learned doctor who draws such crowds to the First Presbyterian Church ever having one convicted of sin or crying out, "What must I do to be saved?" Why Brother John Josiah Munro, whatever put that idea in your head? Who suggested to you as a standard that "By their fruits ye shall know them?" You are out of date, Brother Josiah. You belong to an extinct species. The true standard of test for one's gospel now is the size of the crowd that attends and the publicity it gets, not how many souls are saved. Oh no! That was the idea once but we have got over all that now. The test of apostolic succession is apostolic success. We shall see, Brother John Josiah, what we shall see.

Funeral Reforms

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I was much interested and inspired by Dr. Lloyd C. Douglas' excellent contribution entitled "Earth to Earth". On every point of the old-time funeral customs which he describes my own memory preserves a duplicate, except in the case of the morris chair to be occupied by the chief mourner. My recollection go back sixty-five years, and the horrors of those occasions to my child mind are still very vivid. One feature of them, which Dr. Douglas does not mention, was the not infrequent custom of kissing the corpse. I have seen children shrink and turn pale under the compulsion. Another grotesque fashion of those years was for the men mourners to keep their hats on while in the church, and also to wear crepe on their hats for a period following the funeral. No grave in those days was lined or ornamented with the relieving ever-green, or drapery of white. Flowers on the casket, or elsewhere, was a thing unknown. A long heavy fold of crepe hung at the door of the home of the deceased. The two or three nights preceding the funeral were observed in the home as a "wake," when several neighbors—often gay young people—sat in the room all night where the corpse lay, with lights burning, refreshments provided for the watchers, and sometimes, according to reports afterward from the complaining family, merriment and kissing as a pastime. The undertaker removed the lid from the coffin in church for the public gaze, at the close of the funeral sermon, and then fastened it down afterward with screws and a screw-driver drawn from his pocket. Later this trying spectacle was partially relieved by the coffin-lid with self-carrying screws, already to be turned. Whether the abolition of these nerve-racking customs is due to the modern funeral director, or to the improved general taste of the public, they are mercifully a thing of the past, and we are thinking more nearly in the cheering words of Him who is the resurrection and the life. It is to be hoped that Dr. Douglas' timely criticisms on certain surviving crudities, if not barbarities, of the general funeral ritual may soon bear fruit. The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church is to be credited for revisions in its burial ritual that are most gratifying. At the funeral of Bishop David H. Moore, in Cincinnati, only seven years ago, Dr. Levi M. Gilbert, editor of the Western Christian Advocate, paused in reading the thirty-ninth psalm, after some of its doleful and pessimistic expressions, to explain that their author did not have the light of the gospel of Jesus, and that we were not thinking of our departed friend in the terms of that ancient day. Also Bishop Earl Cranston, in that same service, said that he hoped the general conference would grow religious enough some day to omit from its use of the ninetieth psalm, in the funeral ritual, such expressions as, "All our days are passed away in thy wrath"; and "Who knoweth the power of thine anger? Even according to thy fear so is thy wrath", etc., and would substitute some of the many beautiful New Testament revelations instead. These bold utterances proved prophetic. Within the next six months the general conference did revise its burial ritual in a most sane and scriptural way, omitting altogether the thirty-ninth psalm, and all of the obnoxious verses of the ninetieth psalm, and also recasting the committal feature, and providing a special form for the funeral of children. If Dr. Douglas will compare the rituals found in the Methodist Episcopal discipline of 1912, with those of the same work in 1916, he will see that his hopes for funeral reforms, from the ministry, are well on the way to fulfillment.

And none too soon! Why should we as Christians dishonor our Lord and Master by repeating thoughts of the ancient Jews on death, or other subjects, where they are not up to the faith and hope of the words of Jesus Christ? Surely we are entitled to the entire heritage of the One who robbed death of its sting, and the grave of its victory.

Portsmouth, Ohio. JOHN COLLINS JACKSON.

An Appreciation

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As one now about knee-deep in his ministry, let me express my hearty appreciation of the series of articles by Lloyd C. Douglas upon the technique of pastoral service. I fail to remember when I have read counsels of more fundamental common sense and genuine helpfulness to the young person just coming to grips with his job and who in the human course of things must at best make many unfortunate errors. Having myself sinned on most of the points in question only increases my appreciation, and my wonder at the casual attention such matters receive in theological curricula wherein the budding neophyte may find ample pabulum as to the law and the gospel, with the social applications thereof, but is left largely to frame for himself his own code of ministerial technique and ethics. May I hope that in due season these articles be compiled in book form? I am sure there must be many others who would welcome such a volume as a friendly monitor to more effective service.

Let me thank you for the many helpful articles and the uniformly fine spirit of The Christian Century. It is a stimulating visitor each week.

We Know One Liberal Who is Not a Unitarian

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Although I cannot agree with your correspondent, John Josiah Munro, in his view of the Bible nor assent to his statement that the ministry of liberals is ineffective, I do think he is right when he says, in effect, that liberals are misfits in the authoritative churches. The religious world stands in need of clean and brave thinking on the part of ministers, but, surely, it requires a ministry that is ethical as well as thoughtful. The churches possessing creeds and confessions are not seeking truth; having it, they dispense it. It is perfectly clear where the confessional churches stand on the doctrines of the deity of Jesus, the virgin birth, the atonement, the physical resurrection and the ascension of Jesus; why, therefore, should those ministers who deny these doctrines continue before the world officially as Methodists, Episcopalians or Presbyterian? It is not for me to impugn the personal honesty of any individual, but I cannot but feel—and I think the laity generally feel—that unitarianism in the bosom and in the pay of trinitarianism is not only confusing but ethically unjustifiable.

An Appeal for Christmas Gifts

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: For many years past, the friends of the Tuskegee Institute have been good enough to share through our various extension agencies, such clothing, books, pictures, cards, etc., both new and old, as they could spare, for needy colored children of the South. Tuskegee Institute will be glad to serve, as in former years, as a distributing center for these gifts, and to place them where they are most needed and will be most appreciated through our various offshoot schools, through Farm Demonstration Agents, Jeanes Fund workers, Movable Schools, etc., we are in close touch with the desolate communities and needy families, as well as with the more prosperous and progressive localities.

We feel that our friends will be glad of the opportunity to contribute their mite towards bringing happiness and Christmas cheer to many homes which otherwise would be quite dreary at the Christmas season. Packages addressed to me at Tuskegee institute will be carefully distributed. Some friends prefer to send money for the purchase of these gifts and in each instance the fund is spent as directed by the donors.

The Colorado Church and Mr. Sweet

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I came home today from the meeting of the ministerial alliance where we had discussed the question of the popular criticism of the church, so much of it evidently based on antiquated ideas, impossible conceptions, and manifest ignorance and misinformation. I pick up your issue of Nov. 30, p 1478 and read the headline, "When the Church Fell Down," I read: "The humiliation of a church sensitive to its social responsibility would be complete in the state of Colorado if there were in that state any such church." Now surely that sounds awful. I find that it is based upon the statement that the almost united church of that state was opposed to the election of William E. Sweet as governor, and that he was elected in spite of such opposition which is supposed to be the humiliating thing. Now to be sure to get the church both coming and going, we are given to understand that Mr. Sweet is himself a prominent and devout churchman and ought to have had the support of the church, instead of its opposition.

In the Congregationalist of Nov. 30, p 697 there is a comment also on the Colorado election. The correspondent is presumably a churchman. He speaks very highly of Mr. Sweet, and favorably of his policies. He mentions that Mr. Sweet had the opposition of "Denver's three leading dailies", and also "several leading ministers went so far as to attack his policies from their pulpits." Now it strikes me that the issue was a long way from being a church issue. That your writer has no warrant at all for telling us that all, or almost all the churches were united against Mr. Sweet. Until I get more information I shall believe that the article in your paper is a quite unjustified attack on the church, and misleading entirely in the impression it would make. I had expected better things of you, thought we have to take it from the irresponsible popular press.

One Hundred Per Cent for the Ku Klux Klan

Rev. James Small of Kansas City, pastor of Hyde Park Christian church, is one hundred per cent for the Ku Klux Klan. His church was filled to overflowing on a recent Sunday when he preached on the klan. Masked figures presented membership cards to the audience, and when they threw the "high sign" from the front of the church, it was answered by many in the audience. The minister justified the klan by an appeal to anti-Catholic feeling. In his view three things threatened the welfare of America, Catholicism, lack of religion, and lawlessness. The newspaper gave large space to his meeting inasmuch as few ministers in Kansas City espouse the cause of the klan, which has been condemned by the resolution of many Protestant church organizations. On the same Sunday that Mr. Small commended the klan, Dr. Fletcher Homan, a Methodist minister of Kansas City, asserted that the klan should secure evidence and present it to the courts rather than take the law into its own hands.

Judge of U. S. Court in China Wins Approval

That the United States Court in China located at Shanghai has won the hearty approval of the Chinese was evidenced by the fact that Judge Lobingier was honored at a dinner recently in which his twenty years of service were recalled. Judge Lobingier has steadfastly endeavored to carry into his judicial service the loftiest Christian idealism, and his service in China has greatly strengthened the Christian cause there. He is a Disciple of the liberal persuasion.

Christian Students Gather at Champaign

The Student Fellowship conference, recruited from colleges and universities in the middle west, gathered at Champaign, Ill., in the Y. M. C. A. building, Dec. 8-10. The topic of major consideration was "America's Need for Christ." That a state university should be the center for a significant gathering of Christian students is a fact to give some pause to those religious people who still speak of the "godless state university." In many state universities of the nation the religious influences are strong and well organized.

Federal Council Favors Admission of Greeks

The refugees pouring from Asia Minor into Greece represent an increase of twenty per cent in the population of Greece, which creates an impossible situation in that country. Ellis Island is full of Greeks and Armenians now who cannot be landed because the immigration quota of these countries is full for this year. The Federal Council of Churches urges federal action to permit an extra number of these peoples to enter the United States this year. The text of their resolution reads: "The Federal Council of Churches urges the administration to take appropriate action to prevent the exclusion of those refugees from Asia Minor and Thrace now at our ports of entry, and to make possible for a short time the admission of a limited number of such refugees, in excess of quota, coming to families who shall guarantee that they shall not become public charges."

Cap and Gown Day at Drake University

The senior class at Drake university has the custom of coming of age by an academic formality celebrated during the autumn, which is called Cap and Gown day. It is the occasion of an address by some visitor, and later festivities such as the class can devise for itself, or the juniors can contrive for its edification. This year the event was impressively observed. Dr. Herbert L. Willett of Chicago was the orator, and spoke on "The Place of the Scholar in American Life". The university is having an unusually prosperous and satisfactory season. Dean Morehouse, of the department of astronomy, is acting president, and is administering the interests of the institution with discretion and ability. The attendance is large, and the prospects brighter than for some time past.

Summarize Protestant Achievements

THE story of the work of united Protestant churches of America during the last twelve months was told at the annual meeting of the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches at Indianapolis last week, which official representatives of thirty great communions with more than 20,000,000 members attended. Other churches were representeed by visitors.

Church leaders regard the last year as one of the most successful in the history of religion in this country. The statistics published show that the war losses have been overcome by practically all religious bodies and that great gains in membership have been made. Church finances in spite of the business depression have improved wonderfully.

A great forward movement has been started towards the Christian ideal of an eventually "warless world" to be attained step by step. The conference on the limitation of armament at Washington is regarded as showing the way. On the other hand, the failure of America to take part and to cooperate in international affairs is regarded as one of the great losses. Practically all the Protestant churches are working for international cooperation.

The churches have been very active in behalf of Russian and near east relief. Much help has been extended to the Protestant bodies in Europe. The near east situation is regarded as critical and the government since the destruction of Smyrna has been urged to take a more active part in bringing about the protection of religious minorities and permanent peace in the near east.

Remarkable progress has been made in evangelism. The development during the last few months, along these lines has been in the cooperation of the churches in conducting evangelistic campaigns, directed by the local pastors and church members. The most notable of these campaigns was in Chicago where there were 37,000 accessions to the churches. The keynote is "Interpreting the Gospel to the Modern Man."

This cooperation is only one of many forms of united practical Christianity in the larger cities. It is being extended to the smaller cities and rural communities. Leaders find that the churches working together can do what they cannot do alone.

Many outstanding men believe that the crisis has come in the temperance movement. The commission on temperance presented a report under the topic: "Prohibition on Trial: What is the Verdict?"

The race problem has been taken up in a constructive way. A commission on international relations, with white and Negro secretaries and members, has been organized. The leaders come chiefly from the south. These men believe that the only solution of the race problem is practical Christianity.

The social service department of the various churches cooperating in the Federal Council's commission on the church and social service have sought to secure the adoption of the principles of Christ in modern industry. Fanatics on both sides have criticised its work but marked progress has been made in securing the acceptance of Christian principles in industry.

A more adequate program of Christian education through cooperation has been planned. This has been regarded as one of the weak points of church work in this country.

During the year the Federal Council has made available for the papers of the country news stories relating to cooperative movements and actions by churches. This material has been widely used not only in this country but also by papers in Great Britain, in France, in Germany, in Switzerland, in Czechoslovakia, in Italy, in China and Japan, in India, and in South America. Church leaders have declared that the press of the country is a tremendous force for good and the experience of the last year has demonstrated the desire of the papers to publish news of the churches when it is made available.

A MESSAGE FROM THE HEAD OF THE "LIVING CHURCH" IN RUSSIA

"TO THOSE CONFESSING THE HOLY AND CHARITABLE FAITH OF CHRIST:

"The scourge of Famine in Russia has been stayed. But the sufferings of starvation have given place to the wilting that comes with undernourishment.

"In the places which were stricken by Famine, those Flowers of Life — the children — today are fading from lack of nourishment.

"May the hands which are able to give these little ones food and support be upheld, until the smile of happiness lights up the emaciated face of each child. ANTONIN, Metropolitan of Moscow."
October 7, 1922.

This appeal, sent through the AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF OF RUSSIAN CHILDREN, is a challenge to YOU. YOUR gift — an appeal for the little ones in Russia, in YOUR CHURCH — may mean life to a MILLION FAMINE ORPHANS in Russia — "flowers fading for lack of nourishment."

Rev. George Stewart, Jr., of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, writes:

> "Let me urge upon you the need to keep up your efforts during this winter and the year of 1923. . . . One cannot forget the scenes of desperation and misery among the people. The refugee trains — long lines of cars aquiver with pain. People in rags beyond description. CHILDREN WITH DEATH-HEADS, CRYING FOR BREAD; DYING MOTHERS WITH CHILDREN TUGGING AT THEIR DRY BREASTS. The Four Horsemen are walking the length and breadth of Russia right now."

CHECKS MAY BE SENT TO THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, 508 S. Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. MARK THEM: "FOR THE RUSSIAN CHILDREN." All information and literature desired for Church Appeals may be secured from the AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF OF RUSSIAN CHILDREN, 110 West 40th Street, New York City.

sonnel recently put into operation, there are now many posts where there is no religious ministry at all. It is being shown that the new kind of army chaplain, trained by the army chaplain's school, is a most valuable aid in keeping up morale in the army.

Naughty Cards Now Passe

A substitute for the naughty cards is being welcomed into hundreds of homes throughout the United States, now that Dr. George P. Atwater, an Episcopal clergyman of Akron, O., has succeeded in developing a Bible game which is useful as a recreation device in the home and also meets the approval of the religious education experts. It is a set of cards organized something like "authors" to present many facts about the life of Christ and the history and geography of the holy land. Sunday school classes that have found attention difficult have taken to the cards as a means of increasing interest.

Christmas Season Marked by Music and Pageants

The old-time Christmas tree and Santa Claus in the churches are giving way in many communities to a type of celebration which pays proper honor to Jesus Christ. For several years in Evanston, Ill., the Messiah has been sung every Christmas to a great congregation gathered from all the churches. Kansas City continues the organization set up last June in connection with the International Sunday School convention and for weeks a chorus has been rehearsing in First Christian church for the Christmas time, when beautiful music, moving pictures and a pageant will provide a unique celebration of the great Christian anniversary in that city. A pageant is being undertaken by local churches in many communities. Community church of Park Ridge, Ill., will present the Christmas story in pageant form on the Sunday evening preceding Christmas.

Catholics Criticize Labor Board

A recent decision of the railway labor board has received radical criticism at the hands of the National Catholic Welfare council. The bulletin of the latter organization says: "The decision is the more serious because of the influence the railroad labor board has on public opinion and the official approval it gives, as a governmental body to what the bishops' program of social reconstruction calls 'pagan ethics of industry'." The closing passage of this well-known program is quoted as saying that "the employer has a right to get a reasonable living out of his business, but he has no right to interest in his investment until his employes have obtained at least living wages. This is human and Christian, in contrast to the purely commercial and pagan ethics of industry."

Rip Van Winkle Belongs to Philadelphia Presbytery

The ecclesiastical relations of Rip Van Winkle may be in a fair way to be determined. Dr. Martin D. Hardin, pastor of First Presbyterian church of Ithaca, N. Y., preached recently on "Shall There Be Intellectual Freedom in the Presbyterian Church?" in which he recounted the age-long contest between the forces of progress and of reaction. With the issue created by the recent action of Philadelphia in bringing charges against Dr. Fosdick he dealt without gloves, saying: "The first time I ever heard Doctor Fosdick's name was when Andrew D. White asked me if I had read a book on immortality by a young Baptist preacher named Fosdick, and he added that he had never read a book which

Why Don't People Go to Church?

THE Richmond Palladium, published at Richmond, Ind., recently carried on an investigation among business and professional people to discover the reason for non-attendance at church. When the reasons were collected, they were set up and given to the ministers on proof sheets. According to the newspaper, there are 40,000 people in Wayne county, only 10,000 of whom go to church. Since much of the comment was censorious, it was not published, but the newspaper did publish the reasons given by the ministers as to why people should go to church. The business men of Richmond have been induced to contribute to an avertising campaign in which the church claim is set forth.

The following are some of the more pungent comments made by people who do not attend the churches:

"The church expects the people to believe without thinking," said a school teacher. "Nowadays, the tendency is to think for oneself and not to accept without question, ideas that have only tradition to support them. Stubborn resistance on the part of most preachers to the findings of modern science that all thinking men including the leaders of the church themselves, accept, keeps away from many churches, people who know how to think."

"People are decidedly not Christian," said a civic worker. "Many say it is the preacher and persons of the church, but the real reason is because they are not Christians themselves in their own hearts. People who hide behind benevolent service propositions and class it as church work are unchristian."

"Why do I not go to church on Sunday? Because I am busy on Sunday morning taking care of the people who do not go to church, that's why!" A member of Richmond's police force made the above statement. He continued: "I am down here seven days in the week, and Sunday is just like any other day. We have to be on the job. I have no criticism to offer in regard to the churches of Richmond. I think they are a force for good and I would hate to live in a community where there were no churches."

Another citizen said: "The chief reason I do not go to church is that the sermons do not interest me any more. The ministers do not have enough new ideas to give out and the result is that after they have told you what their next text is and have given the opening paragraph you know exactly what they are going to say. In other words a person who has been a continual church-goer eventually graduates. Take two people who live together. They talk and talk and discuss matters until finally you find they talk little together. That is because they both know each other's ideas on subjects, having talked and lived together so long. The same with a minister. After you have been to hear him Sunday after Sunday you get to know what he is going to say and what his ideas on subjects are."

The following criticism has point: "A good many sermon announcements do not live up to what they promise. Often you read a topic and go to church expecting to hear an able discussion of it, but are disappointed at the generalities in which the preacher indulges. Nearly all the preachers have a sing-song delivery that tires me. It strikes me that if they devoted more time to studying about what they are going to say, and would learn how to deliver it well, more people would want to go to church. I haven't anything against the church and the preachers, but neither have got anything for me. I mean by that, the church does not interest me. Maybe it is the preachers and maybe because I never got started right."

One church member is honest enough to give a real reason: "Of late, I have formed the habit of doing odd jobs about the house on Sundays, jobs that I do not have time for on week days. For instance, last Sunday morning I cleaned out the furnace. Hardly a Sunday passes that I do not put on my overalls and take care of something that has been neglected through the week."

Former school trustee prominent citizen, Fountain City—goes regularly. Blames autos for small attendance. "People go visiting rather than going to church. So many late Saturday night meetings also, with late sleeping Sunday mornings, keep people from churches. People are looking too much for pleasure now."

One critic fails to find enough religion in the church: "The laity, consciously, sensing a substitute and missing a reality, is not attracted by his sermon, because the aesthetic craving of their souls for spiritual enlightenment, comfort and improvement is not satisfied with the address which he presents in lieu of the spiritual message of Christ."

"I guess I'm too rational for the average minister," said a student and a holder of several college degrees. "The study of logical scientific theories has had a tendency to make me an atheist but through it all I know that I believe there is a living God, a power which moves and causes all action and reaction. My point is that the ministry has not kept abreast of the great strides of science."

Seventy-five years ago, President John Quincy Adams said of THE LIVING AGE:

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe, and in this country, this has appeared to me the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language; but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind, in the utmost expansion of the present age.

And its scope is vastly widened since President Adams's day.

Now it translates and reprints the very best articles published in hundreds of magazines from every quarter of the globe.

It is a weekly record of human achievement.

had done more to convince his intellect that there is a life after death. Not that Doctor Fosdick does not lead men back to God and positive Christian faith. His church is crowded to the doors Sunday after Sunday with eager, hungry souls who feel that his preaching is giving them the true bread of life, and that under his interpretation of Christ, they want to be Christians and make all the world obedient to his divine leadership. Not that he is not a man of prayer. Literally hundreds of thousands of men are today praying because his little book on 'The Meaning of Prayer' has made them see that prayer has a rational basis and is not a groundless superstition. What then is the offense committed by this man that makes his presence in a Presbyterian pulpit, to quote their own words, "A source of profound sorrow, grief and distress of spirit" to the men of the Philadelphia presbytery? This is his crime. He is intellectually honest."

Judaism Turns Away From Public Schools

Reformed Jewish rabbis who were educated at the seminary in Cincinnati have recently decided that they will favor the creation of a parochial school system like that of Catholics and Lutherans. They declare that not over twenty per cent of the Jewish children know anything of their own history or religion. The Reformed Jewish faith is of a liberal sort. Services are often held on Sunday instead of Saturday, and many of the methods of Christian churches are employed in their religious program. Their statement of systematic theology is but little different from the Unitarian statement of Christianity.

Minister Becomes Effective Reformer

For many years La Porte, Ind., has permitted a red light place near the city to operate, to the detriment of the health and morals of the city. The conspiracy of silence was broken recently when Rev. W. F. Bostwick, Baptist minister, took the license numbers of the automobiles parked in front of the place and threatened the city authorities to make a public scandal of the matter in the press if the situation was not cleaned up. The minister was informed that his own men were opposed to his efforts. To test this, he voted his congregation by secret ballot and found only four persons, presumably men, who opposed his activity. The same four also opposed an effort to take down the screens from in front of the soft drink parlors.

Chicago Leads in Congregationalism

The world's greatest Congregational city is Chicago. How its thirteen churches of forty years ago have grown to more than eighty was told at a recent anniversary celebration of the founding of the Chicago Congregational Missionary and Extension society, when a banquet was given at the Auditorium hotel for which 750 plates were laid. Rev. J. R. Nichols, secretary of the organization, gave the annual report showing that 47 churches are being aided. He reported that sixty per cent of the Congregational churches in the district were forging ahead, fifteen per cent were suffering a decline, while the remainder were "holding their own." The budget for the coming year will be $57,000, and a movement is being started to raise a large amount of additional endowment for the society during the coming year. Dr. Charles F. Aked, of Kansas City, who was the guest of honor for the evening, said: "The

Ask Ministers to Further World Peace

FOUR undenominational organizations representing broadly all the churches of the United States will unite in sending a letter to the clergymen of the country calling for a concerted effort to bring about "American cooperation in the work of establishing international peace through world organization." The groups which will cooperate in this task are the Church Peace union, The Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the world Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, and the World Churches of Christ in America the World Peace union is the executive in sending out the appeal. The program says in part.

"The religious folk of America, disregarding differences of creed or party, should unite in the following action: To endorse and cordially approve the informal co-operation which our government is now giving to the humanitarian and other technical organizations which are being efficiently managed by the league of nations; and to urge upon the President and the senate the importance of making this informal co-operation formal by the nomination and confirmation of delegates to those organizations which are carrying on the work in which the United States was actively engaged before the world war.

"To urge the government to take immediate steps to bring the United States into real relationship with the other nations of the work, either through the league of nations or through some other effective form of association.

"To commend cordially the proposed participation of the United States in the permanent court of international justice.

"To urge the President to call a conference of the nations to consider, in the spirit of mutual goodwill and human brotherhood, the grave problems which still menace the very fabric of civilization; such as armaments, economic chaos, and other obstacles to the peace of the world."

As a means of carrying out this program the churches of the country are urged to discuss the matter at midweek and Sunday services, to co-operate with other local agencies in holding mass meetings and to get their most prominent members to write to their senators and representatives.

Rev. William P. Merrill, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church of New York, is president of the Church Peace union and of the World Alliance. Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University, is president of the World Peace foundation, Dr. Robert E. Speer of New York is president of the Federal Council of the Churches, and Dr. John H. Finley of New York is chairman of the commission on international justice and goodwill.

research. Its theory and teachings are useless bunk when handed out to one who knows the facts from hard study. That's why I don't go to church for I can't get the connection between the mysteries, the greater the mystery becomes the more it makes one wonder at the complex work of the infinite power which governs all things. I would think then that ministers would gain much by a thorough study of scientific development."

"Ministers are straying too far from the fundamental truths of religion," said a college graduate. "I don't like to go to church to hear a minister review a book or discuss a poem. I can read the book and the poem and form my own opinions. They may not necessarily affect my spiritual development. I believe there are many others who feel as I do. What a great field of interesting material they are neglecting when they fail to stick to the Bible, the word of God."

American capacity for organization is comparable to the art of Phideas. You make a machine, and then you bow down and worship it. You pray to it to roll over you and crush your souls. The worst speech I ever heard (with the exception of some of my own) was one on the standardized church. I pray the Lord that I may never belong to a standardized church. This is the day of the apotheosis of the filing cabinet. If some one could smash the telephones, filing cabinets and typewriters of the ministers he would be doing them a great service."

Dr. Jowett Sees Progress in Church Unity

Dr. Jowett has stirred all of England recently with his challenge to the churches to unite in the cause of world peace. In many other ways he sees the churches drawing together. He says of this tendency: "It is a little more than three years since I preached in Durham cathedral, and the intimation of the service excited much opposition, while the service itself was the scene of a certain amount of disorder. All that sort of thing has passed away like a bad dream. The exchanges are multiplied, but there is no disturbance. The mutual ministry is deepening fellowship and confidence, and fears and misunderstandings are melting away in the light of actual communion. Rev. Dr. Scott Lidgett, an ex-president of the Wesleyan conference and of acknowledged eminence as a theologian, preached in Hereford cathedral last Sunday, and I hear that the service was one of deep spiritual power and impressiveness."

Congrgationalists Will Hold a Retreat

Knox College has put its dormitories at the service of the Congregational ministers of Illinois, who will hold a retreat in Galesburg immediately following New Year's day. At this retreat Prof. Bosworth of Oberlin College will deliver daily lectures and will provide opportunity for office interviews. Prof. Ozora Davis of Chicago will also deliver a course of lectures. It is hoped to make the conferences and lectures practical as well as spiritually helpful.

Chicago Churches Push Aggressive Campaign

The churches cooperating with the Federation in Chicago are opening an aggressive campaign which will extend to Easter. One of the first efforts is greatly to enlarge the Sunday school constituency, since Protestant churches make the acquaintance of new families in this way most easily. This will provide a considerable enlargement of the prospect lists in the churches. There will be more Watch Night services held this year under Federation auspices than formerly, since the last night of the old year falls on Sunday. The culmination of the season's effort will come in the "Quiet-Hour-Gordon meetings," which will be held in a downtown theater from Feb. 26 to Easter. In previous years the noon meetings have been conducted for one week only, but this year the five week series will make a much deeper impression on the life of the city.

Will Get Out Booklet on Church Publicity

The enrollment fees at the recent National Council of Church Publicity in Chicago were sufficient to enable the publication of a booklet of findings. The gist of the various addresses will be condensed to four or five thousand words and published with the imprint of the Chicago Church federation. The committee on findings which has this matter in charge is composed of Dr. E. Robb Zaring and Rev. O. F. Jordan.

Young People of Chicago Will Hold Rally

While most churches are complaining of the lack of interest in a religious program on the part of young people, it is evident that all is not yet lost. Each year there is held a great rally of the Christian young people in Chicago which is sufficient to fill the very largest auditorium and these represent many thousands more in the local churches. This year it will be held in Moody Tabernacle on North Avenue, on Dec. 15, and addressed by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, of Brooklyn. Representatives of the Christian Endeavor society, the Epworth League and Baptist Union will attend the sessions. The Chicago Church Federation sponsors the rally.

How can YOU acquire the Art of Being Interesting?

The coupon at the bottom of this page is the Key to a new world of fascinating enjoyment.

YOU know men and women in social and business life who, to all outward appearance, are alike. But what a difference when you are in their company for more than a few minutes at a time!

One is helpless in a conversation that goes beyond the narrow circle of his own daily existence. The other always holds your attention and interest, whatever the subject may be.

Around commonplace facts he weaves romance founded seemingly upon knowledge that spans centuries. Wherever he goes he seems to have known the spot when it was in the making. His conversation illuminates the present with the vivid colors of the past.

How can you, whose time for libraries, museums and travel is limited, acquire the fascinating information that causes your company eagerly to be sought? How can you know the hidden story behind a prehistoric relic, or a mystifying freak of Nature?

There is no mystery to the art of being interesting. It is known to all who read an amazing story which the coupon below will bring to you for free examination, a story which the N. Y. Evening Mail calls "A short cut to a liberal education."

Review of Reviews Company, 30 Irving Place, N. Y.

Clark Archer is a foster father for the club. It was decided at a recent meeting to hold another conference this coming spring like the one held last year. At the previous conference some of the denominational leaders were present, and the young men asked what encouragement there was for a university trained man to remain a Disciple in the light of recent happenings in the denomination.

Busy Settlement House in Chicago

Among the social settlements in Chicago it would be hard to find a busier group than Chicago Commons, long presided over by Rev. Graham Taylor, veteran social student. The neighborhood is making another racial shift, but the children swarm at the settlement in all sorts of activity. The manual arts are taught; many children are kept in a day nursery while the mothers work; there are clubs for boys and girls of different ages. This settlement has always maintained a cordial relationship with the churches, and finds considerable support from them. It is not a propagandist institution, but for many years religious services have been held at Chicago Commons.

Minister Has Memorized All of New Testament

Rev. H. H. Halley, a Disciples minister of Chicago, who has for ten years past been patiently engaged in memorizing the new testament, has finally completed his task and now offers interpretative public readings, in which sections of the scripture are bound together with brief comment. He can recite the Bible for ten hours without stopping, a memory feat that is very unusual. His delivery of the Bible passages is quiet and reverent and the total effect edifying. He has appeared before the chapel of Northwestern University recently and in churches of various denominations in cities within easy reach of Chicago.

Wants Protestants to Tell Catholicism's Story

In Boston the hostility between Catholic and Protestant often finds expression, for Boston today is no longer in the hands of the descendants of the Puritans, but is ruled by Irish Catholics. A contributor to the Boston Herald, writing from the Protestant side recently, suggested that some way should be found to allay the suspicion and dislike that exists. Dennis A. McCarthy wants Protestant churches to have an annual Sunday when the ministers will tell of the achievements of Roman Catholics, but he fails to mention any reciprocity in the matter, however.

Methodist Course of Study Increasingly Modern

The Methodist Book Concern has issued a pamphlet giving the names of the conference study manuals. One notes in the list of required reading books of pronounced modernist tendencies. Young Methodist preachers read the life of Phillips Brooks, the noted Episcopal divine. They use Hastings' Bible dictionary and "The Bible in the Making" by Smyth. Elementary philosophy is presented by Bowne and Hyde. Rall's book on "Modern Premillennialism and the Christian Hope" is also in the course. Each candidate must read George Adam Smith's Isaiah, where the critical hypothesis of this book is presented. Dods' "The Origin and Nature of the Bible" is in the course for local preachers. One looks in vain in the list for a book of pronounced reactionary tendency.

Christian Endeavor To Establish Holiday Homes

The fact that Christian Endeavor is a world wide organization enables a good idea to be passed from one nation to another. In England in recent years the "holiday home" for young people has been a feature of its work. This is not a philanthropy for the young people who go away on vacation pay their own way, but the service is provided at cost. The stockholders who put up the homes are guaranteed five per cent on their investment. The first "holiday home" to be provided in America was operated during the past year in Branchville, N. J. by the New York and Brooklyn Union. The rate was twenty dollars for the first week and fifteen for each succeeding week. The home has a radio outfit and a second hand car.

WHY IRVIN S. COBB READS THE OUTLOOK

In politics I think The Outlook sometimes is wrong. In Americanism, it always is right.

There always is need, in this country—and for that matter in every other country—of a magazine dedicated to the task of endeavoring fairly and truthfully to interpret the spirit of the nation and the thought of the people. Never was there a time when this country needed such a publication more than it needs it today. In my opinion, The Outlook amply justifies this need.

Reading it regularly, I think I see in its columns an honest endeavor honestly to present the issues which arise in America and, most of all, I see a strong and virile nationalism. There are times when I, as a citizen, may disagree with some of the conclusions its editors and its contributors have drawn; but there is never a time when I discern in it any note of insincerity, any suggestion of timidity, any taint of cowardice. I value it as part of the literary diet which helps to make me, I trust, a good American.

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

1. It is beautifully made. Typographically it is perfect, and the binding is superb. It is bound in full morocco ($2.50) and in beautiful purple cloth ($1.50, add 8 cents postage).
2. It carries a religious message. The Christmas season is a religious one and the ideal Christmas gift is a religious book.
3. It lasts the year round — and for many years. Every time your friend takes up the book for his morning reading he will think of the thoughtful giver of the gift.

What The Daily Altar Contains

There is a page for each day's reading. For each day there is a verse of Scripture, a meditation, a brief poem, and a prayer.

The Time Is Short! Order—on a postcard if you wish—the number of copies you desire, (indicate how many cloth-bound, how many leather), and books will be mailed to you at once, and the bill charged to your account, payable February 1, 1923.

WHAT THEY SAY OF THE DAILY ALTAR

The Central Christian Advocate: "Cannot be too highly commended."
The Presbyterian Advance: "Excellent and beautiful."
The Christian Evangelist: "A real help toward restoring the family altar."
The Churchman: "A beautiful book."
The Christian Standard: "Beyond all praise."
The Christian Advocate (New York): "Excellently arranged."

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

EDITORIAL

An Editorial by a Reader

To the Editors:

IF Life is a journey—as the poets are pleased to think—it is well to have it broken into convenient stages. There are thus friendly Inns set up along the road which halt and entertain us. At the Inn of Day's-End we put up for the night. Master Sleep there attends us and, for the most part, dismisses us of a morning much restored through his care. At the Inn of Week's-End Mistress Stop-a-Day offers us a variety of entertainment. It has long been the habit of travellers to use this Inn for the refreshment of their souls, but many, through choice or necessity, pass it by altogether. Month's-End Inn is much used for the paying of bills and the like. The Host is Mister Please-Remit—a trying fellow but useful for all that.

The Inn of Year's-End is an important posting station and, with others like it, serves to calculate the progress of travellers. The Host is Mr. Count-the-Years, a man of grave mien with whom many, and especially those who have met him often, do not like to deal. But he is attended by My Ladies Memory and Hope who greatly soften his hard ways. My Lady Memory commonly calls up one Gratitude who will warm a traveller's heart rarely, while Lady Hope waits upon those setting out upon the next stage with a light which makes their road more easy.

There is always amongst those who put up at the Inn of Year's-End—though one may lodge there also for a night—a great business of mutual congratulation upon so much of the journey safely done and much well-wishing of good fortune for those setting out again. And in this all friendly travellers rejoice and heartily take part.

We, then, who have come to Year's-End along with you and who have profited greatly by receiving from you—with such regularity as the Post has been able to manage—good news about the enterprises of our fellow travellers, along with many profitable suggestions as to the brave conduct of our journey, and comforting assurances of its happy issue, hasten to join in this good and ancient custom and wish you God-speed and prosperous going as you set out of a New Year's morning. And though any one of us may often and naturally enough be somewhat cast down as he considers the length of the way to the Land-of-Better-Things and his slow progress thereto, yet because you have assured us of the wealth of comradeship in which we journey and have held before us high and reasonable hopes, we take our way again, persuaded that, if we continue steadfast, there will at last dawn upon us a century that is Christian indeed. GAIUS GLENN ATKINS.

Unspeakable Suffering Reaches Climax Now

CABLEGRAMS from the near east areas bring dire warnings of impending tragedies. A number of wireless stations sent out calls for relief recently which have been caught by ships of our navy and sent on to the United States. President Harding has been so moved by these reports that he has made a second and a special appeal in which he says: "The need as revealed in the latest cable reports far exceeds all previous calculations and the response to date has been altogether inadequate." Thousands of women and little children are sleeping on the ground with inadequate clothing and without blankets. As might be expected, disease is raging. Typhus has appeared in the concentration camps and threatens to spread. The Near East Relief has established an orphanage at Nazareth where five thousand orphans have been transferred. These made a five hundred mile journey from Harpoot into Syria. The refugees from Asia Minor are almost all women and little children. The situation is all the worse for lack of the natural protectors of the little families. The fact that Christmas day has passed does not make it too late for American families to respond to the appeal to take on unseen guests at their tables by making an offering to Near East Relief in addition to any offerings that have been made. With the vastly increased responsibility of this great relief organization, millions of additional money are necessary. The gold of the world is in America. It is inevitable that those who are in distress will turn to us for aid. So far as human eye can see, unless the money the Near East Relief asks for is immediately forthcoming, the loss of life this winter will constitute one of the major tragedies of all human history. The Armenian nation is gone, but Armenian human beings cry out for the elemental help which if we refuse robs us of any title at all to be called Christians.

The Zero Point in Prayers for Peace

A CABLEGRAM says that in England the recent manifesto of Dr. Jowett, in which he calls upon the churches to present themselves before God in a sacramental vow and prayer on behalf of world-wide peace, has been received with sufficient seriousness to incorporate it in the services of the Sunday before Christmas. The archbishops of Canterbury and York, representing the church of England joined with leading free churchmen in suggesting a prayer to be offered on that Sunday. As a measure of the quality of the peace sentiment which has been historically associated with Christianity this prayer is an interesting exhibit. We ask our readers to look below the rhythm and cadence of its phrasing to the ideas, if there are any, which it embodies: "O God, our Father, who at this time didst send thy son to be the saviour of all men and the prince of peace, look, we pray thee, in mercy upon the nations of the world and prosper all counsels which make for righteousness and peace. Forgive what thou hast seen in us of selfishness and pride. Remove far from us the tempers which provoke the spirit of strife, and grant us such a measure of the gentleness and patience of thy son that we may live peaceably with all men and be by thy blessing the makers of peace, through the same Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen." In a mood of candor as far removed from irreverence as if we had ourselves just risen from an act of devotion, we say that that is as near the zero point n praying for peace as one can get. It is a nice, ladylike, innocuous prayer, of the same sort as that which churchianity has mumbled or sung for centuries, which Almighty God never has answered and never will answer, because he simply will not hear it. It lacks the faintest hint of the two requisites of a Christian prayer for peace—repentance for the sin of war and commitment to a distinctively Christian principle for the abolition of war. The fact is that the Christian church has no convictions on the peace question. It has no message, no solving word to speak on the way to abolish war. More than all, it has no sorrow of conscience as to its own part in past wars. The church simply is not interested in peace. Its interests are in other things—the salvation of individuals, the preservation of a system of doctrine, the aggrandizing of its multitudinous denominational units, the pushing out of its boundaries through missionary activity. But the church has never been trained to think of itself as possessing the secret of brotherhood in the secular order, and being responsible for such a reconstruction of that order as will make war as disreputable as duelling or murder. How can a ritual of common prayer for peace be formulated when there is no common conviction?

Come, Let Us Build!

GREAT preachers have always been passionately certain that they had the message that would save the world. Paul was continually saying: "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel!" All too often modern preachers have felt no such compulsion. They have not been convinced that the world without their message would perish. Fosdick in his recent book, "Christianity and Progress," arraigns the pulpit for its lack of conviction in these terms: "One wonders why preachers do not feel this more and so recover their consciousness of an indispensable mission. One wonders that the churches can be so timid and dull and negative, that our sermons can be so pallid and inconsequential. One wonders why in the pulpit we have so many flutes and so few trumpets. For here is a world with the accumulating energies of the new science in its hands, living in the purlieus of hell because it cannot gain spiritual mastery over the power in which it glories. Here is a world which must build its civilization on spiritual bases or else collapse into abysmal ruin and which cannot achieve the task though all the motives of self-preservation cry out to have it done, because men lack the very elements of faith and character which it is the business of religion to supply." Surely religion has a wonderful new apologetic for our day. The gospel is the same through all the centuries, but human need varies continually. The preacher who gets a clear view of the causes which in any age lead to racial disintegration and decay, and who sees the remedy in the application of the gospel, has a message which will make him welcome on any platform. The pulpit of today is emerging from an era of negation. The old theological debris had to be cleared away. It takes more than a negation, however, to make an acceptable teacher of religion. Our age awaits the era of the architect. The temple of God must be built in men's hearts.

Fosdick Heresy Case Destined To Be Famous

IT now seems clear that a historic heresy trial is in process of coming to a head in the Presbyterian church in the case of Harry Emerson Fosdick. The Philadelphia presbytery passed a resolution asking the general assembly to direct the presbytery of New York to take such action as will require the teaching and preaching of the pulpit of First Church, New York, "to conform to the system of doctrine taught in the Westminster confession of faith."

The chief complainant in the Philadelphia presbytery is Rev. Clarence E. Macartney, who has published certain correspondence between himself and Dr. Fosdick in which there is revealed an unalterable determination to bring the New York preacher's case to the formal consideration of the highest judicatory of the denomination. In his letter dealing with the views called in question Dr. Fosdick tells Dr. Macartney that he could wish the two might sit down together and have a heart to heart talk over their differences. To which Dr. Macartney replies as follows: "I should enjoy as much as you a 'heart to heart talk,' but I feel that there has been too much easy-going conference and exchange of mutual compliments among men of irreconcilable views, and not enough of protest and expression of dissent, with the result that there has been raised a false cry of 'Peace, peace!' when both sides know that there is no peace. . . . The Christ whom you preach is not the Christ whom I preach and in whom I put my trust for this life and for that which is to come." Dr. Fosdick on his part declares that Dr. Macartney has drawn a caricature of him and then gotten angry at it. The three pivotal considerations upon which the case is likely to turn are the major premise that the Presbyterian church is essentially a creedal church, that its creed holds the virgin birth as one of its structural and irreducible elements, and that Dr. Fosdick holds and preaches that belief in the virgin birth is not essential to faith in the divinity and unique leadership of Jesus. These seem to be the issues which lend themselves most easily to the legal necessities of a heresy trial. Other theological issues, such as the doctrine of substitutionary atonement, the authority of the Bible and possibly the second coming of Christ can hardly be kept out, but the virgin birth is more specific and matter of fact, and hence is more easily taken hold of by the legalities of an ecclesiastical court.

Is There a Real Case Against Dr. Fosdick?

IT is difficult to write with restraint of an action so belated in the progress of both the conception and the spirit of our Christian religion as that of the Philadelphia presbytery. But at this moment we are looking at it in an objective and disinterested way. Is there a substantial case against Dr. Fosdick? From the standpoint of an ecclesiastical lawyer the answer will have to be that there is. As Dr. Macartney contends, the literal rendering of the confession of faith commits the Presbyterian church to the doctrine of the virgin birth. It will be difficult to establish any other interpretation of the venerable creed on this point. There can be no doubt that the words of the confession afford a substantial basis for attacking the teaching in the pulpit of First church. On the other hand, the spirit and practice of the church with respect to the confession has grown beyond the use of it as an instrument with which to test and validate the Christian soundness of its ministry. Few indeed are the ministers in Presbyterianism who in all details hold the faith literally expressed in the creed. Take the famous foreordination section, a part of which reads thus: "By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death; for these angels and men thus predestined and foreordained are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot either be increased or diminished." If the Philadelphia presbytery insists upon Dr. Fosdick preaching literally the virgin birth because the Westminster confession teaches it, it should insist equally upon Dr. Macartney preaching the foreordination doctrine contained in the above quotation. And though we have not the slightest hint outside the present controversy as to Dr. Macartney's theological position, we venture the guess that he not only does not believe this part of the creed, but vigorously repudiates it. The aspect of the procedure which is most difficult to forecast is whether Dr. Fosdick will personally have a chance to meet his opponents. He is not a Presbyterian, but a Baptist. Technically it is not he but First church that will be tried. Dr. Fosdick will no doubt have a strong inward feeling that he ought to resign the pulpit rather than allow the church to be subjected to embarrassment. Against this inward prompting all considerations of enlightenment and progress in Presbyterianism and in the Christian world would register a decisive no if it was thought there was serious danger that he might act upon it. After all it is neither Dr. Fosdick who is on trial, nor First church, but the Presbyterian church itself. And all Christendom will benefit by the disclosure of the sort of church the Presbyterian church is.

The Friendship of the Two Americas

PEACE-BUILDERS must be at their task early and late to keep up with the junkers and the commercialized interests which sow the seed of international hatred. The peace of Europe seems now the question of major import, but through the centuries it will be seen to be equally important that the two Americas, north and south, should come into a mutual understanding. The fifth Pan-American conference will be held in Chile next spring. At that conference one cannot but hope that the real problems involved in American unity will be discussed, for previous conferences have been polite efforts in cultivating a large acquaintance. Even Mr. Hughes' present Central American conference finds it difficult to undertake a discussion of concrete problems in a spirit of candor. A number of recent events augur well for the peace of the two continents. Chile and Peru are about to settle their differences due in part to the helpful friendship of North America. The visit of the secretary of state of the United States to Brazil was a happy event. The United States has withdrawn her troops from San Domingo, which removes one of the difficult questions from further consideration. That the South Americans have a more friendly view of us is seen in the coming of thousands of Latin-American students to this country. The rapid transportation between New York and Brazil on the east coast, and between New York and Valparaiso through the canal and down the west coast, help to unite North and South American countries in common economic interests. The oil interests in this country as well as other commercial interests try to keep up hatred and hostility toward Mexico. Without the friendship and confidence of Mexico this country cannot hope to have the good-will of the southern republics. These are days when every sermon on world peace should lay sure foundations in public feeling and opinion for the future peace of the American republics.

The Renaissance in China

THERE is now an intellectual renaissance in China. This will be a matter of indifference to any who retain the comfortable illusion that nothing of any importance to the human race happens outside of Europe and America, and that the history of the world has only room for the east in footnotes. To the others who have awakened to the real situation, a Chinese renaissance may well seem as important for the present age as the renaissance of learning was for the sixteenth century. Canon Barnett on his death-bed implored his friends to remember and to make known that the future of the human race depended on the way in which Christianity was presented to China. That was the last prophetic vision of one whose life had been rich in visions. To him it was clear that upon the spiritual direction of China more depended than the destiny of China, or of the east. Every new movement in the drama of the world confirms the judgment of that dying seer.

Those who left China in 1918 and returned in 1921 found that a revolution had taken place in the intellectual life of Young China. If the revolution had been spread over many years it would have appeared to be rapid; but in three years there had been a rebirth of the Chinese mind. The classical tradition had been broken; the authority of the beautiful and strangely dignified intellectual inheritance of China had been abandoned. The very language was changed. The classical language, fixed and static, had given place to pai hua, a new plastic speech, in which youth was pouring out its new hopes and dreams. It was like the change when Latin was replaced by the vernacular tongues in Europe; and the new speech was but one sign of a new intellectual outlook. Young China was set upon the task of building from the very foundation its own modern civilization. The past must not lay its dead hand upon the living. For many years China had been in contact with the west. But the influence of Europe, and even of America, had been more or less superficial. Now China has begun to study fearlessly the fabric of European civilization with an open mind. Youth in that land, as everywhere, has the disciple-heart and is seeking for a master. It is bringing all its rare gifts into the human scene; and it is asking, Who will show us any good?

Teachers have been invited from the west by Young China to give it guidance. One of them, Mr. Bertrand Russell, has told in "The Problem of China" the counsel which he left with the students of the east. Without any question he and others in sympathy with him have had a widespread influence. This fact must be remembered when his book is read. Mr. Russell is frankly hostile to religion; in China he found a race more favorably disposed to his own wisdom than any other; there was a race traditionally not greatly concerned with religion; and yet with a fine ethical sense; a race, moreover, pacifist in its disposition, and untroubled by the mechanistic ways of western moralists. Upon such a ground it might be possible to build a civilization, set free from the curses which have ruined the west—a civilization reared on the sure basis of a scientific interpretation of the universe and human life without any of the illusions of religion. Without question a large number of Chinese students and leaders of power amongst them have discarded religion; they declare that it may be comforting and peaceful but it has one unfortunate disadvantage—it is not true. It is difficult to discover the relative importance of these students. At the Peking conference in April there was a striking revelation of the power and enthusiasm of the Christian students. But it would be a serious miscalculation to ignore the "new thought" students or to lose sight of their powerful intellectual leaders. The student Christians in China would be the first to admit the strength of their foes.

In "The Problem of China" there is an estimate of this intellectual arena by one of the foremost thinkers in England. If he retains still in his style some traces of the brilliant undergraduate he is not to be dismissed for that reason. When the reader is told, for example, that the chief difference between west and east in morality is that the western having more energy can commit more crimes per diem, or when the times of Jenghiz Khan are likened to the present day, "except that his methods of causing death were more merciful than those that have been employed since the armistice," the reader may be tempted to read no more.

But there is much that ought to be read. Mr. Russell very quickly came to understand certain phases of Chinese character; and he is as generous to the east as he is scornful of the west. He loves the cheerfulness of the Chinese, their capacity for happiness, their courtesy, their respect for learning, and many other qualities. But he criticizes strongly their faith in the efficacy of moral forces. They should look to the west for scientific method, but not trouble about its ethics, which are no better than their own. With a good deal of hesitation about the future he cherishes the hope that Young China may escape from the "blessings" which are being pressed upon it by western benefactors, more especially by Americans. Much of the education, he declares, provided by them is admirable; but it will be better for the Chinese to direct their own educational system. He declares

> "It is science that makes the difference between our intellectual outlook and that of the Chinese intelligentsia. The Chinese, even the most modern, look to the white nations, especially America, for moral maxims to replace those of Confucius. They have not yet grasped that men's morals in the mass are the same everywhere; they do as much harm as they dare, and as much good as they must. . . . What we have to teach the Chinese is not morals, or ethical maxims about governments, but science and technical skill. The real problem for the Chinese intellectuals is to acquire western knowledge without acquiring the mechanistic outlook."

Here the issue becomes plainer. If Young China is only seeking maxims or a theory of ethics, then Mr. Russell is right; but what if some of its members are seeking moral power and the spiritual satisfaction without which man has never been able to live? Young China is right to reject any ethical system with a mechanistic outlook; but it will not imagine that the fussy busybodies who are always forcing their own panaceas upon others are really representative of Christianity. That religion by its very definition can have no mechanistic outlook. It has its mistaken and foolish interpreters, and of these China has had more than its share; but the heart of China seeking for moral power and the spiritual interpretation of the universe which alone can give that power, will not be satisfied to build a new civilization on the foundations which Mr. Russell offers.

But for the present there is a strong contention. The arena is cleared for action. The combatants will not be eastern against western. They will be on the one hand the eager and brilliant band of intellectuals who have done with religious sanctions; on the other hand, the Christian students, who do not find the fulfilment of their nation's past in the Christianity of the west; but penetrate through that to Christ himself, and believe that in him China will come to itself.

Our Rusty Political Machinery

DEAN INGE has astutely remarked that of course every one knows that a generation of people who can travel sixty miles an hour is twelve times as civilized as one that could travel only five miles an hour. The world is rapidly becoming civilized. The other day the announcement was made of a gun which can shoot around a corner. What a comfort and asset to the professional bandit who can now pursue his trade with comfortable security. We have boasted for some years that our gunners could hit vessels still below the horizon. This month we have learned of a manless aeroplane which traveled ninety miles and came safe to earth—a machine capable of carrying and scattering bombs and destroying cities. We have become so clever, that is, so civilized, that, as Mr. Edison assures us, we could blow a city like London to ashes in three hours. Technicians burn the midnight oil studying how to invent devilish devices that will destroy, not our enemies, for we have none at present, nor necessarily some of our suppositious future enemies, but that may be sold now to some possible future enemy and used against ourselves. They may destroy women and children yet unborn.

Speed, wealth and force, these were the dominant factors of the last hundred years. These fascinated and gripped the imaginations of the last three generations intoxicated with the marvels of science. These things shaped the ideals of a new period which for the first time in human history let science, discovery, novelty and comfort replace religion, philosophy, literature, ethics and art as the controlling influences in life. An unbalanced world, with no perception of relative values lay behind all the immediate causes of the war, and was its primary cause. It was a world in which titanic forces had been let loose and a thousand-foot chasm dug between the men whose lives ended and those whose lives began a century ago. Today we are seeing that if the once dominant invisible forces are not strengthened, organized and put in control, our new civilization, spite of its miracles of speed and force, will inevitably destroy the accumulated wealth of ages and wreck the spiritual life of humanity.

What science does mankind most need today? None of those that a hundred years ago were in their infancy and now have grown so great that they are overshadowing the humanities. Only a balanced world, one that has regained reverence, conscience, and a sane philosophy of human relations can insure that the terrible agencies which have been discovered shall not sweep off humanity as a prairie fire consumes the dry grass. We need more than technique. We need new insight. Civilization must outlaw collective homicide and set these agencies to produce, not destroy. But we need master-minds. Where are they? What is a world trying to get a moral equilibrium to do to develop the one thing needful, to guide bewildered, inarticulate democracies that are fast ousting monarchies and whose unenlightenment, as Elihu Root has just shown, is the chief obstacle to our safety?

We hear that Germany in 1920 put 6,000 of its youth to preparation for research work in chemistry. How many students in any country were started on the special study of the science of human relationships, the science of getting on together, the science of democratic government? These are the invisible things which are not very popular subjects with baseball rooters and those mad over movies and motor cars. We are keen over the latest new wrinkle about the radio, but our governmental machinery is rusty, creaking and in many respects as antiquated as a handloom. Our beloved constitution is not commending itself so much as formerly for imitation. The new governments that are setting up in Europe are demanding a responsible cabinet. They are trying to avoid our frequent wasteful deadlocks between the executive and congress. They are learning, as we might learn, from our present inadequate methods.

Great Britain has just had an election and given us an object lesson in efficiency. An election was called six weeks ago, the people voted and today the new government is functioning at Westminster. To be sure, the election was not adequate, as the new government was elected by a minority of the voters and had only a plurality. More legislation can rectify this and by giving a second choice secure a real majority. But the election brought the present members of parliament swiftly and directly into touch with the people. We, too, have had an election and, as every one knows, our new congress will not be due to function for thirteen months. Meanwhile the hold-over congress, full of "lame ducks" is in this short session to vote on many vital matters and may cast a vote the reverse of that indicated by the people's choice in the election. Nothing in our constitution requires the long delay to secure an amendment to end our perpetuation of a method which should have ended when steam and telegraph made rapid communication easy. What is to hinder our legislating that after a November election both President and congress shall be inducted into office the following January and that the dangerous and often useless short session be abandoned? What but apathy and conservatism? Yet the need of such a change has long been recognized and never more painfully so than when, two years ago, world affairs hung on our decision.

For years it has been apparent that the hundreds of hours wasted in roll calls could be avoided in congress were a simple electric device fastened to each desk so that by the touch of a black or white key each man could register "Yes" or "No" opposite his name on a huge tablet at the front and the balloting be over in two minutes. This of course would compel every man to make his own decision without waiting to see how his neighbors voted, but it would in the course of the year save much time for which the taxpayers are paying. Traditional, self-imposed red-tape renders largely impotent the rank and file who are not chairmen of committees. It may well be questioned whether business would not be more effectively done, were the number of our representatives cut down by one-half.

In state matters, we sometimes find democracy gone mad. Behold the citizens of the highly intelligent state of California in its last election almost abolishing the need of representative government by taking legislative and executive functions into their own hands. One ballot compelled voters to fill thirty elective offices. Rarely does a Briton vote for more than five at one time. But more monstrous still as a strain on one's time and gray matter was the list of thirty-four referenda. Four of these concerned war veterans, exempting them from taxation. Others referred to land settlement, housing, title insurance, municipalities, municipal charters, regulation and taxation of public utilities, state budget, judges' salaries, local taxation, chiropractic, use of streams, municipal public utilities, water and power, osteopathic act, prohibiting special laws, absent voters, deposit of public moneys, regulating practice of laws, judges pro tempore, school districts, initiative, vivisection, land franchise taxation, franchises. The formidable explanatory textbook of 135 pages of very fine print which at great expense was supplied to each voter, it is safe to say, was never read through by any one but the proofreader.

Imagine a board of directors of a railroad taking out of the hands of their superintendent the decision on the salaries of each ticket agent and the technical questions about engines and rails. Big business places responsibility on a few well-chosen men and holds them responsible for subordinates and detail. But our electorate, with far less knowledge of efficient political machinery than a ten-year-old has of an automobile, fumbles and boggles and finds running its governmental affairs a severe test of patriotism.

No wonder that other nations beginning new governmental experiments are watching our floundering after one hundred and thirty years of self-government and are finding that in many respects we stand as a warning, not a guide. One university has an endowed chair in citizenship. A small group have chosen that, perhaps a twelfth as many as those who choose engineering or chemistry. Our medical schools are crowded. But the physicians who are in training to heal the sicknesses of the body politic and cure anaemia and paralysis are far to seek and chronic illness, due to neglect, is sapping the life-blood of the republic.

The Paper of Pins

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I RODE with friends, who took me in a Swift Chariot, and we journeyed through places where I was a stranger. And they told me concerning one and another of the folk who had lived in the houses along the road. And concerning one of them, this is the story that a certain lady told to me:

Once upon a time, there was a Young Lady, who came of a Prosperous Family, and who continued Prosperous by Rigid Economy. And she never in all her life had owned an whole Paper of Pins. And when she was about to be Married, then there was bought for her a Paper of Pins. And she prized it more than almost anything that she ever had owned. And when she removed pins from the Paper for the fastening of her Wedding Gown, she was careful not to lose them. And she put them all back, each one in its own two little holes.

And as the days and years came and went, she took heed, and when she saw a Pin, she picked it up; and if ever she lost a pin that had been in her Paper, she replaced it with one of the Same Size. So she kept that Paper of Pins and a Pin Cushion besides, and the Paper of Pins lasted like the Cruse of Oil of the Widow where the Prophet Elijah boarded. And all the years through, she was careful not to wear the holes in the Paper, and she kept putting back the Pins that she Borrowed.

And it came to pass in time that she died. And they took from the Paper the pins that fastened her Shroud. And except for the pins that were thus used, the Paper of Pins was intact as it was when she bought it. And she lived with her husband Forty years, and he never had to buy her a Paper of Pins, no, nor yet One Pin.

And they said that her husband was Likeminded; and they had Money in the Bank. But as she was with her Paper of Pins, so was he with all his possessions. Therefore did they both live and die Poor; and they left a Large Estate, over which their Heirs quarreled; and the Lawyers got the most of it. And when the time came for the Heirs to divide what was left, behold it was very little: but one of the Great-nieces got the original paper of Pins. And only so many were missing as had gone into the Shroud.

And I considered that every man and woman doth measure his or her own life and soul by the value which is set by them upon Material Things. A Pin is not to be wasted; but he who doth set the value of a Paper of Pins so high can never be otherwise than Poor. And it would not greatly alter the Situation if the Paper of Pins were a Gold Mine.

The Struggle to Break Denominational Shackles

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

THE federated church, the union church, and the community church are different, each from the others, in important features, but they are alike in marking an attempt to escape from the limitations and evils of denominationalism. Union churches long ago appeared, and remain here and there. Federated churches appeared a little later. Community churches are more recent still. Union churches have often been formed in more or less violent revolt. Federated churches are inspired by a temperate spirit, and have indeed been frequently promoted by denominational field officials, though others have been resisted or embarrassed by the opposition of denominational leaders. Community churches have sprung up unheralded and, as a rule, unsponsored by denominational agencies or by any other promoting body. They are perhaps the most spontaneous religious movement in our history. They spring out of the vivid community spirit which has broken forth in all parts of the country, and which expresses itself in numerous social tendencies of the greatest significance.

I

It is not necessary for the purposes of our discussion to recite the history of these three types of churches, nor to analyze minutely their character or their differences. They are steps in progress. They do not follow rhythmically one after the other. The steps are now taken simultaneously, though the first venture in each is differently dated. There are those who believe that each is the latest and best word in religious organization. Others adopt the one or the other, understanding full well that it is a temporizing measure, worth while as a step in progress away from impossible conditions created by denominational conflicts or stagnation, but conscious that other steps should and must soon follow.

The weakness of all of them is the tendency to enter into rivalry in its own field with the denominational church. There are relatively few of them which serve a community alone. They are thus in active competition with denominational churches. Their common aim is to overcome the evils of competition in religious organization, yet their common method is to enter more or less vigorously into such competition. Maybe it is not fair to say that they fight fire with fire. Yet they run the risk of attempting to supplant unholiness by a holier-than-thou holiness. They are a "liberal" enterprise, invoking a rebuke to "conservatism." Some of them are not blatant in this rebuke; they freely and sincerely invite all citizens of whatever faiths to join them, but they are not always careful to make all feel at home. They are built on creeds, as a rule, but their creeds are contrived so as to be as unobtrusive as possible. This puts them at a disadvantage among the staunch structures which thoroughly convinced factions in the community make of their denominational bodies. These latter sadly lack the capacity to serve the whole religious need of their communities, but when it comes to a fight they are armed and securely intrenched for the contest.

It would be very unjust to imply that these three types of reform in church organization are militant and born of the pugnacious spirit. Their progeniture is precisely the contrary. They are conceived to overcome and eliminate the contumacy which so often blights the spiritual life of communities set upon by contending denominational bodies. But they all fail more or less conspicuously to achieve their purpose. They make the mistake of supposing that unity can be attained in religion by suppressing or disregarding differences of temperament and opinion. Many adopt the motto, "In essentials unity, in non-essentials charity," and then split or stagnate upon the attempt to determine what are essentials and what non-essentials.

II

The lumping of these three types must not go the extent of neglecting their differences. The federated church usually cherishes no hope of unifying the religious society, while the community church announces that aim. A federated church results from the conviction of two or more weak denominational churches that the interests of each will be better served by the union of their forces for certain purposes. They find that the congregation can worship together, that they can conduct certain lines of social work in common, and that they can reduce overhead and thus economize in running expenses. They still divide their contributions to benevolent causes, and each group is encouraged loyally to support the missionary and other enterprises of the denomination of which they are members. No one of the group in the federation cuts the connection with its denomination. They assume no more definite or comprehensive community responsibility than did the separate congregations. Often, perhaps usually, the federation is maintained in a community where denominational churches go on their way in the old order of separate and independent existence.

Unfortunately a similar remark may be made of most community churches. While they aspire to embrace the whole religious society in their body, as a matter of fact most of them are faced on their own ground with denominational organizations which decline to be included in the community scheme. The community church aspires largely, but rarely or never fully attains, while the federated church attains certain practical economies, and lets the larger, sterner problems of community religion await larger aspirations for their solution.

On the other hand, the community church sometimes appears to succeed by compromising its principles. In peculiarly homogeneous communities a denominational church sometimes occupies the field alone, and calls itself a community church. So far as religion gains social expression in its community it expresses it. It forestalls the attempts of dissenting groups to introduce other denominational organizations by softening its own creedal requirements. Numbers of so-called community churches are actually liberal and mild-mannered denominational churches, sometimes indeed retaining the name in parenthesis on the church bulletin board and in their literature. Their missionary and other extra-community activities also go to support the denominations with which they are affiliated.

This type of church cannot endure the strain of diversified religious sentiments. It succeeds in towns and rural communities made up of people of homogenous racial strains or of congenial social antecedents or of relatively level economic status. It is unthinkable among populations of wide economic and social divergencies. There are organizations in such centers which call themselves community churches, and justify their appropriation of the name by an irenic spirit and a human service which shouts no shibboleths and imposes no restrictions upon belief or conduct, except as they are imposed by the canons of any orderly and neighborly society. But they are not community churches in the realization of the ideal to which they aspire. To enable them to realize their aim, society must, in all of its departments, be thoroughly reorganized. They resemble denominational churches to the extent of prescribing a method or a mode to which society is expected to conform in ordering its religious interests. They are churches. They declare against ecclesiastical methods, yet exist by adopting them. They denounce all creeds, yet are held together by a "declaration of purpose" which their detractors vex and embarrass them by calling creeds.

The union church sometimes contents itself with aspirations little enlarged beyond that of the federated church; sometimes it aspires only less ambitiously than does the community church. It is the weakest of the three. It has the least definite aim. Its philosophy is least consistently worked out. It usually springs of the vague desire to quit the contentions which sectarian rivalries inspire, and it suffers, so long as it exists, from the negative character of its aims. Which is not to say that union churches are not frequently inspiring to their membership, and very serviceable to their communities. But the mortality among them has been high. Some quickly disappear, and others ere long join a willing denomination, usually one of the more liberal order.

III

Full tribute should be paid all of these movements, and the spirit out of which they spring. Our religious life would be poorer without them. If they fall short, they suffer the fate of all made-up contrivances. They have their day and cease to be. Such a fate is not sad. It is the saving of society and honoring to the dead. Rather, sad and baneful is the persistence of forms and institutions which undo much of their initial good service by stubbornly holding on beyond their time and function. This is not to say that the time has everywhere passed for the prevalence of the types of churches we are discussing. They are redeeming many a situation, at least to the extent of saving it from hopelessness. Each such project should be encouraged, new organizations of each of these types may well be formed here and there. The community church, especially, thrills many with hope where any other apparent alternative invites despair.

But in the search for a reasoned principle of religious organization we shall not likely rest in any of these. They are palliative, meliorative measures which are worth all they cost, but must in the end reveal the defects of the principle which they embody. They are the attempt of doctrinal liberalism to win, to serve the community so efficiently and generously that all will rally to its standard. This is an end greatly to be desired if one is a liberal, and wishes to see the conservatives worsted. But the discovery of such an intent is not likely to reassure the confirmed conservative. He has no notion of accepting defeat in an open fight, nor will sly attempts to take him from ambush or by circumvention be less uncompromisingly resisted. Most historians are liberals of a more or less pronounced type, and history has been almost invariably interpreted as the process by which liberalism has finally won against conservative reaction; it is the story of how doughty liberals have succeeded in dragging society to the heights in spite of the desperate efforts of conservatives to keep it floundering in the lowland sloughs. This is a heroic picture, and is highly satisfying to the vanity of the liberals. But perhaps we liberals shall some day learn that it is not accurate history. If we have been all these eons dragging society by main strength toward the heights, and have succeeded only as now, it is not surprising that our vanity is sometimes clouded with fleeting sentiments of despair.

A keener sense of democracy, which we loudly laud and little comprehend, will perhaps some day vouchsafe a truer appreciation of the goals of social progress, and of the methods and courses through which they are to be attained. The end is not the triumph of either the liberal or the conservative, but rather the healthy and frank and unafraid persistence of the two in the one perpetually unfolding social organism. For either to scheme or even to wish for the final discomfiture and suppression of the other, is to will the undoing of society, including the dearest hopes and loftiest sanctions of religion. Undoubtedly the conservatives have had long and unchallenged innings, which they have used with fell results. In society's sufferings at their hands they have themselves, of course, shared, but only the cataclysm, or its dire threat, has cured their obtuseness even for a spasm. The very banality of their policies ought to warn the liberal not, in the day of his power, to repeat their folly. He ought, indeed, to beware of unreined power. Those seized of power abuse it, always. The liberal ought not to want to have things all his own way. He can gain little reassurance from the history of liberal churches. Every one of our stagnated, rigid denominational organizations began in a liberal movement To continue forever duplicating the folly of ordering our religious life on this basis, is not complimentary to our intelligence. Our most serious problem in religious organization today is not finding a basis for some new cult or order; it is rather devising means to get rid of the masses of such which already overburden society. Forming new churches to supplant the old furnishes the slough into which ecclesiastical conceptions have brought us, and out of which ecclesiasticism has no vision whatever to lead us. Patching up our ecclesiastical system even with such sincerely conceived devices as these new types of churches, will give us simply a patched-up system. It will creak, and clank, and consume more fuel relatively to its product, the more we patch it. Forming new ecclesiastical contrivances to crowd out the old should seem futile to those who have followed the history of American churches. We ought to have learned by this time that under an ecclesiastical regime ecclesiastical bodies never disappear; creating more simply adds to the already intolerable burden.

IV

Thus we are confronted with the demand for a principle in religious organization which shall afford a victory to neither the conservative nor the liberal, and which shall eliminate ecclesiasticism. The attempt to concoct this principle and method out of lucubrated theories would be as ridiculous as it would be futile. But practical tendencies in our religious life show that the principle is not now far to seek. When it is consistently applied ecclesiasticism will no longer dominate. Certain types of worthy service closely associated in the minds of most of us with ecclesiastical absolutism, are not necessarily so associated. The inherent evils in ecclesiasticism are too flagrant to be overlooked or perpetuated. Its elimination will be all gain. And if American democracy cannot eliminate it, the hope of the fathers will have failed; our civilization will be one with the futilities of the past. The roots of more socially noxious growths strike down into this banal soil than we comprehend. The hopes of democracy center more directly in being rid of it than we understand. Not incidental reforms are at stake, but aims and ideals which determine society's health and our destiny.

The Method of the New Preaching

By Joseph Fort Newton

I

TRANSLATION

EVERY age has its dialect, its accent, its manner of speech—in art, in literature, in religion—and the gospel must be so preached, as at Pentecost, that each new age may hear the words of life in its own tongue. Jesus knew how to translate "the truths that wake to perish never" out of the abstract and academic into the living speech of his time, using old and simple and lovable things to make his meaning plain; and the common people heard him gladly. The necessity for this divine art was forced upon us during the war, when we preached to vast multitudes of lads swept together in the armies. Everywhere I went in the camps and hospitals, the report was the same: "The old stuff will not go"; which meant that the boys simply did not understand the language of the church. Only a few who had been trained in the church knew what the preachers were talking about. As to the vocabulary of religion, the vast majority were actually illiterate. In those days in the after-meetings the congregations talked back at the preachers, and it was often a terrifying experience—showing how much preaching missed the mark by going over the heads of its hearers.

Some examples will make the point plain. One Sunday evening, after my service at the City Temple, I went down to conduct an after-meeting for a friend at the Alwych theatre, at that used by the Australian armies for religious gatherings. As I had not heard the sermon, I asked some one to give me an account of it. Whereupon a British Tommy gave me a synopsis of the sermon, and I can still see his big blue eyes and hear his soft English voice as he told me, precisely, point by point, what the preacher had said. The subject was The Grace of God, and Tommy closed his account, with exquisite courtesy, in these words: "The minister told us that the grace of God is plentiful, sufficient to all need, and near at hand, but he did not tell us what the grace of God is; perhaps you, sir, will be good enough to do that." Think of such a question being fired at you, point blank, with no warning at all! Honestly, I had never asked myself that question in my life, having used the word "grace" for years without thinking of what it meant. The old saying of St. Augustine flashed through my mind: "I know until you ask me; when you ask me, I do not know."

Before I could make reply, a tall New Zealander stood up and expressed amazement that Tommy did not know what the grace of God is. Fortunately, he proceeded to tell us, which literally saved my life. The grace of God, he said, is to the moral and spiritual world what the mysterious, ever-present, ever-active power of recovery, of healing, of renewal is in nature. When a man is "pinked" —the slang for being wounded—all the forces of health in the body rush to that spot. No physician ever heals a disease; all he does is to help the healing forces of nature do their work. This healing power of nature sets at once to repair ruin even when the ruin is not her own work but the result of the greed or folly of man. Trampled fields soon become green again. Similarly, in the spiritual world, a power of recovery is always at work, if we yield to it and know how to work with it. As the tide of evil rises, the tide of mercy and moral power rises against it: "When sin abounded grace did much more abound!" When evil runs rife and all seems lost, a deliverer appears who rescues a man or a nation in the hour of their extremity. Often it seems that the race cannot escape disaster, but his abundant power of spiritual renewal redeems it, and we are saved by grace. At any rate, he made more than a thousand men see that the grace of God is not an "empty name," as Berkeley said, but a reality near at hand, ready to help and heal.

For more than an hour we went on, taking the old words of religion and translating them into actual life. A Canadian said that in a universe where not at atom of matter, or a volt of energy, is ever lost, we ought to redefine what we mean by the salvation of man. There was a chorus of assent, and when I quoted a sentence from Clutton-Brock it seemed to clear the air: "Salvation is seeing that the universe is good, and becoming a part of that goodness." An American said that we need a new version of the word faith, which a Harvard student defined as "the ability to believe what you know is not so," as if some special virtue attached to acceptance of the most incredible ideas. Some one recalled that the White Queen in "Alice in Wonderland" practiced believing impossible things a little while before breakfast every morning, as a form of exercise—a kind of spiritual "daily dozen," as it would be called now. There was applause when an Australian suggested that it would be just as well to drop the word faith for a decade, so unreal are the ideas associated with it. And renewed applause as I ventured to quote the words of Donald Hankey—killed on the Somme—as describing what we really mean by faith: "Religion is betting your life that there is a God." As we joined in the Lord's prayer at the end all must have felt that we had cracked the shell of mere words and found the kernel of reality; and that is what the new preaching is learning to do.

II

RECONCILIATION

Upon the new preachers is laid the old ministry of reconciliation, and it is much needed just now as between the younger generation and their elders. Time out of mind, to go no further back than Romeo and Juliet, this old feud has been the theme of bitter tragedy; and it may be so in our day if we are not wise. Like all other things it has been made acute by the war, which left the world neurotic, erotic, and in so many ways idiotic. Old restraints are thrown lightly aside, old standards upset, old confidences challenged. It is rather trying when our young realists insist upon emptying the garbage can in the drawing-room, but we must be patient, hoping all things while enduring much. At best the mood of the younger set is a most engaging sauciness; at worst, it is downright impudence. Youth loves to shock, startle and amaze, but it is not half as bad as it paints itself, mistaking audacity for originality and contortions for inspirations. None the less, it is a mistake to think that youth is not serious just because it refuses to be solemn, and goes pirouetting in the van of the angels.

Nowhere is the breach between youth and age wider today than in matters of religion, and there is need of tact as well as insight. A case in point is a recent book describing "Civilization in the United States", by a group of Young Intellectuals. It contained chapters on almost every aspect of American life, except religion, and those who may be interested in that antiquated subject were referred to the chapter on "Nerves"—though why they used the word in the plural is hard to know. It is all very clever, very smart. Denunciation is worse than wicked; it is stupid. Instead, in a day when the politician has his ear to the ground, and the little boy has his radio wire in the air, "listening in," we must seek to understand what lies back of it all. So, at least, I have been trying to do among our literary set in New York, and if I have heard many things—some of which are not so—I have learned much to make me think. Hear now a faithful transcript of the mood of a gifted and high-minded young man, honorable alike in his character and his achievement, as he recalled his austere up-bringing in New England:

> It is like a nightmare to think of it. Sunday was as dismal as a funeral. Joy was a sin, an idea an agony. Every happy impulse and instinct was trampled upon, suppressed, as if it were a thing vile and shameful. God was a big policeman always on watch with a club. Facts about sex were unclean, and I grew up in ignorance of my own nature. If one asked a human question, the old extinguisher was brought out and applied. All inquiry about religion was squelched forthwith, as if one had touched a taboo. We had to swallow it whole, willy nilly, take it or leave it. Art was a blasphemy and science and invention of the devil. No, it's all off. I'm done. They got God and the devil mixed. They put the war over on us, but they can't get their religion across. They think we are a wild, godless set. It may be so, if they mean their petty, fussy little God, who is harder to please than a spinster school-mistress. We are not irreligious, but we want reality. What is the church going to do about it? No preacher over forty can speak our language, and the young fellows shy at the puulpit. No, I don't talk this to the old folk—they would not understand.

There was more of a sort similar, only more stinging, showing how bitterly he had reacted against the older view, repression rebounding in rebellion. As I tried to "listen in," knowing the fine spirit and purpose of my friend, I thought how Jesus would love such a lad and how quickly he would understand. When I spoke of the Master, and of the high demands he makes upon us, the mood changed and irritation gave way to a gentle hush in our hearts. As the talk went on, we agreed that the old folk did the best they knew and meant it for the best, and that youth must listen to what age has to say about life, that its blunders may not be repeated. All truth was not achieved by our fathers. Nor will wisdom die with us. Logical extremes do not arrive at the truth, but only darken perception and lose what is most worth finding. "They would not understand"—that is the tragedy on the other side, and it is heart-searching and moving, revealing a chasm which Christian strategy must somehow bridge, if youth and age are to unite, as Meredith said they must, in building the temple of "the credible God."

Indeed, one of the finest insights of Meredith is that in which he was able to reconcile wise age and joyous youth, and the new preaching may well take a lesson from him. Across the gulf that separates the ends of life he flung a delicate network of sympathies, showing how instinctive wisdom may be added to trained intelligence in the service of the larger truth. In this matter he was more successful than Stevenson, in whose audacious defence of the ideals of youth we are always aware of his own revolt from the religious traditions of his home. It would be interesting to know what the elder Stevenson thought of the Vailima Prayers, if he ever read them, and especially the one beginning, "Give us courage and gaiety and the quiet mind!" Where Stevenson failed Meredith triumphed by bringing youth and age together, and by the discovery, one of the happiest ever made, that wits and passions join

To rear the temple of the credible God!

Neither the severity of age nor the impulsiveness of youth is able alone to build the temple of God. Only as the trophy of many insights, many affirmations, may we hope to arrive, if not at comprehension, at least at the confidence and power of a saving faith. And what is true as between youth and age is equally true between the wisdom of the ancient faith and the noble, fruitful and brilliant agitations of modern thought.

The story of Samuel might have been written yesterday. Suddenly, in a rather violent fit of modernism, the people said to the venerable judge: "Behold, thou art old," and, cruellest of all, "Even thy sons walk not in thy ways." It was a blunt, brutal blow, and the old man awoke to the fact that all he stood for—his order, his methods, his way of thinking—was being voted out of date. New ideas were in the air. Kings were the latest fashion, and Samuel did not believe in kings. It was useless to argue that new methods do not always cure old ills; "the people refused to harken unto the voice of Samuel." Then follows a picture which melts my heart. And "Samuel heard all the words of the people and rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord." The vision of that old man at his prayers, his head white and bent, his face drawn, alone with his perplexity and his God, ought to haunt the heart of youth. In the home, in the church the generations clash. It is inevitable, but it is not inevitable that it should be made as bitter as it often is for those who must bear the brunt of it. God told Samuel to let the people have their way, and he did it with a dignity and grace forever memorable. He did not sulk. He refused to be a die-hard. He chose the new king, crowned him, led the shout in his honor, "and wrote it in a book." While we admire his wisdom, we must not be blind to his generosity, and to the fine spiritual sportsmanship which he learned on his knees!

INTERPRETATION

It is one of my habits to read all the books about preaching, and in each one I find something new, valuable, and fascinating. One of the most recent of such books is "Preaching and Sermon Construction," by Father Paul Bull, priest of the community of the resurrection, and it is a rewarding book. What struck me was its central insight in which the author detects the leading trait of our age—nay, its tragedy—in the divorce of science from mysticism, of the head from the heart, of fact from value. "These activities of the human spirit which God joined together and man today has put asunder and set at war, the preacher must get men to reunite in a rich harmony of peace." With which agrees the insight of Dean Inge, who says that as matters now stand we are left with the impression that "science gives us facts without values, and religion values without facts." It is an intolerable dualism, not only distressing but dangerous, and it may almost be said to be the crux of the whole question of religious faith in our day. Religion cannot go on living in a world with but one hemisphere; it must win all or lose all.

Dean Inge writes these noble words: "Formless and vague and fleeting as it is, the mystical experience is the bedrock of religious faith. In it the soul, acting as a unity with all its faculties, rises above itself and becomes spirit; it asserts its claim to be a citizen of heaven." So far, good; but if religion is not to be a visionary scene suspended in the sky, the soul must assert its claim to be a citizen of the earth, which is also one of the heavenly bodies; in answer to the prayer the Master taught us to pray, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." As it is, mysticism, ejected by science and theology alike, takes refuge in all kinds of cults, and is forced to be a religious bootlegger haunting the hotels of our cities. It is an outcast, made so by science grinding at facts and theology disputing about dogmas and rites; while "the light that never was on sea or land"—the truth that makes all other truth true—seems like a mirage, a will-o'-the-wisp in a marsh.

Here is a challenge to the new preaching to reunite what God has joined together, using science to interpret religion and religion to interpret science, making two mighty forces friends. For, manifestly, if great social ideals are ever to be realized, it must be by the power of mystical faith using the facts and skill of science to organize fraternal righteousness. How can it be done? Many of the older preachers, like Lyman Abbott—to whom we owe an unpayable debt—accepted the results of scientific research, and found them rich in religious meaning. But the new preaching will go much further. It sees the universe as all of a piece, divinely ordered and illumined, and that science is reading here a line and there a stanza of the manuscripts of God. It knows that all human thought—in science no less than in religion—begins and ends in faith, and that its achievements are so many confirmations of faith. Therefore, it will welcome not only the facts of science, but its method, its spirit, its temper, which, as Huxley said, is the humble, docile, child-like spirit which Jesus made the key to the kingdom of heaven. Lowell, in "The Cathedral," pointed out the path:

Science was Faith once; Faith were Science now,
Would she but lay her bow and arrow by
And arm her with the weapons of her time.
Nothing that keeps thought out is safe from thought.
For there's no virgin-fort but self-respect,
And truth defensive hath lost hold of God.

Aye, "faith were science now," did we know that we live in a dependable universe, in which law reigns—law, not fitful moods or capricious emotions—in the far off star, in the nearby atom, and in the soul of man. The new preaching will discover that the spiritual universe, the moral order, the inner life of faith and vision and power, is also a realm of law, order, discipline, and beauty: and that is the meaning of mysticism. Today we see psychology confirming one after another the old laws of the spiritual life learned by the mystics long ago, obedience to which sent Francis singing through the world, and made Wesley a redeemer of England from rot and revolution. The power whereby they, and others of like daring adventure, transformed their times is with us still, once we know its laws and yield ourselves to it. To that end the new preaching will seek the laws of the inner life, using not only the sermon, but symbol and sacrament, the better to bring "folk of many families," walking many scattered ways, distracted and distraught, into the unity of the spirit and the bond of fellowship, that all may know together what none may know alone, and become, in very truth, the body of Christ, wearing his seamless robe—his cross the center of consecration and the sign of conquest. But of that one may not speak—except to say that we must express that ineffable Reality for which words were never made, and which our worship of ideas leaves unuttered.

IV

EXPLORATION

As a matter of strategy, if for no other reason, the new preaching must be inductive in its emphasis and approach. Inevitably so, because the whole spirit and method of thought in our day in inductive, and if we are to win the men of today to the truths of faith we must use the method by which they find truth in other fields. In the old days the text was a truth assumed to be true, and the preacher only needed to expound its meaning, deduce its lessons and apply them. Often enough a text was a tiny peg from which a vast weight of theology depended, and so long as men accepted the theology all went well. Of course, the old formula, "the Bible teaches, therefore it is true; the church affirms, therefore it is valid," is still sufficient for those who accept such authorities. But in an age of inquiry, when the authority of the Bible and the church is in debate, such an appeal does not carry conviction. We may wish it otherwise, but we must face the facts and be wise enough to win men on their own terms, remembering that we are persuaders, not soldiers, fishers of men and not mere critics. Also, if by the inductive method we can show the truths of faith to be real, we have re-established the authority of the Bible and the church.

For some time I have been discussing the matter of inductive preaching with my English friends in letters, much to my delight and profit. One of them sent me an example of an inductive sermon so admirable that I venture to pass it along. The preacher wished to make a plea for single-heartedness in the service of God, taking for his text the words of Jesus, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Had he used the old method he would have stated the truth of the text as a proposition and gone straight to his deductions, but he would not have carried his hearers with him. Many men today, as you will agree, are unconvinced that such a double service is impossible. Indeed, not a few hold that the great thing in life is precisely a skillful adjustment of the service of God and the service of the world—like the old woman who always curtseyed at the name of the devil "so as to be safe anyhow," and her family is very large. The preacher may have the tongue of an angel, but he will not win men in that way who question the truth of his text at the outset.

By the inductive approach it is different; it puts no weight on the text at first, but begins with nearby facts familiar to all, using popular illustrations. Is it not true that in factory life fatigue and weariness are common? Why? The mind is divided. On the contrary, the theatre and the golf game bring the minimum of weariness, in spite of long hours. Why? The mind is not divided. In the same way, hours spent in pursuing a hobby—growing roses, say—even produces freshness of mind. Why? There is single-hearted enjoyment in the work. "Why, this is true!" is the unspoken verdict; the truth of the text is approved, not only as upon divine authority, but as a truth of experience. Having led his hearers on a tour of exploration, the preacher may now skillfully use a sense of intellectual satisfaction as an opportunity to create a deep sense of spiritual dissatisfaction. Such a method seems to be the best in an age which has a peculiar bent towards discovery; and for the presentation of difficult or unpopular truth it is invaluable. It is a flank attack on the fortifications of prejudice, its most striking virtue being its element of surprise.

The method of Jesus was distinctly inductive, as we see in all his parables. He knew that men are discoverers, and not least in the things of the spirit. He really had but one text, "God is love," but He never quoted it, much less assumed its truth as accepted. Instead, he began with facts from the life around him, and these were presented with exquisite art, converging upon his main thesis. A man giving his child bread, a farmer pulling his ox out of the pit, a father receiving a prodigal son home, a hen and her chicks, a wayside flower, a childish game, red sunsets, a wedding, making bread—all life became at his touch an infinite parable of the truth that makes life worth living, investing these our days and years with epic worth and wonder. It is to be noted that he always used this method in speaking to the stranger, the doubter, and the sinner, and, since he has done more good than all of us put together, it behooves us to follow his lead.

It remains to point out that the new preaching will not be content with the culture of a private piety. It will be the prophet, no less, of public religion, not only social in its insight but international in its aspiration. Just now we are between two eras, when the old individualism has shown itself to be clearly inadequate, and the wider social mind has not fully come. As Clutton-Brock said: "In two thousand years we have advanced at least to this point, that, if we are to have religion at all, we cannot believe in private salvation." Moreover, a man who can be content with his own salvation, or with the very idea of a private salvation, proves, by that fact, that he is not saved. If God has tied all humanity together, and science, by annihilating time and distance, has jammed it together, it must learn to live together in a world community, or perish. For the first time in history the race is able either to live together as a family or destroy itself; and that is the issue before the world.

Alas, the church in its choice between the redemption of mankind and the rescue of a few from the wreck of divine failure, gave up the greater hope for the lesser.. In nothing was the divinity of Jesus more clearly revealed than in his vision of the communal redemption of all humanity, and the church cannot be called Christian until it sees that vision, not as a vague dream to be longed for, but as the first truth of his teaching. Christianity has not failed; it is about to be discovered. In the presence of this fact, and the world issues involved, the questions that divide sect from sect are infinitesimal and insignificant. No wonder the new preaching is impatient with sectarianism, finding it intolerably petty in face of the real facts of the gospel and the world! It is not concerned to debate dead dogmas, but, rather, to poise its bright lance against the real enemies of Christ—the unutterable wickedness of war, the organized atheism of our industrial order, and the stupid materialism which, to gain a temporary advantage, imperils the existence, no less than the security, of society. Against racial rancor, religious bigotry, and the horn-eyed obtuseness of blind greed, it aims its darts with the insight and passion of the prophets of old, in the name of him in whose gospel hate is the supreme sin and love is the sovereign reality.

Much has been done—how much we need to remind ourselves, by looking back fifty years—but more remains to be done, if we are to have men and women who know how to think in terms of one humanity and one Christianity; and to that task the new preaching is dedicated. They speak to a pitiless force who hope for any kind of world co-operation until we have, in greater degree than hitherto, a world-mindedness illumined by spiritual vision. To that end the new preaching has taken vows to interpret the meaning of life, the facts of science, the movements of the world, in the light of the mind of Christ, as the greatest reality with which the mind of man can come in contact—the one Light that gives coherence and cohesion to an else ambiguous and unintelligible universe—that so, in the long last, by the grace of God, our humanity may live in a frontierless and unfortified world, ruled by moral intelligence and fraternal goodwill. These things shall be, else Christianity is a dream too fair to have been true in the past and too frail ever to be true in the future, and we are the dupes of a divine delusion. It is a great day for the preacher, if he believes his religion, knows his age, loves it, lives in it, speaks its dialect, feels the pathos of its quest and the thrill of its adventure. The preaching of the past was noble, stately, rich in beauty and power, in myriad keys and tones eloquent for God. The new preaching is more simple, direct, human, dipped and dyed in the color of life, more artless in its technique, more intimate in its appeal; but it proclaims the same gospel which, in its depth and power and richness, is equal today, as in all the days agone, to every mortal need and every immortal longing. May the Lord of all good life melt our hearts with love, clear our minds with the bright vision of an emancipated faith, and touch our lips with lyric fire, that we may tell the truth as it is in Jesus.

Alice Meynell: Poet of the Eternal

By Edward Shillito

ALICE MEYNELL has a deserved immortality in the poems of Francis Thompson. If she had never written a line, she would have had the glory of saving for the world the author of "The Hound of Heaven." The story of all that she and her house did for that poet, is told in his life, for he was not the man to forget the generous hearts that understood him, and loved him, and delivered him. But apart from this immortality, Alice Meynell has one in her own right. There will never come a time in which her poems, few and perfect, will not be read and loved; and so long as the Christian faith is dear to men, these inspired interpretations will open to them, as they have opened to us, new visions of the mysterious order by which we are haunted and beset. It is more than the mastery of form we find; it is spiritual vision. All the poems may be read in an hour or two. She published a thin volume when she was a girl. Only a few welcomed this rare and finished work, but among the few was John Ruskin. It was only in 1893 that she gathered together these early poems and some later. Another volume followed in 1901, and of late her collected poems have been read by thousands. Now she has passed into the land of which she had many visions. She has left nothing which was not her best. For long years she was silent; like Patmore she would not go until she was sent; she had too much reverence for the gift of the poet to let it be lowered in dignity. But for her gift, many of us are grateful as a prisoner is grateful to the hand that strikes the bolt from his prison door and reveals to him the land of beauty and wonder outside. As a spiritual seer, Alice Meynell will keep her place. Her works are among the treasures which are kept safe.

> Heavenly treasure safe the ages through
> Safe from ignoble benison, or ban.

She had a reverence for the very thought of the poetic gift. The poet is linked to a thousand poets before him. Every song has its origin far away in the past. The poet is called to receive and convey the secrets of the past by which men live.

> Voices I have not heard possessed
> My own fresh songs; my thoughts are blessed
> With relics of the far unknown,
> And mixed with memories not my own
> The sweet streams throng into my breast.
> Before this life began to be
> The happy songs that wake in me
> Woke long ago, and far apart;
> Heavily on this little heart
> Presses this immortality.

The poet trembles at his calling. It is a mark of the great poets that they work out their task with fear and trembling. Her art was to Alice Meynell a wonderful mystery; it was something given to be received with humility. The singer has a certain detachment as though she heard a song coming from another world to another than she.

She is distinctive in her poems, but they deal always with universal things. The poet will not avoid old and even commonplace themes, but he will treat them with a greater depth than others and make them new. He comes to his theme with the delight and freshness of a child who is the first ever to see the moon or the daisies. The old universal themes are found again in Alice Meynell's poems, but they are seen freshly and as it might be for the first time.

There is, for example, the relation between the love of man for God, and the love of man for his fellow. "He that loveth father and mother more than me, is not worthy of me," said the Lord. Alice Meynell gave to this theme a setting in which all the pitifulness of the choice is laid bare. A mother had given her son to God; he had entered a religious order, and she saw him no more; many years afterwards one of that order came to her house; she did not know whether or not he were her son:

If to my son my alms were given
I know not, and I wait for Heaven.
He did not plead for child of mine
But for another child divine
And unto Him it was surely given.

There is One alone, who cannot change.
Dreams are we, shadows, visions strange;
And all I give is given to One.
I might mistake my dearest son,
But never the Son who cannot change. .

Of if we think of that undying theme—the passing of youth into age, we shall see how quick with tender insight Mrs. Meynell's treatment is of that familiar theme. She wrote in her earliest volume "A Letter from a Girl to Her Own Old Age."

Listen, and when thy hand this paper presses,
O time-worn woman, think of her who blesses
What thy thin fingers touch, with her caresses.

O fainting traveller, morn is grey in heaven,
Dost thou remember how the clouds were driven?
And are they calm about the fall of even?

It is not a matter of wonder that the closing stanzas of this poem moved Ruskin more than any other modern verses.

Or to take one more universal theme—the miracle wrought by death if the faith of Christ is true. Who among us has not wondered at the bedside of some worn and beaten man at the impending miracle. Soon, very soon, he will know what the wisest on earth have not known. Mrs. Meynell describes a crossing-sweeper on Manchester Square.

The paralytic man has dropped in death
The crossing sweeper's brush to which he clung,
One-handed, twisted, dwarfed, scanted of breath
Although his hair was young.

I saw this year the winter vines of France,
Dwarfed, twisted goblins in the frosty drouth,
Gnarled, crippled, blackened little stems askance,
On long hills to the South.

Great green and golden hands of leaves ere long
Shall proffer clusters to that vineyard wide,
And oh! his might, his sweet, his wine, his song,
His stature, since he died.

She had taken her side in the conflict between the faith and the denial of the faith. Like so many other religious poets of this age, she was a Catholic. Her world was the place trodden once by the feet of Christ and forever penetrated and thrilled by his sacramental presence. In her mind there was a covenant between nature, man and God. Yet the nature of that bond was not disclosed to all, but the poet can read the language of the covenant. Nature as she beheld it was sensitive to the human heart in its sorrow and ready to bring all its consolations, but it hides something.

O daisy mine, what will it be to look
From God's side even of such a simple thing?

But this nature eagerly waiting finds its consummation in man, and man his glorious fulfillment in the Son of Man. The sadness of earth, the unutterable pathos of human life with its renunciations and its partings can all be borne, because the secret has been revealed in Christ.

Given, not lent,
And not withdrawn—once sent
This infant of mankind, this One
Is still the little welcome Son.

New every year
New-born and newly dear
He comes with tidings and a song,
The ages long, the ages long.

Every man in such a world, so mysteriously endowed, became infinitely wonderful. A stranger kneeling by her side after the holy eucharist was no more one of a crowd but a sacred being in whose heart Christ dwelt, and so real was this faith that she could pray to "Christ in this man's heart." A throng at the communion was like a field of flowers."

A thousand single central daisies they,
A thousand of the one;
For each the entire monopoly of day
For each the whole of the devoted sun.

Human life becomes under such conditions filled with strange surmises of a hidden future; and nature itself finds her glorious fulfillment in the Man, the divine Lord. He it is who

Waits in the cornlands far and near
Bright in His sun, dark in His Frost,
Sweet in the vine, ripe in the ear,
Lonely unconsecrated Host.

Of the unfolding and the triumph of that Man and of the price paid for the redemption which He wrought, Mrs. Meynell has told in a little poem, "The Crucifixion."

Only one has explored
The deepmost; but He did not die of it.

Not yet, not yet he died. Man's human Lord
Touched the extreme; it is not infinite.

But over the abyss
Of God's capacity for woe, He stayed
One hesitating hour; what gulf was this?
Forsaken He went down, and was afraid.

Earth has its secret; other planets may not know what is its glory and its boast. Its meaning and its destiny are unfolded in the incarnation.

Of His earth-visiting feet
None knows the secret, cherished, perilous,
The terrible shamefast, frightened, whispered sweet,
Heart-shattering secret of His way with us.

O, be prepared, my soul!
To read the inconceivable, to scan
The countless forms of God those stars unroll
When, in our turn, we show to them a Man.

It was a lovely and sufficient faith by which this noble poet lived. To her the belief in the incarnate Son of God brought peace and mastery, and a hope, which grew brighter as the end came near. There are few references by which Alice Meynell's poems can be dated; they belong for the most part to timeless things. But none the less, the singer was one of us. She lived in the same world as that which surrounds us, but out of the material by the touch of faith, she wove a fair and lovely fabric; out of its jangled voices, she caught a heavenly music.

Making Americans Out of Russians

JEROME K. DAVIS was a Y. M. C. A. representative in Russia for nearly three years during the war and he has made another visit to Russia since. He not only learned the Russian language but, endowed with an exceptionally keen mind and a training in sociology, he was able discriminatingly to study the Russian character and to appraise the Russian revolution. Since returning home he has made a study of the Russian in America which is both intensive and extensive—intensive in its close and incisive study of the inner phases of their life and extensive in its treatment of all the major colonies in this country.*

There are in America about 700,000 Russians of the first and second generations, of whom 392,000 were born in Russia. The major migration was between 1910 and 1914 with 155,000 arriving. Only 8,332 of them brought more than $50 cash into the port of entry. They came to work at what looked to them to be fabulous wages, and nearly 65 per cent of the 700,000 settled in the industrial districts of New York and Pennsylvania. There they do hard, manual labor for the most part, and in comparison with the American scale their wages are the lowest. Steel, coal, and coke command the larger number, meat packing and textiles follow, and sugar refining comes next. These immigrants come largely from Russian farms where, while the small homes are not modern and sanitation is little known, the fields are wide, the air is fresh, the light is on four sides and above, and work is in the open. In this country the majority live in crowded tenements with high rent considering accommodation. They have little knowledge of hygienic living. The immigration commission found an average of 2.8 persons per room and reported that housing conditions were as bad as the owners dared to make them.

Once he is located, the Russian immigrant not only does the hardest and most dangerous of our labor, but he stays on the job. In 1920, 87 per cent were found where they had been in 1910. The Russian is rarely promoted, is indifferent to danger, easily becomes a drudge, and allows a sense of inequity to fire the resentment of radicalism in his breast. His children climb out of his slough of despond, however. Though they are taken out of school as soon as the law will allow and put to work to piece out the family exchequer, they have learned the language, become Americans, and seek to raise their standards of living; only 10 per cent of them are found following their father's occupations.

The most striking thing in Mr. Davis' survey is the discovery of the fact that the greater number of these pilgrims of hope, who have pictured America as a better land, gradually come to distrust and dislike us. It is not because a Russian is a born bolshevik either, but because the treatment he receives disillusions him and turns his hope into distrust. In Russia Mr. Davis found very few peasants or soldiers who had been in America who had a good word to say of their experiences, and of course, they spread their story among the neighbors.

Learning to Dislike America.

It is from Russian ranks that workmen for the twelve hour day and the seven day week shifts are recruted. Thousands of them work in steel, an industry which the author found least conducive of all to the making of good Americans. The Russian could change to something else if he were not illiterate, ignorant of the language, and lacking in skill. Hoping to escape oppression he finds the "boss" in the mill or mine a petty tyrant all too often. From a big, far away czar he falls into the clutches of a petty, near-by czar. Whiting Williams says the gang foreman in steel seems to be the worst type of the "what the hell" philosophy. In his native Russia the bureaucrat was far away at least, his fields were open and free, and he "bossed himself" when on the job. There he was used to cooperation in the local store and in the village life, while here the "gang" is a part of a machine system.

The Russian comes with fond dreams of a larger income and a free country; as a rule he realizes much less than he hoped for and often suffers a bitter disappointment in both respects. In a fairly wide study in Chicago the average wage was found, though wages were good, to be only $23 per week. If any money is saved on such a wage it is at the cost of the standard of living. Low wages force the immigrant to the more crowded sections and cheaper tenements. All too often banks are organized to exploit his savings. When he sends money home he is cheated in making the exchange. In his ignorance the word "state" or "national" on the window leads him to think the bank is a part of the government so that his mistreatment at the hands of the money shark brings distrust of the government. Mr. Davis found that the Russian paid more for food at the stores in his neighborhood than did Americans. Here again his ignorance is exploited. Used to fresh food at home he is given the old and musty in his "slum" quarter. And so bad food, too much poor meat, and bad air result in digestive troubles and tuberculosis. The New York Academy of Medicine found one-tenth of them ill.

The Palmer raids and prejudice against the bolshevik have reacted very badly upon the Russian in America. Hundreds were arrested who had no sense of disloyalty and many personal injustices were perpetrated through wholesale methods of "running down the reds". The prejudice against bolshevism was indiscriminately felt toward all Russians alike; loyal Old Believers were denied employment, and in some immigrant quarters a prejudice against even whiskers was noted. Every Russian was immediately suspected to be a bolshevik, and employers told Mr. Davis they did not employ Russians any more, saying "why take a bolshevik when we can get others."

Cultivating Suspicion.

Whiting Williams says the Russian's ignorance of his employer is only equaled by his employer's ignorance of him. Things easily remedied are left to breed suspicion and distrust and a sense of injustice. When hurt he fails to get what the law provides because he does not know the law and is taken advantage of. Some states exclude aliens from the benefits of industrial compensation and no one takes the trouble to inform him that a declaration of intention to become a citizen will entitle him to the benefit. In his ignorance he fears to lose employment or the privilege of returning to Russia through making a legal demand.

There are strong racial antagonisms in shop and mine and his treatment makes it easy for him to feel that Americans assume a superiority and do not welcome him. Crowded into "immigrant quarters", he is segregated from Americanizing influences. With small chance of promotion or of becoming a skilled worker he is not welcomed into the labor union, and only the I. W. W. or Union of Russian Workers seek him out. There radical ideas are cultivated. Because he is idealistic and visionary dreams of a new world where all injustice will be righted appeal to him. He is very loyal and sticks to his group tenaciously. W. Z. Foster says he "stays put" in a strike while Americans quit and go back to the job.

The Russian church and press have not helped. The Russian priest was loyal above all to the Little White Father and his attempts to tie his congregation back to the old regime of church and state in Russia have resulted in wholesale defections. The author found a great falling off in church and parochial schools. One priest in Brooklyn said 755 per cent of the Russian membership had quit the church. In North Dakota few were found in the congregations. Since the Russian revolution some congregations which have held together have revolted and demanded the right to elect their own priest. Some have even started an independent movement. The last religious census showed only fifteen Protestant churches that were exclusively Russian.

Many attempts to publish Russian papers have been made but few have succeeded. With 35 per cent of the immigrants unable to read or write the field is not propitious. The second generation quit school too early to become eager for information. The four or five dailies that are able to live are socialistic in their editorials and quite critical of American treatment of their people and of American institutions. Like the priests they are more concerned with things Russion than with things American. The inter-racial council found, however, that they had little effect in influencing the opinions of their readers.

Drastic anti-alien laws foster the suspicion that the immigrant is not wanted. He wonders why he cannot play ball in Pennsylvania on Sunday although he can work all day in a steel mill. When the steel strike was on the state constabulary was, to him, the counterpart of the cossacks. If he has an income that is taxable, he finds that deductions are not allowed an alien. The government charges his employer with responsibility for giving him the facts, but the employer all too often passes up the responsibility. The foreign language governmental information bureau found that thousands had been over-taxed through this delinquency of employers.

Americanization.

"The inclination of employers to identify Americanization with industrial submissiveness is with us today as in the past," says George Creel. The U. S. Immigration Commission at Pittsburgh said: "Our Americanization committees are largely a sham. They think only of getting the foreigner to take out citizenship papers, and that is the last thing he ought to do." The settlement workers have done a good deal. The Y. M. C. A. has done much. The Russians' own mutual aid associations have helped. The foreign language information service does more. In New York, the Carnegie Foundation sponsors in part a Russian Collegiate Institute. In California the immigration commission has been successful. With the children the public schools can do much if they can keep them, but industry calls them out as quickly as the law allows. But all these agencies reach only a few. The masses are unreached. "They are out of touch with every kind of culture and of educational influence, both American and Russian," said a Russian investigator of the American Russian colonies.

More than 40 per cent of the Russian immigrants are single men. Many husbands are here with families in Russia. Algether 72 per cent are men here without families. In the past 20 years only 14 per cent of the arrivals have been women and girls. Thus there is little home life or cultural influence. The saloon was the trysting place until it was abolished; now the moving picture and the pool hall take its place, and the pictures are usually of the sex variety. When the wife is here, she works hard and many children come. There is not much chance given the Russian, but he would make a good American if he had a chance. Mr. Davis has done a brilliant piece of work in revealing the facts.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

What Shall I Do on Sunday?*

THIS is a vital question and one to be faced frankly. Our Puritan fathers established the Sabbath as a sacred institution. They demanded strict observance. Within the last fifty years a great change has swept over our country in our regard for Sunday. One cause for this change is that the older generation succeeded in making Sunday so perfectly dull and depressing that a reaction was inevitable. Twenty years ago it was quite frequently heard on the lips of men whom you invited to church: "O, I got enough of that when I was a boy, and, as soon as I became my own master I avoided the whole business." The next generation, we grant you, will have quite another excuse! It was a mistake not to allow boys to whistle on Sunday; it is also a mistake to allow a boy to take a high-powered motor on Sunday morning and go off to the golf club. Industry now admits that a six day week is right. Six days of eight hours is now standardized. Once, in a steel center, the ministers staged a great mass meeting to protest against the mills running seven days a week. After brilliant speeches, it was a mill-man himself who ruined the whole movement because he insisted that six day work could not obtain in the steel mills. Just now there is a movement to make the number of working days as few as possible and the hours as short as possible, with the implication that labor is a curse. I do not sympathize with this trend; work is noble. We all have to toil; there is no easy way. Sunday should be protected for the workingman and he should use it well when it is given him. The abuse of leisure means its withdrawal. Most men do not now know how to use leisure, but they can be taught. Some trains must run on Sunday, certain kinds of operations in a complex society cannot stop altogether on Sunday, but every man can have time at home and can attend at least one church service of employer and employe desire such an end.

*Jan. 7, "Jesus Healing on the Sabbath," Scripture, Luke 13:10-17.

The so-called "tired business man" often sets a miserable example on Sunday. What ails this fellow is not hard work but dissipation, as a rule. He keeps late hours; he wastes his week; he seeks to catch up on Sunday by taking it out on God. This is selfish and contemptible. There is no excuse, under the sun, for any business man playing golf before noon. When he does this he sets a bad example to the community, for he is the type of man that boys imitate. I happen to know an unusual number of big business men who manage large concerns and handle hundreds of men. Many of the best of these men attend church regularly. If they can do it why must a lot of these little imitation business men run down to the office Sunday morning to read the mail? It seems smart to many men to talk pompously about their vast interests that tire them out so completely that they cannot get to church on Sunday. Most of this talk is pure bunk. Our men's class is taught by the president of a large manufacturing company—he never misses. The tired business man and the preacher with nervous prostration are jokes. "Nervous house-wives" there may be, but "tired business men"—we know these men—let's get another excuse.

When the bicycle appeared timid souls predicted that the churches would be emptied. When the auto came, again we heard the same story. When the radio appeared many predicted a great falling off in church attendance. On my desk are a pile of letters from all over the United States and Canada telling of my sermon broadcasted from the church last Sunday. Meanwhile more people than ever before are attending church services. Each new invention only makes possible more interest in churches. But while this is true I am impressed with a statement I hear frequently: "Our preacher is a fine fellow, but honestly, he can't preach." People no longer go to church merely from a sense of duty. The church must be made attractive. The most attractive thing, year after year, is strong, true preaching. Wherever there is a preacher of this type there is no complaint about church attendance. The "good-fellow" type of preacher cannot last long. What the church needs is preachers, men who toil over their sermons and who only enter the pulpit when some great theme burns in their hearts. What will you do on Sunday? You will go to church and you will support the real preachers in your community. And another thing: Sunday should be family day. Do you want to know the most beautiful sight in our church? A father and a mother, with four charming children between them—every Sunday. Sunday is to be used for religious worship and service. The day was created for our good. We are to use it well. All selfish excuses must be swept aside.

British Table Talk

London, Dec. 5, 1922.

CANON Peter Green of Manchester, a bold and independent thinker, has been rebuking those who are always saying that the church was a failure. Much depends upon the knowledge of facts possessed by the critic, and even more upon his standard of success. Canon Green says that two chief constables in Lancashire have recently written to him saying that things were bad, but they shuddered to think what they would be like but for the work and activity of the churches. The chief constable of Manchester did not merely confirm this, but declared that he thanked God every hour of the day and every day of the week for the work of the church. The Christian World, which quotes these testimonies, adds: "We should like Canon Green's words to resound everywhere throughout the land to hearten all those workers who year in, year out, are carrying on so steadily and faithfully the multifarious work of the churches and doing so much to keep the heart and life of the nation wholesome and strong." If the church compares itself to its own standard, it must be humbled to the dust, but when it compares itself to any other society on earth, it has no need to be ashamed, and it ought not to make its confessions of failure to reach its ideal into an acquiescence in all the contemptuous charges of the outside world: "Merit lives from man to man."

Dr. Jowett's Peace Campaign

Writing in The Daily Telegraph on Tuesday Dr. J. H. Jowett gives some details of his peace campaign, which opens on Monday with a meeting at Liverpool, to be addressed by the Archbishop of York and himself. "During the next few weeks," says Dr. Jowett, "the Archbishop of York and I are to address meetings of citizens in several of the great cities. At each of these meetings the lord mayor of the city will preside. We need something which will be more profound, more vitally effective and enduring. What we want is an act of personal dedication, as part of the corporate act of the whole church of Christ, in which every believer in Christ Jesus will, by some significant form of avowal, enlist himself in the cause of international brotherhood. It must be as real a consecration to the cause of peace as a man's enlistment in the cause of war. The thing must be done in some way which lifts it out of the ordinary routine. We must stand together as before the great tribunal, and we must take our sacramentum that in every way, at home and abroad, we pledge ourselves to eradicate the bitter things which are the roots of war, and that in rectitude, and if need be in sacrifice, we will seek fraternity and enduring peace. That is what I am hoping for, and I trust we may have it on the Sunday which this year makes our Christmas eve, and which would bring to the act all the influences of that sacred season. Of course, many difficulties are being encountered. They were expected. But I think they are one by one being removed, and I am not losing hope that such a measure of unanimity may be attained as will enable the church of Christ to take her stand in the van of all the forces which are seeking the peaceful relationship of mankind."

The Debate on Unemployment

Everyone who is competent to judge speaks well of the new house of commons. The debate on unemployment did credit both to the knowledge and seriousness of purpose of the members. On such a subject the house will always listen with courtesy and even eagerness to the men who know from bitter experience what unemployment means. On such a theme emotion is almost necessary to a complete treatment, and the academic touch by itself is not wanted. It is said that some of the labor members were impatient of the way in which their "intellectuals" handled this subject. A man who began life in the pit or in the mill may not be an expert on foreign policy, but he knows the pinch of unemployment, as the intellectual trained in a public school and university cannot claim to know it. The adjustment of the two groups will take tact and patience. Meanwhile though the government measures are condemned as inadequate, it is at least to the credit of Mr. Bonar Law that he has not lost time in tackling this vital problem. It will probably be in the mines that the next trouble will break out, but in almost all the great trades there is uneasiness at the moment, and the winter, though deferred, will soon be upon us. One policy on the part of revolutionary labor, is strongly condemned by the more far-sighted and sober members of the party. It is the policy of organizing marches of the unemployed to London as a move in a political game. A march that begins spontaneously is one thing; a march organized from a headquarters in London for a political end is another and a wrong thing.

Lord Balfour on Science and Religion

Lord Balfour is giving the Gifford lectures in the University of Glasgow; he is returning to his old theme, and any words of his on science and philosophy will have great weight. "Science in itself could not be any substitute for philosophy. There was no philosophy of science which he knew of that was really of serious value. There was a great body of scientific doctrine universally accepted and acted upon by educated men, but science in his judgment was still waiting for that philosophic foundation which he was sure it would some day attain, but which as yet it had not attained. In these circumstances it was absurd if they wanted to get the best view of the world as a whole, to test the value of great philosophic beliefs, to go to science. Science had nothing to tell them on that subject. Science itself was partly the material of philosophy; it could not give them a philosophy."

Statesmen as Authors

Our modern statesmen have no mean record as writers and thinkers. Lord Haldane and Lord Balfour are eminent philosophers: Mr. Fisher is a historian in the front rank, and Mr. Birrell has just collected his essays, of which the word "inimitable" so often wildly used, can be justly applied. Among biographers Lord Roseberry and Mr. Winston Churchill have a sure place, while recently Lord Birkenhead has shown that his power of vigorous writing is not unworthy of his eloquent tongue. Neither Mr. Asquith nor Mr. Lloyd George would be counted among authors in the primary sense of the word; they are men whose writing is intended to be auxiliary to their public action—a means of justification or of interpretation. But long before Lord Balfour was known as a statesman he had published his "Defence of Philosophic Doubt," a book which won for him most unfairly a reputation as a "doubter" in the matter of religion. Of course, he was never that; and no one who ever read the book supposed he was. But unhappily many people speak more freely of a book which they have not read.

At the Door

The Bishop of London on Sunday in the abbey quoted largely from an article which appeared in The Times on Saturday. It was an appeal to preachers to make Advent a season in which the individual soul would open the door and let the divine guest enter in. Here are a few passages which will show the drift of the appeal. "The preacher who wishes to speak to the condition of such hearers may cease for a while to think in terms of vast cosmic movements, or to speak of the world in terms of things; to him the knocking comes not from a power described in abstract language but from a person, whose name and purpose can be known. He is a person, and he seeks admission into a personal life. He is a spirit, and 'spirit with spirit' can meet. For other Advents the soul may not need to wait; for this spiritual Advent, the incoming of the Lord Christ—there is no need to wait; he is at the door. A Christian preacher is in order when he offers the promises of Advent to any who without tarrying will unlatch the door. There are other great and tremendous truths to be remembered; the wise and learned will discuss the bearing of the Advent message upon the meaning of progress; others will soar into cosmic heights; but the man who has the divine guest to sup with him has an Advent of his own."

Among Other Things

The members of the Church Missionary society have come to an agreement which will enable them to work together whole-heartedly, but I fear that the zealots who have formed the Bible Churchmen's Missionary society will not come back. . . . Dr. D. S. Cairns is to be the moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland. No one has made a more powerful appeal to the student world. He is a spiritual power, who in his classroom or in the pulpit deals with the great things of the faith. I shall never forget the address he gave upon the resurrection at a conference in Liverpool. It was not only a noble piece of eloquence, it was illuminating in every word. I am not sure that it is reprinted anywhere, but it should be. . . . The Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, who has been very ill, is beginning, his friends hope, to take the turn. Dr. Norwood, of the City Temple, has also had an operation for appendicitis; so far he has borne well the operation and the shock which it brings. . . . We are much interested in the moderator-designate of the church of Scotland, Professor Milligan. He has been a great minister and teacher, but to most of us outside his own country, he is known for his works on the Greek papyri and for his "Vocabulary of the Greek Testament." There are few scholars who have rendered better service to readers of the New Testament. Of this scholar a friend has written: "As parish minister he was freely resorted to and implicitly trusted; to help the humblest was never a trouble to him. Every service was rendered with the completeness and gentle grace that were his father's and mother's before him. One has yet to find the man, woman, or child whom George Milligan failed. In the pulpit he is persuasive, lucid, and attractive. In the wider world of the humanities his fame has spread, like his father's, from the insular to the continental." . . . Missions of remarkable power are being held by the Rev. Lionel Fletcher, till lately of Cardiff. He is a very wonderful gift to the churches of the Congregational order.

Christmas

This letter will appear about the time when we keep the happy festival of Christmas. It is a time when all of us who belong to different nations and different churches are drawn to the same magnetic center and behold the same wonder, when "the great love to the stable came and entered in." It does not seem to me that we should discard the mirth and overflowing goodwill of Christmas; but blended with all thoughts of gentleness and kindness, with all hilarity and mirth, there should be the memory and the living presence of the one

"Who whispered to the star to shine,
And to break, the day."

CORRESPONDENCE

Attention—Dr. D. Preston Blue!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just finished reading "Wanted—A Congregation" by Lloyd C. Douglas and was so deeply interested that for the last forty-eight hours more or less I have been, in imagination, a member of the Broad Street Church. I am so entirely in sympathy with Dr. Blue's conclusions in regard to the service that I am hoping he will call a conference of those who would like to make it more devotional, inspiring and truly worshipful. I am hoping that he will ask us to express ourselves freely so that we, a number of us, may tell him what we miss and what it is we want that we are not getting. If he does I shall say that I, for one, want to kneel when we pray as they do in Catholic, Episcopal and some other churches, and I want him, as the spirit moves him, to add to his own petitions the great prayers of the ages, such as those I read in Dr. Fosdick's books and "Prayers For God And The People" by Walter Rauschenbusch. I want specified moments of silent prayer, real ones I mean, long enough for definite communion. I would like some musical responses from the congregation and I long for an opportunity to chant the Lord's prayer, giving every word and phrase its full value. Perhaps I shall find courage to confess how grieved and offended I have been by the perfunctory and irreverent rapidity with which this, the great prayer, is so often disposed of.

I want Dr. Blue to read the scripture lesson as I have heard it read in a church I could name, as if it were a new message, an important message, a definite message which had just arrived. When the pastor of this church reads from the Bible we hardly breathe until he is done.

I hope Dr. Blue may agree with me in feeling that the sermon should be followed by prayer and benediction instead of a hymn. It seems a pity to shake off the impressions made on us by finding the number in the hymnal, rising to our feet and singing, when they might be deepened by the more quiet procedure. I want the postlude to be played in such a way as to send us forth in thoughtfulness, and not as if the organ were a band giving forth the glad news that now it is over and we can go home.

If these things could be added to those specified by Dr. Blue, to which I fervently said amen as I read them, I would bless the day I was permitted to become a member of his congregation, and I know I should be so unwilling to miss a service that I should go to church even on those Sundays when he did not preach.

Mr. Sweet's Candidacy

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue for November 30 there is an editorial under the heading, "When the Church Fell Down". This editorial contains the statement that "The election of William E. Sweet as governor of Colorado, was won against the opposition of an almost united pulpit in the city of Denver, and throughout the state." And that "he was called a bolshevist, a socialist, and an anarchist by the pulpit." And his election is "a moral embarrassment to the church that failed to see the Christian significance of Mr. Sweet's candidacy."

I do not know who your informant is, but I do know that he has sadly distorted the facts. Being a preacher myself, I was not privileged to listen to the different preachers in Denver, but according to the newspaper reports of the Sunday sermons delivered during the campaign, I read of only two Methodist parsons, who in the course of their sermons openly opposed the election of Mr. Sweet. I never heard of any others of any denomination who spoke one word against him, or called him the nasty names to which your informant refers. There are still a few of us who are old fashioned enough to believe that the pulpit is the last place on God's earth for partisan propaganda of any kind. There are still a few of us who believe that every man has a right to his own political opinions, and that no preacher should ever presume to force his political views into the minds of those who go to church to be brought nearer to God.

There never was a time when the world needed independent political and religious thought more than it does today, and the fact that William E. Sweet and one other were the only Democrats elected, reveals the significant fact that voters are exercising this independency of thought as they never exercised it before. Surely we are beginning to believe that the first duty of every man is to be honest with himself. Who is the man then who would dare to sit in judgment on the thinking and voting of our citizens? Who would dare to assume the position that his ideas on the recent election in Colorado alone are right, and that every voter ought to have seen the situation through his eyes, and voted as he voted? Who would dare to say that the church "fell down" because it refused to support one candidate as against another? Such narrowness and rank intolerance, are altogether unworthy of The Christian Century, the last source from whence I ever expected it to come.

Denver, Col. ROBERT HOPKIN.

Faith and the Miracles

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read and reread with great pleasure your editorial article in the issue for December 14 on "The Miraculous." It is helpful indeed to have this subject, which is so prominent at the present time, set forth so clearly. The fact that the article does not claim to say the last word on every phase of the subject shows that the writer appreciates both the importance and the unimportance of the theme. It expresses in words what I and, no doubt, many others, have been thinking.

It is pertinent to quote certain other men on the same subject. The late E. E. Chivers, who was my pastor in Buffalo some thirty years ago, said to me, "Miracles, which used to be considered the bulwark of the faith, have become its burden." It was not that they burdened his own faith, but that in the presentation of Christianity in these days they cannot be used as proofs as they could in former times, and that Christian teachers are often embarrassed by them in the field of apologetics.

The late Professor George B. Foster said, in the introduction to his "Finality of the Christian Religion"; "Faith is not simply a gift, it is also a task. Thus, it is not simply the amount that one believes, but it is how one comes by his belief, and what one does with it, that is decisive of character........ Our age is not one in which faith can bulk large. But, as it is not the amount that one gives that makes a true giver, so it is not the quantity that one believes that makes one a true believer. The main thing is one's interior attitude to the world and to life, and not the quantum of the credal output."

When E. Benjamin Andrews was president of Brown University he said in one of his chapel talks that if he were forced to surrender belief in every miracle recorded in the New Testament he would still believe in Jesus Christ.

There are many sincere Christian people who think that to deny the credibility of the miraculous is to deny the Christian faith and that to present the gospel as a divine message independent of miracles is a weak compromise, a compromise made in the hope of converting skeptically minded people to at least a semi-acceptance of the truth. Quite the contrary, however, this is simply presenting anew the fact that Christianity is a spiritual religion and that if it is presented in its essence and not in its externals it is applicable to the deepest human need in every age, that it is eternally true. Christian history abounds in examples of men and women holding most diverse views concerning the externals of the faith who nevertheless conspicuously proclaimed Christ by their daily life, and, like him, went about doing good. "Believe me," said Jesus, "that I am in the Father and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very works' sake."

Read Romans 6 : 1

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a subscriber to your paper, I must send my protest against the publication of the article "The Sins of Adolescence" in the issue of December 7. It is a specious plea for the justification of youth in the vicious indulgences and an encouragement of recklessness assuming that it is a normal expression of life. This is a dangerous, a false theory to present and to be broadcasted to the homes of the land at any time, and particularly at the present time when there is such a manifest breaking away from restraints of law and conventions.

Statistics disclose that the percentage of crime among young people is alarmingly on the increase. The paper presents some matters that should be recognized and this makes the article all the more menacing. A periodical seeking to enthrone Christian ideals surely should not consent to encourage questionable morals, particularly when it is going into Christian homes. I appeal to you not to make the work of Christian parents more difficult in the ideals of their children.

Any boy would get the idea that sowing "wild oats" pays and coming back is easy, even contributing to strength according to the article. A grieved subscriber.

Read Simkhovitch's "Toward an Understanding of Jesus"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Mr. Trueblood writes a very searching and stirring article. There is red blood in it and it makes one feel that if he is not a revolutionist he ought to be. He also says that Jesus did not believe in force, that he "knew a better way, the way of love." Just before this he says, "When they saw him drive the rascals from their temple traffic the holders of vested interests must have begun shaking in their boots." Does not that look like force? Now I realize that he did not use poison gas nor a machine gun but would you say his method here was simply another way of putting his arm gently around the shoulder of a pleasant faced, broad shouldered Israelite and saying in gentle tones, "Pardon me, my friend, I am a stranger to you but am very zealous for the honor of our god and I feel down deep in my soul that what you are doing here is contrary to the wishes of our Father in heaven. Excuse me, sir, for being so bold but will you not set a noble example of brotherhood and unselfishness and give up this kind of religious finance? I am sure you will make just as large an income in some other way and God will reward you also for your fine generous sacrifice." That would have been the gentler way but it would not have brought about the result that day that it did. Personally I have had some experiences with saloon keepers. It was before the Volstead act and no amount of gentlemanly attention would have moved them from their business in a million of eons. We used the ballot and even that has not driven the business from the earth. I am not suggesting force but rather saying that gentle treatment will not do in all cases. I would like to ask if "love" simply has at its command moral suasion. I should like to ask Mr. Trueblood just what he means should be included in the method of love.

Again Mr. Trueblood says: "Calling a man a Christian was much the same as calling him a bolshevist or an I. W. W. today." Jesus never said anything about dethroning kings or cutting off rich men's heads and taking away their property. Is it possible that the early Christians left in their wake any such thing as those folk called bolshevists? I understand that the I. W. W. blow up bridges, interfere with work and so intimidate trainmen in the west that they ride free on trains. Both these folk are destructive and forceful in gaining their ends. Were the early Christians like that? Did not Jesus say, "Give unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's." Did not Paul enjoin his followers to pray for the king? I know that the book of Revelation shows a hatred of the Roman empire and yet it leaves the destruction business to God. The early Christians were defiant but not destructive to my knowledge. I am willing to be set right if I am in error here. Jesus is reported to have said in one place: "Put up the sword for they that use the sword perish with the sword," and in another, "He that hath no sword let him sell his garments and buy one." Was this latter simply for defense? and if so does it not signify force in self defense? The real trouble with all of us is we don't know much but if we as Christians would put to practical functioning what we do know we might make some impression upon the world. Mr. Trueblood is quite right, "We, too, must stake all on adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man," but he might have gone further and said "on an adventurous practice of the brotherhood of man". Who is equal to this? Only he who fears not ostracism nor death. This article is very stimulating in the right direction

A Methodist Worm Turns

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Firstly, none of this is for publication if my name be attached thereto, for I am not yet ready to be retired from the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church. Secondly, I congratulate you on your paragraph in the issue of Nov. 23, entitled, "A Skulking Conservatism." Thirdly, I deplore your longer, more politic article of one week later, closing with the anticlimax: "The instance is not one to justify much emotion on either side."

I am disappointed that a journal, that on so many issues is a peerless champion of the right, should apparently consider "the Buckner incident" as a mere isolated phenomenon, and pass it over with a wave of the hand. I am not a regular reader of the New Republic, but I chanced to see their article entitled "Methodism and Intellectual Honesty". It seems to me that they have sensed the Buckner situation far more truly than have you, that "intolerance inside the church is today the worst foe of the church." If you did say anything like that at first, upon second thought (I hope not as a matter of policy after being interviewed by a representative of the Methodist church) you apologize for having said such a thing. For instance: "This minister does not appear to be a very suitable example", etc., and "—unhappy faculty of pursuing an extremely unpedagogical and irritating method."

Granted that there may have been a certain crudeness in the manner of Mr. B's presentation, it was not his crudeness but his peerless championship of the things which he believed that made him the subject of the bishop's disapproval. At first you think there is a principle at stake; later you doubt it and apologize for speaking. I doubt whether this is a case where second thoughts are nearer the truth of things than the first.

I have been preaching for eight years only, within the bounds of this conference. In the annual conference sessions I have said little, seen considerable, and done a great deal of thinking, until I am convinced that the prime essential of advancement in the Methodist Episcopal church is not the question of doctrine, nor of efficiency in one's work, but whether a man is willing to be a cog in a wheel of a machine. Not, "Is he orthodox?" or "Is he efficient?" but "Does he track?"

If Mr. Buckner had fawned before his district superintendent, in whose election he had no voice; if he had been willing to cringe before the series of presiding bishops, and incidentally recognized the ex-district superintendent and special appointees as his superiors, we would never have heard of "the Buckner case."

Wherever a man of initiative, independence, and fervor comes into a Methodist conference, one of four things happens: 1. He becomes a secretary or a bishop, in which case he has "arrived," and is henceforth kept busy making others conform. 2. He is driven from the denomination. There are many ways of "driving". Many of our strongest men have been driven out of the denomination. 3. All the initiative and independence is whipped out of him. 4. By a perfectly unscrupulous understanding between the bishop and district superintendents he is continuously appointed to charges where he can do the least "harm."

Less than a month ago a brother who has for fourteen years done very effective work in the Methodist ministry, but who did not "track", and hence was driven from the denomination, said to me, "There is absolutely nothing that the ecclesiastics will not do", and I had to respond, "Them's my sentiments, too."

My last charge was in an industrial town. I spent three years there, taking a moderately active part in the industrial disputes that arose. I feel that the best work of my life thus far was done in that town. I desired a change last conference and so informed my district superintendent and bishop. The church people, with the exception of two or three families, desired my return, but in the interest of those few families I thought it fair to them that I move. Because of my success I went to conference with light heart, expecting a promotion to the next grade of charge, as I had hitherto been moved, and had been taught that a successful pastor should move.

What I faced was this: In interview with my bishop the latter said, "Brother——, do you know why I cannot promote you?" "No, Bishop, I will be glad to learn." "Well, your reputation with the cabinet (Who appoints and controls the Cabinet? An easy means of explanation) is that you are a socialist! I know that you have done good work at ——, but I simply cannot promote you for this reason. I know you are a bright . . . great possibilities . . . and if you will take my advice . . . a great future for you . . . Just use the soft pedal on these matters of social reform; preach the gospel! It is reported to me that in matters of dispute between employers and employes you always support the employes." And so I was side-tracked, becauuse I then and there told the bishop that there are many things in the life of a minister that are worth more than a "promotion".

I am certain that if today I were to write my bishop, expressing regret that I did not accept his advice last conference, and that henceforth I will refrain from preaching the social gospel, I would again be in the good graces of my bishop and be in time for "promotion". This "skulking" popery and hypocritical intolerance makes me—and doubtless makes you—sick. But this, too, I presume, is "an instance that does not justify much emotion on either side.' Thanking you if you have read to the close, but please do not give me away, as I hope to live to fight another day.

Let's See—Just What was the Question the Student was Asked?

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: I noticed in a recent issue of your paper an article in which a professor in some theological seminary was criticized because he had rejected an examination paper from one of his students, and the student immediately packed up his goods and went to some other school disgusted with the proceeding.

In the article published by you his conduct was not only approved but the wisdom of the professor was seriously questioned. I have been a teacher for twenty years in a theological seminary and I think I have the right to speak in defense of that professor. It seems to me that the view point from which the article was written is not the right one. If a man were in any scientific school and were requested to write a paper giving the views of some ancient physicist upon the subject of heat for example, and came to the class with a paper that presented an entirely different theory of heat, that professor would certainly reject the paper. If a man in a school were being examined on the philosophy of Plato and he brought in a paper embodying the philosophy of some modern man, his paper would properly be rejected because he was set to present Plato's philosophy. The same kind of test prevails in a theological seminary. If a man were asked to present the theology of Calvin he had no business to present the theology of some other man. If he were asked to present the ecclesiology of the Episcopal church it would not answer if he were to present the theology of the Roman Catholic church. The fact that professors require students to present the subject assigned does not by any means imply that they assent to the views presented. They are only giving historical resume. If they were being examined for ordination then their papers would be supposed to present their own views. Then an unsatisfactory paper would justify the refusal to ordain them. If any theological school should refuse to teach or require examination of any view but the one which even the professor himself held, he would at once be accused of unjustifiable conceit.

I remember many years ago the statement of a Presbyterian minister who was inaugurated as the president of a theological seminary in Chicago and in the opening address he said: Students come here not to make a theology but to learn one which is already made. I venture to say that they would hardly be accepted now.

Not a Naval Day But a Navy Day

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: In your issue of November 9, you point out that "in the light of the efforts that have been put forth to establish a 'naval day', it is clear that even in America the lust of war is not abated." We, who are in the navy, think that you may have missed the point entirely. It was not a "naval day" but "navy day." The purpose of the day was to acquaint the American people with the navy, its splendid men and officers, its program for peace, and its desire for any duty of service. It was John Mitchell, an American sailor and now an officer, who defended the missionaries of American churches at Peking during the Boxer uprising. It was the American sailors who saved the lives of helpless women and children a decade ago during the Mexican Revolutions. It was American cruisers who rescued helpless Russians three years ago when they were pushed into the Black Sea by the bolsheviki. It was the American destroyers who saved the lives of thousands of Greeks when the Turks took Smyrna. It was the secretary of the navy who provided the facts which led to the far-reaching results of the conference for the limitation of armament.

Navy day did not increase the spirit of militarism in the minds of the American people but it did increase the respect of the country for the hard working sailor who serves his country with the same desire to serve as did his forbears who fought for freedom of the seas in 1812, for the freedom of the Cubans in 1898, and for the freedom of the world in 1918.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Aquaintance

Blue Law Fight Is On in Ohio

The moving picture interests in Ohio have organized politically to fight the existing law with regard to censorship and to the keeping of Sunday. Under the present law the theaters may be closed on the Lord's day since there is a penalty for transacting business on Sunday other than "works of necessity." The Ohio Church Federation is broadcasting this news to the churches and it is believed that when the movie campaign is staged it will be successfully resisted by the churches. There are three court decisions on record against Sunday shows for profit in the state of Ohio, and in these decisions moving pictures are held to be theatrical exhibitions. The use of films in the churches on Sunday nights is being opposed by certain moving picture interests. A Cleveland pastor reports a contract canceled for his film supply by one of the corporations.

Bishop James M.. Thoburn Passes

The death of Bishop James M. Thoburn of the Methodist church removes one of the foremost missionaries of the world. For some years he has been living quietly in Ohio enjoying his well-earned rest from long labors in India, but in every conversation he showed that his heart was in India. He went to India in 1859 at the age of 23, and continued as missionary there until his retirement in 1908. Methodism was in its infancy in India when he went there, but on his retirement there were six annual conferences and missions, 3,312 Sunday schools, 134,790 communicants in India proper, and the work had overflowed the boundaries of India into Burmah and Malaysia. He was a vigorous defender of his ideas, and he often came into conflict with Dr. Buckley, the veterand Methodist editor. The latter gave this generous tribute at the time of Dr. Thoburn's retirement: "There has never been a man like unto him in the Methodist Episcopal church, for the purpose to which he devoted his life. With simplicity mingled with sagacity; with straightforward English, and yet at times, under inspiration reaching the spirit of the words of the ancient prophets, but more frequently of the apostle John, he has persuaded us when he could not convince, and convinced us when he could not persuade. Consequently he had his way, which he believed was God's way."

Denies Churches Would Push Government into War

The attitude of the churches in this country has been misrepresented by many. Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert asserts that the churches are not trying to push the government into war in connection with the Near East crisis but are trying to push the government into peace. He says: "We are trying to secure a just and righteous settlement so that future war can be averted. Who really doubts that by the positive and unequivocal use of America's prestige and economic power it might be possible for us to have direct and well-nigh conclusive influence in securing the protection of the oppressed minorities? If Great Britain and France and America should say together, clearly and unambiguously, 'All massacres must cease; permanent protection must be given to the Armenian people,' that voice could hardly be disobeyed. But we cannot say this by holding snugly aloof and implying that it is none of our affairs. We can say it only by joining with those nations in conference in such a way as to give effective expression to the concern of America for a settlement that will insure justice and permanent peace."

Congregation Hears Pastor's Creed

REV. John Ray Ewers, pastor of East Side church of the Disciples in Pittsburgh, is an avowed liberal who combines modern thinking with evangelistic passion. He was made the target of many bitter attacks when his church voted to practice Christian union by receiving Christians from other communions without rebaptism, but these criticisms have not prevented his church from maintaining its position as the leading Disciples church of Pittsburgh. The common type of assault on the reputation of such a minister is that he does not believe anything. Mr. Ewers believes a lot of things, and on a recent Sunday he decided to tell his congregation about it. Disciples churches use no credal statement other than some version of the Petrine confession, but Mr. Ewers formulated his personal beliefs on God, Christ, the Holy Spirit, prayer and the Bible.

On these topics Mr. Ewers spoke in a vital and evangelical way, confessing Christ as the unique Son of God and receiving the Bible as inspired "not mechanically but vitally." In his statement about prayer he says: "I do not wish to dictate to God." The concluding portion of his creed is more unusual than his treatment of the great themes of the Christian faith. He says:

"I believe that the pictures given of heaven in the Bible are symbolical but that they are essentially true. Heaven, I think, is the home of the soul, the spiritual home of all the noble of all the ages. To enter such a company will be the reward of control, suffering, and Christ-like living in this world, through the grace of Jesus and the favor of God. I believe that virtue has its reward and that the acceptance of Jesus, in truth, is to be found in the eternal companionship of God, Jesus and the saints of all times.

"I believe that the pictures given of hell in the Bible are symbolical but are essentially true, standing for the punishment of wickedness and the denial of Jesus. I believe that all sin carries punishment in its train. I believe that part of that punishment will consist in remorse over wasted opportunities and selfish use of them. I believe that part of that punishment, the major part, will consist in separation from the companionship of God, Jesus and the good and great of all ages. I frankly confess that in my inmost soul I fear the lashings of outraged conscience and the banishment from the society of the good, which sin would bring about.

"Because I believe in organization and cooperation I believe in the church as the social group whose duty it is to bring the kingdom of God into this whole world. I believe that the church was divinely founded and that it holds a divine task. I regret the many weaknesses, divisions, and mistakes that the historical church has shown to a doubting world. I believe that strength, unity and success can only come by a return, not formally but spiritually, to our Divine Master. The church, to me, is broader than any one denomination, it includes all those who accept and who seek to follow Jesus as Lord. I regard all such disciples as my brothers in the common faith. I believe that the church of today has drifted far from the simple spirituality of its founder and needs to return to the pure life, the love of humanity and the beautiful spirit that dominated Jesus.

"I believe that our religion appeals to the best intellects and therefore that emphasis should be placed upon the cultural side of our faith. Children should be given correct ideas of God, Jesus, and all the items mentioned above. The end of such education, in religion, would be the love of God and of Jesus, and the joyful and whole-hearted acceptance of their way of life.

"My Christian experience being so rich and happy leads me to desire to share it with as many others as possible. Therefore a holy zeal burns in my heart to tell the story of Jesus and his love to everyone possible. I believe that this can be done by personal interviews, by public testimony and by the quiet influence of a true life. I believe that I cannot remain a Christian unless I try to build up the kingdom of my Master.

"I believe that the final test of the value of my religious faith is demonstrated to an unconvinced world by the genuineness of my social service. I believe that society has a right to expect from me, as a man who wears the name of Christ, expressions of love in the form of social justice, mercy and righteousness. I believe that this service cannot be given without sacrifice and suffering upon my part, and, in the spirit of Jesus, I am glad to give these proofs to the world, to the limit of my ability. I am convinced that this spiritual attitude and service is the key that will unlock all the conflicting social problems of today and of all days."

Methodists Put Millions Into Hospitals

Methodist hospitals are now being erected in various parts of the country which will aggregate a cost of two and a half millions. The number of hospitals in America under Methodist control is 76, and these institutions have a combined budget of six and a half millions. The Methodists have 37 homes for the aged, of which the cost of maintenance is $600,000 a year. In the 44 homes for children the investment for property and endowment is $5,500,000. In figures like these there is food for thought for the member of the fraternal order who frequently asserts that the church is not doing anything for the children and the aged. The work of the Protestant churches far outstrips that of the fraternal orders in the work of benevolence.

St. Louis Ministers Reach Shop Men

Fifty thousand workers in twenty St. Louis factories have heard the gospel preached at the noon hour during the past eleven months by seventy-eight different ministers under the direction of the St. Louis Church Federation. It is asserted that through this means many men are induced to go to church and to find a place once more in church activities. At the annual meeting of the federation on Dec. 7, Rev. Arthur H. Armstrong made his annual report. Among the unique features was a pageant called "The City Beautiful" under the direction of Prof. H. Augustine Smith. Dr. Robert E. Speer, president of the Federal Council of Churches, was present and spoke on the theme "This Day of Ours and Our Common Duty." Rev. George A. Campbell in behalf of the comity committee reported the most amicable relations among the denominations as they go forward in the location of new churches in the city.

People Can Now Join Church by Radio

The first church to establish a radio associate membership is the East End Church of the Disciples, in Pittsburgh, of which Rev. John Ray Ewers, is pastor. He broadcasted a sermon recently at the end of which, like a good Disciple, he "gave the invitation" and announced that his church would receive as associate members people at a distance who had no convenient access to a church. These "radio" members will attend the service at a distance, and will be given an opportunity to contribute.

Great Presbyterian Gathering in Kansas City

The reorganization of the Presbyterian missionary, benevolent and educational agencies is now complete. The time has come for active promotion of these interests through the new machinery that has been set up. The western and southwestern sections of the church met at Kansas City, Dec. 4-7 under the leadership of the New Era secretaries. The attendance from outside the city was six hundred while thousands from Kansas City churches were in attendance during the various sessions. Westport Avenue Presbyterian church was host to the meeting. This is one of the leading missionary churches of the denomination and is presided over by Dr. George P. Baity. Many group meetings were held in which stewardship, missionary education, New Era organization and lay responsibilities were discussed. Dr. Robert E. Speer gave a moving address on the sorrow in the near east which was regarded by many as the strongest address he ever made. The governor of Kansas was present with a defense of his industrial court. The sessions closed with a most impressive communion service in which the sacrament was administered by Dr. Lewis S. Mudge, the stated clerk of

Federal Council Holds Annual Meeting

CHURCHMANSHIP has a wide variety of representation in American Protestantism, and the extremes come together at the annual meetings of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. At Indianapolis in the three days sessions beginning December 13 less than two hundred men were in attendance, but it would be hard to find another two hundred American ministers whose names carry collectively so great weight. The plump bishop with collar buttoned behind sat beside young, athletic city ministers. In the addresses counsels of caution were mingled with open expressions of derision for the ancient quarrels about baptism, the Lord's Supper, apostolic succession and the virgin birth.. That extremes so violently opposed in everything should yet cohere in an organization whose authority grows from year to year is one of the hopeful miracles of modern Protestant life. One still hears the ancient defences of a denominational order, but increasingly the utterances and actions of the great Protestant leaders look in another direction—that of a united and modernized church in which the Christianity of Jesus replaces the hellenized and romanized substitutes for his gospel.

THIRTY DENOMINATIONS

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has thirty actively cooperating denominations. Episcopalians and Lutherans have an unofficial but real cooperation, though participating in none of the votes taken. The Southern Baptists alone of the great evangelical denominations of the country hold aloof. Southern Presbyterians have been in and out, but are back again. Lutherans complain of the lact of dogmatic standards in the Federal Council. Among Episcopalians the opposition to participation in the Council is among the high church group who do not desire their communion to be identified as Protestant. Four hundred official representatives make up the Council, which meets quadrennially, and a smaller delegate group makes up the executive committee. An administration committee meets in New York once a month so the organization has machinery that functions the year round. Dr. Robert E. Speer is president of the organization. Dr. Frederick A. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary society, was chairman of the executive committee this year. Rev. Charles S. MacFarland and Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert are general secretaries located in New York, and Dr. H. L. Willett is western secretary with an office in Chicago. The various commissions have a numerous secretarial force. The sessions were held this year in First Baptist church of Indianapolis, of which Dr. F. E. Taylor, president of the Northern Baptist convention, is pastor.

The sessions of the first day were gladdened by the report of the reunion of the Evangelical denomination which was presented by Bishop S. P. Spreng. Bishop McDowell and Rev. John T. Axton, chief of chaplains of the United States Army indicated something of the significant advance that has been made in the chaplains service in the army. Probably in no army of the world do so many men attend divine worship, the attendance records being better than in the average town or village. The Federal Council recommended that each denomination should provide its own chaplains with an allowance of three hundred dollars a year with which to procure the equipment necessary to worship, such as hymn books, communion sets and other necessities. No chaplain is now appointed without the approval of his denominational leaders and of the Federal Council Committee.

EVANGELISTIC RESULTS

The Federal Council believes that among the cooperative tasks which the Protestant churches can perform best together is that of evangelism. Cooperative evangelism added 37,000 to the evangelical churches of Chicago last year. One of the foremost addresses on this theme was given by Dr. Ozora S. Davis who said: "But there must be another interpretation of the gospel to the modern man. This must be a new revelation of the energy of the gospel in daily life. We have connected it too exclusively with the specific acts of the church, and not enough with the daily toil of the factory and farm. We have thought too exclusively of the gospel as pointing the way to heaven and not enough of it as commanding and empowering men for the heavenly life on earth." The professional evangelist who has fattened upon a gospel of slang and ridicule would have found scant comfort in the evangelistic sessions at Indianapolis. The churches were exhorted that they could hire no one to do their own work. Evangelism is the task of the whole church the whole year round, and not a spasm directed by the itinerant preacher on his irregular visits.

The Social Service Commission held some live sessions. Thursday evening program was too much crowded to give the general assembly. The leading lights of the denomination spent the week filling picked leaders with the information and the inspiration for a marked forward movement in every type of benevolent effort, and one may safely expect this effort to bring large results this coming year.

Church Fathers Were Heretics and Liberals

Several Disciples ministers are engaged in the interesting occupation of printing and circulating pamphlets which show the fathers of the movement to be heretics according to conservative standards today. Dean W. J. Lhamon, of Liscomb, Ia., has circulated a tract giving his Congress address of last spring in which he writes of Alexander Campbell as repudiating the conception that the unimmersed are not Christians. Much more of a similar nature is to be found in a tract gotten out by the Campbell Institute, of which Dr. E. S. Ames of Chicago is secretary. The College of the Bible Quarterly, published in Lexington, Ky., contains in a recent issue many excerpts from the writings of Barton W. Stone. The latter says: "There are two kinds of authoritative creeds—one drawn up in articles and printed or written in a book—the other a set of doctrines or opinions received but not committed to writing, or printed in a book. Each of these creeds is used for the same kind of a purpose, which is to exclude from fellowship the man who dares to dissent from them. Of the two, we certainly give preference to the creeds written and published; because we can then read them, and form a more correct judgment of the doctrines contained in them.

Fundamentalist Ministers Organization in Chicago not Flourishing

Hundreds of ministers attend the great union gatherings in Chicago when the call of a social and international Christianity is put forth in these great sessions. On one side is a little group of ministers who meet to cultivate suspicion and ill-will toward their brethren. These are called the Fundamentalists Ministers Union of Chicago. A meeting at the LaSalle Hotel on Dec. 11 was attended by less than a score of men. There are more than this number of ultra-conservative ministers in Chicago, but the pursuit of heresy-hunting does not seem to be as popular as formerly.

Disciples Aid in Russia

The Disciples of Christ have for a number of years been in correspondence with a certain sect of evangelical Christians of Russia. Letters have been coming through this year indicating the desperate straits of the Russian group so a committee was organized in America to assist in relief work. The American Disciples gather money, and with this money purchase food drafts which are honored by the American Relief organization. A special call has come recently, and in many of the Disciples churches special offerings will be received at the Christmas time.

Julian Mack Criticizes Missionaries

Julian Mack, a magazine writer, in an address before the City Club of Chicago recently declared that the geisha girls of Japan did not deserve the reputation they bore in the western world. He further asserted that this reputation rested upon false information given by missionaries. This is not the first time a traveller making casual observations of a mission land has come home declaring the ignorance of the missionaries. Mission study manuals indicate that geisha girls, like cabaret singers in America, are not all bad, but exposed to peculiar temptations which makes their average rather bad. Meanwhile one wonders whether the newspaper writer ever read an honest-to-goodness missionary manual, or ever talked to a real live missionary.

Fundamentalist Charge against President Stewart Does not Stand

Dr. Griffith-Thomas some time ago made an extensive tour in China, and his sensational charges against Chinese missionaries have been a source of trouble in the Christian world ever since. The orthodoxy of President J. Leighton Stewart of Peking University was impeached. Dr. Stewart recently appeared before the presbytery in New Jersey that ordained him, known as a very conservative presbytery, and stated his religious views. The presbytery made a minute declaring its confidence in the doctrinal soundness of the eminent missionary. This minute has been given large publicity by the foreign missions board.

Fate of Orthodox Patriarch Hangs in Balance

Meletios, the ecumenical patriarch of the Orthodox church, the most eminent ecclesiastic of that communion, has a position of great difficulty. Seven metropolitans seceded before his election, and he must try to win these back to loyalty. He favors the translation of the scriptures into modern Greek, but in the disorderly political situation it is impossible to secure the money or to assemble the scholars. He is friendly to the Prot-

any of the able men a full opportunity, but it was worth while to see such a trinity as a labor union editor, a director of employment of a great factory and a prominent Christian minister sitting upon one platform. They said things that harmonized in the big fundamentals. Dr. E. F. Tittle, pastor of First Methodist church of Evanston, Ill., plead for a pulpit that would see the world through the eyes of Jesus Christ. "If anything stands condemned should not the pulpit say so? It is not the business of the pulpit to furnish blue prints, but to hold up ideals. Christian laymen must seek means by which principles may be applied. In its corporate life the church can become a prophet. I hope to live to see the day when a whole denomination will seek first the kingdom of God, even at the loss of its own life."

INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS

The various phases of the international obligations of the churches took up by far the greater part of the time of the sessions. It was conceived by the various leaders that in general the church has two duties to the nations across the sea. One of these is philanthropic, the feeding of the hungry. The other is political, the speaking of the right word in behalf of international harmony and justice. In the work of philanthropy the great leaders for the most part frown upon efforts to let denominational propaganda ride into Europe on the philanthropic wagon. The Federal Council officers decidedly favor the policy of aiding the Orthodox church in Russia to reform itself, rather than to introduce into Russia our American sectarianism. The presence of the new Orthodox bishop of Chicago throughout the sessions and his message of thanksgiving from his superior officers in Russia together with his apostolic benediction was a most striking feature of the sessions. Politically the religious leaders seem to be practically unanimous against the policy of American isolation. Demand was made for American participation in the international court of justice, and President Harding was memorialized to call another international congress in which the economic reconstruction of Europe would be considered. Further action was taken committing the churches to the principle of American participation in some association of the family of nations which might be the League of Nations or something else.

Much legislation passed the sessions of the executive committee, some of it of a routine sort, but much of large significance. The churches are urged to provide $60,000 with which to complete the union church at Balboa on the Canal strip. The Volstead Act is vigorously defended. A protest cabled to Lausanne against the proposed removal of the Patriarch of Constantinople from his ancient see.

At the closing session Bishop Brent made a keynote address on American obligation in the international situation. He said in part: "No one will dispute the function of representative government to interpret and apply the mind of the people, but in order that it may do this, the voice of the people must be heard. Organized Christianity must be alert in pressing on the attention of the government the mind of its constituency in all matters that pertain to the moral responsibility of the nation and to the sanctity of human life. A democratic government that merely awaits the mandate of the people without instituting a progressive course of education among its citizenship is abdicating leadership. I am voicing the thought of multitudes of American Christians when I express the opinion that our government should give the country a clearer idea of its mind on the community of nations."

Marriage Through the Ages

KINGS—nations—cities—these may come and go, but the relationship of man to woman has endured through all time. The history of marriage is the history of the race. From the earliest dawn of civilization until today man has sought his woman in the manner of his time. Between the brutal courtship of primitive man and the finished lovemaking of modern man lies a crowded history more fascinating than any story ever invented—for it is true.

And you may learn this story, as well as thousands of other amazing facts in that stupendous work—

H. G. WELLS' Outline of History

Long Ministerial Career Crowned By Communitv Affection

A singularly gracious and significant ministerial career came to an end with the recent passing of Rev. M. M. Goode of St. Joseph, Mo., who had attained to his eighty-fifth year. Mr. Goode had been a resident of St. Joseph for forty-one years, having been pastor of the First Christian churuch for seventeen years and afterward of the Wyatt Street Christian church up to a few years prior to his death. The entire community regardless of denomination shared in the affection which his long ministry called forth.

Quakers Decide Upon Reorganization

The Five Years' Meeting in Quaker phraseology corresponds with the national convention of other denominations. The annual meetings are in a general way similar to state conventions. The executive committee was in session in Richmond, Ind., recently and many changes were agreed upon. A new general secretary to succeed Dr. Walter C. Woodward will be elected. He has been directing the central offices since 1917, and is also editor of the American Friend. Milo S. Hinkle, executive secretary of the foreign missions committee, will do promotional work in the yearly meetings, and the office of assistant secretary has been abandoned. Many of these changes are dictated by a desire to cut expenses.

Methodist Review anu Pseudo-Fundamentalism

A recent issue of the Methodist Review, a bi-monthly journal makes a distinction that is of importance in ecclesiastical phraseology. It insists that modern minded Christians are fundamentalists in that they are true to the real fundamentals of Jesus Christ. The other sort are pseudo-fundamentalists. The journal says: "The Pseudo-Fundamentalists of our day are again placing emphasis on doctrines which have no relation to life—such as the verbal inspiration of the Bible, its inerrancy not only in historical detail, but in scientific statement, literalism in its interpretation even when its language is absolutely symbolical, the Jewish conception of the messiahship as culminating in a visible kingdom, dogmatic definitions of the deity of our Lord, the atonement, and the trinity, which would close the eyes of the church to growing visions of Christ, his cross, and the divine nature—in other words substituting everywhere a static and dead for a living theology."

HAVE YOU READ
"Mountain Scenes from the Bible"
By William Robert Polhamus, S.T.D.
(Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.)
The book is modern and progressive in its treatment of an important but neglected phase of Divine Revelation, yet maintains a high spiritual note throughout. Enthusiastically endorsed by professors in our leading Christian Universities.
EVERY STUDENT OF THE BIBLE, EVERY LOVER OF THE MOUNTAINS SHOULD READ IT.
A Timely Christmas or Birthday Suggestion.
Ask your dealer for it. Or write for it to Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Or address Fifth Wheel, First Methodist Church, Massillon, Ohio. Price $2.00 net.

THE MESSAGE OF STEWARDSHIP
By RALPH S. CUSHMAN
This book has been written out of a deep desire to indicate more clearly the inestimable value of the stewardship message, by showing that the principle of stewardship underlies the entire message of the Old and New Testaments. The book is prepared for use in daily devotions and for classes in the study of stewardship. To the latter end the introductory section of each will assure additional help. Material for helps for class and individual study will be found at the close of each chapter, and special emphasis has been laid on the stewardship of business.
Price, net, $1.00, postpaid.
ADVENTURES IN STEWARDSHIP
By RALPH S. CUSHMAN and MARTHA F. BELLINGER
"It will be very useful to pastors and other Church workers who are urging the matter of stewardship in any of its phases to make a careful study of this little book. It is established upon things practical."
—The Christian Advocate.

Play-Writing

A professional course in play writing is offered under the personal supervision of Theodore Ballou Hinckley, Elitor of THE DRAMA, assisted by famous playwrights, critics, actors and producers.

PERSONALIZED CRITICISM OF YOUR PLAY

The course covers a year of individualized instruction in dramatic technique. You will be taken step by step through study courses, books and practice plays, from the simplest rudiments up to the actual completion of plays. Your work will receive the individual attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticisms will be directed at your specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and your dialogue, and give you definite, constructive criticism and help.

PRODUCERS WILL READ YOUR PLAYS

Throughout the entire course the aim is toward the completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers. If your manuscript has the endorsement of THE DRAMA, it will receive a reading by managers.

LIMITED ENROLLMENT

Since the work is so carefully personalized, the enrollment is limited to people of real promise. If you have ideas and imagination, you will find the practical dramatic technique and honest, competent criticism of this course of inestimable value to you. Fill out the coupon and mail it for complete information.

WHY GENERAL PERSHING READS THE OUTLOOK

AMONG our excellent periodicals The Outlook has a very high place. Through its columns one may keep in touch with current events and with the many National problems that can be rightly solved only when public opinion is enlightened. Its views are always clearly and frankly stated. The Outlook does not restrict itself to the more momentous questions, but contains weekly articles, written in entertaining style, on subjects of general interest to our citizens. The service rendered the public by The Outlook has commended it to me most highly.

Glimpses of foreign lands are always interesting.

"But," the student of human nature will ask, "what do the people think?"

The Living Age

gives you the answer to this question.

Every week it publishes the best articles from all over the world.

The leaders of the nations express the ideals of their own people through their ow npress.

The most eminent Statesmen, Scientists, Artists, Scholars, Financiers and Men of Letters are represented in the LIVING AGE.

Their judgments are the soundest we can get.

As a citizen of the world, can you ignore them?

An Invitation

New York, December, 1923.

Dear Friend:

The season suggests to us the possibility of urging upon you the support of one of our most liberal and independent journals—the New York Nation. We believe that few others are so fearlessly devoted to ethical ideals and to the cause of peace, have so true and wise an international vision, or realize more clearly the need of a new and more just world. In its columns appear, moreover, news from all quarters of the globe, not found elsewhere.

We earnestly urge you not only to subscribe to The Nation, if you have not already done so, but to counsel your friends to do likewise. Aside from the quality of this weekly itself, we base our appeal to you upon the fact that the liberal, independent, and unbought press in America is struggling with great difficulty against heavy odds. Without a brave and free press, liberty perishes.
